Ah ! mais que fallait-il donc faire ? Et c'est moi-même qui l'ai chassé ! Plutôt que de me contraindre dans tout ce factice qui m'étouffait le cœur, j'aurais dû lui parler simplement et ne pas l'étourdir par le caquet de mes élégances ineptes. Si j'avais été une autre, je lui aurais plu peut-être ? Il lui faudrait quelqu'un avec moins de fard aux pommettes, de sottises aux lèvres, de singeries dans les manières ; une femme... qui le gagnerait par la modestie de sa tendresse... une bonne épouse... une simple bourgeoise.

LE ROI.

Tu veux en être une ?

JEANNE.

Est-ce qu'il m'aimerait alors ?

LE ROI.

Je le pense !

JEANNE.

Comment le devenir ?

LE ROI.

Oli ! cela est facile !

JEANNE.

Fais donc !

LE ROI.

Tu l'exiges !

JEAN N E. Oui î oui ! Ou Jonc le trou\er ?

LE ROI, Venir dînant p.ir la iii.u'i, .née autorité.

Viens ! Par là ! Suis-moi !

SIXIÈME TABLEAU

LE ROYAUME DU POT-AU-FEU

Le théâtre représente la place de ville, en hémicycle. Toutes les rues y aboutissent, de façon que l'on peut apercevoir d'un seul coup d'œil la ville entière. Les maisons, toutes pareilles et d'une architecture pitoyable, à façade nue, sont peintes en couleur chocolat, avec des réchampis blancs. Au milieu de la place, porté par un trépied et sur les charbons embrasés, bouillonne un gigantesque pot-au-feu.

Autour du pot-au »feu, il y a, rangés en demi-cercle, des fauteuils de bureau en acajou, dans lesquels se tiennent assis les épiciers, tous en serpillière et en casquette de loutre. Derrière eux, des deux côtés de la scène, debout, les différentes corporations de la ville, portant des bannières, où l'on voit écrit : BUREAUCRATIE, SCIENCES, LITTERATURE, etc. Les savants ont des toques et des abat-jour verts ; les littérateurs, un mirliton et un encrier passés en bandoulière sur la hanche ; les bureaucrates, des bouts de manche de percale noire avec une plume de ter à l'oreille. Tous les citoyens portent la barbe en collier et ont (à l'exception des épiciers) des redingotes à la propriétaire et des clipeaux-tromblons sur la tête.

Le grand pontife, au milieu de la scène, derrière le pot-au-feu, faisant face au spectateur et monté sur un escabeau, dépasse la multitude. Des deux côtés, sur le devant, un groupe de collégiens, coiffés de képis, joue de l'accordéon. Aux fenêtres des maisons, il y a des femmes à bonnets tuyautés et en robe de laine brune ; sur les toits à tuiles rouges, des chats. Au-delà, un ciel gris.

SCÈNE PREMIÈRE

La toile se lève aux sous nulancoliques des accordéons joués par les collégiens, et qui se prolongent quelque temps encore après quelle est entièrement levée. Puis il se fait un silence. On entend bouillonner le pot-au-feu tout doucement, et enfin le grand pontife commence.

LE GRAND PONTIFE, une écumoire à la main.

Citoyens, bourgeois, croûtons ! En ce jour solennel, où nous sommes réunis pour adorer le trois fois saint Pot-au-Feu, emblème des intérêts matériels, autrement dit des plus chers ! si bien que, grâce à vous, le voilà maintenant presque un<sup>2</sup> divinité !... C'est à moi, le grand pontife de ce culte sage, qu'il incombe de vous remémorer vo= ; devoirs et do vous relier tous, par un act » ' commun, à la vénération, à l'amour, à la frénésie du Pot-au-Feu !

Vos devoirs, ô Bourgeois, nul d'entre vous, je le déclare, n'y a transgressé ! Vous vous êtes tenus philosophiquement dans vos maisons, ne pensant qu'à vos affaires, à vous-mêmes seulement ; et vous vous êtes bien gardés de lever jamais les yeux vers les étoiles, sachant que c'est le moyen de tomber dans les puits. Continuez votre petit bonhomme de chemin, qui vous mènera au repos, à la richesse et à la considération ! Ne manquez point de haïr ce qui est exorbitant ou héroïque, — pas d'enthousiasme surtout ! — et ne changez rien à quoi que ce soit, ni à vos idées, ni à vos redingotes ; car le bonheur particulier, comme le public, ne se trouve que dans la tempérance de l'esprit, l'immutabilité des usages et le gloulou du pot-au-feu !

Accordéons.

A vous d'abord, colonnes de la patrie, exemples du commerce, base de la moralité, protecteurs des arts, Épiciers !

Les épiciers se lèvent.

Jurez-vous de toujours mettre de la chicorée dans le café ?

LES ÉPICIERS, en chœur.

Oui !

LE GRAND PONTIFE.

Et de ne pas quitter le comptai.-, sauf, bien entendu, pour venir sur votre seuil indiquer aux badauds la route qu'il faut suivre ; enfin, de vous infusionner dans le inonde par toutes sortes de moyen®, alliances et propagande, de manière à faire prévaloir vos principes et à demeurer, ce que vous êtes, les rois de l'humanité, les dominateurs universels ?

TOUS LES ÉPICIERS, debout, la main étendue vers le pot-au-feu.

Nous le jurons !

LE GRAND PONTIFE.

Ft vous, Bureaucrates !

LES BUREAUCRATES.

Présents !

LE GRAND PONTIFE.

ÊtCi-vous bien résolu à travailler toujours le moins possible, en ne songeant toujours qu'à votre avancement ?

LES BUREAUCRATES.

Oh ! oui !

LE GRAND PONTIFE.

Jurez-vous de toujours brûler effroyablement de bois flans vos po »-| ? s, d ? vous montrer incivils, de maudire vos chefs en vous plaignant de l'existence, et de dépenser pour cent écus d'écritures dans une affaire de vingt-cinq centimes, dont vous ferez attendre la solution pendant quinze ans ?

LES BUREAUCRATES. Nous le jurons !

LE GRAND PONTIFE. Messieurs les Savants, lumières du pays, à votre tour !

Les Savants se présentent à di mi courbés, avec un tremblement sénile.

LE GRAND PONTIFE, d'un ton familier. Vous vous engagez, n'est-ce pas, comme par le passé, à ne faire que des petites recherches innocentes, qui ne troublent rien ?

TOUS LES SAVANTS, levant les mains. Oui ! oui ! N'ayez pas peur ! Nous le jurons.

LE GRAND PONTIFE. Cela suffit ! — Venez maintenant, vous, talents honnêtes qui charmez nos soirées de famille. L'Art étant fait pour récréer, vous nous récréez. Allons !

LES POÈTES COMIQUES étendent tous la main vers le pot-au-feu, en faisant :

Cocorico !

Ricanements dans l'assemblée.

LE GRAND PONTIFE, souriant aux épiciers qui l'entourent.

Encore un peu d'excentricité dans la forme ; mais les intentions sont si pure ; !

Il frappe atec son éeirr.oire sur le pot-au-feu pour réclamer

Vattentio n.

Un dernier mot, Messieurs, à la Jcune.se, au printemps de la vie.

Sur un signe qu'il leur fait, les coll<gi ;ns s'approchent avec leurs accordéons sous le bras.

Approchez, Ëphèbes, approchez ! Jeunes gens, notre espoir, vous allez entrer dans l'âge des passions ! Prenez garde, c'est comme si vous pénétriez dans une poudrière ; la moindre étincelle, tombant sur vos cerveaux, peut faire sauter l'édifice ! On a eu soin d'écarter de vous toutes les torches, je le sais : n'importe ! Il n'en faut pas moins se défier des ardeurs du sang et de l'imagination ; elles ne produisent que des crimes et des folies ! ou plutôt, utilisez vos vices ! employez profitablement vos mauvais instincts ! Que ceux, pa~ exemple, cjui savent gagner au jeu rapportent leur argent à la maison, et qu'ils le placent ! Amusez-vous en cachette, économiquement ; prenez un bon état, et ne rentrez, jamais passé dix heures du soir. Voilà le secret.
Jurez-vous de l'observer ?

LES COLLEGIENS.

Nous le jurons !

Ils retournent à leur place«

LÊ CHATEAU DES COEURS.

LE GRAND PONTIFE.

Je suL ému, Mes ;icurs ! Tant de raison dans cet âge m'a touché, et si la fête n'était pas terminée, je succomberais à mon émotion. Elle est terminée, car il n'est pas besoin de vous demander de serment, à vous...

Il s'adresse aux feumus qui sont aux fmètres.

gardiennes et cause de notre félicité, épouses, ménagères, petites-mamans pot-au-feu ! C'est par vos soins qu'il mijote ! Donc, persévérez dans vos deux préoccupations chéries : 1° raccommorder les chaussettes de vos légitimes, et 2° être toujours en garde contre les séductions de la gaudriole. Ne songez même qu'à cela, incessamment, exclusivement. Bref, n'oubliez pas que l'attitude la plus belle pour une femme, sa position idéale, si j'ose m'exprimer ainsi, est de se tenir quelque peu agenouillée, avec une écumoire à la main, un bas de laine passé dans le bras gauche, tournant dos à Cupidon, et la tête perdue dans la vapeur du pot-au-feu !

Et vous, Chats, inconstants quadrupèdes, bohémiens des toits ! Si vous n'employez pas tout votre temps et la force de votre gueule à nous prendre des souris, on vous mettra des muselières et l'on vous empalera avec la broche, puisque la Nature vous a créés pour nous être utile ». Mais, que si vous devenez sédentaires et zélés à nous servir, on vous laissera au fond de l'as ; icitte quelques gouttes froides du pot-au-feu !

Et toi, Soleil, puisses-tu, bien avant toujours modérément, te transformer en un vaste paquet de chandelles, pour nous économiser l'éclairage ! et que tes rayons fassent tomber dans le creux des mers une pluie de graisse, afin que, se chauffant à la tiédeur, tout le globe entier ne soit point qu'un immense pot-au-feu !

TOUS crient : Vive le pot-au-feu !

En retirant leurs chapeaux, ce qui laisse voir distinctement leur crânes étroits et très allongés, en forme de pain de sucre.

LES FEMMES, aux fenêtres.

Comme nos maris sont bien !

Les autres corporations qui n'ont pas < été nommées ; s'empressent autour du pot-au-feu, et le grand pontife, décrivant mystiquement un cercle dans l'air, les asperge tous avec son écumoire. Après quoi, la séance étant leite, on retire les sieges, on se cherche et l'on s'aborde avec une certaine animation.

LES BOURGEOIS.

Ah ! une belle fête ! un remarquable discours ! Et quelle musique ! On a fait des progrès dans les arts ! C'est incontestable !...

La confusion et la rumeur peu à peu s'apaisent, et tous se mettent à obsener les horloges qvi sont au-dessus de la porte, devant chaque maison. L'aiguille marque cinq heures cinquante-cinq minutes. Ils attendent le nez en l'air, et quand six heures sonnent, ils disent tous en même temps :

Allons dîner !...

Ils entrent dans les maisons.

SCÈNE U

La scène reste complètement vide. D'abord, on entend dans les maisons un bruit de gros baisers, ensuite un bruit de chaises ; presque aussitôt après, un bruit de cuillères sur les assiettes, et quelque temps après

DES VOIX s'élèvent et disent : Ah ! ça fait bien !...

Un petit silence, puis cliquetis de couteaux et de fourchettes.

LES MÊMES VOIX.

Voilà ce qu'on ne trouve pas au restaurant !...

Le bruit des couteaux et des fourchettes continue. On entend déboucher des bouteilles de vin, puis

LES MÊMES VOIX. Nous sommes entre la poire et le fromage. Alors quelques petits rires de satisfaction.

LES VOIX DES HOMMES, seulement. Donne-nous un verro de liqueurs, hein ?

LES VOIX DES FEMMES. Mais tu vas te faire mal !

LES VOIX DES HOMMES. C'est pour mon estomac, une fois n'est pas coutume !...

Ensuite un fort remaniement de chaises, et

TOUS LES BOURGEOIS apparaissent à leurs fenêtres, étendent la main et disent :

Il fait chaud !

UNE FEMME arrive à chaque fenêtre. Oui ! mais le fond de l'air est froid.

TOUS LES BOURGEOIS. C'est vrai !

Ils se détournent un peu et tapent sur le baromètre accroché en dehors de la fenêtre.

Ça va-t-il se maintenir ?...

Après quelque réflexion.

Oui !... oui... on peut prendre le frais !

Les croistes se referment, et bientôt tous les bourgeois rentrent en scène et s'installent devant leurs portes sur des chaises, chaque ménage étant flanqué d'un petit garçon habillé en turco et d'une petite fille habillée en Suissesse.

Ah ! on est bien ici !

Les femmes prennent leur tricot, les hommes leur journal. Jeanne, en costume extra-bourgeois, s'assoit sur le seuil (i'unt maison au premier plan, à droite.

SCÈ&CE ///

LES BOURGEOIS, LES BOURGEOISES, JEANNE, LE ROI DES GNOMES.

Dès que Jeanne est assise,

LE ROI DES GNOMES, ayant retiré quelques-uns de ses attributs de Pontife du Pot-au Feu, paraît derrière elle, et se penchant sur son épaule :

Tu le vois ! tout me cède ! tout nous sert ! Je n'ai eu qu'à me montrer pour être élu bourgmestre de la ville et pontife de la religion. A part.

Rien de plus facile : c'est dans la médiocrité que l'esprit du mal triomphe !•

JEANNE, soupirant.

Mais voilà tant de jours que je le cherche, que je l'attends... Et il va venir, tu crois ?

LE ROI DES GNOMES. J'en suis sûr ! Patiente !

JEANNE. Oh ! merci. Protège-moi toujours !

LES MERES.

Allons, mes anges ! Voici l'heure où les enfants doivent s'amuser !

Les petits lurcos et les petites suissesses s't lancent du seuil des maisons en courant, se prennent par la main et dansent en rond autour du pot-au-feu en chantant quatre vers imités de ta chanson des Spartiates :

Nos grands-pères étaient betes,

Nos pères l'ont été plus !

Nous le sommes davantage,

Nos enfants le seront encore bien plus.

Quelques-uns de leurs bonnets tombent dans leur danse, et l'on voit leurs crânes extra-pointus.

JEANNE, les contemplant. Ils sont jolis, ces enfants. Heureuses mères !

UNE DAME, à côté d'elle, sur une chaise.

Sans doute ! Vous êtes bien honnête, Mademoiselle, et le mien, quoique plus jeune, promet beaucoup !

Elle appelle.

Nourrice !...

DEUXIÈME DAME. Et le mien aussi. — Nourrice !.

TROISIÈME DAME.

Et les deux miens donc ! — Nourrice !...

Alors paraît une légion de nourrices dandinant des poupons dans leurs bras. Les mères s'empressent autour d'eux, pour les montrer.

PREMIÈRE DAME.

Envoyez un bécot à la jolie demoiselle et au bon monsieur.

UNE MÈRE DE POUPARD, lui retirant ses langes. Regardez-moi ces membres.

UNE AUTRE MÈRE.

Et sa tête !

Elle lui retire son béguin.

Voyez !...

TOUTES LES MÈRES DE POUPARDS. La sienne est bien plus belle ! la plus belle !

Elles retirent toutes les béguins de leurs marmots, qui ont des crânes fantastiquement pointus.

LE ROI, piisant.

Encore mieux que leurs pères ! La génération s'annonce crânement !

TOUTES LES MÈRES ET DAMES, parlant à la fois.

Récitez votre fable !... Une risette !,,. Ah ! qu'il çst gentil ! Il aura du nanan !

Tous les enfants envoient des baisers à Jeanne et commencent à marmotter nés vite, pendant que les mères parlent à la fois, que les poupons pleurent et que les nourrices chantonnent. Mais il s'élève dans la coulisse un grand murmure, comme serait iirritation contenue d'une foule lointaine. Paul et Dominique paraissent. Tous les enfants, effrayes, s'enfuient, les nourrices remmenent leurs nourrissons, et beaucoup de bourgeois et de bourgeoises s'éloignent avec dts regards farouches. D'autres vocifèrent :

A bas ! canailles, brigands, originaux !

Sifflets, huecs.

SCÈNE IV

LE ROI DES GNOMES, JEANNE, PAUL et DOMINIQUE, en costume de voyage très négligé.

Ils arrivent par le fond du théâtre.

DOMINIQUE. Eh bien, quoi ?... Imbéciles ! Est-ce notre costume qui nous vaut tout cela ?

Les bourgeois sortent, en se faisant des signes d'intelligence.

JEANNE, s'élançant vers Paul. Paul !... Ah ! enfin !

LE ROI.

Dissimule ! Tu sais qu'il faut de la simplicité !

DOMINIQUE.

Ils ont l'air assez rébarbatif, ces particuliers-là.

PAUL.

N'importe ! C'est peut-être ici que se trouve... la bien-aimée inconnue...

DOMINIQUE.

Ah ! nous y revoilà ! Décidément, que voulez-vous ? que cherchez-vous ? Où est le but ? Depuis le temps que nous vagabondons dans toutes sortes de pays... car c'est la bouteille à l'encre que votre histoire !

PAUL.

Rien de plus simple ! Je dois rencontrer quelque part une jeune fille à l'âme pure, au désintéressement absolu, la reconnaître, en être aimé, et, fort de son amour, m'emparer du château des Cœurs.

DOMINIQUE.

Ah ! très bien ! Une femme qui n'existe guère, un château qui n'existe pas. Car, enfin, qu'y a-t-il donc clans ce savoyard de château ? Des trésors ?

PAUL.

Non ! mais une fortune tellement extraordinaire que tu ne peux l'imaginer.

DOMINIQUE.

Oh ! oh ! reste à -avoir ! Allons, Monsieur, un bon moment !
Revenons à Paris !...

P A U L.

Oh ! laisse-moi, Dominique ! Je suis si plein de lassitude, de découragement ! Et puis il y a dans cette ville, malgré sa vulgarité, je ne sais quel charme !

JEANNE, lui offrant une chaise près d'elle.

Oui ! reste/, Monsieur ! Paul hésite.

Asseyez-vous !

PAUL.

A part.

On n'est pas plus gracieuse, ma parole !

Il la considéré. Elle baisse les yeux.

Diable ! quelle pudeur !

Silence. Ils se regardent face à face.

J E A N N E.

On voit que vous êtes complètement étranger à la localité, Monsieur !

Avec dédain.

Et ce costume... excentrique !...

4J

PAUL.

Mon Dieu ! Mademoiselle, je ne pensais pas qu'en voyage... !

JEANNE, sèchement. N'importe ! Il faut suivre la coutume !

DOMINIQUE. Mais elle est assommante, celle-là !

A part, haussant les épaules et montrant Faut. Quel plaisir que de s'entêter !... J'ai envie de voir aux alentours s'il n'y a rien de plus drôle ! Vous permettez, n'est-ce-pas ?...

PAUL.

Oui ! Reviens vite !

SCÈ^CE V

JEANNE, PAUL et LE ROI DES GNOMES, cache par le trône du Pontife, qu'on a roulé au premier plan, à droite.

JEANNE.

Vous ne faites pas comme lui ? Tant mieux ! PAUL, à part.

Ah ! elle s'humanise !

JEAN N t.

Pour demeurer avec nous...

Silence.

PAUL.

Eh bie 1 ?

JEANNE, timidement.

Il faudra... oh ! r.e m'en voulez pas... r.e rien faire, ne rien dire et même ne rien penser qui sorte des actions, des paroles et des idées de tout le monde !

PAUL.

Eh ! pourquoi ? Où est le mal d'obéir à son cœur quand on sent qu'il est honnête ? Moi, quoi qu'il advienne, je soufilète les infamies, je m'écarte des laideurs, et, devant ce qui est grand, je m'agenouille !

JEANNE.

Ah ! c'est bien, cela ! c'est bien !

LE ROI DES GNOMES, derrière Jeanie.

Prends garde !

JEANNE.

Pour un homme fatigué du monde, il s'agit. doux, cependant, d'habiter une de ces maisons :”S.

Paul se détourne avec dégoût.

Oh ! l'intérieur vaut mieux ! Si vous saviez comme chaque femme soigne son petit mari !

Elle l'entoure de prévenances, fait les confitures, lui brode des pantoufles, le dorlote, le bécote, l'aide à s'habiller, et même lui présente... sa redingote !

Jeanne offre à Paul une des redingotes locales.

Passez-la !

PAUL, ébahi.

Pourquoi ?

JEANNE.

On est si bien dedans ! Je vous en prie !

PAUL, mettant la redingote.

A part.

Elle est stupide, quoique charmante !

Haut.

Sans doute, cette vie-là possède des avantages. Mais ne croyez-vous pas, vous dont la voix est pure comme un chant d'oiseau et le regard cordial comme une bonne poignée de main, ne sentez-vous pas, dites, qu'il peut se rencontrer parfois des unions plus complètes, une félicité d'une telle ardeur qu'elle envoie ses rayons tout autour d'elle ?

L'enchantement qu'on a l'un de l'autre fait, au milieu des fanges de la terre, comme une poésie permanente : plus on s'aime, plus on devient bon ; l'habitude seule de la tendresse conduit à l'intelligence de tout ; et ce qui paraît de la vertu n'est que l'excès du bonheur !

JEANNE.

Ah ! je vous comprends ! Oui ! oui !

LE ROI DES GNOMES.

Mais tu te perd.-, malheureuse !

JEANNE, oppresser.

En effet, assurément ! et, sans bannir un certain idéal, il y a moyen de s'organiser une petite existence bien tranquille. Pourquoi perdre le meilleur de soi-même en sympathies, en émotions, en démarches, au lieu de réserver tout cela pour son propre individu ?

LE ROI DES GNOMES.

Bravo !

JEANNE.

Comme les autres sont les plus forts, soumettons-nous, afin qu'ils nous respectent et qu'il.-, nous servent ! Oh ! c'est facile, avec des concessions extérieures, et pourvu qu'on n'ait dans ses discours et sur sa personne rien d'extravagant !

Paraît un barbier avec les ustensiles de sa profession.

PAUL, surprit.

Que voulez -vous ?

LE BARBIER, d'une voix caverneuse.

Tailler votre barbe en collier comme à tout le monde !

PAUL.

Voilà, par exemple, une exigence !

JEANNE.

Oh ! pour me plaire !

Elle lui attache la serviette autour du cou.

PAUL.

Je suis d'un ridicule achevé, n'importe ! Mais d'où vient qu'elle me fascine, et que j'obéis comme un enfant !

JEANNE, pendant que le barbier travaille.

Un peu de patience ! C'est presque fini ! Encore un coup ! Ah ! que vous serez bien ! et quels bons soirs, cet hiver, dans le salon à rideaux de perse, décoré par des photographies de famille, au coin du feu, près de mon piano ! Il y a, dans le faubourg, de petits jardins avec des tonnelles de bâtons verts. Nous viendrons là, tous les deux, le dimanche ; et, nous promenant bras dessus bras dessous, nous parlerons sans cesse de notre bonheur, à côté des légumes, en regardant l'espalier.

PAUL, le barbier ayant fini, se lève. — A part.

Elle a raison peut-être. Un fond de jugement se découvre dans ce qu'elle dit. D'ailleurs, une fois ma femme, je l'éduquerai !

JEANNE.

Mais tournez-vous donc pour que je vous voie ! Ah ! bravo ! Merci ! Je suis contente. Vous ne me quitterez plus.

Elle lui prend les maint.

PAUL.

Ah ! chère mignonne ! Non ! non ! je te le jure !

JEANNE, ravie et le contemplant. Est-ce possible ? Mais oui ! Rien ne lui manque !

LE ROI DES GNOMES, tendant vivement à Jeanne un tromblon.

JEANNE, posant le tromblon sur la tête de Paul, Oui, cela !

Appelant. Tous ! tous ! venez ! c'est fini. Dis trois côtes, un Jlot de bourgeois se précipite sur la scér.r.

SCE^E VI

LES PRECEDENTS, BOURGEOIS, puis DOMINIQUE.

LES BOURGEOIS, applaudissant et embrassant Taul.

— Ah ! très bien, très bien !

— Excessivement convenable !

— Nos félicitations !

— Mon cher compatriote, je suis heureux... !

PAUL.

Permettez... Que signifie ? Tout à l'heure on a failli me lapider, et maintenant...

UN BOURGEOIS. C'est que vous êtes un des nôtres !

LE ROI DES GNOMES, lui pimentant un miroir. Tiens ! regarde !

PAUL, après s'être considéré quelque temps dans le miroir, et comme un homme qui sort d'un songe.

Comment ! le collier ! l'odieux tromblon du bourgeois !

Il jette par terre le chapeau. Cris d'indignation de la foule. Et la redingote à la propriétaire !

Il se l'arrache du corps.

Moi, j'ai pu me déshonorer avec ces deux couvre-idiots, sous ces infâmes symboles ! Jamais ! jamais !

Il trépigne sur le chapeau et sur la redingote avec rage.

JEANNE. Le malheureux ! Grâce !

LES BOURGEOIS.

Il est fou ! Prenez garde !

JEANNE, éperdue.

Calmez-le ! Voyons ! que faire ?

VOIX DE LA FOULE.

Qu'on le saisisse ! Un bouillon ! L'épreuve du bouillon

JEANNE.

Apportez-le, vite !... Là ! C'est bien ! Prenez, mon ami !

Paul est entouré, tenu par les pieds et par les mains. Jeanne lui tend une tasse de bouillon, qu'on lient de lui remettre et l'approche de ses lèvres.

Buvez-moi cela, lentement.

PAUL renverse la tasse d'un revers de tain.

Je ne me moque pas mal de votre bouillon !

TOUS.

Sacrilège ! — Au cachot ! au cachot ! — Dans un cul de basse-fosse !

La foule s'est ruée sur lui et on le garrotte aux poignets.

PAUL.

Oui ! battez-moi ! J'aime mieux vos injures que vos applaudissements et vos supplices que vos bienfaits ! Avec vos cœurs d'esclaves et vos têtes en pain de sucre, vos grotesques costumes, vos hideux ameublements, vos occupations abjectes et vos férociétés d'anthropophages...

LA FOULE.

C'est du délire !

PAUL, levant au ciel ses mains enchaînées.

Ah ! que n'ai je, pour vous exterminer, la foudre du ciel !

LES BOURGEOIS. U devient dangereux ! Un bâillon !...

On le bâillonne.

UN BOURGEOIS. Et à son domestique !...

TOUS LES BOURGEOIS. Oui ! oui !

DOMINIQUE reparaît avec la redingote et le tromblon, et se débattant.

Mais j'ai la redingote, moi ! J'ai le tromblort ! Je ne demande pas mieux !

UN BOURGEOIS. Ça n'y fait rien ! En vertu de la solidarité... !

DOMINIQUE. Je boirai le bouillon !

LES BOURGEOIS.

Silence !

DOMINIQUE. J'en ai même besoin !

LES BOURGEOIS.

Insolent !

On le bâillonne, et on les enferme tous les deux, eu reç-de- ckaussee, dans la prison qui est à droite, au second plan. — On les aperçoit à travers les barreaux.

LA FOULE pousse un grand soupir de satisfaction.

Ah ! il s'agit maintenant de les moraliser un peu, de les catéchiser !

SCÈ^CE VU

LES MEMES, LE GRAND PONTIFE.

LE GRAND PONTIFE. Ça me regarde ! C'est mon devoir, mon sacerdoce ! Je commence !

Infortunés ! vous êtes convaincus d'attentat contre la redingote et le pot-au-feu !

LES BOURGEOIS, ricanant. Ah ! ah ! ces Messieurs n'en voulaient pas !

LE GRAND PONTIFE. De dédain pour l'Épicerie, de sentiment, id 'cs, paroles, manières et costumes bizarres, en un mot d'excentricité !

UNE VOIX.

La guillotine !

LE GRAND PONTIFE, Non, Messieurs ! Grâce au ciel, nos mœurs sont plus douces ! Nous ne demandons, misérables ! qu'à vous lessiver par le châtiment, à vous purifier par le remords, et même nous voudrions que plus tard, si c'est possible, à force de bonne conduite, vous vous réhabilitassiez ! Le bouillon que vous avez rejeté, on vous l'ingurgitera de force, mais plus clair ; les murs de votre appartement seront embellis par des inscriptions morales, et ce sera, au lieu d'apprivoiser des araignées, votre distraction unique !

Les prisonniers s'agitent en remuant leurs bras à traver les barreaux.

Je n'ai pas fini ! La juste fureur du peuple veut, puisque vous ne pouvez à présent nous faire aucun mal, que je vous assomme ainsi en vous disant un tas de choses ! Donc on tentera sur vous des expériences !...

Un petit rôle se fait entendre à toutes les horloges au-dessus des portes, et huit heures sonnent. Au premier coup, tous les bourgeois tirent leur bonnet de coton de leur poche et le mettent sur leur tête. Le grand pontife s'interrompt subitement et se coiffe du sien en même temps.

L'heure de se coucher ! A demain ! Tous les bourgeois rentrent chez eux.

SCE^CE VIII

J H A X X I :, LE ROI DI ; S GXOMES.

JEANNE, avec emportement.

Délivre-le ! Délivre-le donc, ou je vais moi-même.. .

LE ROI.

Prends garde !

JEANNE.

Mais c'est par ta faute qu'il se trouve là. et que je l'ai perdu encore une fois !

LE ROI.

Par la tienne !

JEANNE.

Ah ! non content de m'avoir trompée... !

LE ROI.

Je ne t'ai pas trompée ! Je puis te donner tout ce que tu demandes, mais il m'est impossible d'agir sur tes sentiments comme sur les siens ; choisis mieux ! A ta première réquisition, je t'ai accordé les élégances d'i monde et les niaiseries qu'elles comportent ; à la seconde, la simplicité bourgeoise avec son cortège de laideurs. De quoi te plains-tu ? que te faut-il ?

JEANNE, après un long silence.

Eh bien ! je vais te le dire ; car je l'ai deviné enfin, lorsqu'au milieu de la populace qui l'enchaînait, le rêve de son cœur a jailli dans une explosion d'orgueil ! Ce que je veux ? Écoute : C'est un pouvoir tellement démesuré qu'il l'éblouisse ! Je demande des palais de basalte avec des escaliers de diamant, et à le faire asseoir auprès de moi sur un trône d'or, pour qu'il contemple de plus haut toutes les têtes de mes peuples esclaves prosternés dans la poussière !

LE ROI.

Bien ! bien ! Mais pas si fort, ma princesse, de peur de réveiller ces honnêtes populations.

Il tire de sa poche un bonnet de coton démesuré, se l'enfonce sur le chef et relève ses lunettes bleues. Son visage est effroyable, avec des dents jaunes, des yeux cernés jusqu'aux oreilles, tandis que son collier de barbe rouge, se développant sur les deux côtés, ressemble à deux gros plumets. La mèche de son bonnet de coton flamboie. Il disparaît avec Jeanne.

SCÈNE IX

Aussitôt le pot-au-feu, dont les anses se transforment en deux ailes, monte dans les airs et, arrivé en haut, il se retourne entièrement. Tandis que les flancs du pot-au-feu vont s'élargissant toujours, de manière à couvrir la cité endormie, des légumes lumineux, carottes, navets, poireaux, s'échappent de sa cavité et restent suspendus à la toute noire comme des constellations.

Dès que l'obscurité est complétée, on entend s'élever dans toutes les maisons un ronflement général.

Mais il se fait un bruit sec comme d'un barreau qu'on brise ; puis de la prison sortent deux ombres humaines, frôlant les murs et marchant sur la pointe des pieds. Alors apparaît d'abord, ensuite Dominique avec le tromblon et la redingote à la propriétaire, et portant sous ses bras ses deux bottes pour ne point faire de bruit. Il contemple un instant avec effroi les constellations-légumes.

Le ronflement général repart.

La toile tombe lentement.

SEPTIÈME TABLEAU

LES ÉTATS DE PIPEMPOHÉ

Le théâtre représente une vaste salle d'une architecture indo-moresque, ayant dans le fond une galerie (praticable) à doubles arcs correspondants, soutenus par des colonnettes géminées. Il y en a trois, et celui du milieu, faisant porte, s'ouvre sur l'escalier à trois marches par où l'on descend dans la salle.

Le salon a des poutrelles or et bleu, successivement. Les colonnettes sont en ébène avec des incrustations de nacre, et les arcades du côté extérieur de la galerie closes par des stores en petits bambous dorés.

Sur la plinthe qui supporte la galerie, comme sur toutes les murailles, des losanges vermillon et azur alternent dans la couleur noire.

A droite, une grande portière de cachemire. A gauche, sur un trône flanqué de chimères, à fond d'or mat et que surmonte un baldaquin de plumes blanches, Jeanne, en costume royal et éblouissante de pierreries, est assise dans une attitude impérieuse.

Près d'elle, debout, se tient son premier ministre (le Roi des Gnômes). Par derrière, des négresses agitent des éventails en plumes de paon ; et devant elle, des nains barbus, habillés de rouge et accroupis sur leurs talons, occupent symétriquement tous les degrés du trône. Les deux derniers, en bas, soufflent à pleine poitrine sur deux cassolettes un peu plus hautes qu'eux.

Au milieu de la scène danse un groupe de bayadères, — tandis qu'au fond, devant chaque arcade et tranchant ainsi sur la couleur dorée des stores, il y a un géant, habillé d'une longue robe noire, et qui reste immobile.

Une musique langoureuse bourdonne. Les tourbillons des parfums montent lentement ; et la lumière du soleil, passant par les intervalles des roseaux, enveloppe tout d'une atmosphère ambrée.

SCÈNE PREMIMÈRE

JEANNE, LE ROI DES GNOMES, en

premier ministre, LES NAINS, LES DANSEUSES.

LE ROI DES GNOMES, bas, a l'oreille de Jeanne. Es-tu heureuse, maintenant ?

4 î

JEANNE, souriant. J'espère l'être bientôt !

Les bayadères, après un de leurs pas et avant d'en recommencer un autre, s'inclinent devant le trône.

LE ROI DES GNOMES.

Oui, c'est cela ! Tous te prennent pour la reine, morte la nuit passée, et l'erreur du peuple va durer. Tu n'as plus qu'à le retenir quand il viendra, mais sans te faire connaître, car n'oublie pas quelles conséquences terribles...

JEANNE.

Je sais ! Merci, bon génie, qui as eu pitié de ma tendresse, et puisque tu es mon premier ministre, ne me quitte plus.

LE ROI DES GNOMES.

Si parfois je m'écarte, ce sifflet d'or m'appellera.

Il lui donne un sifflet d'or, qu'il avait à son cou et qu'elle passe au sien.

La portière de cachemire faisant face au trône s'entr'ouvre, et il entre un nain d'aspect farouche, avec une aigrette à son turban, de très longues moustaches, et un bâton d'ivoire à la main. Il conduit, marchant au pas et effroyablement armés, une escouade de six géants. Tandis qu'il s'avance jusqu'aux pieds du trône pour se prosterner, les géants s'alignent en haït contre la muraille et y restent immobiles,

SCÈNE II

LES MEMES, LE NAIN, général des géants, puis UN OFFICIER, puis LE CHANCELIER.

LE NAIN, après sa prosternation, se retourne vers les géants.

Plus haut, drôles ! plus haut ! Le menton levé ! Qu'est-ce qu'une tenue pareille !...

Tous les géants tremblent d'effroi devant lui.

Place au messager des désirs de la souveraine !

En gardant le dos toujours collé contre la muraille, ils s'écartent de droite et de gauche ; et alors paraît un officier en turban rose, avec des gants de mousseline claire, une veste Oleue et un large sabre suspendu contre sa hanch : par un baudrier.

L'OFFICIER, ayant fait un long salut.

D'après les ordres de Votre Majesté sublime, nous venons de haclu r en petits morceaux les douze misérables qui ne se sont pns pr<>.- ternés assez vite, hier, quand vous passiez dan.- le bazar des soierie- sur votre éléphant blanc.

JEAN N E.

D'après mes ordres... par morceaux... mon éléphant... ?

L'OFFICIER, souriant. Il ne s'agit pas de votre trois fois divin éléphant blanc, Majesté ; ce ne sont que des hommes.

JEANNE, indignée.

Malheureux !

L'officier la regarde, ébahi.

LE ROI DES GNOMES, bas. Tu te compromets par cette indignation. Pense donc à lui, à ton but, et récompense ce bon serviteur pour son exactitude.

JEANNE. Jamais je ne pourrai !

LE ROI DES GNOMES. Il le faut cependant !

JEANNE, d'une voix hésitante.

C'est bien, nous sommes contente, va !

L'officier sort. — A part.

Ah ! mon Dieu ! qui m'aurait dit que j'aurais le courage... ?

LE ROI, à part. Allons ! elle commence bien !

Entre le Chancelier, vêtu d'une grande pelisse bordée de fourrures par-dessus sa robe verte, avec un bonnet d'astrakan, un encrier dans sa ceinture noire, et à la main gauche, entre les doigts, plusieurs longues bandes de papier.

LE CHANCELIER. Je me hasarde sous vos puissants rayons, lumière des étoiles, pour vous faire observer qu'il manque à cette place votre auguste sceau !

J E A N N E.

Qu'est-ce ?

LE CHANCELIER. Votre Majesté, sans doute, se rappelle l'insolence de cet homme qui osa pleurer en sa présence, avant-hier, sous le prétexte qu'il mourait de faim ?

JEANNE. Je... ne me souviens pas.

LE ROI, bas. Tu te souviens, au contraire.

LE CHANCELIER. C'est l'ordre pour son exécution immédiate !

J E A N N E.

Horreur ! Retirez-moi cela !

LE ROI, au chancelier.

Donne, je m'en charge ! Sortez, vous tous ! J E A N N E.

Oui, sortez !

Le nain sort, suivi des six géants, dont les têtes touchent aux voussures des arcades dans la galerie. Les bayadères s'en vont ensuite, et les nains, accroupis sur les marches du trône, sauf un seul qui demeure à demi caché.

LE ROI, désignant les deux géants du fond près des stores.

Ceux-là peuvent rester, étant muets.

SCÈNE III LE ROI DES GNOMES, JEANNE.

JEANNE, descendant du trône.

Qu'as-tu donc pour exiger cette mort ? LE ROI.

Moi ? Oh ! pas le moindre motif !

JEANNE.

Eh bien, comme j'ai le droit de pardonner... LE ROI.

Pardonner ? Mais ils ne croiront jamais que tu sois la reine !

JEANNE.

Pour avoir pleuré ! quel crime ! Elle était donc bien cruelle, l'autre !...

LE ROI.

Elle était forte. Imite-la !

JEANNE.

Il m'est impossible cependant...

LE ROI.

Tu veux donc te perdre, et pour un scrupule indigne de ce pouvoir tant rêvé, quand il te le faudrait plus fort que jamais...

JEANNE.

Que dis-tu ?...

LE ROI.

Car bientôt, tout à l'heure peut-être, tu auras à tirer d'un péril mortel ton frère et ton amant.

JEANNE, après un long silence.

Et tu crois que ce papier...

LE ROI.

Il ne s'agit que de retourner dans tes mains ton sifflet d'or et d'en appuyer le pommeau sur cette cire rouge.

JEANNE.

Oh ! non ! c'est trop horrible !

LE ROI.

Mais si le peuple se révolte, .-’il te chassait ? Je ne peux rien sur les multitudes, moi ! Il est accoutumé chaque jour à des supplices. Tu le prives de sa joie, il va douter de ta reine.

De grands cris s’t lèvent au dehors.

J’entends-lu ?

JEANNE, prêtant l’oreille.

En effet !

VOIX LOINTAINES. Vengeance ! La mort ! la mort !

LE ROI DES GNOMES, à un des géants près des stores. Relève !

Le géant, sans monter sur les marches, allonge le bras et il relève d’un seul coup jusqu’en haut le store de bambous dorés qui ferme l’arcade extérieure du milieu de la galerie. On aperçoit une ville orientale, minarets, coupoles.

JEANNE gravit vivement les trois marches et se penche pour voir.

Quelle foule ! et avec des piques, des haches, des épées ! La voilà qui bat contre les portes du palais !

LE ROI.

Hâte-toi donc, malheureuse ! pour sauver ceux que tu aimes !

JEANNE.

Donne !

Elle repousse le papier.

Non ! non !

LE ROI DES GNOMES. Garde au moins le pouvoir quelque temps, ne fût-ce qu’un jour, une heure, et que ce supplice montre...

JEANNE, emporter. Eh bien ! qu’il ait lieu quand je n’y serai plus !

LE ROI, servilement.

Demain, si tu veux ; tes désirs sont des ordres, Majesté. Voilà.

JEANNE, apposant vite le cachet.

Oui, demain !

LE ROI remet le papier au nain resté près du trône. Cours !

Le nain se précipite à droite par la portière, en riant à gorge deployée.

Eh ! eh ! il est d'humeur folâtre, ce bouffon !

JEANNE, se tordant les mains.

Miséricorde de Dieu ! si j'avais su tout cela... !

LE ROI DES GNOMES, à part.

Nous la tenons ! Elle a été coquette, puis stupide ; elle devient cruelle ! C'est complet !

Cris de joie et applaudissements au dehors.

Ton peuple te remercie, ô reine !

JEANNE.

Mais un grand bruit de pas se rapproche !...

LES VOIX, de plus près. La mort ! la mort !

LE ROI, tout en remontant jusqu'au fond, au delà des trois marches, contre la grande baie du milieu.

C'est qu'il vient lui-même jusqu'ici, pour aider à tes bourreaux et jouir de ton aspect trois fois saint. Entrez !

Alors s'avance par la galerie d'abord le nain général, puis derrière lui des nègres portant sur leur épaule le bout d'une énorme chaîne qui attache Paul et Dominique. Un flot de peuple les accompagne. Tout ce cortège, avec le nain en tête, descend les marches de l'escalier et se déploie au fond contre le petit mur de la galerie, laissant au premier plan Paul et Dominique en haillons, très pâles, les yeux hagards, tandis que le Roi des Gnomes reste sous l'arcade du milieu et que les géants en robe noire, dominant par derrière la multitude, se tiennent toujours immobiles devant les stores dorés.

JEANNE, LE ROI DES GNOMES, PAUL, DOMINIQUE, LE NAIN GÉNÉRAL, NÈGRES, FOULE, etc.

JEANNE, apercevant Paul.

Lui !...

Puis elle s'est contenue, et quand il se trouve en face d'elle, au nain :

Enchaînés ! Pourquoi ?

LE NAIN', GÉNÉRAL DES GÉANTS.

Ils ont franchi les limites de vos États, Majesté !

JEANNE.

Eh bien ?...

LE ROI DES GNOMES, descendant vers elle par le cote gauche.

N'est-ce pas le plus grand des crimes, à lumière des étoiles ?

JEANNE, comprenant.

Ah !... en effet... certainement ! Vous avez bien agi, général ! et vous aussi, les noirs !... et vous aussi, mon peuple !... Mais... en raison même de cet excès d'audace, nous désirons interroger les deux coupables, seule !

Au roi des Gnomes.

Sans notre premier ministre !

Il s'incline.

S'il est besoin de vous...

Lui montrant le sifflet.

on vous appellera, vous- savez !

Il disparaît brusquement par une trappe, dans le trône.

Comment ? disparu déjà ?... Je ne l'ai pas vu sortir !

A demi-voix.

Ah ! tant mieux, il nous importunerait !...

SCÈNE V

JEANNE, PAUL, DOMINIQUE, puis LE ROI DES GNOMES.

JEANNE, après que la foule s'est écoulée.

Bien que je sois la reine, il me faut subir pourtant les lois de ce pays.
C'est en verlu d'elles que, mon peuple vous a tout à l'heure arrêtés.
J'ai du, quand il était là, lui donner raison. A présent je vous pardonne, vous êtes libres !

DOMINIQUE, à part

Quelle bonne femme !

JEANNE.

Je veux d'abord vous retirer ces chaînes, sans que personne le sache toutefois, excepté le premier ministre. — Où est-il ? — Ah ! le sifflet !

Elle siffle. Le Roi des Gnomes, à l'instant, se trouve près d'elle.

DOMINIQUE, à part.

D'où sort-il donc, celui-là ? Je n'aime pas ces manières d'entrer !
Quand nos affaires allaient si bien !

PAUL, conudirant le Roi des Gnomes. C'est étrange ! Je l'ai déjà vu... mais oui Dans ce bal... ou plutôt... ne serait-ce pas l'homme du cabaret ? Il y a là-des>ous... quelque piège...

JEANNE, a u Roi des Gncmei. Faites tomber leurs chaîne ? ! Bas.

J'avais besoin du secret... tu m'excuses ? LE ROI.

Sans doute ! Haut.

Oh ! immédiatement, Majesté !...

Il s'avance gravement vers les deux prisonniers, et sans effort, rien qu'en les touchant, il brise leur chaîne, anneau par anneau, avec ses doigts. Les tronçons tombent sur le sol, avec un grand bruit de fer.

D O M I N I Q U E. Tudieu ! quel poignet !

PAUL.

C'est lui !

Il se penche pour l'examiner ; le Roi des G .ornes a di'psra.

JEANNE, a part. Aussi discret que dévoué, ce bon gén ;e ! Haut à Paul.

Mais qui vous gêne encore ? Cependant, voyez vos mains, elles sont délivrées ; toutes ces portes, elles sont ouvertes. N'avez-vous rien à nous dire ?...

PAUL, froidement.

Des remerciements, il est vrai !

JEANNE, piquée.

Ali 1... c'est tout ?...

PAUL, lentement.

Que demandez-vous de plus ? Sais-je d'ailleurs quel motif... ?

DOMINIQUE, à part.

L'imprudent !

Haut.

Ah ! Majesté, reine, déesse, reflet de la lune, nos cœurs débordent de reconnaissance !...

JEANNE.

Bien ! — Plutôt que de continuer vos courses périlleuses, il serait meilleur pour vous de rester dans ce royaume.

DOMINIQUE.

Certainement ; moi, j'accepte !

JEANNE, a part.

Il ne répond pas !...

Haut.

Je dis dans cette ville, à ma cour, où je veus offrirais quelque fonction.

PAUL, brièvement.

Je refuse !

JEANNE.

Même celle de premier ministre.

PAUL.

Oui !

JEANNE, à part.

Que veut-il donc ?...

Elle étend son bras vers l'arcade du milieu ouverte.

Regarde ! Voici la capitale de mes Liât ?, ma grande ville de Pipempohé. Elle a vingt-quatre lieues de tour, trois millions d'habitants ?, six fleuves qui la traversent, des palais d'or, de » maisons d'argent, et des bazars tellement interminables qu'il faut un guide pour vous conduire dans la forêt de leurs piliers de cèdre. Je te la donne.

PAUL.

Je n'en ai pas besoin !

JEANNE. Ali ! quel orgueil !

Au géant qui est au fond, à droite.

Relève !

Le géant relève, comme a fait Vautre, le store de bambous dorés. On aperçoit un golfe semé de navires, — une forêt plus loin.

Et tu auras mon port, mes marins, mes vaisseaux, toute la mer, avec les îles et les contrées que l'on découvrira.

PAUL.

A quoi bon ?

JEANNE. Tu accepteras ceci, j'espère ! Au second géant.

Relève !

Le géant relève le store de gauche et Von aperçoit, entre des rochers noirs et d'aspect horrible, un grand bloc éclatant de blancheur.

Cette montagne est tout en diamant. Les magiciens qui sont à mon service la couperont, et je te fournirai des éléphants pour en emporter les morceaux.

PAUL.

C'est un bagage trop lourd, Majesté ! Est-ce mon trône que tu désire ? ?... Je puis t'y faire asseoir près de moi !... Avec tendresse.

et même en descendre, pour que tu y rentes seul ?

PAUL.

Ma place est plus loin ; j'ai une tâche à exécuter.

JEANNE.

Ah ! Et si je t'en empêche ?

PAUL.

Elle se trouve au-dessus de tous les pouvoirs !

JEAN N E. Mais si je te retenais ?

PAUL.

J'aurais encore la liberté de vous haïr ! JEANNE.

Me haïr ! — Lt tu refuses mon trône ? Qu'e^t- el !e donc, cette mission si ex'ranrdinaire ?...

PAUL.

Personne, je vous le di-, n'en doit rien .-avoir. JEANNE.

Mais moi ?

PAUL.

Vous surtout !...

JEANNE.

Quelle audace !

DOMINIQUE, bas.

Monsieur ! Monsieur ! pas de folies ! D'un mot elle peut faire sauter nos têtes comme deux volants ; si vous ne voulez pas, refusez avec politesse ! Du calme ! de l'astuce !

PAUL.

Eh ! je ne crains rien ! A mesure que je me rapproche du but, il se fait des lumières dans mon esprit. Et vous qui m'apparaissez maintenant sous la figure d'une reine au milieu d'épouvantes et de somptuosités, vous n'êtes rien autre chose que cette même femme qui a déjà voulu m'arrêter par d'absurdes élégances, et qui plus tard a tâché de me séduire avec les charmes d'un bonheur vulgaire. Ah ! je vous connais.

JEANNE, à part.

Malheureuse ! A moitié seulement, et pour m'exécrer davantage.

PAUL.

Car vous n'êtes, avouez-le donc ! que l'instrument des génies funestes ! Mais je ne succomberai pas plus sous votre puissance que je n'ai été vaincu par les autres tentations ! Accumulez ! le malheur ! Ma volonté est plus solide que vos citadelles et plus fière que vos armées.

JEANNE.

Insensé !

Appelant.

Les nègres ! les nègres !

Arrivent quatre nègres avec des poignards. — Aux deux premiers.

Approchez, vous deux !... Tirez vos poignards.

Ils marchent sur Paul et Dominique en levant leurs longs coutelas. Paul reste impassible ; Dominique est presque évanoui de terreur. — froidement.

Tuez-vous !

Les deux nègres tremblent et hésitent.

Avez-vous entendu ?

Ils se percent de leurs poignards et tombent morts. — Aux deux autres.

Emportez cela !

Les deux negres survivants emportent les deux cadavrei. — A Paul.

Doutes-tu encore de ma puissance ?

DOMINIQUE, a genoux, les maint jointes. Non ! non ! Moi, d'ailleurs, je n'ai rien dit

JEANNE.

Penses-tu qu'avec un peuple pareil je manque de moyens pour te contraindre ? J'ai ma tour de fer, bâtie sur un roc d'airain, dans un lac de soufre ; et au-dessus d'elle, pour empêcher de fuir par les airs, il y a continuellement quatre griffons tenant des nuages dans leur gueule et qui tourbillonnent en regardant sous eux. J'ai au fond d'un puits de marbre, après des centaines d'escaliers, un cachot plus étroit qu'un cercueil, dont les pierres vous dévorent, et où les captifs ne peuvent pas mourir ! Mais je te ferais, s'il me plaisait, écraser sous mes chariots, brûler dans mes fours à porcelaine, dévorer par mes tigres, ou boire d'un tel poison qu'immédiatement tu disparaîtrais et qu'il ne resterait de toi sur la terre, pas plus que d'une goutte d'eau évaporée ! Eh bien... va-t'en !... tu es libre.

PAUL, croisant Us bras.

De quelle façon ?

JEANNE.

Tu peux sortir de mon royaume.

Paul fait un geste de doute.

Oui, sans que personne t'en empêche.

PAUL.

Qui me l'affirme ?

JEANNE déchire son écharpe au-desius de l',I/M'ige, et y imprime so'i cachit.

Mon nom sur cette bribe île satin suffira jjour vous mener jusqu'aux frontië ; es... et peut-être, un jour, si tu la conserves, tu t'ace^eras d'avoir répondu par des outrage.- aux offre.- les plus magnifiques et les plus tendres que jamais un homme ait reçues d'une reine !

A Dominique, lui tendant le sauf-, o .dui,.

Tiens, prends !

Avec u'i geste d'.iut.lité.

Sortez !

Ils s'en vont par la galerie. Jeanne h s suit du i. ^ .'. ! j e : !. : it lo-.gicwps.

SCÈC^E VI

JHAXXI ;, seule.

Que lui ai-je donc fait, p >ur qu'il me fuie toujours ? Il m'a été impo ? sil >'e de l'éb'ouir avec mon pouvoir, et ma générosité ne l'a pa-ému !

Elle marche lentement en regaida'.t les murs.

Qu'ai-je besoin dr> tout cela maintenant, puisqu'il le refuie !... Je vais abandonner ce royaume... et le suivre... partout... de loin...

Elle s'affaisse sur les degres du trô.e.

Ah ! j'avais plus de bonheur autrefois, quand je n'étais qu'une pauvre laitière. Un jour... je me rappelle... je suis venue dans sa mansarde, il me vanta ma jolie figure... mes mains qu'il a presque portées à ses lèvres... Et aujourd'hui non seulement il ne me reconnaît plus, mais il me hait. Par quelle fatalité ? Et pourquoi se trompe-t-il sur ces bons génies, quand ils ne travaillent au contraire qu'à notre félicité commune.

Des éclats de rire stridents éclatent au dehors, à gauchet derrière le trône.

Ah ! ce sont mes petits bouffons, dans la salle à côté, qui s'amuse !

Un bruit de voix joyeuses s'élève.

Quelle gaieté !

SCÈNE VII

JEANNE, LE ROI DES GNOMES, entrant de côté, dans son costume de gnome.

JEANNE, à sa vue, pousse un cri d'effroi.

Qu'est-ce donc ?

LE ROI.

Rien ! Nous nous amusons beaucoup ! tu l'as dit !

JEANNE.

Ces voix tout à l'heure, cette apparence... que signifie... ?

LE ROI.

Ceux qui rient ! ils ont suivi les, <“““, acharnés à ta poursuite, connue à elle-même « t...m. Moi, celui L'ai connu ; a"t ut. o... 11 - “... i 1 ! “et fait semblant de te servir, j'<* leur maître, le Roi de ? Gnômes.

JEANNE, ;. . .

Le Roi des Gnômes !... d — s Gnomes : r. < -

LE ROI.

En vertu de ma volonté, jamais il ne t'aunt-ra, et, à peine arrivé sur notre-terre-, il e^ perdu.

J E A N N E.

Impossible ! Je cours après...

LE ROI.

Il est trop tard : d'ici et quand même il n'viendrait, je suis sûr de sa défaite.

J E A N N E, dvd ■ mpaiif n f.

Non ! non ! non ! Je vais donner d's -mires.

LE ROI.

Oh ! tant qu'il te plaira !

JEANNE.

Tu vas t'y opposer, n'est-ce pas ?

LE ROI.

Au contraire ! Tu seras obéie ponctuellement. Essaye.

Le Roi des Gnomes sort en riant ; et les rires, dans la coulisse, redoublent.

SCÈNE VIII

JEANNE, seule.

Que veulent-ils donc contre lui ? et dans quel but ? Qu'importe ! un périt le menace. Il y tombe, peut-être ? Il est perdu. Ah ! qu'il revienne ! Que faire ensuite ? Je n'en sais rien. Nous fuirons.

Appelant.

Général !

Le nain, gênerai des géants, parait.

Oh ! non pas lui ! C'est un des leurs ! D'autres ! le chef de ma garde, le chancelier, des soldats, quelqu'un ! Venez donc ! venez donc !

SCÈNE IX

JEANNE, UN OFFICIER avec des soldats, LE CHANCELIER.

JEANNE, à Vofficier.

Ces deux étrangers partis tout à l'heure, cours après ! Maigre notre sauT-coul nit royal, quoi qu'ils fassent, tu m'entends, je le- veux ! ramène- les ! Tu m'en réponds sur ta tête !... Plus là :e. L'officier ei lei soldais sortait pat la duite. — Au chancelier.

Pourquoi don t'ai je appelé, t'>i ?... Ali ! tu dois avoir encore entre te> main- l'ordre de supplice de cet homme... tu sais... qui a pleuré l'autre jour.

LE CHANCELIER, avec une grande rén rc.ce, le lui montrant.

Le voici, gracieuse Majt-té.

JEAN N E.

Donne !

Elle le déchire en morceaux.

Je lui fais grâce !...

Le chancelier la regarde, stupéfait.

Oui ! entièrement grâce !... N'a le délivrer toi- même, et tu auras soin qu'on lui porte, pour qu'il n'ait plus faim a l'avenir, trois tonnes d'agent et la charge eu ble de quatre dromadaire.-.

Fausse sortie du chancelier.

Ecoute donc ! Il duit y avoir beaucoup d'e>< laves dans mes jardins ? Qu'on brise leurs chaînes et qu'on les renvoie, sur de ? vaisseaux, dans leur patrie ! Ensuite, tu prendras aux magasins du palais tous les vêtements qui s'y trouvent : les dolimans de fourrures, les vestes eu brocart d'ur, les robes tissues de perles, et tu les distribueras aux habitants de ma ville, en commençant par les plus pauvres !...

Reviens ! Je n'ai pas fini ! On tirera des arsenaux toutes les armes, et l'on en fera sur les places de grands bûchers qui réjouiront les veuves ! Comme j'ai trop de parfums, qu'on les jette par les fenêtres pour laver les rues ! J'ordonne qu'il n'existe rien des commandements portés jusqu'à ce jour en mon nom ! Je veux qu'il n'y ait plus dans mon royaume une seule douleur, mais un même sourire de joie sur la face de tout mon peuple ! Rien, maintenant, que des larmes d'allégresse et des bénédictions pour moi !

Paul et Dominique rentrent à droite, par la portière, avec l'officier et les soldats,

Ah !

A l'officier.

C'est bien ! Laissez-nous !

SCÈC^E X

J H A N NI-, PAUL, DOMINTQ.UE.

PAUL, ironiquement.

Je me doutais de cette clémence, ô Reine ! Malheureux qui me calomnie encoiv ! écoute, il y va de ton salut.

DOMINIQUE. Peut-être du mien ! Mi-éricorde !

JEANNE.

De ta vie !

PAUL. Que vous importe ? Un long silence.

JEANNE.

C'est à moi que tu le demandes, toi !... toi, Paul de Damvilliers !

PAUL.

Qui vous a dit mon nom ?

JEANNE, ferement.

Fh ! que t'importe a ton tour ? Silence.

PAUL.

Ah ! je comprends. I n effet, von- aw p ur vous la science de.- Cnoin"*- ; moi, j'ai h p >- tection des Fées. Je vous délie.

JEANNE.

Ah ! oui, insulte-moi, méprisç-moi. exècre-moi bien ! Mais au nom de tout ce qu'il y a de plus sacré, par les âmes de ceux qui te sont les plus chers, par pitié pour toi-même, je t'en supplie, reste, reste ici !

PAUL.

Je partirai, cependant !

JEANNE.

Pourquoi donc t'obstines-tu à ne jamais me croire ?

PAUL.

C'est que vous m'avez déjà trompé sous tant de formes ! Tout à l'heure encore, vous m'accablerez d'offres et de protestations, et puis à propos de rien, subitement, voilà que vous reprenez avec violence cette liberté que vous aviez eu tant de mal à fournir !

JEANNE.

Mais tu ne sais pas que tu te précipites à une mort certaine, puisque je ne le savais, pas moi- même. Jusqu'à présent, j'étais la victime d'esprits infernaux dont je ne soupçonnais pas les desseins.

PAUL.

Ah ! c'est un autre artifice maintenant ?

JEANNE.

Non, je te jure. Ne t'en va pas !

PAUL.

Eh ! tous les hasards sont moins périlleux que vos serments.

JEANNE.

Regarde-moi donc ! Est-ce que j'ai l'air de mentir ?

PAUL.

Un nouveau piège ! Car plus je vous considère, et plus votre visage, évoquant pour moi tics souvenirs lointains, m'en représente un autre... celui d'une jeune fille.

J E A N N E.

Achève !

PAUL.

Elle valait mieux que toute ? le ? reine ? ; et j'aurais bien fait peut-être de retourner en arrière dans ma vie, plutôt que de toujours poursuivre en avant !

J E A N N E.

Giandeur de Dic.-u ! que'le punition !

P A U L.

Rien qu'une jus'io- !

JEANNE.

Mais c'est affreux ! Tu ne me reconnais donc pas, quand tu sauras... quand je te dis... !

LE ROI DES GNOMES, apparaissant tout à coup. Prends garde !

PAUL, à part.

Encore lui !

JEANNE. Je ne t'ai pas appelé, toi ?

LE ROI DES GNOMES, avec un grand salut. Raison de plus pour venir, ô Reine !

JEANNE.

Va-t'en, va-t'en ! Je le sauverai seule !

LE ROI DES GNOMES. Mais tu vois bien que le misérable lui-même ne veut pas de ton secours.

JEANNE, à Paul, qui est déjà remonté au milieu de la scène.

Grâce ! Reviens !

PAUL.

Jamais !

// entraîne Dominique immobile de terreur, et s'en va par le fond.

JEANNE.

Au nom du souvenir dont tu parlais tout à l'heure ! Dussé-je pour te convaincre donner ma vie... !

PAUL.

Je n'en ai que faire de vos dons !

J E A N N E.

Écoute, je su ;-...

Paul et Dominique ont disparu. Le Roi des Gnomei étend sa main sur Jeanne qui balbutie d'une voix mourante :

Jeanne la laitière !

Elle tombe comme foudroyée sous la main du Roi des Gnomes...

Alors, toutes les marches du trône l'enlèvent ; et les Nains, avec les têtes de gnomes qu'ils avaient au premier tableau, s'élancent autour d'elle, dansant et chantant.

Elle est morte, elle est morte ! Personne désormais ne nous contrariera.

Enfin ! nous triomphons ! Haha ! haha ! halia !

LA REINE DES FÉES apparaît d'un bout sur le trou. Non, elle n'est pas morte !

Elle descend gravement les marches du trône et étend son manteau sur Jeanne pour la défendre.

Son abnégation l'aidera !

Les Gnomes, reculant, font un cercle au milieu duquel se trouve Jeanne et la Reine des Fées.

HUITIÈME TABLEAU

LA FORÊT PÉRILLEUSE

SCÈNE PREMIMÈRE

DOMINIQUE, seul.

Il arrive par la droite, ù petits pas, en regardant de tous les côtés.

Perdu ! pour avoir quitté mon maître une minute ! Où est-il donc ?

Il crie.

Monsieur ! Monsieur !... Absent ! Eh, c'est sa faute... Quelle diable d'idée a-t-il avec ses gnomes et son château des Cœurs ! Cherchons-le cependant ! Monsieur !... Ah bien oui ! cours après. Mais des yeux brillent dans les feuilles... Eh non ! c'est le soleil sur la mousse ! Il y a de ces effets-là dans les bois ! Continuons !... On marche ! Un oiseau qui s'envole. Suis-je bête ! Il n'en faut pas moins sortir d'ici ! Faisons !

Une branche le cingle.

Ah !

Il se détourné.

Personne. Dieu soit loué ! Scélérates d'épines, va ! Gueuses de branches ! Plus j'avance, plus je m'empêtre !

Les arbres le frappent avec leurs branches.

Mais... iMais... J'ai toute la forêt sur les épaules ! Aïe ! N'importe ! je passerai !... Quand je vous dis que je passerai !

Il empoigne vigoureusement un arbre de chaque main, et il les écarte d'un seul mouvement. Aussitôt toute la forêt se divise devant lui, comme une toile que l'on déchiré, et forme une belle allée de verdure, avec deux rangs d'arbres symétriques.

Au fond, et détache en noir sur le ciel rose que fait le soleil couchant, se dresse le Château des Carurj, tel qu'il a été vu dans la mansarde ; ses trois tourelles sont reluites par des courtines percées de petites ouvertures d'où s'échappe une lumière rouge.

Dominique reste longtemps immobile et muet de surprise.

Un château ! Le château des Cu-urs ! C'e ?t donc vrai ! Le voilà exactement comme d'après ses paroles. Eh non ! je rêve ! Impossible. Il se palpe.

Cependant... je ne dors pas !... Ce toit noir, ces lumières rouges, 011 dirait un monstre qui vous regarde. Voyons ! voyons ! calmons-nous ! Pas de raison d'avoir peur ! au contraire c'est une fière chance ! Je l'ai découvert le premier tout de même ! Quelle joie ce sera pour Monsieur !

Mais... puisque je suis le premier ici... c'est à moi que revient la gloire ! Et pourquoi pas ?

Il est pris d'un rire frénétique.

La récompense, la dame, la belle femme ! La maison paraît seigneuriale, et les terres à l'entour vous composent un domaine... La forêt en dépend sans doute ? Comme je vais la couper rasibus ! C'est par là que je commence ! Quel abatis feront mes gens ! car j'ai des gens.

Il se promène de droite et de gauche, enthousiasmé.

Je ne suis plus domestique ! Allons donc ! Ah ! mais oui ! une valetaille de Sardanapale ! une livrée rouge et or, avec des bas tirés, sapristi ! des plumets au chapeau, des boutons larges comme des assiettes, et dans le vestibule, au bas de l'escalier, toutes sortes de jeux de cartes et de dominos ; c'est grand genre !... et s'ils ne charrient pas droit...

Il fait le geste de donner des coups de pied.

Eh bien ! pas de bourgeois ? Ma foi, tant pis ! J'ai fait tout ce que j'ai pu !... Cependant, une dernière complaisance.

Il crie. mais très faiblement »

Monsieur ! Monsieur !... Il ne pourra pas dire que je ne l'ai pas appelé !... Je suis quitte car enfin... puisqu'il se cache... je voudrais même qu'il y eût ici des témoin- pour affirmer que j<* l'ai bien appelé.

Tous les arbres du cote ou il a crie à voix basse s'inclinent, tandis que ceux de l'autre côté secouent leur feuillage en signe de dénégation.

Ah ! voilà qui est drôle ! Ils remuent, sans qu'il y ait du vent, d'eux-mêmes, comme des personnes ! Vous ne me comprenez pas cependant !

Tous les arbres des deux cotés s'inclinent à la fois, en manière d'assentiment.

Horreur ! Ma moelle se glace dans mes os, je deviens fou ! Si j'allais mourir ! Il y a des choses au-dessus de notre intelligence, décidément, et j'avais bien tort de nier !...

Il s'as>oit par terre, près de défaillir.

Je voudrais que Monsieur fut arrivé maintenant. Attendons-le ! Ce n'était pas très délicat ce que j'allais faire ! lui dérober sa gloire, pauvre garçon ! après tant de travers ! Il est vrai que je les ni subis comme lui ! Jusqu'à présent je m'en suis tiré. Pourquoi la suite serait-elle pire ? Tout à l'heure, c'est un petit étourdissement que j'ai eu, rien de plus !

Il regarde le château.

Et ce château-là ressemble à bien d'autres châteaux, parbleu ! seulement un peu rébarbatif de loin, mais d'un chic !... 11 n'est pas désert.

toujours. On s'y remue. La fumée des cuisines m'arrive j'entends de grands bruits de vaisselle. Sans doute, on attend le maître ? Mais c'est moi le maître.

Il regarde les arbres avec indécision. Non, immobiles. Du courage, Dominique ! en avant ! on n'a rien sans toupet !

Il s'élance, mais ses jambes se trouvent vivement prises dans Vécorce qui monte le long de son corps.

Ah ! Ah !

Parvenue à la hauteur des bras, Vécorce se déploie en branches chargées de feuilles, la tête reste intacte.

Mon maître ! à moi, mon bon maître, je...

Il est complètement métamorphosé en arbre.

SCÈNE II

DOMINIQUE, LES ARBRES.

TOUS LES ARBRES a la fois. 11 est pris !... Encore un ! encore un !...

DOMINIQUE, changé en prunier.

Au secours ! à mon secours !

LES ARBRES.

Impossible.

DOMINIQUE.

Qui a par'é ?

LES ARBRES.

Un chêne, — un orme, — un tilleul, — un sapin, — des ébéniers.

DOMINIQUE.

Quelle plaisanterie !...

UN CHÊNE.

Tu parles bien toi-même. Nous étions tous des hommes autrefois !

LES ARBRES.

Tous ! Tous !

UN TILLEUL.

Nous avons subi ton aventure. Notre seule distraction est de causer entre nous. Mais quand arrive quelqu'un d'un ordre supérieur, nous devenons muets comme les arbres ordinaires.

DOMINIQUE.

Qu'est-ce qui me parle à présent ?

UN TILLEUL.

Un tilleul !

DOMINIQUE.

Et moi, que suis-je donc ?

LE TILLEUL.

Tu te trouves trop loin... Nous t'apercevons confusément...

DOMINIQUE.

Je me sens... stupide... Je ne serais pas surpris d'être un prunier.

LES ARBRES.

Oui, en effet... un prunier.

DOMINIQUE.

Et dire que me voilà tout seul, à l'écart... comme un proscrit, sans pouvoir seulement vous donner une poignée de branche...

UN ORME.

Imite-nous ! Résigne-toi !

DOMINIQUE.

Mais je vais m'ennuyer à périr, moi qui venais pour épouser. Au printemps, quand j'aurai des nids, ça me mettra dans une position" affreuse. Ce sera un nid de Tantale ! Vous n'auriez pas quelque plante grimpante qui pourrait venir jusqu'à moi ?

LES ARBRES.

Non !

DOMINIQUE.

Pas un petit liseron ? pas une vigne ? une vigne folle ? Ça ferait mon ullaïre. N'oyons 1 Je vous L< rendrai.

LES ARBRES. Prunier, vous êtes obscène ! >ilence ! A !i ! voila la brise, heureusement, qui va chanter dans nos feuilles !

CHOEUR DES BRISES DANS LES ARBRES.

Réveillez-vous, arbres des bois ; Tressaillez toutes à la fois, Forêts profondes, Et, loin des rayons embrasés, A la fraîcheur de nos baisers Mêlez vos ondes.

Aimez-nous, Chantez tous, Pins et houx,
Fougères ! Nous passons, Nous glissons, Nous valsons Légères !
Oh ! comme avec un bruit joyeux Nos ailes battent sous les cieux Grandes ouvertes ! Oh ! le délire et la douceur De se rouler dans l'épaisseur De feuilles vertes !

Quels doux sons Les chansons Des pinsons, Des merles ! Bois bénis, Tous vos nids Sont garnis De perles !

Quand nous aurons, quelques instants, Joué sous les berceaux flottants De vos ramures, Nous reviendrons dans les cités Mêler un peu de vos gaîtés A leurs murmures.

Ouvrez-vous Devant nous, Pins et houx,
Fougères ! Nous passons, Nous glissons, Nous valsons, Légères !
A la fin, les Arbres baissent de plus en plus la voix et, se penchant les uns vers les autres, s'avertissent.

Un homme ! Un homme ! Un homme !

DOMINIQUE. C'est mon maître, mes amis, c'est mon... Paul paraît par la gauche.

SCE^E lit LES ARBRES, DOMINIQUE, PAUL.

PAUL, accablé.

Je ne le trouverai donc jamais, cet infernal château des Gnomes ! et Dominique disparu ! Ou n'est pas idiot comme ce garçon ! J'ai beau lui prescrire de ne pas me quitter d'une semelle, depuis plus de deux heures il faut que je perde mon temps...

Il est arrivé au milieu de l'allée, et s'arrête stupéfait.

Ah ! Enfin !...

Dominique secoue ses branches, pour attirer l'attention de son maître.

Me voilà donc au terme de toutes mes recherches et de toutes mes fatigues ! Merci, bonne fée, d'avoir soutenu mon coeur à travers des périls où tant d'autres avant moi se sont perdus !

Un éclat de rire part de l'intérieur du château.

On dirait un éclat de rire venant du château. Cependant toutes ses fenêtres sont fermées. . Qu'est-ce encore ? Allons ! c'est bien la peine d'être arrivé jusqu'ici pour m'effrayer, comme une femme, du cri de quelque oiseau ou d'une bête fauve ?... Mais où est donc Dominique ?

Dominique s'agite.

S ?

J'ai fait plus que mon devoir en le cherchant derrière tous les arbres de cette forêt... M'a-t-il assez ennuyé, du reste, pendant le voyage ! et je suis bon de tant l'aimer, vraiment ! Il sera tombé sans doute dans quelque embûche, où, malgré mes recommandations, sa curiosité ou sa sottise l'aura conduit.

Dominique s'agite de plus en plus. En avant ! Dans une entreprise pareille, l'existence d'un seul homme n'est rien, puisqu'il s'agit de tous les autres.

Alors retentit un immense éclat de rire, un bruit de foule. Toutes les fenêtres et toutes les portes du château s'ouvrent avec violence. Il y a dou^efenêtres j à chacune d'elles paraît un Gnome. Sur le balcon du milieu se tient le Roi avec une couronne en tête et le sceptre à la main. De chaque porte s'élance un Gnome (garde du corps ou laquais), riant, criant, sautant autour de Paul, à quelque distance. Tous les arbres s'inclinent avec un grand frémissement. Paul, ébloui, reste debout en face du château.

SCÈ&CE IV

LES PRECEDENTS, LE ROI DES GNOMES*

LE ROI DES GNOMES, à son balcon, d'une voix haute et ironique.

Ah ! maître sensible ! Ah ! cœur exempt de souillures ! Toi qui abandonnes ton serviteur et qui te crois appelle à sauver le genre humain, tu as failli deux fois en deux minutes, par égoïsme et par orgueil ! Tu es à nous, maintenant.

PAUL, dédaigneusement.

Moi ?

LE ROI DES GNOMES. Contemple cet arbre, c'est ton domestique lui-même.

PAUL.

Grands dieux !

LE ROI DES GNOMES. Sous l'écorce où le voilà caché, il conserve le sentiment et la mémoire. Tu vas être comme lui.

PAUL, d'un ton terrible, aux Gnomes qui se sont resserrés autour de lui.

Pas encore, tant que cette épée...

LE ROI DES GNOMES. Tire-la donc !

Paul, déjà la main sur la garde de son épée, en paralyse tout à coup. Ses bras et ses jambes concurrent l'attitude qu'il avait prise dans ce mouvement. Il devient rigide et blanc comme une statue, pendant que le Roi, du haut de son balcon, prend son sceptre d'or. La bague reluit à sa main de marbre.

LE ROI DES GNOMES. Nous t'avons fait des épaules assez solides pour porter les destinées du monde. Qu'en dis-tu ?

Garde comme un remords le souvenir du passé. Demeure perpétuellement dans l'impuissance de ta menace. Tes yeux sans prunelles auront le don de nous voir et tes oreilles celui de nous entendre, quand tu seras transporté dans la salle de nos festins ; car sous ton apparence insensible tu vivras, pour souffrir ton supplice éternel.

Tous les Gnomes, se prenant par la main avec des éclats de rire et aux sons d'une musique infernale, font une grande ronde autour de la statue immobile.

NEUVIÈME TABLEAU

LE GRAND BANQUET

Une salle à manger monumentale. Des lampes brillent, tenues à de très longues cordes, comme dans les églises. Sur les deux côtés, de distance en distance, il y a des colonnes de fer à chapiteau corinthien reliées entre elles par de grosses chaînes où sont suspendus des cœurs tout rouges. Au fond et occupant la largeur entière de la scène, un escalier à marches noires monte vers une galerie où se répète le même alignement de colonnes ; mais celles-là sans chaînes ni cœurs, avec des palmettes d'améthyste dans leurs chapiteaux et laissant voir la nuit par les intervalles de l'une à l'autre. Au milieu, à une table couverte de vaisselle d'or, et dont la nappe est de pourpre à franges d'or, siègent douze Gnômes de premier rang, six d'un côté, six de l'autre, tous portant au front des couronnes d'or. Le Roi, sur un trône plus élevé et faisant face au spectateur, est au haut bout de la table avec une couronne plus haute et ornée tout autour de petits cœurs en diamants. — Sur le premier plan, à gauche, Paul, changé en statue de marbre blanc et dans le costume qu'il portait à l'avant-dernier tableau, garde son attitude immobile.

CHOEUR DES GNOMES célébrant leur victoire.

Pendant qu'ils chantent, les marmitons circulent dans la galerie du fond pour apporter les plats et descendent quelques marches de l'escalier où les valets servant les Gnômes viennent prendre les plats pour les poser sur la table. En passant devant la statue, chaque valet lui fait une salutation ironique.

SCÈNE PREMIÈRE

LES GNOMES, LE ROI DES GNOMES, PAUL, en statue.

PREMIER GNOME à la droite du Roi, regardant la statue.

Eh bien, héroïque nigaud, comment trouves-tu ta position ?

DEUXIÈME GNOME.

Te voilà maintenant au-dessus de nous.

TROISIÈME GNOME.

Et méprisant toujours les petits gnomes.

TOUS, riant à la fois.

Ha ! ha ! ha ! ha !

QUATRIÈME GNOME.

Tu voulais changer le monde, toi !

CINQUIÈME GNOME.

Change donc d'attitude.

TOUS, riant à la fois.

Ha ! ha ! ha ! ha !

SIXIÈME GNOME.

Insulte-nous, pour te venger.

SEPTIÈME GNOME.

Pour nous faire rire.

TOUS, riant à la fois.

Ha ! ha ! ha : lia !

LE ROI DES GNOMES.

Bien ! amusez-vous. Gnomes, mes sujets. Petons-royalement notre victoire sur les hommes. Leurs cœurs à présent nous appartiennent, et il n'est pas besoin de ménager la marchandise. Les cañons, les murailles, notre palais, tout en regorge. Contemplez ! Et chaque partie du monde nous en procure : il y en a de Tombouctou et il y en a de Paris. Des cœurs de nègres et des cœurs de duchesses ! les uns qui ont palpité pour de l'opium sous la grande muraille en Chine, et d'autres un peu rancidés déjà par trop de séjour au fond d'un comptoir, dans Londres !

Une longue branche d'arbre paraît à droite et s'étend contre la statue.

LES SIX GNOMES, en face, à gauche. Tiens ! regardez donc !

LE ROI.

Eh ! c'est cet imbécile changé en prunier contre le mur du château.

Une seconde branche paraît.

UN GNOME. Mais voilà deux branches ; elles l'entourent, elles vont l'embrasser.

LE ROI.

Du sentiment ! Ça m'ennuie. Coupez-les !

Un valet, avec un couteau, abat d'un seul coup deux branches d'arbre. On entend deux cris terribles. Les rameaux saignent contre le piédestal.

UN GNOME. Délicat comme une sensitive. Pour un prunier, c'est comique !

TOUS LES GNOMES, riant. Ha ! ha ! ha ! ha !

PREMIER GNOME, regardant la statue. Il ne s'en émeut pas, le misérable !

DEUXIEME GNOME. Défends-le donc ! Anime-toi !

TROISIEME GNOME.

Veux-tu prendre, avec nous, ta petite portion de cœurs ?

QUATRIEME GNOME. Faut-il qu'on t'en serve ?

CINQUIÈME GNOME. J'ai envie de t'en barbouiller le visage !

SIXIEME GNOME. Moi, de te les faire manger tous !

LE ROI. Tiens, bois leur sang !

Il lui jette le contenu de la coupe. Le liquide rouge l'éclabousse, et reste figé ça et là par plaques inégales sur sa face et ses vêtements.

SEPTIEME GNOME. Réponds-nous donc, lâche !

HUITIEME GNOME. Entends-tu, nous bafouons ta sottise, tes illusions, ton courage !

NEUVIÈME GNOME. Et ce cœur immaculé, où est-il ?

DIXIÈME GNOME. Tu en as rencontré de jolis cependant.

ONZIÈME GNOME. Et qui t'aimaient.

DOUZIÈME GNOME. Depuis des reines jusqu'à des femmes de banquier.

PAUL, toujours immobile, répète trois fois lentement. Jeanne !
Jeanne ! Jeanne !

Tous les Gnomes épouvantés se lèvent sur leurs sièges. LE ROI.

Ah ! malédiction !

A et moment, Jeanne, en laitière, se trouve debout sur le piédestal, dans les bras de Paul et Vétreignant étroitement.

LES GNOMES. Regardez ! regardez !

LE ROI.

A moi, mes valets, mes soldats, mes bourreaux ! tout le monde ! à moi, au secours !

Une foule de Gnomes apparaît de tous côtés, se précipitant dans (a salle, La statue, peu à peu, a changé de couleur, et le piédestal 1 est abaitit, si bnn que le grctipe est maintenant au niveau du plancher.

PAUL, tenant Jeanne sur son iras gauche, tire son epre.

Vous êtes vaincus, misérable- !

Un large éclair sillonne le ciel au fond ; et dans un éclat de tonnerre, avec un cri immmse de la foule, la table et les Gnomes, tout s'abime sous le sol et disparaît. Les lampes s'éteignent. Les cœurs suspendus se mettent à flamboyer, les colonnes du fond s'écroulent J demi, et l'escalier ne fait plus qu'un monceau de ruines.

SCÈNE II PAUL, JEANNE.

PAUL.

C'est toi ? c'est bien toi ? M'as-tu pardonné ? JEANNE.

Monsieur Paul...

PAUL.

Oh ! plus de ces mots-la ! Lève la tête ! toi qui as secouru ma détresse autrefois et qui maintenant me délivres, chère providence de ma vie, pauvre amour méconnu ! 11 j'ai pu en chercher d'autres ! Ah ! comme j'étais ingrat pour le passé, aveugle pour l'avenir ! Je me suis lai-sé prendre, t )ut le long de ma route, par des illusions funestes, d'autant plus irrésistibles que je retrouvais dans chacun de ces monstres survenant pour me perdre quelque chose de toi, ton image. — Et tu étais, au contraire, si loin !

JEANNE.

Oh ! pas si loin !

PAUL.

Comment ?

JEANNE.

Moi aussi, j'étais aveugle !

PAUL.

Que veux tu dire ?

J E A N N E.

Vous rappelez-vous cette coquette Parisienne qui vous étourdissait avec son embarras de bagages et de sottises ?

PAUL, riant.

Oui ! oui !

JEANNE, naïvement.

C'était moi !

PAUL.

Mais. Vous rappelez-vous cette lourde petite bourgeoise, dans eette contrée hideuse ?

PAUL.

Ah ! ne me parle pas de cette imbécile !

JEANNE, piteusement. C'était moi !

PAUL.

Impossible !

JEANNE.

Et cette reine aux splendeurs infinies qui d'un geste faisait mourir les hommes...

PAUL. Assez ! N'achève pas !

JEANNE, se cachant la tête dans les mains.

C'était moi !

PAUL recule d'un pas.

Vous !

JEANNE, lui sautant au cou.

Oui, moi ! Pour te retrouver, pour te plaire, pour que tu m'aimes !
J'ose te le dire maintenant. Mon amour était si fort que j'ai traversé, afin d'*

venir jusqu'à toi, toutes les démentes et toutes les cruautés du monde.
Et comme tu ne l'as pas compris, cet amour, comme tu ne l'as pas même aperçu, — il redoublait pourtant à chacun de tes dédains, — aujourd'hui, pour te sauver, je descends du ciel.

PAUL.

Du ciel ?

JEANNE.

Ah ! tu ne sais pas, écoute ! J'étais morte ; les Gnomes me trompaient.
Les Fées m'ont rendue à la vie ! Tu vas me suivre ! l'heure a sonné.
Viens ! viens !

PAUL.

Oh ! oui, oui, je te crois ! Je savais bien quelle destinée m'était promise. Malgré tous les obstacles, je n'en ai jamais douté... Et tout à l'heure sous le marbre qui m'enfermait, j'en avais l'espoir, l'impatience et l'angoisse ! Partons ! Emmène-moi ! Les Gnomes sont vaincus, laissons la terre !

JEANNE.

Je vais te conduire dans un pays tout bleu, où les fleurs, comme les amours, sont éternelles et démesurées. Là, mon bien-aimé, les orages ne soufflent pas ; l'immensité tiendra dans nos cœurs, et nos yeux, toujours se contemplant, auront la lumière et la durée des étoiles !

NEUVIÈME. MF T A B 1 EAU, SCÈNE III. 40- PAUL, entraînant Jeanne.

Ah ! délices de mon âme. elle commence déjà l'éternité de notre ivresse ? se !

SCÈNE III PAUL, JEANNE, LA REINE DES FÉES.

LA REINE DES FÉES, qui depuis le milieu de la scène précédente est descendue lentement du fond, survenant entre eux deux.

Non ! pas encore !

PAUL, indigné.

Toi, la Reine des Fées ! Mais tu m'avais promis...

LA REINE.

As-tu donc oublié notre convention ? Tu n'as accompli que la moitié de ton devoir. La seconde est plus difficile peut-être.

Montrant Jeanne.

Avant d'obtenir la félicité de votre union perpétuelle, il faut remettre aux hommes ces cœurs délivrés par ta bravoure !

PAUL.

Comment pourrai-je, à moi seul.

LA REINE, souriant.

Oh ! nous sommes là : les Fées t'aideront ! Tu n'as à t'occuper que de ceux exclusivement qui te sont connus ! Tâche de les convaincre !

qu'ils reprennent leur cœur ! Pour devenir immortel, exécute d'abord l'œuvre d'un dieu !

Paul baisse la tête dans ses mains. On entend au dehors un chœur de voix joyeuses.

PAUL, levant son visage baigné de larmes.

Ces voix ?...

LA REINE.

Ce sont les arbres de la forêt, les hommes délivrés qui s'en retournent !

SCÈ^CE IV

LES PRECEDENTS ; DOMINIQUE entre par le côté droit, avec un nid sur la tête ; en guise de bras, il a deux rameaux chargés de fruits qu'il tient horizontalement.

JEANNE, émue. Mon frère ! Comme le voilà !

DOMINIQUE, pleurant.

Mon pauvre maître ! Enfin je vous retrouve. Les larmes m'en coulent comme la pluie le long du tronc, du corf ; S c'est-à-dire. Je 11e peux vous serrer dans mes bras. On a beau me couper les rameaux, ça repousse. Je voudrais tant vous embrasser ! Maudite gourmandise, c'est elle qui a tout fait !

En baissant le menton, il mange une prune sur son épaule, et se remet à pleurer.

Ah ! mon Dieu, mon Dieu !

PAUL et JEANNE, ensemble. Grâce pour lui, bonne Fée !

LA REINE, .1 raul.

Puisque tu l'aimes, soit !

Aussitôt les deux branches disparaissent. Dominique a dei bras. Dans le mouvement de sa chevelure qui frissonne, le nid tombe de sa tête, des oeufs s'écrasent par terre et UM oiseau s'envole.

LA REINE DES FEES, a Dominique. Mais tu iras...

DOMINIQUE.

Oh ! partout. Depuis que j'ai pris racine, je ne demande qu'à me dégourdir.

LA REINE, montrant les colonnes.

Tu iras avec ton maître, pour donner ces cours à tous ceux qui en manquent.

DOMINIQUE.

Volontiers !

Il considère les coeurs suspendus et se gratte l'oreille.

IVlais... vu la quantité, nous allons avoir une cargaison d'une lourdeur... !

LA REINE.

Non ! regarde.

Les caurs se rapetissent à la dimension d'une noix. Une surface dorée les enveloppe.

DOMINIQUE. Oh ! que c'est drôle ! comme c'est drôle ! Pas de paresse ! grimpons-y !

Il va pour monter à la colonne de gauche au premier plan

LA REINE. Non ! baisse-toi !

Le chapiteau de la colonne à gauche et celui de la colonne à droite, entr'ouvrant, laissent tomber une pluie de caurs.

DOMINIQUE, les ramassant. On dirait, vraiment, des bonbons de sucre !

LA REINE. Il n'en seront que plus faciles à prendre.

A Paul, qui reste immobile au pied de la colonne de droite.

Que fais-tu donc ? Tu restes là !

PAUL, j part, murmurant.

Et je la perds au moment de ma victoire. quand tout semblait fini et que je croyais enfin la tenir !

JEANNE, suppliant.

Oh ! ne sois pas désespéré... Va-t'en, si tu m'aimes. Tu ne connais pas le destin. Fais ce qu'elle ordonne, tout de suite, tout de suite !

DOMINIQUE.

Allons ! mon pauvre maître, encore un petit voyage, le dernier !

Paul étend son manteau, et reçoit des coeurs pendant que Dominique en bourre tes poches.

LA REINE, montrant l'horizon.

Va ! maintenant.

PAUL, se tournant vers Jeanne pour l'embrasser.

Jeanne !

LA REINE, l', cariant d'un geste.

Non ! à ton devoir ! le sien e.-t accompli sur la terre. Je la transporte dans des répiens où elle attendra, pour vous retrouver, que ta vertu t'ait fait digne de son amour.

Paul et Dominique remontent l'escalier en ruines en trébuchant parmi les pierres.

JEANNE,

Adieu !

PAUL, de loin.

Adieu !

Dominique se retourne pour envoyer un baiser. Tous les chapiteaux de toutes les colonnes s'entr'ouvrent et laissent tomber un ruisseau de caurs d'or. En même temps, des deux côtés, les Fées envahissent la scène en tourbillonnant et recueillent les caurs dans le pan de leurs robes. — Au premier plan, Jeanne, émue, est restée avec la Reine qui lui tient la main. — On aperçoit Paul et Dominique à l'extrême horizon.

DIXIÈME TABLEAU

LA FÊTE DU PAYS

Un beau parc dans les environs de Paris, chez le banquier Kloeher. Des deux cotés de la scène il y a de grands arbres. — Au fond un petit mur soutenant une terrasse, avec un escalier de pierre au milieu. Sur chaque marche de l'escalier, aux deux bouts, un vase de fleurs. D'autres vases sont alignés sur la dalle du mur. Au delà, on aperçoit la campagne avec Paris dans l'éloignement. Le milieu de la scène se trouve occupé par une pelouse de gazon.

SCÈNE PREMIÈRE

MONSIEUR et MADAME KLOEKHER, LETOURNEUX, ALFRED DE C1SY.

ONÈSIME DUBOIS, MACARET, CO- LOMBEL, BOUVIGNARD, INVITÉS, MESSIEURS et DAMES, tous en élégants costumes d'été.

C'est le soir. Au lever du rideau les invites arrivent par la gauche et se répandent sur la scène, Madame Kloeher donnant le bras à Alfred. Bouvignard se précipite à droite, seul, à l'écart, et tire de sa poche une petite cruche de faïence, enveloppée dans son mouchoir, qu'il découvre et se met à contempler.

MADAME KLOEKHER, respirant largement.

Enfin, ici, on respire ! car cette fête du pays, avec ses trompettes et sa grosse caisse, nous a ennuyé si fort durant le dîner...

MONSIEUR KLOEKHER.

Ah ! voilà ! Le jour qu'on choisit pour recevoir ses amis, Messieurs les gens du peuple s'amuse !

LETOURNEUX.

Si au moins dans leurs divertissements ils respectaient la morale !

MACARET.

Puis, ils viendront crier misère à la porte de notre usine...

COLOMBEL.

Ht il faudra les recevoir dans les hôpitaux, où l'on perd a les soigner un temps... Il sort.

LETOURNEUX, gaiement.

Et dire que de vieux camarades comme nous ont été sur le point de se fâcher, mon pauvre Kloekher !

KLOEKHER. Comment sur le point ? Nous étions furieux !

Il rit. Ha ! ha !

LETOURNEUX, riant.

A propos de quoi, je vous le demande ? Pour ce petit monsieur Paul.

KLOEKHER, avec une colere concentrée.

L'intrigant !

ALFRED, haussant les >paulet.

Un fou !...

MADAME KLOEKHER. Un véritable drôle !

Elle s'assoit sur le banc à gauche. Alfred se m-1 ptes St'lt.

KLOEKHER. Sait-on au moins ce qu'il est devenu ?

ALFRED.

Non ! Sombre.

MADAME KLOEKHER. Vous ne pleurez pas, Onésime, vous, son ami ?

ONÉSIME.

iMoi, Madame ! jamais de la vie, je vous jure.

MADAME KLOEKHER, riait.

C'eût été fort beau, cependant, que de le voir, la semaine prochaine, à vos côtés, comme témoin de votre mariage.

KLOEKHER. Eh ! mon Dieu, ne causons plus de ce misérable ! Si nous faisons quelques pas, Letourneux, hein, pour régler les bases de notre opération !...

LETOURNEUX.

Avec plaisir !

Letourneux et Klokher se mettent à se promener du haut en bas de la scène.

MADAME KLOEKHER, à Onésime.

On la dit une excellente personne, votre fiancée ?

ONÉSIME.

Elle n'est point d'une beauté... extraordinaire. Mais... il y a d'autres avantages.

MACARET, à Onésime.

Qu'a-t-il donc, Bouvignard ? Il semble absorbé dans une contemplation...

Ils vont à lui.

BOUVIGNARD, à Onésime. Vous qui étiez ; artiste, examinez-moi cela ! Quels filets ! quel émail !

Onésime veut prendre le pot.

Prenez garde ! Non ! je vais vous le démontrer moi-même.

Bouvignard, Onésime et Macaret restent debout à examiner le pot que Bouvignard leur montre sur toutes les faces. Mm* Klokher est assise sur le banc, à gauche, avec Alfred. Letourneux et Klokher se promènent de haut en bas.

MADAME KLOEKHER, à demi-voix. Ainsi c'est convenu ? je recevrai pour samedi mon invitation chez madame la comtesse de Trc-manville ?

ALFRED. Et pour tous ses autres samedis.

Klokher et Letourneux passent en gesticulant.

Ma tante s'est fait prier, je vous l'av ne La différence des mondes, des quartiers, je veux dire...

A part.

Attrape, ma petite bourgeoise !

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Oh ! merci ! et il ne faudra plus me faire des terreurs, comme l'autre jour.

ALFRED.

Non ! non ! bien sur ! C'est que j'avais perdu la tête, à propos de rien ; tout s'est arrangé. Je vous adore, Ernestine !

Montrant Kloekher qui repasse.

Vous lui parlerez de moi, n'est-ce pas, comme d'un homme entièrement à lui, prêt à toutes les démarches, et auquel il pourrait, dans son intérêt même, confier ses affaires... les plus capitales.

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Sans doute, mon ami !

ALFRED, à part.

Si elle ne s'y met pas, dans huit jours la Bel* gique !

MACARET

Et vous avez acheté cela... ?

BOU VIGNARD.

Quatre-vingts francs ! — pas un sou de plu-, — ici dans un cabaret, a roté !

On entend UT bruit de trompettes et de çroite caitie.

MADAME KLOEKHER, levant.

Encore ! mais c'est intolérable, monsieur Kloskher ; il faudrait se plaindre a l'autorité.

Le bruit redouble ; il t'y mêle des cm d'ent\outi.ttme et comme le brouhaha d'une foule.

L r s PRÉCiiDrNTS, COLOMBEL rentrant.

COLOMBEL.

Savez-vous qu'il y a là sur la place, au milieu des boutiques, quelque chose de fort original, d'extraordinaire, une chose très amusante, ma parole ! J'ai vu bien de ? saltimbanques, mais aucun de pareil à celui-là. Un homme qui vend des coeurs pour un sou !

ALFRED.

Ce n'est pas cher !

UNE DAME. Oh ! non, mais curieux.

UN INVITÉ. On ferait peut-être bien de voir... Qui sait ?

UN AUTRE. Quand ce ne serait que pour entendre le boniment.

MACARET.

Ces gaillards-là, quelquefois, vous ont une verve !...

Les invités entourent Madame Kloekher.

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Je ne sais si je dois ?... Est-ce un homme que l'on puisse faire venir, docteur ?

COLOMBEL.

Oh ! pour vous, certainement non, belle dame ; il n'en est nul besoin. Mais, quanta nous autres, à qui vous avez pris tous nos coeurs...

KLOEKHER, se disposant à sortir. Bah !... à la campagne !... Je vais l'appeler !

LES INVITÉS. Bien !... Bravo !... c'est une idée !

COLOMBEL remonte de quelques pas, en faisant un signe à droite.

Entrez ! — Je me suis permis, en qualité de médecin, de vous donner celte petite su-prise, Mesdames.

SCÈNE111

LES PRECEDENTS, PAUL, avec de longs cheveux- blancs, une barbe blanche et une vaste robe de velours noir qui l'enveloppe complètement. DOMINIQUE : le suit, habillé en Chinois, et portant sur son dos une grosse caisse et un sac de peau rouge, à la main titi petit pliant.

Ils s'arrêtent, au milieu, sur le ga^on. Dominique place le sac sur le pliant.

LES DAMES.

OI> ! ça va être gentil ! Ça m'amuse déjà, moi j'aime les escamoteurs.

MADAME KLOEKHER. Vous faut-il une table "pour exécuter vos tours ?

PAUL.

Merci, Madame, je ne fais pas île tours. Ma mission est plus haute. C'est votre amélioration morale, votre salut que je demande. Je suis chargé par les Fée :- de vous remettre vos cœurs.

LES INVITÉS. Comment, nos cœurs ?

ALFRED. Il est poli, le Nostradamus !

PAUL.

Eh ! il ne s'agit pas de politesse ; je parle sérieusement, croyez-moi.

LES INVITÉS, riant. Très drôle ! très drôle !

COLOMBEL, à Madame Kloekher. Quand je vous disais qu'il est parfait !

DOMINIQUE, après avoir vidé sur le pliant le sac plein de bonbons dorés.

Eh bien ! Messieurs, qui vous empêche... ? Voyons, Mesdames, un peu de courage !... C'est joli, sucré, hygiénique !

COLOMBEL. Il s'exprime en bon termes, ce Chinois, qui vient de Paris.

DOMINIQUE. Non, Monsieur, nous arrivons de Pipempohé...

Caressant sa moustache.

où la sultane nous a fait les offres les plus avantageuses !

LES INVITES,,am. Pipempohe !... la sultane !...

PAUL.

Oui ! et c'est ensuite que je les ai conquis moi- même dans la forteresse des Gnomes.

LES INVITES. Les Gnomes !... Il est d'un sérieux !...

ONESIME. Laissez-le donc contii uer.

PAUL.

Mais j'ai fini !... Je vous répète encore une fois que je dois, d'après l'ordre des Fées, vous remettre vos cœurs !

DOMI NIQUE, tapant sur la grotte came à tour de brat.

Des cœurs ! des cœurs ! des cœurs ! prenez des cœurs !#

PAUL, l'arrêtant.

Tais-toi !

Joignant les mains d'un air suppliant.

Ah ! c'est dans votre intérêt, je vous le jure. Prenez ! Hâtez-vous !

UNE DAME, s'tançant Gela se mange ?

MADAME KLOEKHER. N'y touchez pas ! Quelque drogue, sans doute.

ONÉSIME.

Tant pis ! Je me risque !... Allons, père Bou- vignard, je vous en paye un ! — Faites comme moi !

Il donne une pièce de monnaie et se met à croquer un bonbon, comme Bouvignard.

UNE DAME, à demi-voix. Ces artistes !... toujours singuliers !

COLOMBEL, tout en payant et prenant un cœur.

U faut bien que je donne l'exemple aussi, moi qui l'ai amené, ce farceur-là.

ONÉSIME, se frappant le front. Malheureux ! Où est-elle ? .

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Qui donc ?

ONÉSIME.

Clémence !

MADAME KLOEKHER, bas.

Y pensez-vous ? devant le monde !... Votre mariage !...

D I X I f c M f c I ABIFAU, S C c N E III.

O N F S I M F.

Plus de mariage !

Il sort en criant.

Clémence ! Clémence !

BOUVIGNARD, élevant la voix.

Mais quelle stupidité que de produire ?r « ■on argent à de pareils bibelots !

Il j'tte son pot, qui se brise par terre.

Ah ! ça soulage l... et je vais vendre toute la collection pour doter ma pauvre fille !

COLOMBEL, se parlant à lui-même en se promenant.

Pour l'achat du terrain, un million, je II » donne ! — Et, quant au reste, avec des souscriptions particulières et en s'adressant au gouvernement, j'arriverai à fonder mon hôpital !

Voyant qu'on le regarde.

Oui, Messieurs, j'y consacrerai ma forme, mon temps, ma science, tous mes efforts. Les ser\ Léseront dirigés par de véritable.- savants ;

les sal es tapissées en aubusson, les lits en acajou. Je veux, fiable m'emporte !...

LES INVITÉS, surpris

42S

Eh bien ! eh bien !...

LETOURNEUX.

Il y a là-dedans quelque chose qui monte au cerveau.

PAUL.

Prenez donc !... Je ne les vends plus, je les donne !

MACARET.

A ce prix-là... D'ailleurs je ne vois pas l'intérêt qu'il aurait...

Il avale un bonbon.

PAUL, à Alfred.

Et vous, Monsieur, auriez-vous peur, quand les autres... ?

ALFRED.

Moi ! peur !... Allons donc ! J'en demande deux !

Il en prend deux et en mange un.

MADAME KLOEKHER.

Vous aussi ?...

ALFRED, d voix basse.

Mais c'est excellent ! plus sucré que du miel et suave comme un baiser ! Partagez enfin la passion qui me torture ! Quoi que j'aie pu dire, elle est nouvelle. Quittons cette horrible existence ! Fuyons bien loin sur quelque plage inconnue, au fond des bois, dans un désert !
n'importe où, pourvu que nous soyons seuls tous les deux n savourer le bonheur de vous chérir.

Il porte le bonbon aux letres de Madame hloekher, qui l'avale.

MADAME KLOEKHER aussitôt baine ton toile, et t.e .i prendre le bras de son mari, affectueusement.

Alphonse, mon ami ?

KLOEKHER.

Hein ? Quoi ?

MADAME KLOEKHER. Ce monde m'ennuie... nous sommes si bien dans notre petite intimité... Je t'aime !

KLOEKHER, j pan. Ma femme qui m'aime, maintenant !... Elle a perdu la tête !

MACARET, dans le coin de droite, sanglotant.

Oh ! oh ! mon Dieu !... Oh ! oh ! mon Dieu !... Oh ! oh !...

KLOEKHER. Ou'avez-vous donc, vous ?

MACARET, sans lui repondie.

Oh ! oh !... tant de jours perdus !... Oh ! oh !... comme Titus !

Les invités, qui peu a peu ont pris dei cerurs, l'empreiient autour de Paul de plus en plut.

DOMINIQUE, bas à Paul. Ça va bien !

PAUL, bas.

Non !... Comme il en reste ! Dominique !

Dominique frappe sur sa caisse.

PAUL, avec impatience.

Allons ! Allons donc !

KLOEKHER, irrité.

Eh ! la farce est trop longue !... le monde en a assez... Laissez-nous !

PAUL.

Vous n'en avez pas, vous, Alphonse-Jean- Baptiste-Isidore Kloekher !

KLOEKHE R. Insolent ! Qui t'a dit mes noms ?

PAUL.

Je les sais !

KLOEKHER et LETOURNEUX. A la porte ! A la porte !

PAUL.

Pas avant que tu n'aies pris ce cœur.

DIXIÈME TABLEAU, SCÈNE III. 429 KLOEKHER.

Moi !

PAUL. Je vous en conjure !

KLOEKHER. Mais c'est une indignité !

PAUL.

Je te l'ordonne !

KLOEKHER reste quelque temps abasourdi, pâle de colère ; puis, avec une pose majestueuse.

De quel droit ?

Paul, sans lui répondre, arrache d'un seul mouvement sa barbe et ses cheveux blancs, ainsi que sa longue robe de velours noir. Kloeher lève les bras, épouvante, comme à la vue d'un spectre, en s'écriant :

Lui !

MADAME KLOEKHER, pressant délicatement le bras de son mari, et le lui montrant, avec une voix douce.

Monsieur Paul !

LETOURNEUX, se mordant le pouce et détournant la tête.

Paul de Damvilliers !...

UNE DAME. Ali ! la bonne surprise !

COLOMBEL. Cet excellent jeune homme !

ALFRED, venant lui presser la main. Cher ami !

Tous les invites viennent ou lui serrer la main ou l'entourer.

KLOEKHER, à part.

Mon Dieu !... tout le monde pour lui !... S'il allait parler !...

Étendant la main.

Je veux bien.

Il avale un coeur.

DOMINIQUE, à part. Allons donc !

KLOEKHER, d'une voix entrecoupée.

Tiens ! tiens !... Mais... qu'est-ce que j'ai donc ?... Ah ! j'oubliais ! Ces pauvres gens que j'ai fait avant hier enfermer à Clichy. S'adressant à une dame.

François...

A un monsieur.

Pierre, délivrez-les. Qu'on y coure !

LETOURNEUX, s'approchant avec inquiétude. Mon ami |

KLOEKHER.

Et ce brave inventeur à qui j'ai refusé... vingt mille francs tout de suite ! Nous verrons après ! mon caissier !

LETOURNEUX.

Mais vous n'y pensez pas, Kloekher.

KLOEKHER.

Laissez-moi, vous.- !

Letourneux fait un geste de stupéfaction et de pitié.

Je suis heureux... oui, — écoutez tous ! — heureux de vous avoir là, réuni-, pour être témoins d'un acte de... haute justice... non !...

Bas.

de confiance ! Il s'agit d'une restitution ! — qu'est-ce que je dis donc là ? — ■ d'un dépôt sacré !...

Sefiappant la poitrine à deux poings.

Imbécile !... oui, tant pis !... je dis bien !... sa... sa... sacré !

PAUL, ferementi.

Je ne suis pas venu pour cela, Monsieur !

KLOEKHER. N'importe, jeune homme ! Je profite de l'occasion.
C'est un fardeau qu'on m'enlève, et, dès ce soir...

Lui serrant la main.

pas plus tard !

Le bruit de la fête villageoise redouble au dehors.

Ah ! comme ça fait plaisir d'entendre cette gaieté populaire ! Eh ! ce serait doubler notre bonheur que de le partager avec eux. Les pauvres gens ! ils n'ont pas déjà tant de joie tout le long de l'année !...

Criant.

Débouchez le Champagne ! Qu'on les fasse entrer ! Ouvrez tout !...

Ah ! le beau jour !,..

Tout le décor s'e'claire en rose.

Je vois la vie en rose !... Quel beau jour !

SCÈ^CE IV

LES PRECEDENTS, un flot de peuple oh se trouve le cabaretier, LE PÈRE et LA MÈRE THOMAS.

LA FOULE, criant.

Vive monsieur Kloeher ! Vive monsieur Kloe- kher !

KLOEKHER, j part. Mon cœur déborde !

MACARET, dans son coin, sanglotant. Ab J ah ! bien touchant ! bien touchant !

DOMINIQUE, tapant sur la caisse.

Dépêchez-vous ! Suivez la foule ! Enlevez le reste !

La multitude tourbillonne autour de Paul et de Dominique. — Trois valets, en grande livrée, apportent des paniers pleins de vin de Champagne. — Kloekher en fait sauter le bouchon, et, suivi par un Domestique, il se précipite de groupe en groupe et verse à boire.

KLOEKHER.

Sablez ! sablez ! sablez !

Le décor, tout rose maintenant, s'éclaire de plus en plus, jusqu'à la fin du tableau. Des fleurs lumineuses, pareilles à de grandes tulipes et à des tournesols, s'épanouissent dans les arbres. Les raisins d'une vigne, serpentant autour d'un chêne, deviennent des grenats ; les feuilles d'un tremble se changent en argent ; et tous les arbres et tous les arbustes, selon leur essence particulière, prennent différents feuillages en pierres précieuses. — Tout le monde s'embrasse, saute de joie, applaudit. Le père et la mère Thomas envoient des baisers à leur fils.

DOMINIQUE, à Paul. Eh bien ! Tout est fini, mon bon maître, plus rien dans le sac ! Amusons-nous, comme les autres.

55

PAUL, lentement et bas, en prenant sur le pliant un coeur et le tenant entre ses doigts.

Mais il y en a encore un, Dominique !

DOMINIQUE, le lui prenant vivement.

Ah ! ce ne sera pas long ! ça me connaît !

A un monsieur. Vous, là-bas, Monsieur ?

LE MONSIEUR.

J'en ai pris !

DOMINIQUE, à une dame. Et vous, Madame ?

LA DAME.

Moi aussi !

DOMINIQUE. Voyons I... le dernier !

UNE PERSONNE. Nous en avons tous.

LA FOULE.

Tous ! tous !

PAUL, à demi-voix. Mais ce serait épouvantable ! C'est impossible !

DOMINIQUE, bas et d'une voix effrayée, en ténor. Ir coeur, qui peu
.2 peu grossièrement.

Maître ! maître ! comme il grandit '... comme il s'enfle !

L'ETOURNEMENT, survient à la fois. JLI et lui frappant tut à propos.

Vous voudriez bien me le faire gober, celui-là ?

PAUL.

Oui, oui !... Pardon pour ça que je vu. » ai fait.

Montrant le cœur.

Prenez-le ! C'est la paix de la conscience, le pouvoir du bien, l'intelligence de tout ce qui est beau ; le moyen de comprendre à la foi » l'humanité, la nature et Dieu !

Letourneux sourit ironiquement, sans bouger.

Mais qui êtes-vous donc, pour rester in » en »ible dans l'allégresse de tous ? Dans quelle pierre êtes-vous taillé ? Vous n'avez donc jamais eu quelque chose, quelqu'un ? Vous n'avez donc rêvé jamais au bonheur de la posséder, au désespoir de le perdre ? Ah ! s'il ne fallait, pour vous » convaincre, que verser mon sang, retournera l'autre bout du monde, vous servir en esclave ! Un peu de pitié ! grâce ! attendri-se/- vous !... Prenez-le !

LETOURNEUX.

Merci, ça gêne trop !

PAUL.

Adieu, Jeanne !... Oh ! je suis maudit !... Je t'ai perdue !...

Le petit mur de la terrasse s'est levé, et l'escalier, devenu d'argent, a grandi. De chacun des vases de fleurs posés sur les marches est sortie une femme. Elles étendent leurs bras sur les épaules les unes des autres, de sorte que l'escalier semble avoir pour rampe une longue file de femmes vêtues de perles. On distingue en haut, enveloppée dans les nuages et sous les teintes laiteuses d'un clair de lune, la base du palais des Fées, couleur de nacre. Jeanne est en avant, sur la plateforme, au sommet de l'escalier. — Paul, en se retournant pour suivre du regard Letourneux qui s'éloigne, l'aperçoit, s'écrie :

Jeanne !...

et escalade, en courant l'escalier. — Pendant qu'il monte, son habillement disparaît pour un costume d'apothéose, tout en blanc, long manteau. Chaque marche, h mesure qu'il monte, exhale un son d'harmonica : succession de toutes les notes de la gamme. — Au moment où il va ouvrir les bras pour serrer Jeanne, la Reine des Fées apparaît auprès d'elle, avec toutes les Fées, qui sont un peu en arrière, à sa droite et à sa gauche ; sur le péristyle du temple, lequel est maintenant plus éclairé, Paul s'arrête et recule.

Je n'ose avancer, ô Reine ! ma mission n'est pas finie. J'ai laissé le mal sur la terre.

LA REINE.

Il lui en faut toujours un peu ! Tu n'en as pas moins mérité la récompense. Soyez heureux dans l'immortalité !

DOMINIQUE, tenant le c^rur dans ses maint et lt pied sur la première marche de Vetcalier.

Et bien, et moi ? et moi ? quV-t-^c que je v.vs devenir avec cette char^c-Ià ?

LA REINE.

Valet <li.' cœur, •surveille << . 'U\ qui trichoni, console ceux qui perdent !

Dominique est change en \alet de coeur. — Le r.rur se place dans l'air, à sa gauche, sur un carre blanc, fait à sa tulle, et qui lui sert de fond, tandis qu'ue longue banierole te déploie dans les airs, portant, écrits en lettres lumineuei, ces mots :

LA VERTU ÉTANT RÉCOMPENSÉE, ON N'A RIEN A DIRE !

LE SEXE FAIBLE

A COMEDY IN FIVE ACTS

After the resounding failure of The Candidate in 1874, Flaubert penned this light-hearted comedy about the ‘weaker sex’, which was much more successful than its predecessor. Unfortunately, there are no translations of the play available, which has only very recently been translated for the first time in English. The original French text has been provided instead for our readers.

ACTE I

Scène 1

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Amédée !

AMÉDÉE

Ma tante ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

As-tu fini d'écrire les noms de nos invités pour ce soir ?

AMÉDÉE

Oui, et de ma plus belle main ! en ronde superbe ! Brard et Saint-Omer auprès de moi...

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Tu es capable d'avoir commis encore quelque bétise !
Voyons.

AMÉDÉE

Voyez ! (Il se lève tendant un des billets.)

Et d'abord notre nouveau ministre, Monsieur des Orbières...
Fallait-il mettre Son Excellence ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Certainement !

AMÉDÉE

En toutes lettres ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Non ! un S et un E, puis ministre : Son Excellence le ministre de...
(Pendant qu'Amédée, qui s'est rassis, écrit à part.)
Il l'est enfin ! il l'est...

AMÉDÉE

(donnant les autres billets au fur et à mesure)

Maintenant, voici les autres : Madame de Grémonville, Mademoiselle Valentine de Grémonville, Mademoiselle Thérèse de Grémonville, la considérable Madame Duvernier, son fils Monsieur Paul, et l'oncle, le vieux de la vieille, l'excellent général Varin des Ilots !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Parfait !

AMÉDÉE (ironiquement)

Vous croyez ? mais il manque quelqu'un.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Qui donc ?

AMÉDÉE

Et Gertrude ? Mademoiselle Gertrude ! est-ce que notre général peut s'en passer ? Ne faut-il pas qu'elle soit là pour le garantir du vent, de la pluie et du soleil, le forcer de mettre sa calotte de peur des rhumes et lui faire avaler son bouillon dès cinq heures, juste ? Il la mène, ou plutôt elle l'escorte partout, si bien qu'au jour de l'an je l'ai rencontré sur le boulevard en train de faire ses visites, côte à côte dans un cabriolet mylord avec sa bonne ; rien de plus folichon que leurs deux profils !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Faiblesse de vieillard ! N'importe ! Il nous a rendu service, un vrai service ; sans lui, Monsieur des Orbières ne serait pas maintenant au pouvoir ; c'est par son influence dans le comité de la Madeleine et les voix de ses vieux compagnons d'armes dont il dispose.

AMÉDÉE

Et où faut-il le placer, notre grand homme ? en face de vous n'est-ce pas ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Pourquoi cela, en face ?

AMÉDÉE

Mais... Chère tante, sa longue habitude de venir ici tous les jours... l'autorité qu'il y possède... enfin, c'est comme le maître de la maison !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Je n'aime pas ce genre de plaisanteries, tu sais !

AMÉDÉE

Cela va de soi-même, pourtant ! et le rapport de vos deux personnes n'a rien que de naturel. Lui, c'est un homme de tribune et de gouvernement ; vous, vous êtes une femme... académique, diplomatique et politique. Oh ! ne niez pas !
Plus d'une motion importante est sortie du boudoir de la rue Bellechasse !... Et quels raouts, miséricorde ! Des messieurs, convenables comme des domestiques du GrandHôtel, et qui dissertent sur la fusion des Centres, l'esprit du dernier cabinet, ou la meilleure assiette des impôts !
Le tout, bien entendu, d'après la direction du célèbre orateur, publiciste et homme d'Etat, Monsieur des Orbières... et on appelle la comtesse de Mérilhac (il salue) son Egérie... ce qui est un grand honneur pour vous, ou plutôt pour lui, chère tante.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Tu auras soin de te placer auprès de Valentine.

AMÉDÉE

Moi ? je veux bien.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Et tu tâcheras, n'est-ce pas, de surveiller un peu tes manières ? je tiens à ce que tu plaises.

AMÉDÉE

Je plais toujours ! Dans quel but, ce soir, tout particulièrement...

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Je trouve qu'il faudrait quitter enfin la vie de garçon ; à cinquante ans, il n'est pas trop tôt de s'établir, de se marier.

AMÉDÉE

Moi ! me marier ! allons donc ! Un mariage, des enfants !
D'abord, je déteste les enfants, et quant à subir le joug d'une femme...

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Fais ce que je te dis... Et tu mettras ton ami Paul près de Thérèse.

AMÉDÉE

Auriez-vous également, à son endroit, des intentions d'hyménée ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Pourquoi pas ?

AMÉDÉE

Celui-là, je l'avoue, est de naissance prédestiné au mariage ; sa mère le gouverne comme un marmot, jusqu'à régler la longueur de sa barbe, interdiction de la cigarette, défense du bal masqué et privation de sortie après minuit ! Et, comme elle le contrecarre dans tous ses goûts, sans qu'il regimbe ! Avec Thérèse ce sera bien pire, car je la trouve, moi, une petite personne désagréable ; elle tient cela peut-être de son père que l'on dit fou ? Ce bonhomme Grémonville ne vit pas avec sa femme.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Tu ferais mieux de ne pas répéter des cancan., pareils !
Du reste, je partage ton opinion sur Valentine (geste d'étonnement d'Amédée), elle est charmante, tandis que Thérèse, entre nous, me semble un peu nigaude, sans compter un caractère boudeur, avec un entêtement !

AMÉDÉE

Eh bien ! au lieu d'un maître, le pauvre garçon en aura deux ! Sera-t-il assez inspecté, et grondé, tiraillé, surmené !
Avant six mois il est fourbu, je parie ! (riant) Très drôle ! très drôle !

Scène 2

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Exact comme un simple mortel !

M. DES ORBIÈRES (lui baisant la main)

C'est bien le moins, chère Madame. Depuis longtemps déjà j'aurais dû...

AMÉDÉE

Croyez, Monsieur le Ministre, que, pour ma part, je m'estime fort heureux...

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Bien, bien, mon jeune ami ! mais entre nous...

AMÉDÉE (prenant son chapeau de paille pour sortir)

On se comprend, Monsieur le Ministre, et comme je sais le prix de vos instants, j'aurais peur...

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Non !... pas le moins du monde !

AMÉDÉE

Si fait ! permettez ! D'ailleurs, il faut que j'aille pour ma tante...

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Oh ! alors...

AMÉDÉE (à part, en se retirant)

Que j'aie de très mauvaises manières, c'est possible ! mais je ne manque pas d'une certaine délicatesse ! (sur le seuil, au fond)

Bénissez-moi, donc, vieux tourtereaux !

Scène 3

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Eh bien ?

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Ah !... la transition est jugée... un peu brusque ! on m'appelle renégat, on crie.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Laissez crier.

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Us ne veulent pas comprendre que mon entrée au pouvoir ne change en rien mes convictions, et que je suis toujours aussi libéral qu'auparavant.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

C'est ce qu'il faut dire.

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Et même encore plus, peut-être.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Sans doute !... aussi je m'applaudis de vous avoir montré indirectement le chemin, et enlevé des scrupules qui prenaient leur cause, non pas dans l'insuffisance de votre coup d'oeil, grâce au ciel, mais dans l'exagération d'une probité...

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Une fois de plus, je m'incline. Et d'ailleurs, n'ai-je pas d'innombrables motifs pour admirer l'excellence de vos conseils ? Vous avez été pour moi un secours, une lumière, un dévouement continu, si bien qu'à chaque pas dans ma carrière, à chaque échelon de ma fortune j'ai senti se développer ma reconnaissance et grandir... ma tendresse.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Eh ! j'ai soixante-trois ans, mon ami !

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Pour moi, vous êtes toujours à la trentaine.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Flatteur !

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Non pas ! et vous calomniez votre âge ; c'est à cause de lui que je vous adore. Il faut que les caprices de la jeunesse soient disparus si nous voulons trouver dans une femme le plus fidèle, et le plus intelligent des amis !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Je ne suis qu'un reflet, le vôtre, vous le savez ; avocat, journaliste, député, j'ai suivi, j'ai partagé orgueilleusement tous vos triomphes, et à présent que vous êtes le Pouvoir, ce ne sont plus des paroles et des écrits que j'attends, mais des œuvres, de grandes choses ! Vous les ferez (geste de des Orbières), oh ! j'en suis sûre ! Pardon, une misère, j'oubliais ! avez-vous pensé à cette place d'inspecteur des Beaux-Arts pour le jeune Duvernier ?

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Toutes, malheureusement, sont prises.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Faites-en une autre !

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Il n'y a pas d'argent au budget !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Trouvez-en !

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Je vous répète que c'est impossible !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Ah ! n'importe, il me la faut !

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Mais, chère amie, quel est là-dedans votre intérêt ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

C'est que je marie mon neveu Amédée Peyronneau à Valentine de Grémonville.

M. DES ORBIÈRES (d'un air maussade)

Tiens ! pourquoi ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Cela vous choque ? cependant la fortune de Valentine...

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Sans doute ! mais ce qui s'est passé autrefois à Toulouse ?

Madame de Grémonville, malgré ses grands airs de vertu...

(Geste de Mme de Mérilhac comme pour dire : je m'en moque.)

Permettez, je connais parfaitement l'histoire, et même, comme avocat, j'ai donné à Monsieur de Grémonville une consultation.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Alors, vous savez que Valentine a été avantagée par son père ?

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Oui ! je le sais ; mais quel rapport entre les demoiselles de Grémonville et une place pour Monsieur Duvernier ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

C'est afin de reconnaître dans la personne du neveu les services rendus par l'oncle.

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Eh ! le général n'est pas homme...

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Pardon ! le général Varin des Ilots, soit embarras ou délicatesse, n'a pas osé vous la demander lui-même, mais il en a envie, j'en suis sûre, il me l'a dit. (à part) De cette façon-là, mon maître, vous serez bien forcé...

M. DES ORBIÈRES (se grattant l'oreille)

Diab ! diab !...

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Cette place n'est pas considérable, la dot de Thérèse non plus, mais la place et la dot réunies donneront aux jeunes époux Duvernier un revenu fort honnête ; c'est un moyen d'équilibrer les choses, de rendre la position des deux sœurs égale, et, puisque je marie mon neveu à Valentine, de faire entrer Paul dans ma famille. D'ailleurs, cet exemple moralisera Amédée, et je ne vois pas, mon cher Ministre, que le Gouvernement serait bien malade quand vous dénicheriez dans les Beaux-Arts...

M. DES ORBIÈRES (avec empressement)

Il s'y connaît ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Eh ! tout le monde s'y connaît !

M. DES ORBIÈRES

D'accord, mais...

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Savez-vous ce qui vous retient ? la peur des journaux ! Ah ! quelle faiblesse !

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Il n'y a pas de faiblesse à respecter la loi. Est-ce que je peux, moi...

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Ce que vous pouvez ? vraiment ! et vous êtes un homme !

Il faut avoir l'audace de sa faiblesse, mon ami, et le dédain brutal de l'opinion est parfois de l'habileté... Moi, quand je me suis vu des cheveux gris, j'ai poudré à blanc tout le reste, hardiment, ce qui m'a rendue plus jeune. Osez tout, et on vous trouvera fort... Ah ! vous êtes loin des grands modèles ! Le Cardinal de Richelieu, Monsieur de Talleyrand, et même Mirabeau, n'y auraient pas tant regardé !

M. DES ORBIÈRES (à part)

Quelle femme !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC (remontant)

Ce sera fait bientôt, n'est-ce pas ? On peut compter...

M. DES ORBIÈRES (derrière elle)

Ah ! je ne promets rien.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Allons donc ! vous vous moquez !

Scène 4

Mme DUVERNIER (minaudant)

Ah ! comtesse, quelle délicieuse résidence vous avez là !
Des fleurs, une pelouse, un étang, qui est un lac !... A chaque détour d'allée un site nouveau, jusqu'à la façade de la maison !... Comme on reconnaît aux moindres choses...
(à Paul) Tu pourrais bien, par convenance, renforcer ce que je dis d'agréable, (haut) Non ! véritablement tout a un cachet !...

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Vous me comblez ! (à M. des Orbières) Madame Duvernier, une de mes bonnes amies... Son fils, Monsieur Paul... (à Mme Duvernier) Permettez-moi de vous présenter notre ministre, Monsieur des Orbières.

MME DUVERNIER

Lui ! le ministre ! Ah ! Monsieur, quel immense honneur pour moi que de me trouver face à face avec un homme... de votre capacité ! (à M) “ de Mérilhac, de manière à être entendue ) un génie, et si simple !

M. DES ORBIÈRES (s'inclinant)

Madame !

Mme DUVERNIER (à Paul)

Trouve donc un compliment pour Son Excellence... l'occasion !

PAUL

Mais tout de suite, ce serait...

Mme DE MÉRILHAC (désignant Paul)

L'ami de mon neveu, le jeune homme dont...

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Ah ! fort bien ! Vous n'êtes pas un inconnu pour moi, Monsieur, et soyez persuadé...

(Il le prend par le coude et remonte avec lui doucement vers le fond ; les femmes restent au premier plan.)

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Dépêchons-nous, pendant qu'ils causent plus loin ! Et d'abord, notre grand projet, que devient-il ?

Mme DUVERNIER

Le général a promis de tâter le terrain, j'aurai sa réponse prochainement, peut-être même aujourd'hui.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Monsieur votre fils doit être d'une impatience !

Mme DUVERNIER

Pourquoi ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Amoureux comme il est !

Mme DUVERNIER

Mais non ! Je ne lui ai encore rien dit !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Alors que savez-vous si Thérèse...

Mme DUVERNIER

Oh ! il ne refusera pas une femme de ma main !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Voilà un fils modèle, chère Madame, recevez-en mes compliments.

Mme DUVERNIER

Pour être dans le vrai, certains indices, de ces petits détails peu importants par eux-mêmes, mais qui, réunis, ont leur signification, me donnent à croire que la jeune personne ne lui est pas indifférente. Pendant les visites que nous faisons aux dames de Grémonville, j'ai remarqué qu'il avait de la pâleur, avec des yeux !... Ah ! comtesse ! Quels yeux !

Ça me rappelle son pauvre père quand il était dans la même position, et je vous avoue que, à sa place, moi aussi c'est bien Thérèse que je choisirais... un agneau, du bon sens, pas évaporée, pas artiste, avec le goût naturel de l'économie, enfin une vraie femme d'intérieur, tout ce qu'il faut pour gagner la confiance d'une mère de famille, en être une elle-même !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Je la crois, comme vous, une jeune fille pleine de... qualités sérieuses, ce qui ne l'empêche pas, sans doute, d'en avoir au fond de plus brillantes, et que monsieur votre fils ne manquera pas de développer, tout naturellement, par sa place...

Mme DUVERNIER

Elle est donnée ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Oh ! à peu près.

MME DUVERNIER

Si j'allais remercier Son Excellence ? qu'en dites-vous ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Mais... oui ! ce sera une manière de l'engager. (Elles remontent vers la véranda ; les hommes, pendant qu'elles parlaient, ont descendu la scène jusqu'au milieu.) Et puis la nomination de Paul va devenir pour son mariage un argument décisif, je me fais un plaisir de l'apprendre, pendant le dîner, à Madame de Grémonville.

PAUL (se retourne vivement)

Ces dames de Grémonville dînent ici ?

Mme DUVERNIER (à Mme de Mérilhac)

Son secret lui échappe, vous voyez bien !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Le cri de la passion, en effet ! (à Paul, ironiquement) Oui, Monsieur, elles dînent ici, et je n'ai pas attendu que vous me dénonciez vos sentiments pour faire mes invitations.

(Les deux femmes, en riant légèrement, continuent à s'avancer vers M. des Orbières, Paul va pour les suivre.)

AMÉDÉE (l'arrêtant)

Eh ! laissez-les tripoter ensemble ! nous en aurons assez tout à l'heure pendant le festin ! J'imagine qu'il sera peu drôle, et je serai de même. D'abord, je me méfie toujours de ma tante dès qu'il y a des vierges aspirant au sacrement ; elle a voulu me placer à côté de Valentine.

PAUL (vivement)

Tu seras à côté d'elle, toi ?

AMÉDÉE

Oui ! et que le diable m'emporte si je trouve de quoi alimenter la conversation ! je n'ai rien à dire aux femmes honnêtes, moi ! Oh ! pas n'est besoin de surveillance ! Mais toi, pendant ce temps-là, mon gaillard, tu nageras en plein azur ?

PAUL

Comment ?

AMÉDÉE

Tu vas faire ta cour à la cadette, à Mademoiselle Thérèse.

PAUL

A Thérèse (il s'assombrit).

AMÉDÉE

Malin ! ne cache donc pas ton jeu ! tu l'aimes.

PAUL

Ah ! par exemple !

AMÉDÉE

Ta ta ta.

PAUL

Mais je te jure...

AMÉDÉE

Je te souhaite infiniment de plaisir !

PAUL

Oh ! ce n'est pas...

AMÉDÉE

Après tout, tu es libre, ça te regarde ! (Il pirouette sur ses talons et remonte la scène.)

PAUL (resté seul sur le devant)

Ah ! maudite timidité qui me rend toujours si malheureux !
Est-ce que jamais je ne me ferai connaître ! Pourquoi rougir de mon amour comme d'un crime ? il faudra bien pourtant que je prenne une résolution, et que ça finisse !

Scène 5

LE GÉNÉRAL

(Il est entré par la porte latérale, à droite, et après avoir regardé quelque temps avec inquiétude.)

Paul ! ah ! je te cherchais... Un mot ! Tu devrais prier ton ami Amédée d'avertir son domestique qu'il viendra peut-être, ce soir, une dame me demander... en secret.

PAUL (étonné)

Mon oncle !

LE GÉNÉRAL

C'est tout bonnement Gertrude ! je n'ai pas voulu la faire manger à la cuisine, tu comprends ; elle est restée chez le traiteur du village, là, à côté, et si par hasard, pour une chose, ou pour une autre...

PAUL

Bien ! Bien !

LE GÉNÉRAL

Ainsi, je peux être tranquille, n'est-ce pas ?

Mme DUVERNIER (descendant précipitamment)

Mais c'est la voix du général ! je brûle...

LE GÉNÉRAL (saluant)

Madame... Comtesse, je dépose mes hommages... (vite)

Bonjour, Monsieur Peyronneau !... (donnant une poignée de main)

Monseigneur, je vous salue.

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Le monseigneur doit bien des excuses à son général, d'abord de n'avoir pas répondu à sa lettre si flatteuse (l'entraînant un peu), puis, relativement à cette place pour Monsieur Paul Duvernier...

LE GÉNÉRAL

Une place ?

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Oui ! l'inspection !

LE GÉNÉRAL

Quelle inspection ?

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Celle enfin que vous avez demandée.

LE GÉNÉRAL

Moi ? demandée... à qui ?

M. DES ORBIÈRES

A Madame de Mérilhac.

LE GÉNÉRAL

Jamais de la vie !

M. DES ORBIÈRES (étonné, regardant Mme de Mérilhac)

Comment ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC (bas à des Orbières)

Maladroit, vous le blessez. (Des Orbières remonte.)

LE GÉNÉRAL (s'avançant vers elle)

N'est-ce pas, comtesse, que je n'ai point...

Mme DUVERNIER (au général, l'arrêtant)

Mais, depuis deux heures, j'attends ! (Elle l'entraîne.) Eh bien, voyons, Madame de Grémonville, qu'a-t-elle dit ?

LE GÉNÉRAL

Je n'y vais pas par quatre chemins, vous savez ! je mène les choses rondement, à la hussarde ! j'ai donc fait la demande.

Mme DUVERNIER

Et ?

LE GÉNÉRAL

Madame de Grémonville l'a accueillie avec une satisfaction que j'ose dire visible, malgré un petit air de modestie ; la vérité même est qu'elle se rengorgeait !

Mme DUVERNIER

Ah ! le ciel soit loué !

LE GÉNÉRAL

Du reste, vous pouvez vous en assurer par vous-même, ces dames arrivent tout à l'heure, elles doivent être maintenant au bout du parc.

Mme DUVERNIER (à MME de Mérilhac)

Allons au-devant d'elles, ce serait plus poli, qu'en ditesvous ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Volontiers. (appelant) Amédée ! tu nous accompagnes, c'est bien le moins qu'il y ait un homme pour offrir son bras à Madame de Grémonville.

AMÉDÉE

Oui ! je vous rejoins.

PAUL (,à part)

Si j'y allais aussi, moi ! Pourquoi pas ? en plein air, on est plus brave ; le bon vent d'été, le ciel bleu, les roses, les oiseaux, la nature immense autour de moi me soutiendra.

Quelque chose me dit même : en avant ! Je risque tout !

(Il sort très vite.)

Scène 6

AMÉDÉE

(regardant Paul s'éloigner, et haussant les épaules)

Encore un qui se précipite à l'abîme ! Pauvre garçon !

LE GÉNÉRAL

De quoi le plaignez-vous ?

AMÉDÉE

Eh ! de se marier ! il va se marier !

M. DES ORBIÈRES

C'est s'y prendre un peu jeune !

LE GÉNÉRAL

Certainement ! j'ai même fait là-dessus des représentations à Madame Duvernier : mais les femmes, vous savez, l'amour, le mariage !... et puis le mariage, l'amour ! elles ne sortent pas de là !

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Il y a d'autres buts cependant, et pour les atteindre il vaut mieux rester garçon.

AMÉDÉE

D'abord avec les femmes on n'est jamais indépendant.

LE GÉNÉRAL

Ni tranquille.

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Ni sûr de quoi que ce soit.

LE GÉNÉRAL

Croyez-vous, par exemple, qu'un militaire marié aura le même courage...

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Et qu'on puisse, au milieu de tracas pareils, mener, je suppose, une vie d'études, de cabinet ?

AMÉDÉE

Effectivement, il me semble que je ne posséderais pas toutes mes facultés si j'avais une épouse.

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Le mal de notre temps, le voilà, Messieurs, la femme ! son influence nous étouffe, on la sent partout épandue, c'est le grand filet où se prennent les âmes ! L'homme libre y laisse sa force, et le penseur sa conscience !

LE GÉNÉRAL

Que je voudrais que Gertrude l'entendît !

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Eve, Circé, Dalilah, Hélène, Cléopâtre, Dubarry et bien d'autres prouvent assez que, depuis le commencement du monde, elles sont faites pour combattre l'idéal, humilier l'homme et perdre les empires !

LE GÉNÉRAL

Dans toutes les affaires criminelles, on trouve, au fond, une femme !

AMÉDÉE

Il est de fait qu'elles vous mènent souvent très loin.

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Aussi, moi, Messieurs, pour me conserver plus ferme dans la lutte, ardent au travail et sourd aux complaisances, j'ai poussé, comment dirais-je ? la circonspection... oui, c'est le mot... jusqu'à me priver d'une maîtresse !

LE GÉNÉRAL

Moi, en qualité de militaire, j'ai parcouru bien des pays, et j'ai eu... je peux maintenant le dire sans fatuité... pas mal de relations ! mais jamais, nom d'un petit bonhomme ! la moindre attache sérieuse.

(Il rit. On rit.)

AMÉDÉE

De la brune à la blonde ! libre comme l'air ! tout est là !

LE GÉNÉRAL

Et elles avaient beau, pour m'attendrir, employer leurs giries... (Il se détourne.)

Hein ? vous dites ?

UN DOMESTIQUE

(entré timidement depuis quelque temps, s'approche du général et lui présentant une regindote-pardessus)

C'est une dame qui veut que Monsieur le général mette sa redingote, à cause du frais.

LE GÉNÉRAL

(en lui faisant signe de se retirer, prend la redingote)

...Ça ne produisait aucun effet ! (Il passe une manche.) Je vous les envoyais bouler !... (Il a du mal à passer l'autre manche.)

AMÉDÉE (l'aidant)

Moi, comme enfant de Paris, je ne suis pas, vous pensez bien, sans avoir rencontré quelques bonnes fortunes... Des personnes ! oh ! j'en ai connu qui m'ont aimé beaucoup, et qui rêvaient un tas de choses... qui entreprenaient de me faire changer mes habitudes ! mais pas si bête ! un moment ! Aucune encore n'a pu aplatir cette boule-là, voyez-vous (montrant sa tête), pas même ma tante ! et Dieu sait qu'elle est forte, la comtesse.

M. DES ORBIÈRES (à part)

Après tout, rien ne m'empêche de commander un rapport sur son affaire ?... Une idée, notons-la. (Il tire un calepin de sa poche et écrit debout.)

AMÉDÉE (se frappant le front)

Ah ! saperlotte ! j'oubliais les dames de Grémonville !...
Quelle semonce ! (Il se précipite pour sortir.)

LE GÉNÉRAL (regardant au loin)
Inutile ! je crois que les voilà.

AMÉDÉE (même jeu)
Oui ! toutes les trois... et ma tante, et Madame Duvernier...
Cinq femmes ! comme ça tient de la place !

LE GÉNÉRAL
Avec la toilette qu'elles ont aujourd'hui, parbleu ! Et même je ne sais comment un homme peut y suffire !
D'autant plus que la simplicité, mon Dieu, un joli petit bonnet !...

M. DES ORBIÈRES
Autre signe des temps, général ; toute la valeur d'un siècle se reconnaît à la façon dont les femmes s'habillent. Aux époques viriles, pas d'étalage, nulle pompe ; vous les voyez glisser entre les événements, minces et fluettes, dans des sarraux ou des gaines. Mais que l'homme s'endorme et que les cœurs se relâchent, tout à coup leur coiffure se dresse à leur front comme une menace, leurs hanches s'élargissent dans des proportions formidables, elles débordent les voitures, elles font craquer les murailles ; on dirait qu'elles veulent toucher le ciel de leur front et abriter le monde avec leur jupe.

AMÉDÉE
Très bien !

LE GÉNÉRAL (serrant la main de M. des Orbières)
Vous me faites plaisir, quand vous parlez, vous ! non, là, sérieusement, vous me faites plaisir !

Scène 7

THÉRÈSE

(Elle entre par la droite avec des sanglots, une main sur le cœur, et s'appuyant aux lambris.)

Moi qui l'aimais tant ! Oh ! mon Dieu ! mon Dieu !

Mme DUVERNIER (entre par la gauche, ébouriffée, furieuse)

Le misérable ! manquer à toutes les convenances ! sans égard pour sa pauvre mère !

THÉRÈSE

Faut-il que j'aie cru jusqu'à présent !...

Mme DUVERNIER

S'il m'avait prévenue, au moins ! mais non, là, tout à coup...

THÉRÈSE

C'est à en mourir de chagrin ! (Elle s'affaisse sur la causeuse.)

Mme DUVERNIER

Ah ! j'étouffe de rage ! (Elle tombe de l'autre côté, dans un fauteuil.)

LE GÉNÉRAL

Eh ! bon Dieu, chère Madame, si je pouvais...

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Mademoiselle, du calme, je vous en prie, du calme !

AMÉDÉE

Mais qu'y a-t-il ?

Scène 8

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Rien ! une petite sottise !

PAUL

Un événement heureux.

VALENTINE

Oh ! bien heureux !

THÉRÈSE (redoublant de sanglots)

Pas pour moi toujours ! pas pour moi !

Mme DUVERNIER (à son fils)

Un procédé de ta part que je n'attendais guère, par exemple !

THÉRÈSE

Oh ! allons-nous-en.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Veux-tu bien ne pas pleurer !

THÉRÈSE

Je veux pleurer, moi ! je veux m'en aller !... non ! qu'on me laisse tranquille !... dans un couvent !

LE GÉNÉRAL

Mais elle va se faire du mal !

Mme DUVERNIER

Et moi ! j'en aurai bien sûr une fluxion de poitrine ! et rien que pour la mémoire de ton père...

Scène 9

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Tout ce bruit, ces cris, je voudrais savoir...

(Paul se penche à l'oreille du général et lui parle bas sans qu'on l'entende.)

LE GÉNÉRAL (fait un bond en arrière)

Comment ! mais ce n'était pas ça ? voilà qui dérange tout !

ah ! fichtre !

M. DES ORBIÈRES (au général)

Quoi donc ?

LE GÉNÉRAL

(parle bas à l'oreille de M. des Orbières, puis désignant Mme de Mérilhac)

Je n'ose pas lui dire, mais dites-le, vous.

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Ah ! diable, c'est fort embarrassant !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Mais, mon ami, pourquoi, dans ma maison, tous ces mystères ?

AMÉDÉE

(un peu auparavant, s'est rapproché de Paul qui lui a parlé à l'oreille, et sur le dernier mot de Mme de Mérilhac, gaiement)

Le mystère est bien simple, Paul a demandé et obtenu la main de Mademoiselle Valentine.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC (pousse un cri)

Valentine ! (se contraignant) J'en suis ravie... enchantée, certainement, (à Mme Duvernier) Vous aurez là, Madame, une belle-fille on ne peut mieux. (à Paul) Je vous félicite, Monsieur ! (tâchant de se remettre) La nouvelle de ces événements, quand on s'y intéresse, a toujours quelque chose qui impressionne.

UNE FILLE DE BASSE-COUR (entre, essoufflée)

Il y a là une dame qui veut à toute force parler au général.

LE GÉNÉRAL

On y va, sacrr... (Embarras général.)

AMÉDÉE

Qu'est-ce que vous avez donc à vous regarder tous sans rien dire ?

Moi, par principe et caractère, je ne suis pas pour le mariage, assurément ; mais quand c'est plus fort que vous, je trouve cela très bien et permets qu'on en use. Allons dîner ! (On se met en mouvement pour passer dans la salle à manger, d'une façon contrainte. Mme de Mérilhac, seule, en tête ; Mme de Grémonville au bras de Paul, Mme Duvernier au bras du général, Valentine au bras de M. des Orbières ; Thérèse, seule, après tous les autres ; enfin Amédée.

Il regarde les convives, et au public.) Pas de femme ! moi ! jamais de femme !

ACTE II

Scène 1

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

(fermant avec violence un secrétaire plein de papiers, registres de comptes, etc.)

Une pareille dépense pour quinze jours à Nice, c'est affreux !

VALENTINE

Il est vrai de dire qu'il ne m'a rien refusé !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Je crois bien !

VALENTINE

Les premiers temps du mariage...

THÉRÈSE (ironiquement)

La lune de miel !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Du miel qui coûte cher !

VALENTINE

Mais, petite maman adorée, tu ne songes pas que bientôt sa place...

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Toi et lui, vois-tu, vous n'êtes que deux enfants sans aucune idée de la vie, et il est réellement fort heureux que je vous aie tout sacrifié : goûts, repos, habitudes... sacrifié est le mot, car si j'habite, avec vous, cette maison, c'est grâce aux instances de ton mari.
Bien sûr !

VALENTINE

Aussi notre reconnaissance...

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Sans moi, pauvre fille, il t'aurait dominée, tu es trop bonne.

Dieu merci, j'étais là ; mon expérience m'avait appris qu'il fallait d'abord lui tenir tête et se poser dès le premier jour carrément. C'est pour son bien, après tout ; il a été singulièrement élevé, ce garçon.

THERÈSE

Oh ! oui !

VALENTINE (vivement)

Quand tu ne seras pas sans cesse à renforcer les accusations...

Mrae DE GRÉMONVILLE

Elle a raison ; rappelle-toi les premiers temps de votre mariage !
comme il était pliant, respectueux, empressé !

Depuis son retour de Nice, il manifeste en toutes choses je ne sais quel esprit d'indépendance ; vendredi, c'était une grimace devant le dîner maigre, tu l'as vu ; l'autre jour, il a refusé de m'accompagner au sermon. A chaque instant, on dirait qu'il prend à tâche de combattre mes principes ; mais sois tranquille, une mère se doit au bonheur de ses enfants. Il y a ici un besoin urgent de réformes, d'abord votre train de maison.

VALENTINE

Mais, petite mère, puisqu'il va avoir cette place, aujourd'hui peut-être ? il est même descendu...

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Tant mieux ! Quoi qu'il en soit, je vous sauverai, et comme premier point j'exige... (Bruit de pas précipités dans la coulisse.)

VALENTINE

Ecoute donc ! mais oui, c'est lui !

Scène 2

PAUL

Le journal ! le journal ! il y est, le décret ! j'ai respecté la bande, je n'ai pas voulu lire ma nomination tout seul.

(Valentine lui saute au cou.)

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Etes-vous sûr au moins ?

PAUL (montrant le journal)

Parbleu ! tenez, là ! regardez !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (prenant les mains de Paul)

Cette excellente dame de Mérilhac ! quel noble caractère !
et une influence...

VALENTINE

Oh ! la bonne comtesse ! il faut aller la remercier, maman.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Tout de suite ! (prenant la main de Paul qui va déployer le journal)

Vous aussi ! [à Valentine] Mets ton chapeau.

(Valentine sort.) Tu nous accompagnes, Thérèse ?

THÉRÈSE (avec humeur)

Moi ?

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

(après avoir sonné, revenant vers Paul et l'arrêtant dans sa lecture commencée)

Oui, l'expression de notre reconnaissance doit avoir un caractère de spontanéité.

PAUL

Sans doute.

VALENTINE (revenant avec son châle et son chapeau)
Me voilà ! (Victoire entre.)

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Faites atteler, Victoire, et donnez-nous d'abord à moi et à Mademoiselle tout ce qu'il faut pour sortir. (Victoire sort.)

PAUL (feuilleter avec anxiété)

Mais... mais... ah ! l'autre page...

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (pendant qu'il lit)

Une place pareille ! et pour un début ! c'est splendide !...

Oh la protection des femmes ! Vous avez maintenant le pied à l'étrier, mon ami !

PAUL (balbutiant et parcourant fiévreusement le journal)

Comment ?

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Eh bien, qu'arrive-t-il ? (Paul s'affaisse dans un fauteuil.)

Vous pâlissez.

VALENTINE (courant à lui)

Paul ! Paul !

PAUL (d'une voix faible et laissant tomber le journal)

Je ne suis pas nommé !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (ramassant le journal)

C'est impossible !

VALENTINE (bas à Paul)

Du courage, mon ami !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (froissant le journal)

Non ! rien !

THÉRÈSE (avec amertume)

Ah ! ah ! cette excellente dame de Mérilhac !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (éclatant)

Mais c'est une trahison, mais c'est une infamie ! mais on ne se moque pas ainsi des personnes de notre rang ! (Victoire revient avec deux chapeaux et deux manteaux.)

VICTOIRE (à part)

Oh ! oh ! tempête !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (à Victoire)

Allez-vous rester plantée comme ça une heure devant moi ?
Mettez tout ici, laissez-nous ! Ah ! Madame de Mérilhac !

THÉRÈSE (allant à sa mère)

Chère maman, ne te fais donc pas tant de mal pour une... intrigante de cette espèce.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Embrasse-moi, Thérèse ; tu as vu clair, toi ! tu es la seule tête forte de la maison. (désignant Paul et Valentine avec dédain) On n'arrive à rien avec des caractères comme ceux-là.

PAUL (se relevant)

Madame !

VALENTINE (à sa mère)

Mais, ce n'est pas sa faute.

MME DE GRÉMONVILLE

Qu'en sais-tu ? que veux-tu que je te dise, moi ? Monsieur a ses idées, Monsieur a ses allures... Monsieur est un libre penseur ! tout cela peut fort bien ne pas convenir à tout le monde ! et si Madame de Mérilhac est inexcusable d'avoir agi de cette façon-là à mon égard, je suis bien forcée de reconnaître qu'elle n'a peut-être pas complètement tort envers Monsieur.

PAUL

J'excuse votre injustice en considération de votre désappointement.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Une place sans laquelle, certainement, je n'aurais pas consenti...

PAUL

A quoi ?

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (détournant la tête)

Car enfin, la dot que Madame Duvernier vous a donnée...

PAUL

Oh ! Madame, il me semble que vous-même vous n'avez pas été d'une générosité...

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (fondant en larmes)

Des reproches ! Mon Dieu ! c'est le dernier coup ! [Elle tombe dans un fauteuil.)]

THÉRÈSE

Ma pauvre maman !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (gémissant)

Me faire un crime, à moi, de l'exiguïté de mes ressources présentes ! me reprocher les immenses sacrifices que m'impose la malheureuse santé de mon mari.

VALENTINE

Il n'a pas voulu dire cela, je t'assure.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Ce n'était pas la peine de m'attirer chez lui, à mon âge, s'il n'avait que des insultes...

VALENTINE (bas à Paul)

Demande-lui pardon, Paul.

PAUL

Moi ?

VALENTINE

Je t'en supplie...

PAUL

Jamais !

VALENTINE (s'agenouillant)

Tiens, comme cela, près de moi !

PAUL

Tu le veux ?

VALENTINE

Oui, je t'en prie.

PAUL (s'avançant gravement vers Mmede Grémonville)

Je vous fais mes excuses, Madame.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Ah ! Monsieur, la vie en commun n'était qu'un beau rêve !

Je vois bien maintenant qu'il vaut mieux nous séparer...

dans notre intérêt réciproque.

VALENTINE

Oh ! chère maman, ne nous quitte jamais, jamais !

PAUL

Je vais joindre ma prière à la sienne, Madame.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

(laissant prendre sa main par Valentine, qui la met dans celle de Paul)

Ah ! Monsieur, vous ne connaissez pas le cœur d'une mère !

THÉRÈSE

Quoi qu'il en soit, je pense que notre visite à Madame de Mérilhac est toute faite ?

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (se relevant convulsivement)

Non pas ! j'ai des compliments à lui adresser. Allons, mes filles (Elle se coiffe ainsi que Thérèse.) nous avons dit que nous irions, nous irons, (à Paul) Vous n'avez pas besoin de vous déranger pour elle, Monsieur Paul. (Elle sort avec Valentine et Thérèse.)

Scène 3

PAUL [seul, regardant la porte du fond]

Tu peux bien compter que j'ai fait cela pour toi, Valentine.

Me rendre responsable des boutades de Madame de Mérilhac !...

Voyons ! il s'agit désormais de régler un peu ses affaires. Il est impossible qu'avec mes rentes... Mais pouvais-je soupçonner qu'une femme comme la comtesse !...

Allons, un peu de courage ! Puisque ce n'est pas ma faute, je peux bien exposer à ma mère... (Il réfléchit.) Oh ! je n'oserai jamais lui avouer en face, écrivons. (Il s'assoit pour écrire.)

Scène 4

AMÉDÉE (entrant avec hésitation)

Seul ?

PAUL (se retournant)

Amédée !

AMÉDÉE

Maison du bon Dieu, porte ouverte.

PAUL (regardant, à part)

Elles auront oublié de la fermer.

AMÉDÉE

Ma visite de noces est légèrement en retard ; mille compliments, d'ailleurs ; femme adorable, mère charmante, belle petite sœur en sucre, bonne affaire. Moi, voilà bien huit jours que je n'ai pas salué mes pénates, ma tante doit être furieuse ; j'ai passé la nuit, je meurs de faim.

PAUL

Tu vas manger, parbleu !

AMÉDÉE

Sans refus.

PAUL (tire une des sonnettes de la cheminée)

Ce cher Amédée ! toujours gai.

AMÉDÉE

Mais oui ; pourquoi pas ? Et toi ?

PAUL (re-sonne)

Moi aussi !

AMÉDÉE

Et le mariage ? est-ce aussi bon qu'on le prétend ?

PAUL

Délicieux.

(Il sonne plus fort.)

AMÉDÉE

Cette fois, on a entendu, ne t'inquiète pas, on va venir.

(Il s'assoit.) Ce doit être bien agréable, en effet, d'avoir une petite femme toujours là, auprès de soi, pour vous dorloter.

PAUL

Sans doute, (à la cantonade) Dominique !

AMÉDÉE

Un garçon, on a beau dire, n'est jamais aussi bien servi.

PAUL

Certainement. (à la cantonade) Joséphine !

AMÉDÉE

Du reste, tout le monde n'est pas comme toi ; au lieu d'une femme, tu en as deux.

PAUL (à la cantonade)

Victoire !

AMÉDÉE

C'est un double avantage, car une belle-mère doit avoir toutes sortes d'attentions.

PAUL

Mais... (appellant) Victoire !

AMÉDÉE

L'intérêt de sa famille, naturellement, lui fait soigner le bonheur de son gendre.

Scène 5

PAUL

Ah ! enfin ! où étiez-vous donc ?

AMÉDÉE (à part)

Eh ! elle est appétissante, cette esclave !

VICTOIRE

Monsieur, c'est que ces dames...

PAUL

Oui... Quand ces dames ne sont pas là, les domestiques ne se gênent guère ! Vous allez dire à la cuisine qu'on fasse à déjeuner pour Monsieur.

VICTOIRE (embarrassée)

C'est que...

PAUL

Eh bien, quoi ?

VICTOIRE

Entre les repas, Madame a expressément défendu...

PAUL

Quelle madame ?

VICTOIRE

Madame de Grémonville a expressément défendu qu'on fasse jamais...

PAUL

Eh bien, moi j'ordonne !...

AMÉDÉE (voulant s'en aller)

Non ! j'ai regret, vois-tu, j'aime mieux...

PAUL

Vous avez compris, n'est-ce pas ? allons ! vite !

VICTOIRE (s'en allant)

Bien, Monsieur, bien !

AMÉDÉE

Oh ! la moindre des choses ! Je ne suis pas difficile.

(à Paul)

Véritablement, mon bonhomme, je te cause un embarras.

VICTOIRE (revenant)

Monsieur... mais, pour le vin ?

Quoi, encore ?

VICTOIRE

C'est que Madame serre toujours la clef de la cave.

PAUL (exaspéré)

Ah ! qu'on prenne un serrurier... ou qu'on enfonce la porte !

VICTOIRE

Cependant... Madame... (coup de cloche d'antichambre)

Tenez ! c'est elle qui rentre. (Elle sort.)

AMÉDÉE

Dans ce cas, mon bon, je m'éclipse.

PAUL

Au contraire, je tiens à ce que tu restes. Parbleu ! ce serait trop fort si un vieil ami ne pouvait pas, chez moi...

VICTOIRE (rentrant)

Monsieur, Madame la comtesse de Mérilhac !

AMÉDÉE

Ma tante ! je me dérobe à son courroux... dans la salle à manger, (à Victoire) Vous me tiendrez compagnie, jeune fille ! (sur le seuil de la porte) Après vous, s'il vous plaît.

(Victoire passe la première, Amédée lui pince la taille.)

PAUL

Il faut se montrer, à la fin ! et il n'est pas dit que les femmes me gouverneront toujours !

Scène 6

PAUL (d'un air contraint)

Madame !

MME DE MÉRILHAC

Vous ne m'attendiez pas aujourd'hui, n'est-ce pas ?

J'avoue...

Etes-vous seul ?

PAUL

Ces dames, précisément, sont sorties pour aller vous voir (il pousse un siège devant elle), mais faites-moi l'honneur...

Mme DE MÉRILHAC (s'asseyant)

Merci ! (Silence ; elle le considère.) Vous m'avez battue, l'autre jour.

PAUL

Comment cela ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Mais oui ! c'est une histoire piquante, on s'en amuse. Moi qui ai une réputation d'habileté, je passe pour une dupe ; les petits journaux ont raconté votre demande de mariage d'une manière très drôle, sans omettre les initiales ; la chose a pris les proportions d'un événement, c'est pour le Pouvoir presque un échec, en tous cas un ridicule.

PAUL

Et votre vengeance est retombée sur moi.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Parfaitement !

PAUL

Pour quelle raison ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Je voulais marier Amédée à Valentine.

PAUL

Lui ? Amédée ? Avec ses opinions...

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

On change d'opinion tous les jours. Fausse honte, vous dis-je ; je suis sûre de ses sentiments, il a été peiné de votre mariage.

PAUL

Ah ! par exemple !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Je vous l'affirme ; il plaisait à la belle-mère, il regardait même Thérèse.

PAUL

Eh ! qu'il l'épouse ! elle est libre.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC (comme réfléchissant)

Thérèse ! tiens, voilà une idée (silence), malheureusement impraticable.

PAUL

Vous pensiez bien à Valentine.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Oh ! Valentine, c'est autre chose.

PAUL

Que voulez-vous dire ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC (haussant les épaules)

Vous le savez.

PAUL

Pas le moins du monde.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Valentine, votre femme, sera beaucoup plus riche que sa sœur.

PAUL

Comment cela ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Madame de Grémonville ne vous a rien dit ?

PAUL

Pas un mot.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

(réfléchissant et comme se parlant à elle-même)

C'est possible après tout, de peur des explications ; mais le père ayant dénaturé ses biens...

PAUL

Je marche absolument dans les ténèbres.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Monsieur de Grémonville a juré de laisser toute sa fortune à Valentine, au détriment de sa sœur.

PAUL

Monsieur de Grémonville ? mais il n'a pas sa tête ! c'est un impotent, un malade !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Un homme séparé de sa femme, rien de plus... oui... à l'amiable, par incompatibilité d'humeur.

PAUL

Je comprends cela.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC (baissant la voix avec malice)

Certains bruits ont couru... qu'il est inutile de vous dire puisque vous n'en avez pas eu connaissance.

PAUL

Ah ! ah ! la belle-mère...

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Qu'il vous suffise d'apprendre que Monsieur de Grémonville n'a jamais voulu voir Thérèse.

PAUL

Pourquoi ?

Mrae DE MÉRILHAC

De cette naissance date sa séparation, encore une fois !

PAUL (soupirant largement)

Oh ! oh !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC (souriant)

Tout s'efface, le temps met sur les choses une brume...

commode. On a dit à propos de cet événement « maladie » ; Madame de Grémonville, sans l'affirmer, a laissé murmurer tout bas « démence » ; c'est une fiction désormais inattaquable, et qui s'est durcie aux années jusqu'à la consistance d'un fait. (regardant Paul qui réfléchit) Eh bien, qu'avez-vous donc ?... une histoire des plus ordinaires, il n'y a pas le moindre drame à chercher là-dessous, je vous en préviens, et si cette révélation vous affecte, je regretterai vivement d'avoir été entraînée à vous la faire.

PAUL (revenant à lui)

Non, non, au contraire.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Vous comprenez maintenant combien la situation de Thérèse...

PAUL

Pauvre enfant !

MME DE MÉRILHAC

Oui, pauvre !

PAUL

Mais que faire ? il faudrait que Valentine renonçât...

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Prenez garde ! vous parlez contre vos intérêts.

PAUL

Il ne s'agit pas de mes intérêts, mais de justice ; elle finira peut-être par consentir.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

C'est une éventualité douteuse.

PAUL (réfléchissant)

En effet !... Mais Monsieur de Grémonville lui-même pourrait bien...

MME DE MÉRILHAC (à part)

Oh ! l'y voilà !

PAUL

Pourquoi pas ? j'irai le trouver, ce père invisible ; c'est bien le moins qu'il fasse connaissance avec son gendre ; je lui parlerai, Madame. Vraiment ?

PAUL

Mais oui ! je partirai dès ce soir pour Toulouse.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Réfléchissez bien ! on se repent quelquefois de ces mouvements de générosité.

PAUL

Eh ! quand j'ai épousé Valentine, je n'ai rien vu derrière sa dot que la couleur de ses yeux et la qualité de son âme.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Vous êtes simplement sublime, cher Monsieur.

PAUL

Je ne commets rien de sublime en me refusant à jouir de la fortune de ma belle-sœur, je voudrais même par là affaiblir un peu la peine que lui a causée mon mariage, et je déplore, croyez-le, celle qu'il a pu indirectement vous faire.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Ma peine, à moi, est oubliée... (appuyant) bien que j'en regrette les conséquences.

PAUL

N'en parlons plus !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Du reste, elles ne sont pas irréparables ; tous les jours des nominations se trouvent retardées, empêchées même, pour une raison ou pour une autre, puis elles ont lieu, plus tard.

Monsieur des Orbières me le disait encore ce matin : tout n'est pas perdu. (Elle lui tend la main pour partir.) Ainsi, à bientôt ! sans rancune ! Et puisque vous allez voir Monsieur de Grémonville, n'oubliez pas de lui représenter, pour mieux le fléchir, que c'est un parti fort avantageux. La position d'Amédée...

PAUL

Vous croyez donc absolument qu'il veut se marier ?
Je m'en charge.

PAUL

La conversion, quoi que vous dites, me semble...

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Bah ! dès que je le verrai...

PAUL (à la cantonade)

Amédée !

Scène 7

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Amédée !

AMÉDÉE (jetant son cigare)

Ma tante !

PAUL

Il se mourait de faim, je l'ai fait déjeuner.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Vous vous plaisez donc partout mieux que chez vous, mon pauvre neveu ! (le regardant) Ce teint, ces yeux rouges ! vous avez encore joué toute la nuit, je parierais.

AMÉDÉE

Il faut que jeunesse se passe, chère tante.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Au train dont vous allez, prenez garde, elle ne se passe pas, elle se précipite, (le considérant avec anxiété) Mais vous êtes malade, Amédée ! Dites-moi, ne souffrez-vous pas ? vous vieillirez tout à fait, et j'ai véritablement peur...

AMÉDÉE

Moi ? Je me porte comme un régiment de cuirassiers.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Voyez donc sa figure, monsieur Paul !

PAUL

Un peu fatiguée, sans doute...

Mme DE MÉRILHAC (à mi-voix, à Paul)

J'étais aveugle de vouloir le marier, il est trop tard !

PAUL

Trop tard ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Oh ! certainement.

AMÉDÉE (piqué)

Un point de gagné, au moins !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Comme vous le dites. Je vous conseillerai seulement de vous ménager un peu plus.

AMÉDÉE

Ah ça, vous me trouvez donc bien changé depuis quelques semaines ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Je n'ai pas dit cela pour vous affecter, mon ami, n'en parlons plus ; j'aurais été heureuse, j'en conviens, de voir autour de vous les soins d'une épouse, le dévouement d'une famille, mais de deux choses l'une : ou je m'abusais étrangement l'autre jour, ou bien...

AMÉDÉE

Ou bien quoi ?

MME DE MÉRILHAC

Vous êtes à cette période de l'existence qui ne connaît plus la lenteur des transitions.

AMÉDÉE

Mais ne dirait-on pas à vous entendre que je suis un véritable octogénaire... quarante-neuf ans !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Cinquante.

AMÉDÉE

Quarante-neuf, ma tante.

Mrae DE MÉRILHAC

Cinquante, mon neveu.

AMÉDÉE

Et quand même, on se sent bien, je suppose ! Six mois de gymnastique et d'hydrothérapie, un peu d'équitation, plus de sommeil, et je vous garantis, moi, Amédée Peyronneau, de cinquante ans, que je serais encore homme à épouser, haut la main, qui bon me semble.

PAUL (à part)

Il se noie !

MME DE MÉRILHAC

Pourvu que ce ne soit pas une fille de vingt ans, comme j'avais la sottise de vous le proposer.

AMÉDÉE

Pourquoi donc ? en connaissez-vous de plus jeunes, ma tante ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Vous n'avez pas la prétention, j'imagine, de descendre jusqu'à l'âge, par exemple, de Mademoiselle Thérèse de Grémonville ?

PAUL

Elle est pourtant fort bien.

AMÉDÉE

J'ai été accueilli par elle avec une sécheresse...

Mme DE MÉRILHAC (à Paul)

Et il prétend connaître les femmes !

AMÉDÉE

Hein ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Rien. Vous avez peut-être raison, après tout ; Thérèse ne sera pas gênée, vous n'êtes plus guère, pour elle, dans la catégorie des hommes possibles.

AMÉDÉE

J'ai dit sécheresse... pour froideur.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

C'est la même chose.

AMÉDÉE

Voulez-vous parier que si je me donnais la peine de lui faire la cour, sérieusement...

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

N'allez pas vous permettre une aussi sotte plaisanterie.

AMÉDÉE

Comment, plaisanterie ? j'ai bien le droit de me diriger tout seul, je suis d'un âge...

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Oh oui !

AMÉDÉE (exaspéré)

Mais vous feriez damner un saint, ma parole d'honneur !

Voilà bien les femmes ! pendant trente ans, vous me poussez vers la mairie, j'arrive au seuil et tout à coup vous m'arrêtez sans même savoir si je veux y entrer.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Il n'y a vraiment aucune raison à tirer de lui !

AMÉDÉE

Ce n'est pas répondre.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

M'en voulez-vous assez, monsieur mon neveu, pour me refuser l'honneur de votre compagnie jusque chez moi ?

AMÉDÉE

Je suis toujours à vos ordres, chère tante, mais c'est bien convenu, n'est-ce pas, j'entends me conduire absolument à ma guise.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC (à Paul)

Priez pour lui, monsieur Paul. Allons, beau Clitandre, être effervescent ! (bas, à Paul) Je le tiens !

PAUL (à part, les regardant s'éloigner)

On m'avait toujours assuré que le diable portait deux cornes et une queue !

Scène 8

PAUL

Victoire, ma petite malle et mon nécessaire de voyage !

VICTOIRE (du dehors)

Oui, Monsieur.

PAUL

Il y viendra, Amédée ; quelles lâchetés les femmes vous font commettre ! (s'asseyant) J'en ai appris de bonnes aujourd'hui, et maintenant que je connais à fond ma belle-mère, si elle bronche... gare la première mouche qui va piquer !

Ce voyage-là, c'est l'affaire d'une semaine... à peu près (calculant) oui, pas davantage. (Victoire entre, portant la malle et le nécessaire.)

PAUL

Ouvrez cela, Victoire, et voyez s'il ne manque rien.

VICTOIRE

Non, Monsieur... (elle ouvre) les deux limes, les ciseaux... (criant) Aïe !

PAUL (se retournant)

Qu'avez-vous ?

VICTOIRE (pressant son doigt sur ses lèvres)

Je me suis déchiré le doigt à une machine pointue !

PAUL

Est-ce que vous saignez ?

VICTOIRE

Un peu.

PAUL

(prenant les ciseaux et du taffetas dans le nécessaire)

Attendez ! avec un morceau de taffetas d'Angleterre...

VICTOIRE

(minaudant et tenant toujours son doigt sur ses lèvres)

Mais, Monsieur...

PAUL (lui tendant le morceau de taffetas)

Montrez-moi...

VICTOIRE (se détournant avec coquetterie)

Ça guérira tout seul.

PAUL (impatiente)

Donnez donc !

VICTOIRE (rapprochant sa main avec lenteur et timidité)

C'est que je n'osais pas, Monsieur !

PAUL (collant le taffetas sur la déchirure)

Voilà tout. (On sonne.)

VICTOIRE (s'échappant comme effrayée)

Ces dames !

PAUL

Eh bien, allez ouvrir, et prévenez François de ne pas dételer.

VICTOIRE

Oui, Monsieur. (Elle se dirige vers le fond.)

PAUL (la rappelant)

Ah ! vous n'avez pas besoin de dire que j'ai reçu la visite de cette dame.

VICTOIRE (mystérieusement)

Non, Monsieur.

PAUL (la regardant s'éloigner)

C'est qu'elle n'est pas mal, pour une servante ; j'avais une envie de la complimenter sur sa main.

Scène 9

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Ah ! une jolie journée ! c'est comme un fait exprès, une conjuration !
D'abord, chez Madame de Mérilhac, personne !
elle était sortie, ou bien elle se cachait, n'importe !... et l'huissier du ministre, car j'ai tenu à le voir, ce monsieur-là, s'est mis le dos contre les deux battants pour m'empêcher... et on ne sait pas ce qui s'y passait, chez votre ministre.

PAUL

Ce n'est pas le mien, malheureusement.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Ni le mien, je vous assure.

THÉRÈSE

Moi, d'abord, je n'ai jamais pu le sentir.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

La couturière, non plus, n'était pas chez elle, ni la veuve Lehérisse où j'allais pour prendre des renseignements, ni le vicaire que je voulais...
Au moins, quand on n'est pas chez soi, on devrait le dire ! (apercevant la malle et le nécessaire de voyage) Tiens ! pourquoi cela ?

PAUL

Je suis forcé d'entreprendre un voyage.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Vous ?

PAUL

Pour mes affaires.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Quelles affaires ?

PAUL

Vous comprenez bien, Madame, que cette place qui m'échappe et la nouvelle situation qui m'est faite exigent le plus tôt des mesures...

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Peut-on savoir au moins où vous allez ?

Assez loin.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

En Chine ?

PAUL

Cela se peut.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Voilà une plaisanterie d'un goût...

THÉRÈSE

Il faut convenir, Paul, que vous n'êtes guère poli.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Ainsi, vous refusez positivement de me dire...

PAUL

Eh bien, Madame, je vais dans le Midi.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Le Midi ? quelle idée ! pourquoi faire dans le Midi ? à Bordeaux ! sans doute, Marseille, Carpentras ?

PAUL

Mon Dieu, Madame, cette insistance...

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Là, calmez-vous ! gardez vos secrets ! je n'ai pas l'habitude de contrarier les gens. Amusez-vous ! voyagez ! continuez vos fredaines !

PAUL

Mes fredaines !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (éclatant d'indignation)

Croyez-vous que je n'aie pas vu ce qu'il y a dans la salle à manger ?
les restes d'un repas, Monsieur, d'une orgie !
jusqu'à trois carafons sur la table, avec deux tasses de café...
du café au milieu de la journée, je vous demande un peu !

THÉRÈSE

Et une odeur de pipe !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Vraiment, je ne me figurais pas que dans ma maison...

PAUL

Votre maison ? ah ! permettez.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Et comme pour me narguer... en dépit de mes ordres...

PAUL

Les miens diffèrent.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Moi qui ai commandé toute ma vie, je ne changerai pas mes habitudes, je vous en préviens.

PAUL

Et moi qui n'ai jamais eu cet avantage, je désire en prendre d'autres.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

C'est votre dernier mot, Monsieur ?

PAUL

Oui, Madame.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Mets ton manteau, Thérèse, nous ne coucherons pas une nuit de plus dans sa maison.

PAUL

C'est prendre bien vivement les choses.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Peut-être m'accordez-vous le droit de régler ma conduite personnelle comme bon me semble ?

PAUL

Je m'incline.

VALENTINE

Demain ! attends à demain ! où vas-tu aller ce soir ?

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

A Neuilly.

Permettez au moins...

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Merci de vos attentions... Adieu, ma fille, mes facultés baissent, je me fais vieille, tâche d'être plus heureuse que moi, mon enfant (plus bas) à moins que l'inutilité de tes complaisances ne te montre à quels abîmes peut nous entraîner notre faiblesse ! (Elle sort majestueusement avec Thérèse.)

Scène 10

VALENTINE

Mais elle ne reviendra pas !... Qu'as-tu fait ?

PAUL

Je te prie instamment de rester ici, Valentine.

VALENTINE (sanglotant)

Mon Dieu ! que je suis malheureuse !

PAUL

Auprès de moi, ma femme ? Quand nous sommes ensemble, ne sommes-nous pas tout un monde ? Tiens, je n'ai jamais respiré si librement. Par la plus déplorable des sottises, je n'avais fui la discipline maternelle que pour subir la domination d'une belle-mère ! A partir d'aujourd'hui, j'ai ma volonté, je suis un homme. Au revoir, Valentine, quelques jours seulement, aie confiance ! la démarche que je vais faire, tu me l'aurais conseillée toi-même, c'est un sentiment de justice et de délicatesse qui m'y pousse ; j'obtiendrai ma place, tu verras. Mais si Madame de Mérilhac nous oublie, si ma mère se confine dans la froideur qu'elle nous montre, ne trouverons-nous pas toujours mon brave parrain, cet excellent Monsieur Varin des Ilots, qui nous adore et dont nous sommes les héritiers probables ? Adieu encore, petite femme ! (Il l'embrasse.) Essayez-moi ces grands yeux-là, tout de suite.

Quand on s'aime comme nous, Valentine, c'est le bonheur suprême de se blottir tout seuls dans son nid. Adieu (lui envoyant de loin un baiser) Adieu ! (Il sort par le fond.)

ACTE III

(Salon chez Paul, un berceau à gauche)

Scène 1

PAUL (seul)

(Il berce avec un air d'ennui et de résignation, tout en chantonnant, puis il regarde la pendule.)

Trois heures ! et ma commission au Ministère ! Sans compter mon rendez-vous avec Amédée !... Ma femme a perdu la tête et cette maison est de plus en plus intolérable, (appelant) Victoire !

VICTOIRE

Monsieur ?

PAUL

Madame n'est pas rentrée, par hasard ?

VICTOIRE

Non, Monsieur.

PAUL (décontenancé)

C'est bien !

VICTOIRE (à part)

Voilà la troisième fois qu'il m'appelle. (Elle pousse plus loin les objets qui sont sur la cheminée ou l'étagère.)

PAUL

Que faites-vous donc ?

VICTOIRE

Une précaution ! c'est l'heure où Monsieur Amédée Peyronneau vient vous voir.

Eh bien, quel rapport ?

VICTOIRE (levant alternativement ses deux bras)

Il fait des mouvements comme ci, comme ça, de droite, de gauche.

PAUL

Ah ! oui, sa gymnastique ! (Il congédie Victoire d'un geste.)

Amédée se dispose à épouser Thérèse, parfait ! le ciel le protège, et qu'il soit plus heureux que moi !

Scène 2

PAUL

Qu'avez-vous donc, mon cher parrain ? votre figure... ce deuil...

LE GÉNÉRAL (la voix entrecoupée par les larmes)

Gertrude ! (étonnement de Paul) Oui ! défunte !

PAUL

Comment ? Ah ! je ne m'attendais pas...

LE GÉNÉRAL

Ni moi... et c'est une rude secousse, va ! (Il s'assoit et après un long silence.) Dimanche, mon Dieu, nous sommes rentrés ensemble, elle a mangé comme à son habitude ; seulement, au dessert, elle s'est mise à dire tout à coup :

« Tiens ! c'est drôle ! je ne me sens pas bien ! » et trois heures après, elle a passé, sans douleur, tranquillement, comme une sainte.

PAUL

Ah ! mon pauvre oncle, que je vous plains !

LE GÉNÉRAL

Depuis bientôt quarante ans... que nous étions ensemble !

Pense donc ! une fille si dévouée, si attentionnée, si propre !

elle me lisait mon journal tous les matins ; le soir, elle me donnait son bras si je voulais sortir ; la nuit, dès qu'elle m'entendait tousser...

PAUL

Ah ! c'est une perte, je comprends.

LE GÉNÉRAL

Quand il faisait beau, nous allions nous promener aux environs : elle s'asseyait sur l'herbe avec son panier et ses tapisseries, elle m'écoutait lui raconter des histoires... et comme elle aimait le jardinage, j'avais même le projet d'acheter quelque part, en Touraine... Ah ! je ne pourrai pas m'y accoutumer, je ne pourrai pas vivre seul ! (Il pleure.)

PAUL

Voyons ! mon oncle, du courage ! un vieux de la Bérésina, comme vous ! Est-ce qu'on n'est plus un homme, saperlotte !

LE GÉNÉRAL

Tu as raison, je suis bête ! il faut être plus raide sur la discipline. Parlons d'autres choses, de toi plutôt ; c'est même pour toi que j'étais venu. On m'a dit que Madame de Grémonville vous avait quittés ?

PAUL

Dieu merci, oui !

LE GÉNÉRAL

Pourquoi ?

PAUL

Parce que j'ai voulu voir son mari. J'ai donc été à Toulouse et j'ai trouvé un homme très convenable, très raisonnable, et qui n'est pas fou le moins du monde.

LE GÉNÉRAL

Tu m'étonnes ! Eh bien, alors ?...

PAUL

Seulement, il a eu avec sa femme des brouilles trop longues à vous expliquer ; mais ce que j'ai appris me donne le moyen de faire chanter la belle-mère, et d'être le maître chez moi.

LE GÉNÉRAL

Oh !... est-ce qu'il y aurait ?... après tout, ça ne me regarde pas, et tu es assez grand garçon pour te conduire ; mais j'ai un avertissement à te communiquer : on se plaint de toi ! et ne serait-ce que par égard pour Madame de Mérilhac et pour Monsieur des Orbières, qui ont été, dans cette affaire-là, charmants...

PAUL

Quelle est ma faute ?

LE GÉNÉRAL (avec solennité)

« Inspecteur du degré d'avancement des commandes faites aux artistes par la Direction des Beaux-Arts », le titre est long et la besogne, tu en conviendras, facile.

PAUL

Il n'y a rien à faire !

LE GÉNÉRAL

Raison de plus pour donner l'exemple ! et quand, une fois par semaine, tu te présenterais dans ton bureau...

PAUL

Eh ! c'est la faute de ma femme, elle m'empêche de sortir, il faut que je l'accompagne dans ses visites, elle me donne des courses... un tas de choses, est-ce que je sais, moi ?

LE GÉNÉRAL

Comment ! tu n'es pas heureux avec Valentine ?

PAUL

Elle a un cœur excellent, sans doute, mais...

LE GÉNÉRAL

Mais quoi ?

PAUL (après un long silence, éclatant)

Sa mère a déteint sur elle !

LE GÉNÉRAL

Cependant, puisque Madame de Grémonville n'est plus avec vous... N'importe ! elle lui écrit, et l'excite contre moi, j'en suis sûr. Je ne puis expliquer autrement ses exagérations de principes, qui sont devenues intolérables... Et puis, sa maternité, comme un vin nouveau trop fort pour sa cervelle, l'a complètement grisée ; et chaque jour, à propos de rien, elle récrimine, se fâche.

LE GÉNÉRAL

C'est que tu ne sais pas t'y prendre. Les femmes ? mais avec un peu d'adresse, on en fait ce qu'on veut, tout ce qu'on veut.

Scène 3

(Valentine entre avec un paquet d'une main, et de l'autre une boîte de bois blanc qu'elle dépose sur le pied du berceau.)

PAUL

J'ai un grand malheur à t'annoncer, ma chère amie, le général vient de perdre Mademoiselle Gertrude.

VALENTINE

Mon Dieu ! (embrassant tout à coup le général) Ah ! notre pauvre oncle !

LE GÉNÉRAL

Que vous êtes gentille, mon enfant ! (la repoussant doucement)
Assez ! assez ! je recommencerais à m'attendrir.

PAUL

Oui, laisse-le, mais puisque le cher parrain, maintenant, se trouve seul, tu devrais le prier de venir s'installer chez nous.

VALENTINE

Oui ! c'est une bonne idée ; faites cela.

LE GÉNÉRAL

Je vous dérangerai, mes enfants.

VALENTINE

Pas du tout ! pas du tout ! rien n'empêche...

LE GÉNÉRAL

Qu'est-ce que je viendrais faire ici ? Moi, une vieille ganache, me mettre en tiers au milieu de votre bonheur ?

VALENTINE

Vous le partagerez ! Vous aurez du monde à qui causer, quelqu'un, le soir, pour faire la partie de cartes ; et on vous aimera, on vous soignera. Oh ! je connais vos petites habitudes !... et comme c'est l'heure... attendez un peu. (Elle sort vivement.)

LE GÉNÉRAL

Que va-t-elle chercher ?

PAUL

Quelque chose pour vous, sans doute.

LE GÉNÉRAL

Tu as là un trésor, sais-tu bien ?

PAUL

Vous croyez ?

LE GÉNÉRAL

Mais oui.

PAUL

Oh ! il faut la voir, seule avec moi, à de certains moments.

VALENTINE

(rentrant avec Victoire qui porte un bol sur un plateau)

Le voilà ! prenez-le (figure étonnée du général) Votre bouillon !

LE GÉNÉRAL (prenant la tasse)

Ah ! ah ! véritablement, je suis touché... Eh bien, ma foi, puisque vous le voulez... (après avoir bu une gorgée, à Victoire) C'est vous qui le faites ?

VICTOIRE

Non, mon général, mais je sais en faire. (Il boit.)

Si c'est comme celui-là, vous êtes un cordon-bleu. (remettant la tasse sur le plateau) Merci, Mademoiselle. (pendant que Victoire s'éloigne)

Une jolie tournure, votre femme de chambre !... quelque chose de... fin ! et son consommé avait un bouquet !...

VALENTINE

Ici, vous en prendrez tous les jours de pareils... Chez vous, au moins, avez-vous tout ce qu'il vous faut ? et peut-on se permettre d'aller faire une revue ?

LE GÉNÉRAL

(sortant d'une rêverie qui vient de le prendre tout à coup)

Non, je n'ai besoin de rien, mais quand je considère votre intérieur, je pense que j'ai gâché mon existence, et je t'envie, mon garçon !...

Enfin, je ne suis plus jeune ! Soyons sage !...

Adieu, chère belle nièce, (bas à Paul) Tu es un sot, je te répète qu'elle est charmante ; embrasse-la. (haut) Au revoir, mes enfants ! Bonne santé !

Scène 4

PAUL

Maintenant que nous sommes seuls, Valentine, tu me permettras de te dire que c'est se moquer de moi. Ce matin, je t'ai attendue...

VALENTINE

Il faut bien que je sorte pour les affaires de la maison.

PAUL

Je perdrai ma place.

VALENTINE (gravement)

La place d'un père est près de son enfant, Paul.

PAUL

Pourrais-tu m'expliquer dans quel but on paye, ici, une nourrice ?

VALENTINE

Il faut bien qu'elle prenne un peu l'air, cette femme !

PAUL

Et moi, donc ?

VALENTINE

Tu te plains ?

PAUL

Nullement, mais je réclame pour ton bonhomme de mari ce que tu accordes de récréation à une berceuse.

VALENTINE

Ah ! Paul ! tu ne connais pas encore le cœur d'une mère !

PAUL

Valentine, cette phrase-là n'est pas de toi : elle est de ta mère.

VALENTINE

De toutes les mères, mon ami.

PAUL

Eh bien, elle n'est pas amusante.

VALENTINE

Tu deviens grossier, prends garde.

PAUL

Allons ! bon ! je suis grossier maintenant !... c'est que ta nourrice commence à m'agacer terriblement, elle ne remplit pas ses devoirs.

VALENTINE

La nourrice est une seconde mère.

PAUL

(en se tournant vivement, fait tomber la boîte déposée sur le berceau, et les joujoux qu'elle contenait se répandent par terre)

Qu'est-ce que tout cela ?

VALENTINE

Le ménage de ma fille !

Achève donc !

VALENTINE

De la faire manger tous les jours à notre table.

PAUL

Ah ! non, par exemple ! il suffit pour sa gloire qu'elle m'ait chassé de ton appartement, en s'établissant la nuit à ton chevet.

VALENTINE

Et moi, je considère comme un devoir de surveiller par moi-même la façon dont se nourrit cette bonne femme, si rien ne lui manque, si elle n'aurait pas quelque envie.

PAUL

Tout ce que tu voudras, je m'y oppose.

VALENTINE

Mais ce n'est pas elle qui mange, c'est votre fille ! N'admettriez-vous pas votre fille à votre table ?

PAUL

Pas encore ! et en voilà assez sur la nourrice, n'est-ce pas ?

VALENTINE

Non, Monsieur, car je tiens absolument à mon idée ; cela se fait bien chez Madame de Vorigny, et je ne veux pas passer dans le monde pour une moins bonne mère que Madame de Vorigny.

PAUL (riant)

Allons donc ! voilà le post-scriptum ! je savais bien qu'il y avait de la vanité là-dessous. Pour moi, je ne céderai pas à ces caprices, et quant à me priver du spectacle...

VALENTINE

Le plus doux spectacle pour un père...

PAUL (il remonte)

Je connais cela.

66

VALENTINE (le suivant)

Et vous osez me reprocher le peu que je donne à ma fille quand vous trouvez naturel de jeter l'argent à pleines mains dans des dissipations frivoles ?

PAUL

C'est à en devenir fou, ma parole d'honneur ! oh ! (Comme il se trouve près du berceau, il se remet à bercer l'enfant avec force.)

VALENTINE

Un moment ! un moment ! parce que vous êtes fatigué de votre fille, ce n'est pas une raison pour la jeter par terre, comme un chien ! cédez-moi la place, Monsieur !

PAUL (s'écartant)

En effet, c'est la vôtre.

VALENTINE

Oui, c'est la mienne ! je la revendique, je la garde, c'est là seulement que je me sens forte !

PAUL

Oh ! restez-y !

VALENTINE

Ah ! pauvre petite innocente ! il n'aurait pas seulement le cœur de te bercer.

PAUL (exaspéré)

Eh bien, oui ! j'en ai le cœur. (Il revient au berceau, s'assoit et berce en chantant.) Do do do.

VALENTINE

Mais vous allez réveiller l'enfant, Monsieur !

PAUL

C'est vrai, Madame, d'autant que j'ai pris l'air un peu haut.
Do do do, tra la la !

VALENTINE

Il se moque ! il se raille ! et je n'ai plus ma mère pour me défendre ! et je suis seule contre lui, maintenant !

PAUL (toujours berçant)

Do do do.

(Valentine est debout à gauche, au fond ; Paul, assis à droite, près du berceau.)

Scène 5

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

(à Thérèse, en lui montrant du regard les deux époux qui se tournent le dos)

On se boude ici.

THÉRÈSE (bas, à sa mère)

Monsieur Amédée n'y est pas !

Mrae DE GRÉMONVILLE (bas, à Thérèse)

Compte sur moi. (haut) Eh bien, ces chers enfants, ce bon petit ménage va toujours ?

VALENTINE (se jetant à son cou)

Oh ! maman.

PAUL (saluant)

Madame !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Pardonnez-moi d'être entrée comme cela, sans cérémonie.

PAUL

Comment donc, chère Madame, vous aviez bien le droit...

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Aucun droit, aucun motif même que l'intérêt que je vous porte, le désir de savoir... si vous n'êtes pas trop fatigué de votre voyage.

PAUL

Aucunement.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Et tout s'est passé... comme vous le souhaitiez ?

PAUL

On ne peut mieux, Madame, on ne peut mieux.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

J'en suis fort aise, Monsieur ! (allant au berceau) Et cette bichonnette ? que je baise un peu sa petite menotte ! (se penchant) Oh ! je ne veux pas la réveiller... Comme elle dort ! (se retournant) Mais vous avez donc perdu la langue, tous les deux ? (à Valentine) Qu'as-tu, toi ?

VALENTINE

Rien, maman.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Tu as pleuré.

VALENTINE

Je te jure !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Tu pleures encore.

VALENTINE (sanglotant)

Mais non ! mais non !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (avec douceur)

Si ce n'est pas une indiscretion de demander à Monsieur pour quelle cause ?

PAUL

Je ne sais pas, Madame.

VALENTINE (éclatant)

Ah ! vous ne savez pas ! il ne sait pas ! eh bien, c'est un père...

MME DE GRÉMONVILLE

Arrête-toi ! cela ne me regarde pas, ma fille.

VALENTINE

Un père...

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Eh bien ?

VALENTINE

Un père qui ne veut pas bercer son enfant.

PAUL

Comment ? je ne fais que ça !

VALENTINE (pleurant toujours)

Oui, mais d'une façon...

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Monsieur a sans doute des motifs, un système...

VALENTINE

Lui ?

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Les hommes se dirigent d'après des considérations supérieures... dont l'importance nous échappe. Oh ! l'expérience m'a instruite, et si j'ai un regret aujourd'hui, c'est d'avoir cru naïvement autrefois qu'il suffisait du cœur d'une mère pour assurer le bonheur de ses enfants... Ah ! voilà qu'on s'éveille ! (à Paul, avec humilité) Voulez-vous me permettre de bercer ma petite-fille, Monsieur ?

PAUL

Tant qu'il vous plaira, Madame.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (penchée sur le berceau)

Pauvre charmant petit ange, je ne te parlerais pas, va, si tu étais seulement un peu plus grande, de peur de t'inculquer, malgré moi, des idées fausses.

PAUL

Douce comme du miel... où tous les aiguillons sont restés !

Scène 6

VICTOIRE (annonçant)

Monsieur Amédée Peyronneau !

AMÉDÉE

(porte un bouquet de la main gauche, sur le bras un paletot, dans la main droite un haltère, et, le 'fêtant par terre, en entrant)

Ah ! ça commençait à me gêner, depuis le Bazar du Voyage que je porte ça ! (Il salue.) Madame, Mademoiselle ! (à part) C'est un ange ! (à Paul) Tu es joliment venu à ma leçon de gymnastique, toi ?

PAUL

Une occupation des plus graves...

AMÉDÉE

Tu t'y serais mis, rien qu'à me voir ! Sans me vanter, je ne suis pas mal du tout au trapèze ; ces exercices-là vous font des muscles ! (Il soulève une chaise à bras tendu.)

PAUL

Bravo !

AMÉDÉE

Pardon, Mesdames, je me suis oublié, l'habitude...

THÉRÈSE

Comment donc !

AMÉDÉE

C'est que j'ai un grand besoin de rattraper le temps perdu ; une leçon par jour, c'est peu, et je veux à la maison tenir mon système dans une activité incessante. J'avais des haltères du poids de cinquante livres, maintenant j'en porte de cent trente, témoin celui-là. (Il se baisse pour le soulever.)

PAUL

Assez, mon ami, ces dames sont convaincues.

THÉRÈSE

Vous appelez cela ?

AMÉDÉE

Des haltères, Mademoiselle ; ce sont des instruments qui servaient aux athlètes dans l'antiquité.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (à part)

Il est instruit !

AMÉDÉE

J'en lèverais quatre à la fois !

THÉRÈSE (,à part)

Je le trouve beau !

AMÉDÉE

Voilà mon caractère, Madame, quand une chose me plaît, je m'y livre corps et âme... (à Thérèse, amoureuxment)

Oui, corps et âme !

PAUL

Et cela te réussit, tu m'as l'air d'avoir maintenant une santé...

AMÉDÉE (avec joie)

N'est-ce pas ? aussi je me suis condamné à une hygiène impitoyable. J'aimais le sucre, plus de sucre ! j'adorais les légumes, les primeurs ; rien que des viandes rouges ! le vin... ne me déplaisait pas, je m'en gorge et je n'y mets jamais d'eau, c'est le régime. Quant au sommeil, six heures de lit, bonne mesure, et tous les matins, sur la nuque, un plein baquet qu'on a été remplir à la pompe !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (frissonnant)

Brrrr !

AMÉDÉE

Mes cheveux repoussent... il y a mieux : ils repoussent tout noirs, (à Paul, en penchant sa tête vers lui) Vois toi-même !

PAUL (riant)

C'est ma foi vrai !

AMÉDÉE

Le régime ! (à Mme de Grémonville) Et il ne m'empêche pas d'avoir des préoccupations... plus charmantes ; je me suis présenté tout à l'heure à votre hôtel, dans l'intention (Il prend son bouquet.) d'offrir à Mademoiselle ces modestes fleurs.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Monsieur Peyronneau ! Monsieur Peyronneau ! nous n'en sommes pas encore aux cadeaux ! Dans une honnête quantité de semaines, tout au plus ! Il faut bien que nous atteignions à la dignité de dix-huit ans.

AMÉDÉE

C'est bien long.

THÉRÈSE

En attendant, Monsieur, voulez-vous porter, en souvenir de moi, cette médaille ? (Elle tire de sa bourse une petite médaille avec un cordon noir.) J'ai toujours peur pour vous dans vos exercices violents, (à sa mère) Tu permets ? (Amédée recule.)

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Ma pauvre enfant, la plupart des hommes regardent comme une faiblesse de porter sur eux...

THÉRÈSE (à Amédée, le suppliant du regard)

Vraiment ?

AMÉDÉE (obéissant au regard de Thérèse)

Pas moi, Madame, voilà comme je la porterai, moi ! (Il saisit la médaille et la place sur son gilet, ostensiblement.)

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Par le temps qui court, c'est tout bonnement de l'héroïsme, Monsieur.

PAUL (à part)

Il va bien !

VALENTINE (à Amédée lui montrant le couvre-pied)

Vous qui avez tant de délicatesse dans le choix des choses, que pensez-vous de cela ?

AMÉDÉE

Ravissant !

VALENTINE (regardant Paul)

Ce n'est pas l'avis de tout le monde !

Est-ce possible ?

AMÉDÉE (à part)

Je lui en donnerai un tout pareil. (Tout à coup il se précipite vers Mme de Grémonville qui berce l'enfant.) Mais, Madame, vous allez vous fatiguer, permettez ! (Il s'assoit près d'elle.)

VALENTINE

Comment, Monsieur Peyronneau, vous consentiriez ?...

AMÉDÉE

Pourquoi pas ? (Il berce.)

PAUL

Tous les talents.

THÉRÈSE (effrayée de la manière violente dont il berce)

Prenez garde !

PAUL (avec gravité)

Il n'est pas maître de sa force !

THÉRÈSE (prenant en riant la place d'Amédée)

Un peu plus de modération !

AMÉDÉE (bas à l'oreille de Thérèse)

J'apprendrai.

PAUL (à part)

Peut-on ainsi se fourrer, la tête la première...

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Allons, mignonne, nous avons quelques courses à faire !

(montrant le berceau) C'est une grande privation pour toi qui aimes tant les enfants !

AMÉDÉE

Oh ! pas plus que moi.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Mais il faut que la vraie mère ait sa part. Adieu, Monsieur Peyronneau.

Adieu, Valentine.

AMÉDÉE (à Paul)

On a un peu réussi, j'espère ! et mon honorable tante qui doute encore ! Si elle me voyait, hein ?

VALENTINE

(amèrement, et de façon à n'être entendue que de Paul)

Ce gendre-là ne se séparera pas de sa belle-mère, lui !

PAUL

Grand bien lui fasse ! il m'en dira des nouvelles.

AMÉDÉE (offrant son bras à Mme de Grémonville)

Madame, permettez...

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Comment donc ! Au revoir, mes agneaux ! (bas, à Valentine)
De la fermeté toujours... souviens-toi !

Scène 7

PAUL

Valentine !

VALENTINE

Eh bien ?

PAUL

Il serait temps de se mettre à table si nous ne voulons pas manquer le spectacle.

VALENTINE

Je n'irai pas.

PAUL

Et pourquoi ?

VALENTINE (montrant le berceau)

Mais... l'enfant !

PAUL

Valentine, je te préviens que tu joues à la maman comme une pensionnaire et que tu réussis à faire, de ce qu'il y a de plus saint au monde, quelque chose de ridicule et de niais.

VALENTINE

C'est aimable.

PAUL

Laisse donc une bonne fois tes exagérations de commande, sois vraie un peu, sois bonne fille ! (lui montrant le billet de loge qu'il tire de son gilet) La pièce d'un ami, une première ! ça ne se refuse pas. (avec gaieté) Sais-tu comment tu te conduirais, si tu voulais être bien charmante ?

tu mettrais ton chapeau, tu te ferais toute gentille et, bras dessus bras dessous, comme deux amoureux en bonne fortune, dès que la fameuse nourrice sera rentrée, nous irions nous abattre avant le spectacle dans le premier restaurant venu.

VALENTINE (froidement)

Je n'irai pas.

PAUL

Alors, j'irai tout seul.

VALENTINE

Oh ! vous ne ferez pas cela !

PAUL

Mais parfaitement !

VALENTINE

Vous n'abandonnerez pas votre femme... auprès de votre fille en bas âge !

PAUL

Sans le moindre remords.

VALENTINE

Malheureuse mère !

PAUL (à part)

Est-ce que ma femme serait bête, par hasard ? (tirant sa montre)

L'heure marche, tu n'as que le temps de t'habiller, décide-toi !

VALENTINE

Je suis toute décidée, Monsieur. Puisque vous rougissez de voir en face de vous celle qui donne la vie et la santé à votre enfant, je dînerai avec elle, dans ma chambre.

PAUL

Et moi au cabaret, c'est plus simple !

VALENTINE (ouvrant la porte de gauche, à la cantonade)

Victoire, vous ferez servir chez moi deux couverts ; commencez par débarrasser ma chambre.

VICTOIRE (du dehors)

Oui, Madame.

Scène 8

PAUL

(Il se dirige vers le berceau, comme pour embrasser l'enfant.)

Ce n'est pas ta faute à toi, belle petite !

Scène 9

VALENTINE

(paraît à la porte de droite, au moment où Victoire ouvre la porte de gauche)

Ah ! Victoire, vous apporterez le berceau.

PAUL (à part)

C'est qu'elle l'oubliait complètement !

VALENTINE

Allons ! dépêchez-vous !

VICTOIRE (emportant le berceau)

Bien ! bien !

Scène 10

PAUL (seul)

Ah ! je pars, je m'habille, il faut ici un exemple ; ce serait à mourir d'ennui que cette vie-là ! Entêtement ou sottise, je veux savoir dès demain à quoi m'en tenir sur ma femme...

Voilà donc le charmant intérieur que j'avais rêvé !

(Au moment où il sort par un des côtés, Victoire entre par l'autre, tenant un châle sur son bras et à la main un chapeau avec une robe.)

Scène 11

VICTOIRE (seule)

Monsieur est parti ? Il a joliment bien fait ! Quel bon garçon ! On n'est pas grimacière comme cette femme-là !

VALENTINE (dans la coulisse)

Prenez le couvre-pied !

VICTOIRE (haut)

Voilà, Madame, je l'apporte ! (à elle-même) Mais je n'ai pas quatre bras ! un moment ! (Elle met sur sa tête le chapeau qu'elle tenait à la main.)

VALENTINE (dans la coulisse)

Apportez aussi le ménage !

VICTOIRE

On y va ! (Elle jette le châle sur ses épaules.)

VALENTINE

Plus vite donc !

VICTOIRE

J'arrive !

VALENTINE

Mon Dieu ! êtes-vous lente !

VICTOIRE

Là ! là !

Scène 12

(Victoire, Paul, chapeau sur la tête, gants. Quand il arrive, Victoire lui tourne le dos.)

PAUL (s'élançant vers Victoire)

Valentine ! habillée ? voilà qui est ravissant ! (l'embrassant par derrière) Dans mes bras ! je t'adore !

VICTOIRE (confuse)

Monsieur !

PAUL (stupéfait et reculant)

Victoire ! moi qui croyais que c'était ma femme !

VICTOIRE

Ne sachant qu'en faire, j'avais mis le chapeau... et votre baiser...

PAUL

Eh bien, il est à une bonne place, qu'il y reste !

VICTOIRE

Il le faut bien ! je ne peux pas le rendre à Monsieur !

PAUL

Pourquoi donc ?

VICTOIRE

Mais... Madame ?

PAUL

Elle n'a que ce qu'elle mérite ! c'est sa faute ! (à part) Et dire que je n'avais pas encore admiré cette tête-là ! Ce que c'est, pourtant, qu'un peu de toilette ! (Il veut la retenir.)

Laissez-moi !

PAUL (prenant sa main)

Quant à cette main mignonne, je l'ai déjà remarquée.

VICTOIRE (bas, souriant)

Je le sais.

PAUL

Qui vous l'a dit ?

VICTOIRE (montrant son doigt)

Ce petit-là !

PAUL (lui baisant la main)

Attendez ! Attendez ! je vais donner de quoi jaser à tous les autres !

VICTOIRE

Monsieur ! Monsieur ! est-ce possible ?

PAUL

Mais c'est très bien ! (Victoire veut retirer le châle et le chapeau.)

Restez donc ainsi ! Vous êtes charmante.

VICTOIRE (joignant ses mains)

Aurait-on deviné cela à voir Monsieur ?

PAUL (lui fermant la bouche avec sa main)

C'est que je vous trouve tout bonnement jolie à croquer, et si...

VALENTINE (dans la coulisse)

Mais venez donc, Victoire !

VICTOIRE

Je ramasse les joujoux ! (Elle se baisse pour les ramasser.

Au fond, apparaît la nourrice, en Cauchoise.)

PAUL (à part)

La nourrice ! l'éternelle nourrice !

Scène 13

PAUL (saluant profondément)

Donnez-vous la peine d'entrer... Madame aurait-elle, par hasard !
quelque velléité d'appétit ?

VICTOIRE (riant aux éclats)

Ho ! ho ! ho ! ho !

PAUL

Ouvrez les appartements, Victoire ! (Victoire va ouvrir la porte de droite, Paul tire de sa poche un mouchoir blanc, le met sur son bras comme une serviette, puis s'inclinant devant la nourrice.) Madame est servie !

VICTOIRE

Oh ! oh ! oh ! oh !

(La nourrice regarde Paul avec terreur et Victoire avec indignation, puis elle sort par la porte de droite. Paul, derrière son dos, fait un signe d'adieu à Victoire et disparaît par le fond.)

Scène 14

VICTOIRE (seule)

J'ai dans l'idée que je ne serai pas longtemps la servante de Monsieur !

ACTE IV

(Chez Mme de Saint-Laurent (Victoire) - Une salle à manger, table dressée dans le fond, porte au fond, à droite et à gauche, une console à droite, ameublement élégant)

Scène 1

UN DOMESTIQUE

(En livrée toute neuve, un écrin à la main.

Il traverse la scène de gauche à droite, en regardant ses beaux habits.)

Si Madame de Saint-Laurent n'est pas contente de ma tenue !

(Il frappe d'abord faiblement à la porte de droite, puis s'admirant encore et prenant une pose.) C'est un peu ça !

(Il frappe plus fort.) Est-elle morte ? (entrebâillant la porte)

Madame !... (Il la referme aussitôt.)

Scène 2

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

(en peignoir, elle entre en parlant à la cantonade)

Tenez votre fer bien chaud, Marie ! (au domestique)

Qu'avez-vous donc à me dire, pour me déranger de la sorte ?

(Elle regarde le domestique qui se pose, sans répondre, dans tous les avantages de son costume.)

LE DOMESTIQUE

On vient de l'apporter... je voulais faire voir à Madame...

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

Pas assez d'aiguillettes ! J'avais cependant recommandé...

Tournez-vous ! là... bien... Ce ne serait pas trop mal, avec un peu plus d'aiguillettes. (apercevant l'écrin) Cet écrin ?

LE DOMESTIQUE

De la part de Monsieur Gaston de Rumpigny.

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

(iouvre l'écrin et en tire un bracelet))

Ah ! ah ! très joli ! ravissant !... Et il n'a rien fait dire pour les courses ? vous ne savez pas qui a gagné ?

LE DOMESTIQUE

Non, Madame.

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

Bien ! posez-le ici, je vais le prendre. (Elle sort par la droite, tandis que le domestique met le bracelet sur la console.)

Scène 3

LE DOMESTIQUE

(seul ; il revient devant la glace et se mirant)

Eh bien, non ! je porte assez d'aiguilletes pour être tout à fait dans le bon genre ! C'est elle qui se trompe, c'est jeune, ça commence... D'où sort-elle ? fière avec le monde, peu de relations, et pas de piano... petite origine ! Et cependant un certain chic naturel, du cheveu, de l'œil... Oh ! elle a de l'œil ! il y a peut-être là-dessous un avenir, et si ça voulait m'écouter...

Scène 4

PAUL (avec stupéfaction, en regardant le domestique)
Comment ! un pareil costume !

LE DOMESTIQUE (« ouvrant les bras ») C'est Madame...

PAUL
Parbleu ! je le pense bien... Elle aura quelques personnes à souper, vous savez ?

LE DOMESTIQUE (montrant le fond) Tout est prêt.

PAUL
(En se dirigeant vers la porte de droite pour aller trouver M<sup>me</sup> de Saint-Laurent, aperçoit l'écrin au milieu de la console, bondit dessus et rappelle le domestique qui allait sortir à gauche.)
D'où vient ce bracelet ?

LE DOMESTIQUE (embarrassé)
Quel bracelet ?

PAUL
Celui-là que je tiens, et qui était sur la console.

LE DOMESTIQUE
C'est moi qui l'ai apporté, Monsieur.

PAUL (furieux)
Pas de mensonges ! Voyons !

LE DOMESTIQUE
C'est-à-dire que je l'ai apporté dans cette salle...

PAUL (vivement)

De la part de qui ?

LE DOMESTIQUE

Autant que je crois me rappeler...

PAUL

Dites le nom !

LE DOMESTIQUE (avec mystère)

Ça doit venir... de son professeur, Monsieur Népomucène Roch.

PAUL (exaspéré)

Impudent ! (Le domestique sort précipitamment.)

Scène 5

PAUL (seul)

J'ai des démangeaisons de remercier Monsieur Roch sur la joue de Monsieur de Rumpigny ! (Il rejette violemment le bracelet, puis montrant la porte de droite.) Moi, jaloux de cette créature-là ? Dieu m'en garde !... seulement je mériterais des oreilles d'âne, si je ne m'étais couvert de dettes depuis sept mois (Il tire des papiers de sa poche et les froisse convulsivement.) que pour servir de cible aux impertinences d'un sot ! (Il remet vivement ses paperasses dans sa poche en entendant ouvrir la porte de droite.)

Scène 6

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (en costume somptueux)

Vous m'attendiez, mon ami ?

PAUL

Voilà déjà deux fois que je viens ; dix femmes du monde s'habilleraient dans le temps que tu passes à mettre tes gants.

MME DE SAINT-LAURENT

Quoi ! je fais des frais pour vous plaire, et c'est tout ce que vous avez à me dire ?

PAUL

Ce n'est pas tout, (montrant la porte de gauche) Cette livrée !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (éludant la question)

Allez-vous aussi me reprocher ma robe neuve ?

PAUL

J'adore les choses simples...

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

Vous ne disiez pas cela, il y a sept mois ! rien ne coûtait trop cher, vous m'admiriez, en toilette... je portais ces choses-là comme une duchesse ! Oh ! je connais vos goûts, vous avez beau vous débattre, je ne vais pas me négliger comme Madame, pour qu'un de ces quatre matins vous me traitiez de la même façon.

PAUL (en colère)

Je t'ai déjà défendu de prononcer, ici, le nom de ma femme.

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

Quelle humeur !

PAUL

J'y tiens !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

A propos d'une malheureuse livrée...

PAUL

Laissons cela, je ne suis pas encore assez absurde pour te faire un crime de mes sottises ; si tu as des gens, une voiture, si, malgré le danger des rencontres, et au détriment de mes occupations, je t'accompagne à la promenade, au théâtre, partout où m'entraînent tes fantaisies, tu n'es pas coupable, c'est ma faute. Mais ce qu'en retour j'ai le droit d'exiger formellement, c'est que le nom de ma femme soit, ici, à couvert de toute insulte et le mien de tout ridicule.
(Il montre le bracelet qui est tombé sous la console.)

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

(suivant des yeux la direction de son doigt, à part)

Le bracelet !... je l'avais oublié ! (haut) Je ne vous comprends pas, mon ami.

PAUL

De qui, cela ?

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (avec innocence)

Mais... de vous... probablement ?...

PAUL (avec rage)

Ou de Monsieur Gaétan de Rumpigny !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (avec calme)

Ah ! vous croyez ?... c'est possible...

PAUL

Comment ? possible ?

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

D'ailleurs, on peut interroger le domestique.

PAUL

Je le renverrai, le domestique. La maison entière est d'accord pour me tromper !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (haussant les épaules)

Dans quel but ? tous les jours une femme reçoit des bracelets.

PAUL

Cela dépend !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

Mais quand il viendrait de la personne que vous dites, ce n'est pas une raison pour le mépriser. (Elle le ramasse.)

PAUL

Tu oserais...

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

(mettant le bracelet à son bras)

Je le dois dans l'intérêt de votre honneur, mon ami ! vous devenez vraiment d'une jalousie...

PAUL (se défendant)

Moi ?

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (avec sentiment)

Comme si je pouvais en aimer un autre, maintenant ! (à part, tandis qu'il se retourne au moment où elle veut l'embrasser) Ça le tient en haleine, cette peur-là !

PAUL (serrant les poings)

Une histoire qui aura une fin, je le jure !

MME DE SAINT-LAURENT

Vous voilà dans des dispositions charmantes pour le souper de garçon de ce pauvre Monsieur Amédée.

PAUL

Je voudrais qu'il fût au diable, son souper !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (joignant les mains)

Un intime, le seul de vos amis qui connaisse le secret de notre bonheur ! (Elle l'embrasse.)

PAUL (radouci)

Amène-t-il quelqu'un avec lui ?

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

Je l'ignore ; aussi, pour ne pas nous trouver tous les trois en tête à tête, j'ai invité mon professeur de déclamation.

PAUL

Riche idée !... un imbécile !...

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

Oh ! je sais bien que vous le détestez ; vous allez recommencer vos attaques contre mes idées de théâtre, n'est-ce pas ?

PAUL (impatiente)

Parbleu ! si j'avais voulu une actrice, je n'aurais pas choisi une femme de chambre.

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (piquée)

Les femmes de chambre de ma sorte sont du goût des personnes les plus distinguées ; je connais des gens qui vous valent, et qui auraient la délicatesse de ne pas me rappeler...

PAUL (l'interrompant)

Ces gens-là viennent-ils ce soir ?

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

Pourquoi pas ?

PAUL (prenant son chapeau)

Si la chose a lieu, je décampe.

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (lui barrant le chemin)

Vous ne ferez pas à votre ami Amédée un pareil affront, un tel jour...

PAUL (croisant ses bras)

Ainsi, tu as invité Monsieur de Rumpigny ?

MME DE SAINT-LAURENT

Amédée le connaît...

PAUL (même jeu)

Et je vais me voir condamné...

MME DE SAINT-LAURENT (l'interrompant)

Vous êtes bien injuste à son égard.

PAUL

C'est le moyen de ne pas être autre chose.

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

Ah ! mon Dieu ! (Elle feint de s'évanouir. On sonne.)

PAUL (embarrassé)

Allons pas de bêtises !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

Vous me tuerez !

PAUL

Remets-toi !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

Vous ne partirez pas ?

PAUL

Non, je reste ! j'aime autant rester après tout, et si ce faquin vient me braver impunément... (On sonne de nouveau.)

MME DE SAINT-LAURENT

(à Paul, d'une voix languissante)

Les domestiques sont peut-être sortis, mon ami ?

(Paul, après un instant d'hésitation, va ouvrir la porte.)

Scène 7

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

Ah ! cet excellent monsieur Roch ! Soyez le bienvenu, monsieur Roch.

M. ROCH

(s'incline académiquement devant Paul, puis s'avançant, à pas mesurés, vers Mme de Saint-Laurent)

Me permettez-vous une légère observation, Madame !

(geste de Mme de Saint-Laurent) Votre ah ! manque absolument de justesse. Votre ah ! peint l'étonnement, la surprise, comme si vous disiez, en ouvrant votre fenêtre :

« Ah ! il pleut ! » tandis que dans la circonstance présente, où j'ai l'honneur d'être attendu de vous, votre ah ! ne peut être qu'un ah ! de contentement, de joie même :

« Ah !... enfin !... cet excellent monsieur Roch ! » Bien, étalez

« excellent ». « Soyez le bienvenu, monsieur Roch. »

(se retournant vers Paul)

Pardon, mille fois, Monsieur, mais ce sont ces nuances-là qui font la perfection !...

(à Mme de Saint-Laurent, avec emphase)

Bienvenu, le bienvenu monsieur Roch !... tous mots de valeur...

PAUL (à part)

Quel idiot !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (subjugée)

Sans flatterie, Monsieur, espérez-vous tirer quelque chose de votre élève ?

M. ROCH

(appuyé sur la jambe gauche, avançant un peu la droite, avec des gestes du bras et des inflexions savantes)

J'en ai plus que l'espérance, Madame, j'en ai la certitude !

(avec un aimable sourire) ne possédez-vous pas déjà la meilleure garantie de réussite... (se penchant vers elle) la beauté ?

MME DE SAINT-LAURENT (flattée)

Ah !

M. ROCH (vivement)

Très bien, ce ah ! là, très bien ! (s'approchant d'elle) Avezvous observé, Madame, comme je me suis posé, en vous parlant d'une façon vraie et agréable tout à la fois ? Point d'appui, la jambe gauche ; la droite un peu avancée, attitude favorable à la liberté du bras, à la bonne assiette de l'abdomen, et qui laisse aux poumons un développement plus facile... car il faut bien se pénétrer de ce principe, que la voix est le son produit par l'air quand il est chassé des poumons.

PAUL (avec une admiration ironique)

Vous croyez ?

M. ROCH (se retournant vers Paul, avec énergie)

Pas autre chose, Monsieur, pas autre chose ! (revenant à Mme de Saint-Laurent) Et avez-vous noté, vers la fin, cette légère inclination de la partie supérieure de mon corps, comme pour vous faire toucher du doigt la délicatesse du compliment ?

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (avec admiration)

C'est vrai, tout cela !

M. ROCH (à Paul)

Avec la permission de Monsieur, Madame peut nous donner un petit échantillon...

PAUL (vivement)

Pas ce soir ! nous sommes en vacances, monsieur Roch ! vous voyez que je connais aussi les mots de valeur.

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

(bas à Paul, en lui faisant de gros yeux)

De grâce, soyez raisonnable, taisez-vous !

LE DOMESTIQUE

Monsieur le vicomte de Rumpigny. (Il sort.)

Scène 8

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (à part, avec rêverie)

Vicomte !

M. DE RUMPIGNY

(tenue complète de gandin ; il parle tout en marchant et en s'inclinant)

De deux longueurs ! j'avais parié pour Giselle, une affaire certaine, un coup d'or ! et figurez-vous, Madame, que nous avons perdu de deux longueurs, (bas) Ravissante ! (se tournant vers Paul, avec un léger salut) Monsieur, j'ai l'honneur d'être...

PAUL (assez sèchement)

Moi de même !

M. DE RUMPIGNY

(pirouettant sur ses talons et se trouvant nez à nez avec M. Roch)

Deux longueurs !

M. ROCH (gravement)

C'est énorme !

M. DE RUMPIGNY (piqué)

Plaît-il, Monsieur ?

M. ROCH (souriant avec supériorité)

Permettez ! moi, je ne juge des choses que d'après la façon dont elles sont dites, et (se tournant vers Mme de SaintLaurent) je suis bien aise de le faire remarquer à Madame, vos deux longueurs peuvent aller d'ici à la lune, (allongeant le mot en imitant M. de Rumpigny) Deux longueurs !

M. DE RUMPIGNY (indigné)

Mais Monsieur !...

M. ROCH (imperturbable)

Que si, légèrement, sans peser, vous eussiez dit : deux longueurs... (se retournant vers Mme de Saint-Laurent, avec une grande vitesse de prononciation) de deux longueurs, oh ! alors il n'y aurait pas une personne, ici présente, qui ne fût émue, qui ne fût saisie, si j'ose le dire, révoltée, en comparant cette grande trahison de la fortune avec l'exiguïté de la différence. (à demi-voix, à Mme de Saint-Laurent) Et toujours, pour point d'appui, le pied gauche.

M. DE RUMPIGNY (bas, à Mme de Saint-Laurent)

Quelle est cette brute ?

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (bas, d'un air suppliant)

Mon professeur de déclamation.

M. DE RUMPIGNY (souriant)

Ah ! très bien !

PAUL (à part, avec inquiétude)

Que peuvent-ils se dire ainsi tous les deux ?

Scène 9

AMÉDÉE

(du dehors, donnant de grands coups de pied dans la porte)

Ouvrez ! ouvrez !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (à Paul)

Monsieur Amédée.

M. ROCH

(Il se précipite avant Paul pour ouvrir la porte du fond, et se heurte avec le domestique qui vient de la porte de gauche )

Doucement donc ! (Le domestique ouvre la porte et sort.)

AMÉDÉE

(Il entre suivi de M. Casimir, il est chargé de deux énormes ananas.)

Je n'ai pas voulu taper trop ; avec ma force, j'aurais défoncé les deux battants !

M. CASIMIR (à part, boutonné jusqu'au cou)

Il y a eu du feu, ici, on étouffe.

AMÉDÉE

(à Mme de Saint-Laurent, en inclinant sa tête entre les deux ananas)

Salut, belle dame ! (bas) Tu n'as pas voulu, cruelle ! (haut, en se retournant) Monsieur de Rumpigny ! (Il salue.) Mon cher Paul, je ne tends pas la main, je n'ai que des branches !

(bas, à Mme de Saint-Laurent, en lui désignant M. Roch)

Peut-on compter sur cette redingote marron ?

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (bas, en riant)

Comme sur moi-même !

AMÉDÉE (haut, avec joie, en soulevant les deux ananas)

Very well !

MME DE SAINT-LAURENT (à Paul)

Sonnez le domestique, mon ami, Monsieur Peyronneau est plus chargé qu'une table de noce. (Paul appuie sur un timbre.)

AMÉDÉE (réclamant)

Moi ? vous plaisantez ! je les porte, à bras tendu, depuis la voiture (se tournant vers M. Casimir) n'est-ce pas, Casimir ? (le présentant à Mme de Saint-Laurent) Mon professeur de gymnastique, belle dame !
M. CASIMIR (saluant militairement)

Pour vous servir ! (à part) On étouffe !

PAUL (à part)

Quel monde ! quel monde ! c'est pour trouver cela que j'ai déserté ma maison !

(Le domestique a pris les deux ananas, et les place au bout de la table, qu'il tire au milieu de l'appartement.)

AMÉDÉE (regardant la pendule)

Tiens ! une pendule qui retarde sur mon estomac d'une bonne heure !
(regardant la table toute servie) Quand nous serons prêts...

MME DE SAINT-LAURENT

Nous le sommes.

AMÉDÉE (,prenant la main de Mme de Saint-Laurent)

A table ! vive la joie ! c'est ma dernière nuit, soyons fous !

(se retournant vers les convives) car vous saurez, Messieurs, que je me marie demain.

M. DE RUMPIGNY (tout en allant vers la table)

Pas possible !

AMÉDÉE (se redressant)

Pourquoi donc ?

PAUL (avec énergie)

Tu as bien raison, mon ami ! (Il lui serre la main.)

M. ROCH (se posant avec grâce)

Le mariage ! mais c'est la loi, c'est la base, c'est la sécurité (avec sentiment) le bonheur !

M. DE RUMPIGNY

(voyant que Mme de Saint-Laurent est furieuse)

A la condition cependant de savoir se créer (montrant Paul) comme Monsieur (montrant Mme de Saint-Laurent) une charmante compensation !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (à part)

Qu'il a de l'esprit ! (lui montrant un siège, avec un sourire gracieux)

Près de moi !

(M. de Rumpigny s'assoit à gauche de Mme de Saint-Laurent, Amédée à sa droite.)

PAUL

(à part, se plaçant en face d'eux, le dos tourné au public)

Si je les perds de vue un seul instant !

M. CASIMIR (à part, déboutonnant sa redingote)

Pouh ! on peut bien se mettre un peu à l'aise, pour officier...

AMÉDÉE

(au moment où M. Casimir prend place à la gauche de Paul)

Complet, l'omnibus ! Dinck ! (On sonne à la porte d'une façon formidable.)

Scène 10

(M. Varin des îlots s'avance, raide et sévère, au milieu de la stupéfaction générale. Amédée se retourne vivement du côté de la muraille, M. de Rumpigny se lève comme pour protéger Mme de Saint-Laurent, M. Roch et M. Casimir, toujours assis, écartent simultanément leurs chaises de la table ; Mme de Saint-Laurent reste comme pétrifiée à sa place.)

PAUL (reculant sur le devant de la scène)
Mon parrain !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

(iallant droit à lui, sans regarder personne)
Vous n'êtes pas facile à trouver, Monsieur !

PAUL (balbutiant)
Mais...

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

On vous a vu hier, au bois...

PAUL (se retournant vers Mme de Saint-Laurent)
J'en étais sûr !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Votre femme sait tout !

AMÉDÉE (prenant son chapeau)

Ma belle-sœur ! (Il se sauve derrière la porte et regarde dans la salle, en passant seulement la tête.)

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Et vos irrégularités sont devenues si scandaleuses, qu'aujourd'hui même vous avez perdu votre place.

PAUL (abasourdi)

Ma place ?

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

(se retourne et parcourt la salle du regard, Amédée disparaît définitivement)

Peut-on vous parler en particulier dans cette maison ?

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (bas à M. de Rumpigny)

Partez, je vous en supplie ! (M. de Rumpigny se dirige vers la porte en lui envoyant un baiser.)

M. ROCH (regardant M. Varin des Ilots, à part)

C'est peut-être un pick-pocket, un faux parrain, cela s'est vu. (Il se retire vers la porte, avec lenteur, déclamant à demi-voix ces deux vers :)

Replions-nous sans bruit, et que le ciel prospère
Ecarte de nos jours le poids de sa colère !

(Casimir a boutonné fièrement sa redingote jusque sous le menton, mis son chapeau sur sa tête et fait un pas vers M. Varin des Ilots, comme pour protester.)

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

(mettant aussi son chapeau, et marchant vers M. Casimir)

Auriez-vous quelque chose à me dire, Monsieur ?

PAUL (se précipitant vers lui)

Général !

(M. Casimir, au nom du général, et devant la fière attitude du vieillard, ôte involontairement son chapeau, et sort à reculons, sans mot dire.)

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

(se retournant vers Mme de Saint-Laurent)

Vous pouvez vous retirer, Victoire !

(Mme de Saint-Laurent, subjuguée, obéit à l'ordre, et sort lentement par la droite.)

LE DOMESTIQUE

(fait un grand geste d'étonnement dans le fond de la salle, à part)

Victoire ?

Scène 11

(M. Varin des Ilots prend majestueusement un fauteuil et s'y installe ; puis, d'un geste solennel, il indique un siège à Paul. A ce moment on entend un roulement léger, c'est la table poussée par le domestique ; le général se retourne vivement, aperçoit le domestique, et, d'un mouvement muet et impérieux, lui ordonne de sortir.)

Scène 12

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Savez-vous ce que je représente ici, Monsieur ?... la famille !

PAUL

Mon cher parrain, vous ne me tutoyez donc plus ?

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Pas encore !

PAUL

Si j'avais commis un crime...

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (l'interrompant)

Ç'en est un, une pareille conduite !

PAUL

Vous êtes bien dur !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

J'en ai le droit ! Vous cherchiez, sans doute, à faciliter vos désordres en me proposant chez vous un logement ? Tenir compagnie à Madame, pour favoriser les escapades de Monsieur, joli rôle !

PAUL (avec énergie)

Pouvez-vous croire !...

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Pourquoi pas ? un homme capable d'une telle faiblesse !...

(haussant les épaules) Je comprends une amourette, parbleu ! un caprice ; je ne suis pas une vierge, mais on devrait mourir de honte quand on se laisse subjugué par une donzelle, au point de lui sacrifier l'estime publique et les devoirs de sa position... Moi qui vous parle, Monsieur, durant ma longue carrière...

PAUL (l'interrompant)

Oh ! tous les blâmes possibles sont moins forts, pour me ramener chez moi, que mes propres dégoûts et la lassitude où je suis.

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Mais ces dégoûts, Monsieur, vous les promenez en carrosse.

PAUL (exaspéré)

Le carrosse ! c'est ce qui m'a perdu, le carrosse !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Que voulez-vous dire ?

PAUL

Que je quitterais cette femme dès ce soir, si je n'étais pas enchaîné ici par mes dettes... (montrant la porte de droite) et le remords secret de l'avoir poussée dans cette voie.

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Ah ! le remords secret ! vous êtes bon ! Un remords, ça se guérit ; malheureusement, les dettes, ça se paye... Combien dois-tu ?

PAUL (étonné d'abord, puis hésitant)

Beaucoup !... et je n'ai plus ma place, (avec rage) Comme si l'on montrait de pareilles sévérités pour les autres !... Mais Madame de Mérilhac s'est ligüée contre moi, avec ma bellemère, depuis qu'elle tripote le mariage de son neveu.

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (appuyant sur chaque mot)

Combien dois-tu ?

PAUL

(tirant de sa poche une liasse de notes et de protêts)

Tout est là.

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Donne !

PAUL (hésitant)

Si vous saviez !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

(tendant la main avec impatience)

Dépêche-toi !... (prenant les papiers et tâtant toutes ses poches) J'ai oublié ma loupe, je lirai tout cela à la maison, ça me regarde.

PAUL (se levant)

Comment ?

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (mettant tout dans sa poche)

Ça me regarde ! comprends-tu le français ?

PAUL (lui saisissant la main)

Cher parrain !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Si tu as l'audace de répliquer un mot... (lui faisant un geste terrible)
Sors d'ici ! Va-t'en te jeter au cou de ta femme.

PAUL

Ce soir ?

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Tout de suite !

PAUL

Oh ! demain, pas ce soir ! le temps seulement...

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

(roulant son fauteuil devant la porte de droite)

Halte-là !

PAUL (avec un grand geste de dénégation)

Je n'ai aucunement le dessein...

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (froidement)

Espérons-le !

PAUL

Quant à revoir ma femme, sans préparation, face à face...
après tout ce qui s'est passé aujourd'hui... c'est impossible !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (toujours en sentinelle)

Eh ! ça m'est bien égal !... va chez toi, va au diable ! mais va-t'en !

PAUL (timidement)

Vous restez ici ?

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Un peu !

PAUL

Vous allez tout rompre ?

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Je le suppose !

PAUL (revenant à lui)

Dites-moi au moins que vous m'avez pardonné !...

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (lui montrant la porte)

Qu'est-ce que ça te fait ? (Paul sort tout rêveur.)

Scène 13

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (seul)

A l'autre ! (Il se lève avec peine.) Je n'en peux plus (Il va à la porte de droite.) je n'en ai jamais tant brassé... depuis vingt ans ! (Il frappe à la porte.)

Scène 14

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

(à Mme de Saint-Laurent qui arrive dans un déshabillé des plus élégants)

Deux mots seulement à vous dire.

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (inquiète et très humble)

Si Monsieur le général veut bien me faire l'honneur de passer dans une pièce plus convenable...

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Nous sommes parfaitement ici.

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (s'inclinant)

A vos ordres !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

(s'installe dans un grand fauteuil et laisse Mme de Saint-Laurent s'asseoir sur une chaise, en face de lui)

J'ai soixante-cinq ans sur la tête, un âge qui n'attend guère, et où il faut mener les choses rondement.

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

(allant chercher deux coussinets et voulant les placer sous les bras de M. Varin des Ilots)

Le fauteuil est d'un dur ! Ces deux coussins...

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (froidement)

Inutile ! un peu d'attention, s'il vous plaît !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

(les plaçant malgré lui sur chaque bras du fauteuil)

Ah ! tout ce qu'il vous plaira !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (sévèrement)

Honorée de la confiance de Madame Duvernier, mêlée par vos fonctions au plus intéressant des ménages, vous avez compromis sciemment l'avenir d'un homme, et la sécurité d'une famille.

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (très humble et très interdite) Monsieur... mais... Monsieur (lui apportant un petit tabouret) seulement cela...

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (refusant du geste)
Vous détournez la question !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT
(se courbant et plaçant le tabouret à portée de ses pieds)
J'écoute ! c'est un honneur pour moi d'écouter...

M. VARIN DES ILOTS
Sans parler, ici, de vos dettes, ces promenades ensemble, ces rendez-vous au théâtre, ce mépris pour le monde, et cette impudeur dans le désordre...
(Il laisse tomber son mouchoir, elle se précipite pour le ramasser et le lui donner en saluant.) Bien obligé !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (avec humilité)
Mais ces mains-là sont faites pour vous servir (minaudant) comme autrefois.

M. VARIN DES ILOTS
(regardant la main de Victoire, et cherchant à ressaisir l'ordre de ses idées)
Ce désordre, dis-je, dans l'impudeur... et... le mépris du monde... ou plutôt... ce monde du mépris... dans le désordre de l'impudeur...

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (se levant)
Si Monsieur le général veut permettre... il me semble que c'est l'heure de son bouillon. (Elle va au fond, vers la table.)

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (étonné)

Vous croyez ?

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

(revenant avec un verre sur un plateau)

Oui ! et un verre de madère plutôt. (Il hésite.) Allons buvez !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (prenant le verre)

Merci !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

Me remercier ! quand c'est moi au contraire...

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (remettant le verre sur le plateau)

Bref, sans nous perdre encore dans des récriminations inutiles... et mettant de côté les épithètes dont je pourrais qualifier votre conduite...

MME DE SAINT-LAURENT

Monsieur le général est si bon.

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Non, je ne suis pas bon ! et je vous suppose assez d'intelligence pour comprendre qu'entre vous et Paul, tout est fini désormais. (Il se lève pour sortir.)

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (fondant en larmes)

Oui... oui... tout est fini, pour moi ! je comprends !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (se retourne et la regarde, à part)

Allons ! les pleurnicheries commencent ! (haut) Calmezvous !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (sanglotant)

Pardon ! j'avais tort... Vous ai-je manqué ?... Je serai calme.

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (à demi-voix, serrant les poings)

Si elle pouvait se mettre un peu en colère !... J'aurais moins de mal à m'en débarrasser.

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (qui a saisi la phrase, à part)

Ah ! non, par exemple ! (haut) Est-ce que je pleure encore trop haut, Monsieur ?

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (commençant à être ému)

Vous aimez donc bien mon filleul ?

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (vivement)

Moi ? (Elle éclate en sanglots.) Si j'avais su, si j'avais su !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Que voulez-vous dire ?

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (à part)

Il fléchit.

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (insistant avec bonté)

Parlez franchement.

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (d'un air désespéré)

A quoi bon ? il y a des hommes qui n'ont pas de cœur !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (vivement)

Est-ce que Paul ?

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

(l'interrompant, et la voix coupée de sanglots)

Ne craignez rien, Monsieur, je n'accuse personne, c'est l'usage !... On prend une pauvre fille à son travail, à sa joie, à son ignorance des choses... on est jeune, séduisant... on se met à ses pieds, on l'adore... la malheureuse succombe... tout va bien, la famille n'est pas encore en danger ; mais si, par un reste de pudeur, ou mieux, pour faire de la victime une esclave, on lui jette une robe sur les épaules, et l'abri d'un toit sur la tête... horreur et scandale ! tout est perdu, tout s'écroule... les mères se désolent, les vieillards se lèvent, comme des juges, et tandis qu'il y a, dans le monde, des cous qui ploient, sans crainte, sous la charge de leurs diamants, une perle à notre oreille fait pencher la société vers sa ruine ! (Elle sanglote, et, à part, en se détournant pour cacher sa douleur.) Monsieur Roch serait content de moi, cette fois !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (cherchant à l'apaiser)

Paix là ! paix là ! (à part) Où va-t-elle donc chercher ce qu'elle dit ?

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

(d'une voix creuse et frémissante)

Que la société se rassure ! (mettant la main sur sa poitrine) Je le sens ici... j'ai mon compte... je ne troublerai pas longtemps les familles !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Un peu de courage, allons !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (arrachant ses bracelets)

Ce bracelet vient de lui (le jetant à terre), le voilà ! je n'en veux plus !

Ah ! ses bagues, tenez ! le collier... voilà son peigne, oui, oui, tout !

(Elle a successivement tout retiré, arraché, et, se posant, échevelée, devant M. Varin des Ilots.)

Suis-je maintenant assez nue pour que la société dorme tranquille ?

(Elle est prise d'un spasme nerveux, chancelle tout à coup, et tombe, pâmée, sur la chaise, en face de M. Varin des Ilots.)

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

(très embarrassé et la soutenant)

Quelqu'un !... (cherchant partout des yeux) La sonnette ?...

(regardant Mme de Saint-Laurent) Elle se trouve mal !

(appelant) Au secours ! (cherchant encore du regard) Où diable a-t-on pendu cette sonnette ?... Si je pouvais la laisser seulement une seconde...

(Il la pose, avec mille précautions, sur une chaise, et court ouvrir la porte de droite.) Holà ! (d'une voix désespérée)

Personne ! (Il court à gauche, après s'être retourné vers Mme de Saint-Laurent.) A l'aide !... si tout le monde est parti, me voilà bien !

(revenant et cherchant à détacher sa ceinture) Elle étouffe... (ne pouvant y parvenir) Victoire ! (le fichu tombe) Elle a des épaules charmantes, cette fille-là !...

(lui frottant les tempes) Ma toute belle ! (Mme de SaintLaurent lui jette un regard languissant, devant lequel il demeure saisi.) Madame ! (à part) Quels yeux ! (la soulevant à moitié) Mettez-vous, au moins, dans le fauteuil, Madame !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (refusant d'une voix faible)
Quand vous êtes là ?

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

(la soutenant et la plaçant amoureusement dans le fauteuil, dont il arrange les coussins)

Je l'exige ! (Il lui met le tabouret sous les pieds.) De cette façon, vous serez mieux.

(apercevant au fond la table servie)

Attendez ! attendez ! (Il remplit un verre et remue le sucre avec une cuillère, puis revient.)

MME DE SAINT-LAURENT

Vous, Monsieur le général, me servir !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

(lui tendant le verre qu'elle finit par accepter)

Pourquoi pas ?

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (hésitant à boire)

Je serais trop confuse !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Allons ! buvez ! (Elle boit.) Servir la beauté, n'est-ce pas le rôle d'un soldat ? (Il reprend le verre, et va le poser sur la table.)

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

Vous vous moquez... c'est cruel !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (éclatant)

Je ne me moque pas, mille tonnerres ! et il faut que Paul soit un fier dindon, s'il n'a pu oublier devant de pareils charmes...

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (jouant la surprise)

Que dites-vous ?

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (embarrassé)

Je... moi ?... je ne dis rien... (courant vers la table) Encore un peu d'eau sucrée, peut-être ?

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (faisant signe que non)

Mille grâces !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

(s'asseyant sur une chaise en face d'elle)

Vous vous trouvez tout à fait bien maintenant ?

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

(cachant son visage dans ses deux mains)

Ah ! Monsieur le général, que je suis donc malheureuse de vous avoir vu !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (abasourdi)

Comment cela ?

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

Cette rupture... elle devait éclater... un de ces jours... fatalement... je la sentais venir aux dédains de Paul, à ses colères ; mais, alors, j'aurais quitté la vie sans un regret, avec tout mon désespoir... et toute ma haine... je ne me serais pas souvenue, au départ, qu'on trouve des cœurs d'hommes faits autrement que le sien !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Pauvre enfant !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

(jetant sur lui un regard d'admiration)

Que vous ne lui ressembliez guère ! vous avez pleuré votre bonne Gertrude, vous !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (très ému)

Je la pleure encore.

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

Ce n'était pas une servante, c'était une véritable amie... une compagne...

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

C'est vrai, c'est vrai.

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (avec émotion)

Ah ! si l'on recommençait son existence, s'il n'était pas si tard ! si je me sentais assez pure ! avec quelle joie et quelle affection de toutes les heures... j'aurais pu continuer près de vous, moi plus jeune, plus forte, et aussi dévouée...

peut-être... (changeant de ton) Mais il n'y faut pas songer, c'est un rêve ! le malheur a son châtiment, comme le crime, et quelle que soit la cause qui nous perd, le monde ne voit que notre flétrissure, lui !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (rêveur et frémissant)

Oh ! la jolie petite Gertrude !

Mrae DE SAINT-LAURENT (d'une voix brisée)

Au lieu de cette félicité... de cet honneur... je n'ai plus, devant moi, qu'une mort prochaine... ou qu'un avenir misérable !...

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Qui dit cela ?

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

(désignant les objets d'un bras découragé)

Il faudra vendre, à l'enchère, mes meubles, mes tapis, tous ces riens élégants dont j'ignorais jusqu'au nom, mais auxquels on finit par s'attacher... malgré soi...

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (l'interrompant)

Laissez donc !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (énergiquement)

A moins que je ne les abandonne avec mépris... (regardant à terre) comme ces bracelets d'or qui sont à terre !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

(les ramassant avec peine, ainsi que le peigne et le collier)

Vous les garderez, Madame !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (les repoussant de la main) Que je les garde ! pour qu'ils me rappellent encore qui me les a donnés !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Ils vous rappelleront celui qui les paie...

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

(feignant de ne pas comprendre)

Comment ?

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (les lui tendant toujours)

...et qui vous les offre...

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

Mais...

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

... à la condition de les rattacher, lui-même, à vos beaux bras ! (Il lui remet les bracelets, en embrassant les deux mains tour à tour.)

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (comme dans un songe)

Est-ce possible ?

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Voici le collier. (Il le lui passe au cou.) Voici le peigne !
(Il le lui met dans la main.)

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

Ah ! Monsieur ! Monsieur ! qu'ai-je besoin de tout cela ?
je ne suis pas assez grande dame pour qu'on m'enterre avec mes bijoux.

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (se récriant)

Vous enterrer !

Mrae DE SAINT-LAURENT

(ouvrant les bras, d'un air accablé)

Seule au monde !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (lui prenant la main)

Mais moi...

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

Maudite !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Que dites-vous ?

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

Méprisée !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Jamais ! pauvre innocente ! un piège tendu !... je comprends tout !

MME DE SAINT-LAURENT

Mais qui me défendra ? qui me défendra ?

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (avec force)

Je ne suis donc pas là, mille bombes !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT (avec un grand cri)

Vous !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS

Moi ! (bas) sans compter ma maison qui sera la tienne...

Il faut bien que je répare les torts de mon filleul !

Mme DE SAINT-LAURENT

(se précipitant à ses pieds, et posant sa tête échevelée sur les mains de M. Varin des Ilots)

Merci ! merci !

M. VARIN DES ILOTS (à part)

Oh ! la jolie petite Gertrude !

(La toile tombe.)

ACTE V

Scène 1

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Il n'est pas rentré ?

VALENTINE

Non, maman, je l'attends.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Et moi aussi ! (à part) Sans en compter un autre ! mais celui-là !
(comme pour dire : je m'en moque !)

MME DUVERNIER

Une bien triste fête, Mesdames.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Manquer au mariage de son ami intime et de sa belle-sœur !

Mme DUVERNIER

Et son pauvre parrain qu'on n'a pas revu !

MME DE GRÉMONVILLE

Jugez donc ! un coup de cette force à son âge ! lui qui aimait Paul comme son fils ! Il y a de quoi le tuer.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Surtout s'il n'a pas pu encore l'arracher aux séductions de cette...
misérable !

MME DE GRÉMONVILLE (à Mme Duvernier)

Un vieillard qui succombe, une femme délaissée, une orpheline, voilà l'œuvre de Monsieur Paul, Madame !

Mme DUVERNIER

J'en souffre plus que vous, moi, sa mère !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Je suis mère aussi, permettez !

Mme DUVERNIER

Sans doute ! et quand j'aurais des excuses à apporter...

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Lesquelles, s'il vous plaît ?

Mme DUVERNIER

Car enfin, vous l'avez abandonné un peu vite, comtesse ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Dites qu'il s'est abandonné lui-même ! Devant un scandale qui arrive à ces proportions...

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

C'est juste ! et peut-être Madame Duvernier comprend-elle maintenant où mène une éducation... trop... libérale.

Mme DUVERNIER

Parfaitement ! surtout quand elle vient se heurter à une cohabitation imprudente !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Oh ! il avait déjà ses petits projets.

MME DUVERNIER

Tout le monde ne peut avoir votre perspicacité, Madame !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Elle n'a pas suffi toutefois à défendre ma fille chérie !

Cette pauvre enfant, la première victime, qu'a-t-elle fait, je vous le demande ?

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Rien, à coup sûr ! et au lieu de vous accuser mutuellement d'un malheur dont vous êtes innocentes l'une et l'autre, mieux vaudrait nous unir pour en empêcher le retour.

Mme DUVERNIER

Volontiers.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Tout de suite.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Mais si nous consultions Monsieur des Orbières ? Il reviendra tout à l'heure. (à Mme de Grémonville) Son petit cadeau de nocces ! vous savez ? (Mme de Grémonville lui répond par un signe d'intelligence.)

Mrae DUVERNIER

N'importe ! nous pourrions, dès maintenant, commencer.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

(ià part, regardant la pendule, et agitée)

Un retard inexplicable... pas de lettres ! rien !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Je crois donc que la première chose à faire serait...

VALENTINE (en sursaut)

Lui !

Scène 2

PAUL (sur le seuil)

Tout le monde au mariage ! je m'en doutais ! Valentine !...

(Il fait un pas vers elle.)

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

(lui barrant le passage, sévèrement)

Vous vous trompez, Monsieur !

PAUL (interdit)

Vous, Madame !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC (s'approchant, dédaigneusement)

Vous vous trompez !

PAUL (éperdu)

Comtesse !

Mme DUVERNIER (s'avançant, d'un ton solennel)

Vous vous trompez !

PAUL (avec épouvante)

Ma mère ! (cherchant avec anxiété) Où est Amédée ? où est le général ? (à part, avec terreur) Pas un homme ! pas un pan d'habit où me raccrocher !... et toutes ces crinolines amoncelées autour de moi comme des vagues !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Vous auriez trouvé plus commode qu'elle fût abandonnée, n'est-ce pas ?

PAUL

J'avoue qu'une explication pareille, en public...

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Si ma présence vous gêne ?

Mme DUVERNIER

Restez, comtesse ! vous avez ici des droits, le fils a pu se jouer de vos bontés, la mère se fait un devoir de s'en souvenir.

PAUL (allant vers sa femme)

Valentine !

VALENTINE (détourne la tête en sanglotant)

Mon Dieu ! mon Dieu !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

(se précipite entre lui et Valentine, et croisant les bras)

Vous ne comprenez donc pas qu'elle sait tout ?

Scène 3

(La nourrice portant l'enfant et entrant par la gauche.)

PAUL (va pour embrasser sa fille)

Celle-là, au moins !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

[relève vivement le voile du maillot de manière à le couvrir tout entier)

C'est ma fille ! vos lèvres ne sont plus celles d'un père !

elle m'appartient plus qu'à vous, maintenant ! Peut-être sa petite âme comprend-elle déjà son malheur, et si sa faible bouche pouvait parler, elle vous jetterait votre condamnation à la face !

PAUL [saluant profondément le maillot)

Oui ! vous avez raison, c'est une femme aussi, je m'incline.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (à la nourrice)

Emportez l'enfant, nourrice ! (La nourrice sort par la gauche.)

PAUL

Je vous prie instamment de la suivre, Mesdames, j'ai à parler à ma femme.

Mrae DE GRÉMONVILLE

Bien, Monsieur ! nous allons réfléchir sur le parti qu'il faut prendre.

(Valentine fait un mouvement pour suivre les trois dames, Paul l'arrête par le bras.)

Scène 4

VALENTINE

Laissez-moi, Monsieur, laissez-moi !

PAUL

Seulement deux mots !

VALENTINE

Impossible ! on m'attend.

PAUL

Ecoute-moi !

VALENTINE

Après toutes les choses qui se sont passées !

PAUL

Continue ! je ne me défendrai pas ! tes torts, si tu en as eu, sont absorbés dans ma faute. Te rappelles-tu ce soir où tu refusas de m'accompagner au théâtre ? j'en ai honte : tout vient de là... Que veux-tu ? l'amour-propre blessé, un moment de dépit... j'étais fou !

VALENTINE

Cette femme ! cette femme !

PAUL

N'en sois pas jalouse, j'ai trouvé mon premier châtiment dans la vulgarité de son âme... et peut-être me fallait-il cette épreuve pour comprendre moi-même jusqu'à quel point je t'adore.

VALENTINE

Une épreuve terrible où l'on a brisé mon cœur sans retour.

PAUL

Ne dis jamais de ces mots-là, Valentine ! rien n'est brisé, rien n'est mort ! Me voilà sorti de ma folie comme d'un mauvais rêve, je me sens désormais assez de dévouement et de tendresse pour effacer dans ton âme jusqu'au souvenir de mon erreur.

VALENTINE (les yeux au ciel)

Comme s'il m'était possible de le croire, maintenant !

PAUL (avec désespoir)

Que faut-il faire ? est-ce un éclat que tu demandes ? une séparation ? un scandale ? ou supposes-tu que notre raccommodement sera mieux cimenté par les autres que par nous-mêmes ? Non, n'est-ce pas ?...

Détourne-toi ! réponds-moi !

nos mains pour s'étreindre n'ont pas besoin qu'on les pousse, et le pardon que j'attends de ma femme ne veut pas d'autre intermédiaire qu'un baiser.

VALENTINE (émue)

Mon Dieu !

PAUL (s'agenouillant)

Valentine ! aimes-tu mieux que je meure, Valentine ?

VALENTINE (le regardant)

Paul ! (Paul couvre sa main de baisers.)

Scène 5

THÉRÈSE

Malheureuse ! le regarder ! lui parler ! (se tournant avec un rire dépité) Et moi qui accourais ici pour la plaindre !

PAUL (dignement)

Ici, Madame ?

THÉRÈSE

Oh ! ne craignez rien, je me retire ; ouvrez la porte, Amédée !

VALENTINE

(court vers Thérèse, Amédée reste la main sur la porte)

Il voulait mourir, Thérèse !

THÉRÈSE (haussant les épaules et regardant Amédée)

Pauvre tête ! (à Valentine, bas) Mais tu ne comprends pas que c'est donner tort à ma mère et déshonorer tout ton sexe ?... Votre bras Amédée ! (à Valentine, haut) Tu devrais rougir, te dis-je ! tu es plus coupable que lui ! (à Paul) Adieu, Monsieur !

PAUL

Est-ce pour toujours, Thérèse ?

THÉRÈSE

Mais rester plus longtemps, il me semble, ce serait encourager votre conduite...

PAUL

Ah ! vous oubliez un peu le service que je vous ai rendu ?
Quel service ?

AMÉDÉE (s'avançant)

Oui, lequel ?

PAUL (après un long silence)

Il est considérable, je vous jure ; je dis bien considérable.
(voyant que Valentine va sortir) Valentine ! (à Thérèse, lui montrant la porte de droite par où vient de s'en aller Valentine) Ne sortez pas, Madame, on délibère ici contre moi, c'est votre place.

THÉRÈSE (s'arrêtant)

Ces dames, peut-être ? Allons voir ! (à part) Je ne suis pas fâchée de donner cet exemple à mon mari, (à Amédée)

A tout à l'heure, Amédée, je vous ménage une surprise... il y a là quelqu'un...

AMÉDÉE

Qui donc ?

THÉRÈSE

Vous verrez ! vous verrez !

Scène 6

AMÉDÉE

De qui veut-elle parler ?

PAUL

Je ne sais ! mais n'importe ! Ecoute-moi, je suis un misérable, un enfant ! Veux-tu que je te demande pardon à genoux, Amédée ?

AMÉDÉE

A moi ?

PAUL

Tu étais joyeux, tu étais libre ; à chacun de tes pas sur ta route on entendait sonner hardiment tes écus dans ta poche et tes fantaisies dans ta tête. Et moi, pour m'assurer une protection qui m'échappe, en vue d'un intérêt tout personnel, sais-tu ce que j'ai fait, Amédée ? je me suis embusqué sur ton chemin comme un traître, j'ai pris ta liberté dans une trappe, j'ai tendu un piège à loups sous ta joie.

AMÉDÉE

Un piège à loups !

PAUL

Ce complot d'où est résulté ton mariage...

AMÉDÉE

Il y avait... un complot ?

PAUL

Mais sans doute !

AMÉDÉE

Et tu en étais ?

PAUL (baissant la tête)

Oui !

AMÉDÉE

Ah ! ce cher Paul !... ma reconnaissance... (Il lui saute au cou.)

PAUL (s'en débarrassant)

C'est de la générosité, je te remercie.

AMÉDÉE

Pourquoi donc ?

PAUL

Après ce qui m'arrive ? quand tu as dans ma personne un échantillon des aménités qu'on te réserve ?

AMÉDÉE

Ah ! distinguons !

PAUL

Distinguons quoi ?

Ah ! tu m'entends, j'ai beau être ton ami, il y a véritablement des choses...

PAUL

Quelles choses ?

AMÉDÉE

Voyons, en bonne conscience, peux-tu espérer que je donne mon approbation à ta... comment dirais-je ? je ne veux pas être amer... à ta conduite ?

PAUL

Tu me fais de la morale, toi ! quand hier, cette nuit même...

AMÉDÉE (regardant autour de lui)

Chut ! on pourrait t'entendre ! j'étais encore garçon, cette nuit.

PAUL

Et ce matin ?

AMÉDÉE

Mon Dieu, oui ! je me sens métamorphosé, je l'avoue ; cet acte solennel, la cérémonie, nos serments, l'orgue... Mes yeux se sont ouverts, j'ai dépouillé le vieil homme... Certaines positions exigent de nous certaines idées ; ce qui ne semblait la veille qu'une plaisanterie, peut prendre le lendemain des proportions colossales, et sans vouloir me poser en Don Quichotte de la vertu, je trouve franchement qu'il y a des bornes.

PAUL (avec force)

Je crois bien ! (à Amédée) Est-ce que tu me salueras encore dans la rue, Amédée ?

AMÉDÉE

Es-tu bête ! certainement, mon vieux, ce n'est pas parce qu'un ami a eu le malheur de s'égarer... (lui serrant la main) certainement !

PAUL

Que tu es bon ! (à part, avec amertume) Lui aussi ! (apercevant les dames qui entrent) La cour !

Scène 7

(Paul, Amédée, Mme de Grémonville, Mme Duvernier, Mme de Mériilhac, Thérèse, Valentine. - Elles arrivent processionnellement, s'assoient en demi-cercle et après un long silence, Paul restant debout, seul, au milieu de la scène, et Amédée derrière le siège de sa femme.)

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (à Mme de Mériilhac)

Vous avez la parole, Madame.

MME DE MÉRILHAC

Madame Duvernier plutôt.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (à Mme Duvernier)

Madame !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (à Mme de Mériilhac)

Non, vous !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Non !

Mme DUVERNIER (à Mme de Grémonville)

Vous.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Soit ! (à Paul) Toute faute, Monsieur, doit être suivie d'une expiation, et malgré les objections que vous pourrez faire...

PAUL

Je n'en ferai aucune, Madame !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Après les événements déplorables que je ne veux pas rappeler...

AMÉDÉE (à part)

Très bien !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

...et avant que ma fille ne recommence d'enchaîner sa destinée à la vôtre, il faudrait nous prouver, c'est le moins> la sincérité de votre repentir par une conduite à la fois morale et régulière.

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Morale.

Mme DUVERNIER

Régulière.

AMÉDÉE (à part)

Il y a, vraiment, dans cette juridiction de la famille, quelque chose qui empoigne.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Nous vous exposerons d'abord le seul plan de vie qui puisse vous mener à l'accomplissement de nos vœux.

Mme DUVERNIER

C'est cela. Continuez.

MME DE GRÉMONVILLE

J'ignore vos dettes, mais vos ressources personnelles sont insuffisantes désormais à vous faire tenir dans le monde un rang convenable ; vos deux familles y pourvoiront, Monsieur. Non pas, veuillez le croire, par des prodigalités dangereuses, source de tentations nouvelles, mais en mêlant leur existence à la vôtre, et sous la protection de deux mères. Oh ! vous serez bien entouré, cette fois !

PAUL

Comment, entouré ?

Mme DUVERNIER

Sans doute ! dès demain, je m'établis chez vous (montrant Mme de Grémonville) avec Madame, car je ne laisserai pas souiller mon nom, le nom de votre père !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Je n'abandonnerai point à la mobilité de vos passions le bonheur de mon enfant, et l'avenir de ma petite-fille.

Mme DUVERNIER

Je n'en ai pas le droit.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Ce serait de ma part un crime !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC (aux dames)

Et moi, qui n'ai dans la famille qu'une autorité indirecte, je vous promets de veiller au dehors, et généralement, à toutes les phases de son existence.

THÉRÈSE

L'abondance de précautions ne peut nuire.

AMÉDÉE (avec un geste violent)

Bravo !

THÉRÈSE (se retournant)

Tenez-vous donc tranquille ! on dirait que j'ai épousé un saltimbanque !

AMÉDÉE

Un reste d'habitude, pardon, mon ange ! c'était pour montrer seulement que je me soumetts d'avance à toutes les volontés de ma belle petite femme.

PAUL (après avoir regardé Amédée, et baissant la tête)

Oh ! sexe faible !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Enfin, Monsieur, comme vous avez découragé par votre inexactitude (montrant Mme de Mérilhac) le plus bienveillant des patronages, et perdu sans retour un poste éminent, ce n'est plus dans ce genre d'occupations qu'il vous est permis de chercher une place ; mais comme, d'autre part, vous devez fuir l'oisiveté, cette mère de tous les vices... Voulez-vous prendre la parole, comtesse, puisqu'aussi bien c'est vous...

MME DE MÉRILHAC

Nous avons donc pensé à des fonctions... obligatoires, sérieuses ; et j'espère que l'on trouvera, pour vous, quelque emploi dans un bureau.

PAUL

Un bureau ? jamais de la vie !

Scène 8

M. DES ORBIÈRES (à Mme de Mérilhac)

Voici, chère Madame, ce que vous avez désiré. (Il lui tend une grande enveloppe ministérielle.)

Mme DE MÉRILHAC (à Amédée)

Cela vous regarde, mon ami. Lisez-le.

AMÉDÉE

Quel cachet ! (Il ouvre et parcourt des yeux.) « Inspecteur du degré d'avancement des commandes faites aux artistes par la Direction des Beaux-Arts : Monsieur Amédée Peyronneau »... Moi ? oui ! moi ! inspecteur !

PAUL (à M. des Orbières)

Comment ? après m'avoir destitué !

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Eh ! que voulez-vous, cher Monsieur ? Des convenances, un peu exagérées peut-être, mais impérieuses, l'opposition qui est toujours là, à nous guetter, et puis... un homme qui vit dans le désordre, après tout ! bref, il nous a fallu, bien malgré moi, vous retirer cette place.

PAUL (désignant Amédée)

Et pour la donner à...

M. DES ORBIÈRES

Du moment qu'elle était libre, mieux valait Monsieur Peyronneau, votre ami, que le premier venu, convenez-en.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

D'autant plus qu'il est aussi capable.

THÉRÈSE

Il a même la vocation !

AMÉDÉE (obéissant au geste de Thérèse)

Parbleu !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC (mielleusement)

Et cela ne sort pas de la famille !

M. DES ORBIÈRES

De cette façon, vous voyez, je satisfais tout à la fois aux exigences de l'amitié et... pardon du mot... à celles de la morale.

PAUL

La morale ? mais je l'ai servie ; le mariage de Thérèse ne se serait pas fait sans moi, et puisqu'on me force à parler de mon désintéressement, je m'exécute.

(à Mme de Grémonville)

Oh ! vous avez beau me regarder, Madame, je ne suis pas plus fou qu'un autre, et monsieur votre mari, si on l'interroge, donnera là-dessus des renseignements.

MME DE GRÉMONVILLE

Vous pouvez vous-même lui parler, le voilà !

Scène 9

M. DE GRÉMONVILLE

Je m'excuse auprès de mon nouveau gendre d'avoir manqué la cérémonie ; j'avais pris dans la gare un train pour un autre, et je me suis réveillé à Mont-de-Marsan. Alors, forcément, j'ai été obligé de repasser par Toulouse.

PAUL

Qu'ai-je fait, moi, Monsieur, en venant vous voir à Toulouse ?

M. DE GRÉMONVILLE

Une chose très bien.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Vous n'allez pas ennuyer la compagnie par des détails !

M. DE GRÉMONVILLE

Des détails ? non.

PAUL

Dites au moins...

M. DE GRÉMONVILLE

Monsieur Duvernier m'a engagé à une chose... une chose...

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Que vous auriez faite de vous-même, mon Dieu !

M. DE GRÉMONVILLE

Que j'allais faire, moi-même... oui.

PAUL

Et qui est... Voyons ! précisez !

M. DE GRÉMONVILLE

(obéissant toujours au regard de Mme de Grémonville)

Qui est très bien... très bien... et cela m'étonne !

PAUL

De moi ?

M. DE GRÉMONVILLE

Oui, car tout à l'heure je viens d'apprendre par ma femme vos coupables égarements.

PAUL (croisant les bras)

Vous la croyez ?

M. DE GRÉMONVILLE

Pourquoi pas ? et je vous blâme, je vous blâme, tout à fait !... On aurait dû me laisser à Toulouse plutôt que de me faire assister à de pareils... tableaux.

PAUL

Ah ! vous aussi ! tout le monde contre moi ! Eh bien, puisqu'on est à me marchander un pardon que j'implore et jusqu'à un amour qui m'appartient, je repousse net toutes les conditions qu'on m'impose. Assez de prières ! (à Mme de Mérilhac) Je ne descendrai pas pour vivre au modeste emploi que vos bontés me destinaient, Madame... (à M. des Orbières) Et j'espère pouvoir me passer de vous, Monsieur le Ministre !... Si deux maisons me sont fermées et la mienne devenue impossible, une autre va s'ouvrir : celle du général Varin des Ilots. Vous parliez de mes dettes ? rassurez-vous, il les paye.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Lui ?

Mme DUVERNIER

Comment ?

THÉRÈSE

Quel exemple !

Mme DE MÉRILHAC

Une aberration !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Un scandale !

PAUL (à Mme de Grémonville)

Il n'a pas d'autre héritier que moi, Madame, je suis désespéré de vous l'apprendre. C'est un esprit juste, un bon cœur, sachant distinguer une faiblesse d'une infamie, assez sûr de lui-même pour être indulgent aux autres, et dont la fortune, je regrette mille fois de vous le dire, échappe complètement à l'influence salutaire du sexe le plus aimable et le plus infaillible. (prenant son chapeau) J'ai bien l'honneur de vous saluer !

Scène 10

LE GÉNÉRAL

Tout est réparé ! j'ai tout réparé !

PAUL (se jetant à son cou)

Cher Parrain !

Mme DUVERNIER

Vous n'avez pas été indisposé ?

LE GÉNÉRAL

Pas le moins du monde !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Votre absence au mariage...

Toutes ces affaires...

Mme DUVERNIER

Je n'étais pas sans inquiétudes !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Effectivement, si on savait le général bien entouré d'une famille...

PAUL (à part)

Oh ! le serpent, qui veut l'attirer dans sa maison !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Tandis qu'une personne, seule, d'un certain âge... livrée exclusivement à des domestiques mâles... sans ces mille petits soins qu'on ne peut espérer que des femmes...

LE GÉNÉRAL

C'est incontestable ! incontestable !

PAUL (avec anxiété)

Que dit-il ?

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

D'autant plus que vous êtes accoutumé à ces douceurs-là, et que la perte irréparable de cette bonne Gertrude...

PAUL

Allons, Madame, vous exagérez singulièrement les choses ; on peut trouver ailleurs quelqu'un de dévoué.

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE

Allons donc !

LE GÉNÉRAL

J'en ai une autre !

Mme DUVERNIER

Une autre !

PAUL (à part)

Ah ! très fort, il a flairé le piège, je suis sauvé, [haut, avec feu] Et quand vous n'en auriez pas une autre, cher parrain, quand il serait impossible de rencontrer dans le monde connu une femme assez... phénoménale pour diriger convenablement votre maison, sachez que vous trouverez en moi non seulement un filleul, mais un fils. Jour et nuit, à toute heure, je serai fier de vous témoigner par mes soins l'éternelle reconnaissance que je vous dois.

LE GÉNÉRAL

Je te remercie.

PAUL

A compter d'aujourd'hui, plus d'obligations qui m'enchaînaient ! je vous suis de ce pas, je vous appartiens corps et âme !

LE GÉNÉRAL (étonné)

Que dis-tu ?

PAUL

J'habiterai chez vous, nous vivrons seuls, tous les deux !

LE GÉNÉRAL (stupéfait)

Tu rêves !

PAUL

Ah, sans doute ! vous ne savez pas, j'oubliais !... Malgré cette noble indulgence dont vous avez enveloppé toute ma folie, quand les autres ont pu connaître par votre exemple le chemin de la miséricorde et du pardon, ma femme me maudit, mes deux familles me repoussent ou du moins ne m'admettent qu'à des conditions trop basses pour qu'il me soit permis de les accepter. Vous voyez donc bien que je peux vous suivre.

LE GÉNÉRAL

Sacrebleu ! mon garçon, nous ne nous entendons pas du tout !...
Donne-moi un fauteuil. (Il s'assoit.) J'ai absolument tout réparé !
comprends-tu ?

PAUL

Eh bien ?

LE GÉNÉRAL

Mais, mille tonnerres ! tu ne peux pas demeurer chez moi !
fais ta paix !

PAUL (interdit)

Que je...

LE GÉNÉRAL (avec résolution)

C'est impossible ! j'en suis bien fâché... Fais ta paix !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (triomphante)

A la bonne heure ! voilà qui est parlé, général.

PAUL (désespéré)

Ainsi, vous me refusez votre porte ?

LE GÉNÉRAL (avec impatience)

Quand je te dis que j'ai trouvé une personne !

PAUL

Et... cette personne serait un obstacle ?

LE GÉNÉRAL (avec force)

Je t'en réponds !

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (se frottant les mains)

Parfait !

PAUL (abasourdi)

D'où vient cela ?

LE GÉNÉRAL

C'est Victoire !

TOUS

Ah !

(Thérèse jette un regard courroucé à Amédée, qui a joint à son cri un soubresaut gymnastique, et qui retombe aussitôt dans son immobilité.)

Mme DE GRÉMONVILLE (avec dégoût)

Cette fille ?

LE GÉNÉRAL

Cette pauvre fille, Madame, cette innocente... abusée...

PAUL (avec violence)

Comment ?

LE GÉNÉRAL (sévèrement)

Serais-tu assez hardi pour soutenir le contraire ? et t'imagines-tu qu'en soldant tes notes, j'aurai payé toute ta dette ?

PAUL

Quelle dette ?

LE GÉNÉRAL (croisant ses bras)

As-tu, toi, homme marié, les moyens de réparer le tort que tu lui as fait ?

PAUL (hors de lui)

Moi ?

LE GÉNÉRAL

Oui, toi, qui l'as arrachée à une existence honnête, et précipitée dans la honte, si l'on arrive à temps pour la sauver !

PAUL (avec un rire amer)

Il faut que votre religion ait été étrangement surprise par cette fille !

LE GÉNÉRAL (je levant tout à coup)

Plus de ces mots-là... je l'épouse !

TOUS (dans des attitudes accablées)

Ah !

AMÉDÉE (à part, regardant le général)

Encore un de pincé ! et la succession avec ! il était temps !

(très haut, et avec un geste extravagant) Ah !

THÉRÈSE (lui jetant un regard terrible)

Qu'est-ce qui vous prend donc ?

AMÉDÉE (avec un sourire)

Ma chérie ?

PAUL

(sortant tout à coup de son anéantissement et s'avançant le chapeau à la main vers Mme de Mérilhac)

Voulez-vous bien me dire où est ce bureau, Madame ?

Commemorative postcard of Flaubert's hometown

ABOARD THE CANOE

Flaubert published several travel books during his writing career, recounting his various journeys across the world. This extract concerns his adventures along the River Nile.

ABOARD THE CANGE

MAXIME DUCAMP passed part of the night in writing letters. Bouilhet slept on a black bear-skin. This morning I accompanied him to the railway station of Rouen. We embraced, both of us pale and agitated, and he finally left me. I turned on my heel and departed. Heaven be praised! that is over! There will be no more parting with any one. My heart s relieved of a heavy burden.

At Maxime's house there s great confusion. They are packing up his furniture. His friends are there to bid him farewell. Cormenin, sitting on a table, is bathed in tears!

Here I shall interpolate a few pages I wrote while on the Nile, aboard the "Cange." I had intended to write the whole account of my travels in this way, in paragraphs, or in the form of brief chapters, as I might find the time and opportunity. But I found that plan impossible, and I was obliged to give it up as soon as the Ramazan had passed, and we were able to go about freely once more. I entitled this record "The 'Cange.'"

I.

February 6, 1850.

Aboard the "Cange."

The date on which I began this record was, I believe, the twelfth of November, 1840. I was eighteen years old. I had recently returned from Corsica — my first experience of travel. I had lust finished a written description of my journeyings, and idly regarded, without really perceiving them, forty-five sheets of paper spread out upon my table that I did not know what to do with. According to my recollection, it was ordinary, ruled, blue-tinted letter-paper, which I had kept tied up η my travelling portfolio. I had bought it in Toulon on one of those fine mornings when my appetite for literature was so keen that I was ready to write without limit on any subject whatever. I cast a last glance upon the blotted sheets, then, pushing them away, I shoved back my chair and arose. I paced to and fro in my room, with my hands in my pockets, my feet in low slippers; with bent head and sadness in my heart.

My former mode of "life was now ended forever, I had left college. What should I do? I had many plans and projects, already a hundred hopes and a thousand tastes. I wished to learn Greek. I regretted the fact that I was not a Corsair. I was tempted to become a renegade, a muleteer, or a camelherd! I longed to get away from home, from myself. Oh! to go all over the world — to be carried no matter where, like the smoke from my chimney or the leaves of the acacia!

Finally, drawing a deep sigh, I sat down again at the table and sealed up the sheets of paper with a quadruple seal, writing on the outside: "Paper to be used in recording the events of my next journey," followed by a large interrogation-point. Then I put the packet in a drawer and turned the key.

Sleep in peace under thy coverlet, little white sheets, which should contain ebullitions of enthusiasm and the joyous outpourings of a free fancy! Thy format is too slight and thy colour is too soft. Perhaps some day, when I am older, I shall break thy crumbling seals. And what shall I inscribe upon thee then?

II.

Ten years have passed since that time. To-day I find myself on the Nile, and we have just passed Memphis.

We set out from Cairo with a strong north wind. Our two sails, crossing each other, swelled out in all their glory; the "Cange" leaned slightly to one side, her keel cutting through the water, which I could hear softly splashing. Our captain, Ibralm, was seated forward, cross-legged a la Turk, looking straight ahead and uttering from time to time, without turning his head, cries of command to the sailors. Sitting erect on the poop, which formed the roof of our quarters, was the mate, holding the tiller, while he smoked his chibouk of black wood. The sun was bright and the sky was of a deep blue. With our field-glasses we had been able to see, at long intervals along the banks, flocks of herons and storks.

The water of the Nile is yellow, as it contains a great deal of earth.

It moves languidly, as if wearied with the long journeys it has made through many lands; it murmurs incessantly in a mysterious, plaintive monotone. If the Niger and the Nile are really the same river, whence come these waves, and what have they seen? This stream, like the ocean, awakens the profoundest reflection. One thinks of the eternal reverie of Cleopatra, and remembers that the same golden sunlight fell upon the Pharaohs. At the close of day the sky became red on the right of the stream and pink on the left. The pyramids of Sakkara stood out in a grey silhouette against the crimson background of the horizon. A kind of incandescence spread over the sky, steeping it in a golden light. On the opposite side of the river the clouds were a pale rose-colour, deepening in tint towards the horizon. Presently the rosy glow faded a little; then it became yellow, changing to green. At last the green hue melted almost imperceptibly into white, which blended with the deep blue of the vault above our heads,

III.

Far away, on the banks of another river, quieter and less ancient, I own a white house, of which the shutters are closed, now that I am no longer there. The leafless poplars tremble in the cold mists, and the floating blocks of ice in the river grind against the frozen banks. The cows are in their stable, the fruit-trees are covered with straw, the smoke from the farm-house chimney floats slowly up towards the grey clouds.

I left the long, Louis XIV. terrace, bordered with lindens, where I used to walk in summer, clad only in a white dressing-gown. In six weeks the trees will bud again. Each branch will be tipped with little red buttons; then the primroses will bloom, — yellow, green, pink, and variegated — brightening the lawn in the courtyard. O my pretty little primroses! do not lose your seeds, because I wish to see you bloom again another spring!

I left the high wall, covered with a tapestry of roses, and the pavilion beside the water. A honeysuckle climbs upon the iron balcony. In the early hour before dawn, in July, while the moon is still shining, it is pleasant to stand there and watch the humming-birds darting in and out among the blossoms.

IV.

You know all that one feels at the moment of departure from a loved spot, and how the heart aches at the sundering of all the tender ties of place. My notes would be too long should I say more on this subject, so I will pass over all that I might have said.

* * *

Between us, in the coupe, sat a silent lady, about fifty years old. Her face was half smothered in veils, and she wore a long silk pelisse. A young lady and a gentleman had accompanied her to the station. After we had turned the corner of the Rue Saint- Honore, she began to weep, She traveled with us for several hours, weeping all the way. But I did not weep, — I, who was bound on a longer journey and who had probably left much more behind. Why was I indignant at her? Why did she make me pity her? Why did I have a desire to say something unkind to this good woman? Was it because we think our own joy the only legitimate joy, our own love the only true love, our own griefs the most poignant of all griefs?

On my right was a thin gentleman in a white hat; on my left were two diligence conductors who had slipped their blue blouses over their coats. One of these, slightly marked with smallpox and wearing a large black mazagran instead of a beard, was our own conductor. His companion, a fat rascal with a jolly face, came here some days before, to hand in his resignation, as he intended to take a pleasure trip to Lyons and to enjoy the excitement of the hunt. What a pleasing medley of ideas this conductor's personality afforded me! Do you not, like me, possess cherished memories of the time when you were seventeen and the rapturous joy of the holiday vacations and delightful wanderings? Do you not recall your reveries in the fresh air, with five horses galloping before you on a good road, the open country spreading to the horizon, the odour of new-mown hay in your nostrils, the breeze blowing in your face, the ready chat, the soaring dreams, the interminable pipes that were continually going out and having to be relighted, and that freedom which one permits himself in the fraternal ceremony of "having a little glass"; to say nothing of those mysterious and unexpected baskets of game that came to you in your warm dining-room on New Year's day, about ten o'clock in the morning, while you were at breakfast? Have you never overwhelmed With questions this patient man, who always listened to you as he drove along the road? In some corner of your memory is there not still a yearning recollection of some towering height that dominated all the landscape?

I remember a hill we climbed during our first night of travel. It was in the depths of a forest. The moon, shining through the trees here and there, lighted up the road. On our left was a deep valley. The lantern on the seat occupied by the postilion, threw its rays on the backs of the first pair of horses. My neighbour, who had fallen asleep with her mouth open, snored upon my shoulder. "No one spoke, and the coach rolled along.

At ten o'clock we stopped at Nangis-la-France for supper. The men smoked in the kitchen around the great fireplace. A few commercial travellers chatted among themselves. One of them pretended to recognise another, who denied any acquaintance. "Nevertheless," said the persistent one, "I remember seeing you at Goyer's, in Clermont, — , it must be at least eighteen years ago. I even recollect you made a great row because they gave you a bed that was too short. How angry you were! You made a tremendous fuss."

"It is possible, monsieur," was the reply, "but I have no recollection of it."

* * *

Among the passengers on the Saone boat we noticed with interest a young and graceful woman who wore a long green veil upon her bonnet of Italian straw.

* * *

As for myself, tormented by my bump of causality, I walked to and fro on the bridge of the vessel, trying to decide in what social category to place all these people; and from time to time, in order to aid my diagnoses, I threw a glance, as if I were a thief, at the addresses on the cases, trunks and boxes piled up pell-mell at the foot of the smoke-stack.

I have a mania for weaving romances about the persons I meet by chance. An unconquerable curiosity prompts me in spite of myself to mental queries as to the life of the stranger whom I have just encountered. I wish to know his business, whence he comes, his name, what he is doing, what are his regrets and his hopes, his forgotten amours, his present dreams, — everything about him, even to the kind of binding on his flannel undershirt! And if the stranger be a woman (especially if she is of middle age), my curiosity is even more ardent. How I should like to see her au naturel, yes, to the very heart! How I should like to know whence she comes, where she is going, why she is here and not elsewhere. As my eyes dwell upon her, I fancy her the heroine of all sorts of adventures. I credit her with possessing certain sentiments. I speculate upon the probable appearance of her bedchamber, and upon a thousand other things, — even imagining the half-worn slippers into which she thrusts her feet when she gets out of bed!

* * *

A passing diligence stops here by chance. We swallow a bad dinner, jump into the coach, and in fifteen minutes we are rolling along the road to Marseilles.

Already we feel that we have left the north. A soft blue haze lies on the mountains in the rays of the setting sun. The road stretches straight ahead between borders of olive-trees. The air seems more transparent, and is filled with a golden light.

* * *

VI.

The first time I visited Marseilles was on a morning in November. The sun shone upon the sea, which was as smooth as a mirror, blue and sparkling. We were at the summit of the hill on the coast of Aix that commands a view of the city. I had just awakened, and I got out of the coach to breathe a little fresh air and to stretch my limbs. I walked along the road, feeling such a sensation of virile well-being as I have never experienced since. How charmed I was with the Mediterranean, that ancient sea of which I had so often dreamed! I admired the tartanes, with their lateen sails, the immense trousers of the Greek sailors, and the stockings, of the colour of Spanish tobacco, worn by the women of the people. The warm air, circulating through the shadowy streets between the tall houses, overwhelmed my mind with soft oriental fancies, and the large paving-stones from Canabiere that heated the soles of my shoes, made me think of the glowing country where I longed to be.

One evening I was alone at the swimming-school at Lausac, on the shore of the bay of Oursins, where there were great nets for catching the tunny-fish that abound in those waters. I swam about in the blue waves; below me I could distinguish the pebbles at the bottom of the sea, all covered with weeds. With a sensation of placid joy, I extended my body in the caressing waters where perhaps the naiads glided. There were no waves: only a swelling, murmuring undulation that rocked me gently to and fro.

I returned to the hotel in a four-seated cabriolet, in company with the manager of the baths and a young blonde person whose damp hair was caught up loosely under her hat. She held upon her lap a little Havana pug dog which she had taken into the bath with her. The animal shivered, and she rubbed it with her hands to warm it. The driver of the coach wore a large grey felt hat, and sat between the shafts of the vehicle.

Ah, heaven! what a long time it is since that happy day!

CHAPTER I.

CHÂTEAU DE CHAMBORD.

We walked through the empty galleries and deserted rooms where spiders spin their cobwebs over the salamanders of Francis the First. One is overcome by a feeling of distress at the sight of this poverty which has no grandeur. It is not absolute ruin, with the luxury of blackened and mouldy débris, the delicate embroidery of flowers, and the drapery of waving vines undulating in the breeze, like pieces of damask. It is a conscious poverty, for it brushes its threadbare coat and endeavours to appear respectable. The floor has been repaired in one room, while in the next it has been allowed to rot. It shows the futile effort to preserve that which is dying and to bring back that which has fled. Strange to say, it is all very melancholy, but not at all imposing.

And then it seems as if everything had contributed to injure poor Chambord, designed by Le Primatice and chiselled and sculptured by Germain Pilon and Jean Cousin. Upreared by Francis the First, on his return from Spain, after the humiliating treaty of Madrid (1526), it is the monument of a pride that sought to dazzle itself in order to forget defeat. It first harbours Gaston d'Orléans, a crushed pretender, who is exiled within its walls; then it is Louis XIV, who, out of one floor, builds three, thus ruining the beautiful double staircase which extended without interruption from the top to the bottom. Then one day, on the second floor, facing the front, under the magnificent ceiling covered with salamanders and painted ornaments which are now crumbling away, Molière produced for the first time Le Bourgeois gentilhomme. Then it was given to the Maréchal de Saxe; then to the Polignacs, and finally to a plain soldier, Berthier. It was afterwards bought back by subscription and presented to the Duc de Bordeaux. It has been given to everybody, as if nobody cared to have it or desired to keep it. It looks as if it had hardly ever been used, and as if it had always been too spacious. It is like a deserted hostelry where transient guests have not left even their names on the walls.

When we walked through an outside gallery to the Orléans staircase, in order to examine the caryatids which are supposed to represent Francis the First, M. de Chateaubriand, and Madame d'Étampes, and turned around the celebrated lantern that terminates the big staircase, we stuck our heads several times through the railing to look down. In the courtyard was a little donkey nursing its mother, rubbing up against her, shaking its long ears and playfully jumping around. This is what we found in the court of honour of the Château de Chambord; these are its present hosts: a dog rolling in the grass, and a nursing, braying donkey frolicking on the threshold of kings!

CHÂTEAU D'AMBOISE.

The Château d'Amboise, which dominates the whole city that appears to be thrown at its feet like a mass of pebbles at the foot of a rock, looks like an imposing fortress, with its large towers pierced by long, narrow windows; its arched gallery that extends from the one to the other, and the brownish tint of its walls, darkened by the contrast of the flowers, which droop over them like a nodding plume on the bronzed forehead of an old soldier. We spent fully a quarter of an hour admiring the tower on the left; it is superb, imbrowned and yellowish in some places and coated with soot in others; it has charming charlocks hanging from its battlements, and is, in a word, one of those speaking monuments that seem to breathe and hold one spellbound and pensive under their gaze, like those paintings, the originals of which are unknown to us, but whom we love without knowing why.

The Château is reached by a slight incline which leads to a garden elevated like a terrace, from which the view extends on the whole surrounding country. It was of a delicate green; poplar trees lined the banks of the river; the meadows advanced to its edge, mingling their grey border with the bluish and vapourous horizon, vaguely enclosed by indistinct hills. The Loire flowed in the middle, bathing its islands, wetting the edge of the meadows, turning the wheels of the mills and letting the big boats glide peacefully, two by two, over its silvery surface, lulled to sleep by the creaking of the heavy rudders; and in the distance two big white sails gleamed in the sun.

Birds flew from the tops of the towers and the edge of the machicolations to some other spot, described circles in the air, chirped, and soon passed out of sight. About a hundred feet below us were the pointed roofs of the city, the empty courtyards of the old mansions, and the black holes of the smoky chimneys. Leaning in the niche of a battlement, we gazed and listened, and breathed it all in, enjoying the beautiful sunshine and balmy air impregnated with the pungent odour of the ruins. And there, without thinking of anything in particular, without even phrasing inwardly about something, I dreamed of coats of mail as pliable as gloves, of shields of buffalo hide soaked with sweat, of closed visors through which shot bloodthirsty glances, of wild and desperate night attacks with torches that set fire to the walls, and hatchets that mutilated the bodies; and of Louis XI, of the lover's war, of D'Aubigné and of the charlocks, the birds, the polished ivy, the denuded brambles, tasting in my pensive and idle occupation — what is greatest in men, their memory; — and what is most beautiful in nature, her ironical encroachments and eternal youth.

In the garden, among the lilac-bushes and the shrubs that droop over the alleys, rises the chapel, a work of the sixteenth century, chiselled at every angle, a perfect jewel, even more intricately decorated inside than out, cut out like the paper covering of a bonbonnière, and cunningly sculptured like the handle of a Chinese parasol. On the door is a bas-relief which is very amusing and ingenuous. It represents the meeting of Saint Hubert with the mystic stag, which bears a cross between its antlers. The saint is on his knees; above him hovers an angel who is about to place a crown on his cap; near them stands the saint's horse, watching the scene with a surprised expression; the dogs are barking and on the mountain, the sides and facets of which are cut to represent crystals, creeps the serpent. You can see its flat head advancing toward some leafless trees that look like cauliflowers. They are the sort of trees one comes upon in old Bibles, spare of foliage, thick and clumsy, bearing blossoms and fruit but no leaves; the symbolical, theological, and devout trees that are almost fantastical on account of their impossible ugliness. A little further, Saint Christopher is carrying Jesus on his shoulders; Saint Antony is in his cell, which is built on a rock; a pig is retiring into its hole and shows only its hind-quarters and its corkscrew tail, while a rabbit is sticking its head out of its house.

Of course, it is all a little clumsy and the moulding is not faultless. But there is so much life and movement about the figure and the animals, so much charm in the details, that one would give a great deal to be able to carry it away and take it home.

Inside of the Château, the insipid Empire style is reproduced in every apartment. Almost every room is adorned with busts of Louis-Philippe and Madame Adélaïde. The present reigning family has a craze for being portrayed on canvas. It is the bad taste of a parvenu, the mania of a grocer who has accumulated money and who enjoys seeing himself in red, white, and yellow, with his watch-charms dangling over his stomach, his bewhiskered chin and his children gathered around him.

On one of the towers, and in spite of the most ordinary common sense, they have built a glass rotunda which is used for a dining-room. True, the view from it is magnificent. But the building presents so shocking an appearance from the outside, that one would, I should think, prefer to see nothing of the environs, or else to eat in the kitchen.

In order to go back to the city, we came down by a tower that was used by carriages to approach the Château. The sloping gravelled walk turns around a stone axle like the steps of a staircase. The arch is dark and lighted only by the rays that creep through the loop-holes. The columns on which the interior end of the vault rests, are decorated with grotesque or vulgar subjects. A dogmatic intention seems to have presided over their composition. It would be well for travellers to begin the inspection at the bottom, with the Aristoteles equitatus (a subject which has already been treated on one of the choir statues in the Cathedral of Rouen) and reach by degrees a pair embracing in the manner which both Lucretius and l'Amour Conjugal have recommended. The greater part of the intermediary subjects have been removed, to the despair of seekers of comical things, like ourselves; they have been removed in cold blood, with deliberate intent, for the sake of decency, and because, as one of the servants of his Majesty informed us convincingly, "a great many were improper for the lady visitors to see."

CHÂTEAU DE CHENONCEAUX.

A something of infinite suavity and aristocratic serenity pervades the Château de Chenonceaux. It is situated outside of the village, which keeps at a respectful distance. It can be seen through a large avenue of trees, and is enclosed by woods and an extensive park with beautiful lawns. Built on the water, it proudly uprears its turrets and its square chimneys. The Cher flows below, and murmurs at the foot of its arches, the pointed corners of which form eddies in the tide. It is all very peaceful and charming, graceful yet robust. Its calm is not wearying and its melancholy has no tinge of bitterness.

One enters through the end of a long, arched hallway, which used to be a fencing-room. It is decorated with some armours, which, in spite of the obvious necessity of their presence, do not shock one's taste or appear out of place. The whole scheme of interior decoration is tastefully carried out; the furniture and hangings of the period have been preserved and cared for intelligently. The great, venerable mantel-pieces of the sixteenth century do not shelter the hideous and economical German stoves, which might easily be hidden in some of them.

In the kitchen, situated in a wing of the castle, which we visited later, a maid was peeling vegetables and a scullion was washing dishes, while the cook was standing in front of the stove, superintending a reasonable number of shining saucepans. It was all very delightful, and bespoke the idle and intelligent home life of a gentleman. I like the owners of Chenonceaux.

In fact, have you not often seen charming old paintings that make you gaze at them indefinitely, because they portray the period in which their owners lived, the ballets in which the farthingales of all those beautiful pink ladies whirled around, and the sword-thrusts which those noblemen gave each other with their rapiers? Here are some temptations of history. One would like to know whether those people loved as we do, and what difference existed between their passions and our own. One would like them to open their lips and tell their history, tell us everything they used to do, no matter how futile, and what their cares and pleasures used to be. It is an irritating and seductive curiosity, a dreamy desire for knowledge, such as one feels regarding the past life of a mistress.... But they are deaf to the questions our eyes put to them, they remain dumb and motionless in their wooden frames, and we pass on. The moths attack their canvases, but the latter are revarnished; and the pictures will smile on when we are buried and forgotten. And others will come and gaze upon them, till the day they crumble to dust; then people will dream in the same old way before our own likenesses, and ask themselves what used to happen in our day, and whether life was not more alluring then.

I should not have spoken again of those handsome dames, if the large, full-length portrait of Madame Deshoulières, in an elaborate white dêshabille, (it was really a fine picture, and, like the much decried and seldom read efforts of the poetess, better at the second look than at the first), had not reminded me, by the expression of the mouth, which is large, full, and sensual, of the peculiar coarseness of Madame de Staël's portrait by Gérard. When I saw it two years ago, at Coppet, in bright sunshine, I could not help being impressed by those red, vinous lips and the wide, aspiring nostrils. George Sand's face offers a similar peculiarity. In all those women who were half masculine, spirituality revealed itself only in the eyes. All the rest remained material.

In point of amusing incidents, there is still at Chenonceaux, in Diane de Poitiers's room, the wide canopy bedstead of the royal favourite, done in white and red. If it belonged to me, it would be very hard for me not to use it once in a while. To sleep in the bed of Diane de Poitiers, even though it be empty, is worth as much as sleeping in that of many more palpable realities. Moreover, has it not been said that all the pleasure in these things was only imagination? Then, can you conceive of the peculiar and historical voluptuousness, for one who possesses some imagination, to lay his head on the pillow that belonged to the mistress of Francis the First, and to stretch his limbs on her mattress? (Oh! how willingly I would give all the women in the world for the mummy of Cleopatra!) But I would not dare to touch, for fear of breaking them, the porcelains belonging to Catherine de Médicis, in the dining-room, nor place my foot in the stirrup of Francis the First, for fear it might remain there, nor put my lips to the mouth-piece of the huge trumpet in the fencing-room, for fear of rupturing my lungs.

CHAPTER II.

CHÂTEAU DE CLISSON.

On a hill at the foot of which two rivers mingle their waters, in a fresh landscape, brightened by the light colours of the inclined roofs, that are grouped like many sketches of Hubert, near a waterfall that turns the wheel of a mill hidden among the leaves, the Château de Clisson raises its battered roof above the tree-tops. Everything around it is calm and peaceful. The little dwellings seem to smile as if they had been built under softer skies; the waters sing their song, and patches of moss cover a stream over which hang graceful clusters of foliage. The horizon extends on one side into a tapering perspective of meadows, while on the other it rises abruptly and is enclosed by a wooded valley, the trees of which crowd together and form a green ocean.

After one crosses the bridge and arrives at the steep path which leads to the Château, one sees, standing upreared and bold on the moat on which it is built, a formidable wall, crowned with battered machicolations and bedecked with trees and ivy, the luxuriant growth of which covers the grey stones and sways in the wind, like an immense green veil which the recumbent giant moves dreamily across his shoulders. The grass is tall and dark, the plants are strong and hardy; the trunks of the ivy are twisted, knotted, and rough, and lift up the walls as with levers or hold them in the network of their branches. In one spot, a tree has grown through the wall horizontally, and, suspended in the air, has let its branches radiate around it. The moats, the steep slope of which is broken by the earth which has detached itself from the embankments and the stones which have fallen from the battlements, have a wide, deep curve, like hatred and pride; and the portal, with its strong, slightly arched ogive, and its two bays that raise the drawbridge, looks like a great helmet with holes in its visor.

When one enters, he is surprised and astonished at the wonderful mixture of ruins and trees, the ruins accentuating the freshness of the trees, while the latter in turn, render more poignant the melancholy of the ruins. Here, indeed, is the beautiful, eternal, and brilliant laughter of nature over the skeleton of things; here is the insolence of her wealth and the deep grace of her encroachments, and the melodious invasions of her silence. A grave and pensive enthusiasm fills one's soul; one feels that the sap flows in the trees and that the grass grows with the same strength and the same rhythm, as the stones crumble and the walls cave in. A sublime art, in the supreme accord of secondary discordances, has contrasted the unruly ivy with the sinuous sweep of the ruins, the brambles with the heaps of crumbling stones, the clearness of the atmosphere with the strong projections of the masses, the colour of the sky with the colour of the earth, reflecting each one in the other: that which was, and that which is. Thus history and nature always reveal, though they may accomplish it in a circumscribed spot of the world, the unceasing relation, the eternal hymen of dying humanity and the growing daisy; of the stars that glow, and the men who expire, of the heart that beats and the wave that rises. And this is so clearly indicated here, is so overwhelming, that one shudders inwardly, as if this dual life centred in one's own body; so brutal and immediate is the perception of these harmonies and developments. For the eye also has its orgies and the mind its delights.

At the foot of two large trees, the trunks of which are intersected, a stream of light floods the grass and seems like a luminous river, brightening the solitude. Overhead, a dome of leaves, through which one can see the sky presenting a vivid contrast of blue, reverberates a bright, greenish light, which illuminates the ruins, accentuating the deep furrows, intensifying the shadows, and disclosing all the hidden beauties. You advance and walk between those walls and under the trees, wander along the barbicans, pass under the falling arcades from which spring large, waving plants. The vaults, which contain corpses, echo under your footfalls; lizards run in the grass, beetles creep along the walls, the sky is blue, and the sleepy ruins pursue their dream.

With its triple enclosure, its dungeons, its interior court-yards, its machicolations, its underground passages, its ramparts piled one upon the other, like a bark on a bark and a shield on a shield, the ancient Château of the Clissons rises before your mind and is reconstructed. The memory of past existences exudes from its walls with the emanations of the nettles and the coolness of the ivy. In that castle, men altogether different from us were swayed by passions stronger than ours; their hands were brawnier and their chests broader.

Long black streaks still mark the walls, as in the time when logs blazed in the eighteen-foot fireplaces. Symmetrical holes in the masonry indicate the floors to which one ascended by winding staircases now crumbling in ruins, while their empty doors open into space. Sometimes a bird, taking flight from its nest hanging in the branches, would pass with spread wings through the arch of a window, and fly far away into the country.

At the top of a high, bleak wall, several square bay-windows, of unequal length and position, let the pure sky shine through their crossed bars; and the bright blue, framed by the stone, attracted my eye with surprising persistency. The sparrows in the trees were chirping, and in the midst of it all a cow, thinking, no doubt, that it was a meadow, grazed peacefully, her horns sweeping over the grass.

There is a window, a large window that looks out into a meadow called la prairie des chevaliers. It was there, from a stone bench carved in the wall, that the high-born dames of the period watched the knights urge their iron-barbed steeds against one another, and the lances come down on the helmets and snap, and the men fall to the ground. On a fine summer day, like to-day, perhaps, when the mill that enlivens the whole landscape did not exist, when there were roofs on the walls, and Flemish hangings, and oil-cloths on the window-sills, when there was less grass, and when human voices and rumours filled the air, more than one heart beat with love and anguish under its red velvet bodice. Beautiful white hands twitched with fear on the stone, which is now covered with moss, and the embroidered veils of high caps fluttered in the wind that plays with my cravat and that swayed the plumes of the knights.

We went down into the vaults where Jean V was imprisoned. In the men's dungeon we saw the large double hook that was used for executions; and we touched curiously with our fingers the door of the women's prison. It is about four inches thick and is plated with heavy iron bars. In the middle is a little grating that was used to throw in whatever was necessary to prevent the captive from starving. It was this grating which opened instead of the door, which, being the mouth of the most terrible confessions, was one of those that always closed but never opened. In those days there was real hatred. If you hated a person, and he had been kidnapped by surprise or traitorously trapped in an interview, and was in your power, you could torture him at your own sweet will. Every minute, every hour, you could delight in his anguish and drink his tears. You could go down into his cell and speak to him and bargain with him, laugh at his tortures, and discuss his ransom; you could live on and off him, through his slowly ebbing life and his plundered treasures. Your whole castle, from the top of the towers to the bottom of the trenches, weighed on him, crushing, and burying him; and thus family revenges were accomplished by the family itself, a fact which constituted their potency and symbolised the idea.

Sometimes, however, when the wretched prisoner was an aristocrat and a wealthy man, and he near death, and one was tired of him, and his tears had acted upon the hatred of his master like refreshing bleedings, there was talk of releasing him. The captive promised everything; he would return the fortified towns, hand over the keys to his best cities, give his daughter in marriage, endow churches and journey on foot to the Holy Sepulchre. And money! Money! Why, he would have more of it coined by the Jews! Then the treaty would be signed and dated and counter-signed; the relics would be brought forth to be sworn on, and the prisoner would be a free man once more. He would jump on his horse, gallop away, and when he reached home he would order the drawbridge hoisted, call his vassals together, and take down his sword from the wall. His hatred would find an outlet in terrific explosions of wrath. It was the time of frightful passions and victorious rages. The oath? The Pope would free him from it, and the ransom he simply ignored.

When Clisson was imprisoned in the Château de l'Hermine, he promised for his freedom a hundred thousand francs' worth of gold, the restitution of the towns belonging to the duke of Penthièvre, and the cancelling of his daughter Marguerite's betrothal to the Duke of Penthièvre. But as soon as he was set free, he began by attacking Chateladren, Guingamp, Lamballe and St. Malo, which cities either were taken or they capitulated. But the people of Brittany paid for the fun.

When Jean V. was captured by the Count of Penthièvre at the bridge of Loroux, he promised a ransom of one million; he promised his eldest daughter, who was already betrothed to the King of Sicily. He promised Montcontour, Sesson and Jugan, etc., but he gave neither his daughter nor the money, nor the cities. He had promised to go to the Holy Sepulchre. He acquitted himself of this by proxy. He had taken an oath that he would no longer levy taxes and subsidies. The Pope freed him from this pledge. He had promised to give Nôtre-Dame de Nantes his weight in gold; but as he weighed nearly two hundred pounds, he remained greatly indebted. With all that he was able to pick up or snatch away, he quickly formed a league and compelled the house of Penthièvre to buy the peace which they had sold to him.

On the other side of the Sèvre, a forest covers the hill with its fresh, green maze of trees; it is La Garenne, a park that is beautiful in itself, in spite of the artificial embellishments that have been introduced. M. Semot, (the father of the present owner), was a painter of the Empire and a laureate, and he tried to reproduce to the best of his ability that cold Italian, republican, Roman style, which was so popular in the time of Canova and of Madame de Staël. In those days people were inclined to be pompous and noble. They used to place chiselled urns on graves and paint everybody in a flowing cloak, and with long hair; then Corinne sang to the accompaniment of her lyre beside Oswald, who wore Russian boots; and it was thought proper to have everybody's head adorned with a profusion of dishevelled locks and to have a multitude of ruins in every landscape.

This style of embellishment abounds throughout La Garenne. There is a temple erected to Vesta, and directly opposite it another erected to Friendship....

Inscriptions, artificial rocks, factitious ruins, are scattered lavishly, with artlessness and conviction.... But the poetical riches centre in the grotto of Héloïse, a sort of natural dolmen on the bank of the Sèvre.

Why have people made Héloïse, who was such a great and noble figure, appear commonplace and silly, the prototype of all crossed loves and the narrow ideal of sentimental schoolgirls? The unfortunate mistress of the great Abélard deserved a better fate, for she loved him with devoted admiration, although he was hard and taciturn at times and spared her neither bitterness nor blows. She dreaded offending him more than she dreaded offending God, and strove harder to please him. She did not wish him to marry her, because she thought that "it was wrong and deplorable that the one whom nature had created for all ... should be appropriated by one woman." She found, she said, "more happiness in the appellation of mistress or concubine, than in that of wife or empress," and by humiliating herself in him, she hoped to gain a stronger hold over his heart.

The park is really delightful. Alleys wind through the woods and clusters of trees bend over the meandering stream. You can hear the bubbling water and feel the coolness of the foliage. If we were irritated by the bad taste displayed here, it was because we had just left Clisson, which has a real, simple, and solid beauty, and after all, this bad taste is not that of our contemporaries. But what is, in fact, bad taste? Invariably it is the taste of the period which has preceded ours. Bad taste at the time of Ronsard was represented by Marot; at the time of Boileau, by Ronsard; at the time of Voltaire, by Corneille, and by Voltaire in the day of Chateaubriand, whom many people nowadays begin to think a trifle weak. O men of taste in future centuries, let me recommend you the men of taste of to-day! You will laugh at their cramps, their superb disdain, their preference for veal and milk, and the faces they make when underdone meat and too ardent poetry is served to them. Everything that is beautiful will then appear ugly; everything that is graceful, stupid; everything that is rich, poor; and oh! how our delightful boudoirs, our charming salons, our exquisite costumes, our palpitating plays, our interesting novels, our serious books will all be consigned to the garret or be used for old paper and manure! O posterity, above all things do not forget our gothic salons, our Renaissance furniture, M. Pasquier's discourses, the shape of our hats, and the aesthetics of La Revue des Deux Mondes!

While we were pondering upon these lofty philosophical considerations, our wagon had hauled us over to Tiffanges. Seated side by side in a sort of tin tub, our weight crushed the tiny horse, which swayed to and fro between the shafts. It was like the twitching of an eel in the body of a musk-rat. Going down hill pushed him forward, going up hill pulled him backward, while uneven places in the road threw him from side to side, and the wind and the whip lashed him alternately. The poor brute! I cannot think of him now without a certain feeling of remorse.

The road down hill is curved and its edges are covered with clumps of sea-rushes or large patches of a certain reddish moss. To the right, on an eminence that starts from the bottom of the dale and swells in the middle like the carapace of a tortoise, one perceives high, unequal walls, the crumbling tops of which appear one above another.

One follows a hedge, climbs a path, and enters an open portal which has sunken into the ground to the depth of one third of its ogive. The men who used to pass through it on horseback would be obliged to bend over their saddles in order to enter it to-day. When the earth is tired of supporting a monument, it swells up underneath it, creeps up to it like a wave, and while the sky causes the top to crumble away, the ground obliterates the foundations. The courtyard was deserted and the calm water that filled the moats remained motionless and flat under the pond-lilies.

The sky was white and cloudless, but without sunshine. Its bleak curve extended far away, covering the country with a cold and cheerless monotony. Not a sound could be heard, the birds did not sing, even the horizon was mute, and from the empty furrows came neither the scream of the crows as they soar heavenward, nor the soft creaking of plough-wheels. We climbed down through brambles and underbrush into a deep and dark trench, hidden at the foot of a large tower, which stands in the water surrounded by reeds. A lone window opens on one side: a dark square relieved by the grey line of its stone cross-bar. A capricious cluster of wild honeysuckle covers the sill, and its maze of perfumed blossoms creeps along the walls. When one looks up, the openings of the big machicolations reveal only a part of the sky, or some little, unknown flower which has nestled in the battlement, its seed having been wafted there on a stormy day and left to sprout in the cracks of the stones.

Presently, a long, balmy breeze swept over us like a sigh, and the trees in the moats, the moss on the stones, the reeds in the water, the plants among the ruins, and the ivy, which covered the tower from top to bottom with a layer of shining leaves, all trembled and shook their foliage; the corn in the fields rippled in endless waves that again and again bent the swaying tops of the ears; the pond wrinkled and welled up against the foot of the tower; the leaves of the ivy all quivered at once, and an apple-tree in bloom covered the ground with pink blossoms.

Nothing, nothing! The open sky, the growing grass, the passing wind. No ragged child tending a browsing cow; not even, as elsewhere, some solitary goat sticking its shaggy head through an aperture in the walls to turn at our approach and flee in terror through the bushes; not a song-bird, not a nest, not a sound! This castle is like a ghost: mute and cold, it stands abandoned in this deserted place, and looks accursed and replete with terrifying recollections. Still, this melancholy dwelling, which the owls now seem to avoid, was once inhabited. In the dungeon, between four walls as livid as the bottom of an old drinking-trough, we were able to discover the traces of five floors. A chimney, with its two round pillars and black top, has remained suspended in the air at a height of thirty feet. Earth has accumulated on it, and plants are growing there as if it were a jardinière.

Beyond the second enclosure, in a ploughed field, one can recognise the ruins of a chapel by the broken shafts of an ogive portal. Grass has grown around it, and trees have replaced the columns. Four hundred years ago, this chapel was filled with ornaments of gold cloth and silk, censers, chandeliers, chalices, crosses, precious stones, gold vessels and vases, a choir of thirty singers, chaplains, musicians, and children sang hymns to the accompaniment of an organ which they took along with them when they travelled. They were clad in scarlet garments lined with pearl grey and vair. There was one whom they called archdeacon, and another whom they called bishop, and the Pope was asked to allow them to wear mitres like canons, for this chapel was the chapel, and this castle one of the castles of Gilles de Laval, lord of Rouci, of Montmorency, of Retz and of Craon, lieutenant-general of the Duke of Brittany and field-marshal of France, who was burned at Nantes on the 25th of October, 1440, in the Prée de la Madéleine for being a counterfeiter, a murderer, a magician, an atheist and a Sodomite.

He possessed more than one hundred thousand crowns' worth of furniture; an income of thirty thousand pounds a year, the profits of his fiefs and his salary as field-marshal; fifty magnificently appointed horsemen escorted him. He kept open house, served the rarest viands and the oldest wines at his board, and gave representations of mysteries, as cities used to do when a king was within their gates. When his money gave out, he sold his estates; when those were gone, he looked around for more gold, and when he had destroyed his furnaces, he called on the devil. He wrote him that he would give him all that he possessed, excepting his life and his soul. He made sacrifices, gave alms and instituted ceremonies in his honour. At night, the bleak walls of the castle lighted up by the glare of the torches that flared amid bumpers of rare wines and gipsy jugglers, and blushed hotly under the unceasing breath of magical bellows. The inhabitants invoked the devil, joked with death, murdered children, enjoyed frightful and atrocious pleasures; blood flowed, instruments played, everything echoed with voluptuousness, horror, and madness.

When he expired, four or five damsels had his body removed from the stake, laid out, and taken to the Carmelites, who, after performing the customary services, buried him in state.

On one of the bridges of the Loire, relates Guépin, opposite the Hôtel de la Boule-d'Or, an expiatory monument was erected to his memory. It was a niche containing the statue of the Bonne Vierge de crée lait, who had the power of creating milk in nurses; the good people offered her butter and similar rustic products. The niche still exists, but the statue is gone; the same as at the town-house, where the casket which contained the heart of Queen Anne is also empty. But we did not care to see the casket; we did not even give it a thought. I should have preferred gazing upon the trousers of the marshal of Retz to looking at the heart of Madame Anne de Bretagne.

CHAPTER III.

CARNAC.

The field of Carnac is a large, open space where eleven rows of black stones are aligned at symmetrical intervals. They diminish in size as they recede from the ocean. Cambry asserts that there were four thousand of these rocks and Fréminville has counted twelve hundred of them. They are certainly very numerous.

What was their use? Was it a temple?

One day Saint Cornille, pursued along the shore by soldiers, was about to jump into the ocean, when he thought of changing them all into stone, and forthwith the men were petrified. But this explanation was good only for fools, little children, and poets. Other people looked for better reasons.

In the sixteenth century, Olaüs Magnus, archbishop of Upsal (who, banished to Rome, wrote a book on the antiquities of his country that met with widespread success except in his native land, Sweden, where it was not translated), discovered that, when these stones form one long, straight row, they cover the bodies of warriors who died while fighting duels; that those arranged in squares are consecrated to heroes that perished in battle; that those disposed in a circle are family graves, while those that form corners or angular figures are the tombs of horsemen or foot-soldiers, and more especially of those fighters whose party had triumphed. All this is quite clear, but Olaüs Magnus has forgotten to tell us how two cousins who killed each other in a duel on horseback could have been buried. The fact of the duel required that the stones be straight; the relationship required that they be circular; but as the men were horsemen, it seems as if the stones ought to have been arranged squarely, though this rule, it is true, was not formal, as it was applied only to those whose party had triumphed. O good Olaüs Magnus! You must have liked Monte-Pulciano exceeding well! And how many draughts of it did it take for you to acquire all this wonderful knowledge?

According to a certain English doctor named Borlase, who had observed similar stones in Cornouailles, "they buried soldiers there, in the very place where they died.” As if, usually, they were carted to the cemetery! And he builds his hypothesis on the following comparison: their graves are on a straight line, like the front of an army on plains that were the scene of some great action.

Then they tried to bring in the Greeks, the Egyptians, and the Cochin Chinese! There is a Karnac in Egypt, they said, and one on the coast of Brittany. Now, it is probable that this Karnac descends from the Egyptian one; it is quite certain! In Egypt they are sphinxes; here they are rocks; but in both instances they are of stone. So it would seem that the Egyptians (who never travelled), came to this coast (of the existence of which they were ignorant), founded a colony (they never founded any), and left these crude statues (they produced such beautiful ones), as a positive proof of their sojourn in this country (which nobody mentions).

People fond of mythology thought them the columns of Hercules; people fond of natural history thought them a representation of the python, because, according to Pausanias, a similar heap of stones, on the road from Thebes to Elissonte, was called “the serpent’s head,” and especially because the rows of stones at Carnac present the sinuosities of a serpent. People fond of cosmography discovered a zodiac, like M. de Cambry, who recognised in those eleven rows of stones the twelve signs of the zodiac, “for it must be stated,” he adds, “that the ancient Gauls had only eleven signs to the zodiac.”

Subsequently, a member of the Institute conjectured that it might perhaps be the cemetery of the Venetians, who inhabited Vannes, situated six miles from Carnac, and who founded Venice, as everybody knows. Another man wrote that these Venetians, conquered by Cæsar, erected all those rocks solely in a spirit of humility and in order to honour their victor. But people were getting tired of the cemetery theory, the serpent and the zodiac; they set out again and this time found a Druidic temple.

The few documents that we possess, scattered through Pliny and Dionysius Cassius, agree in stating that the Druids chose dark places for their ceremonies, like the depths of the woods with “their vast silence.” And as Carnac is situated on the coast, and surrounded by a barren country, where nothing but these gentlemen’s fancies has ever grown, the first grenadier of France, but not, in my estimation, the cleverest man, followed by Pelloutier and by M. Mahé, (canon of the cathedral of Vannes), concluded that it was “a Druidic temple in which political meetings must also have been held.”

But all had not been said, and it still remained to be discovered of what use the empty spaces in the rows could have been. “Let us look for the reason, a thing nobody has ever thought of before,” cried M. Mahé, and, quoting a sentence from Pomponius Mela: “The Druids teach the nobility many things and instruct them secretly in caves and forests;” and this one from Tucain: “You dwell in tall forests,” he reached the conclusion that the Druids not only officiated at the sanctuaries, but that they also lived and taught in them. “So the monument of Carnac being a sanctuary, like the Gallic forests,” (O power of induction! where are you leading Father Mahé, canon of Vannes and correspondent of the Academy of Agriculture at Poitiers?), there is reason to believe that the intervals, which break up the rows of stones, held rows of houses where the Druids lived with their families and numerous pupils, and where the heads of the nation, who, on state days, betook themselves to the sanctuary, found comfortable lodgings. Good old Druids! Excellent ecclesiastics! How they have been calumniated! They lived there so righteously with their families and numerous pupils, and even were amiable enough to prepare lodgings for the principals of the nation!

But at last came a man imbued with the genius of ancient things and disdainful of trodden paths. He was able to recognize the rests of a Roman camp, and, strangely enough, the rests of one of the camps of Cæsar, who had had these stones upreared only to serve as support for the tents of his soldiers and prevent them from being blown away by the wind. What gales there must have been in those days, on the coasts of Armorica!

The honest writer who, to the glory of the great Julius, discovered this sublime precaution, (thus returning to Cæsar that which never belonged to Cæsar), was a former pupil of l'École Polytechnique, an engineer, a M. de la Sauvagère. The collection of all these data constitutes what is called Celtic Archaeology, the mysteries of which we shall presently disclose.

A stone placed on another one is called a “dolmen,” whether it be horizontal or perpendicular. A group of upright stones covered by succeeding flat stones, and forming a series of dolmens, is a “fairy grotto,” a “fairy rock,” a “devil’s stable,” or a “giant’s palace”; for, like the people who serve the same wine under different labels, the Celto-maniacs, who had almost nothing to offer, decorated the same things with various names. When these stones form an ellipse, and have no head-covering, one must say: There is a “cromlech”; when one perceives a stone laid horizontally upon two upright stones, one is confronted by a “lichaven” or a “trilithe.” Often two enormous rocks are put one on top of the other, and touch only at one point, and we read that “they are balanced in such a way that the wind alone is sufficient to make the upper rock sway perceptibly,” an assertion which I do not dispute, although I am rather suspicious of the Celtic wind, and although these swaying rocks have always remained unshaken in spite of the fierce kicks I was artless enough to give them; they are called “rolling or rolled stones,” “turned or transported stones,” “stones that dance or dancing stones,” “stones that twist or twisting stones.” You must still learn what a pierre fichade, a pierre fiche, a pierre fixée are, and what is meant by a haute borne, a pierre latte and a pierre lait; in what a pierre fonte differs from a pierre fiette, and what connection there is between a chaire à diable and a pierre droite; then you will be as wise as ever were Pelloutier, Déric, Latour d’Auvergne, Penhoet and others, not forgetting Mahé and Fréminville. Now, all this means a pulvan, also called a men-hir, and designates nothing more than a stone of greater or lesser size, placed by itself in an open field.

I was about to forget the tumuli! Those that are composed of silica and soil are called “barrows” in high-flown language, while the simple heaps of stones are “gals-gals.”

People have pretended that when they were not tombs the “dolmens” and “trilithes” were altars, that the “fairy rocks” were assembling places or sepultures, and that the business meetings at the time of the Druids were held in the “cromlechs.” M. de Cambry saw in the “swaying rocks” the emblems of the suspended world. The “barrows” and “gals-gals” have undoubtedly been tombs; and as for the “men-hirs,” people went so far as to pretend that they had a form which led to the deduction that a certain cult reigned throughout lower Brittany. O chaste immodesty of science, you respect nothing, not even a peulven!

A reverie, no matter how undefined, may lead up to splendid creations, when it starts from a fixed point. Then the imagination, like a soaring hippogriff, stamps the earth with all its might and journeys straightway towards infinite regions. But when it applies itself to a subject devoid of plastic art and history, and tries to extract a science from it, and to reconstruct a world, it remains even poorer and more barren than the rough stone to which the vanity of some praters has lent a shape and dignified with a history.

To return to the stones of Carnac (or rather, to leave them), if anyone should, after all these opinions, ask me mine, I would emit an irresistible, irrefutable, incontestable one, which would make the tents of M. de la Sauvagère stagger, blanch the face of the Egyptian Penhoët, break up the zodiac of Cambry and smash the python into a thousand bits. This is my opinion: the stones of Carnac are simply large stones!

So we returned to the inn and dined heartily, for our five hours' tramp had sharpened our appetites. We were served by the hostess, who had large blue eyes, delicate hands, and the sweet face of a nun. It was not yet bedtime, and it was too dark to work, so we went to the church.

This is small, although it has a nave and side-aisles like a city church. Short, thick stone pillars support its wooden roof, painted in blue, from which hang miniature vessels, votive offerings that were promised during raging storms. Spiders creep along their sails and the riggings are rotting under the dust. No service was being held, and the lamp in the choir burned dimly in its cup filled with yellow oil; overhead, through the open windows of the darkened vault, came broad rays of white light and the sound of the wind rustling in the tree-tops. A man came in to put the chairs in order, and placed two candles in an iron chandelier riveted to the stone pillar; then he pulled into the middle of the aisle a sort of stretcher with a pedestal, its black wood stained with large white spots. Other people entered the church, and a priest clad in his surplice passed us. There was the intermittent tinkling of a bell and then the door of the church opened wide. The jangling sound of the little bell mingled with the tones of another and their sharp, clear tones swelled louder as they came nearer and nearer to us.

A cart drawn by oxen appeared and halted in front of the church. It held a corpse, whose dull white feet protruded from under the winding-sheet like bits of washed alabaster, while the body itself had the uncertain form peculiar to dressed corpses. The crowd around was silent. The men bared their heads; the priest shook his holy-water sprinkler and mumbled orisons, and the pair of oxen swung their heads to and fro under the heavy, creaking yoke. The church, in the background of which gleamed a star, formed one huge shadow in the greenish outdoor atmosphere of a rainy twilight, and the child who held a light on the threshold had to keep his hand in front of it to prevent the wind from blowing it out.

They lifted the body from the cart, and in doing so struck its head against the pole. They carried it into the church and placed it on the stretcher. A crowd of men and women followed. They knelt on the floor, the men near the corpse, and the women a little farther away, near the door; then the service began.

It did not last very long, at least it impressed us that way, for the low psalmodies were recited rapidly and drowned now and then by a stifled sob which came from under the black hoods near the door. A hand touched me and I drew aside to let a bent woman pass. With her clenched fists on her breast, and face averted, she advanced without appearing to move her feet, eager to see, yet trembling to behold, and reached the row of lights which burned beside the bier. Slowly, very slowly, lifting up her arm as if to hide herself under it, she turned her head on her shoulder and sank in a heap on a chair, as limp as her garments.

By the light of the candles, I could see her staring eyes, framed by lids that looked as if they had been scalded, so red were they; her idiotic and contracted mouth, trembling with despair, and her whole pitiful face, which was drenched with tears.

The corpse was that of her husband, who had been lost at sea; he had been washed ashore and was now being laid to rest.

The cemetery adjoined the church. The mourners passed into it through a side-door, while the corpse was being nailed in its coffin, in the vestry. A fine rain moistened the atmosphere; we felt cold; the earth was slippery and the grave-diggers who had not completed their task, found it hard to raise the heavy soil, for it stuck to their shovels. In the background, the women kneeling in the grass, throwing back their hoods and their big white caps, the starched wings of which fluttered in the wind, appeared at a distance like an immense winding-sheet hovering over the earth.

When the corpse reappeared, the prayers began again, and the sobs broke out anew, and could be heard through the dropping rain.

Not far from us, issued, at regular intervals, a sort of subdued gurgle that sounded like laughter. In any other place, a person hearing it would have thought it the repressed explosion of some overwhelming joy or the paroxysm of a delirious happiness. It was the widow, weeping. Then she walked to the edge of the grave, as did the rest of the mourners, and little by little, the soil assumed its ordinary level and everybody went home.

As we walked down the cemetery steps, a young fellow passed us and said in French to a companion: "Heavens! didn't the fellow stink! He is almost completely mortified! It isn't surprising, though, after being in the water three weeks!"

One morning we started as on other mornings; we chose the same road, and passed the hedge of young elms and the sloping meadow where the day before we had seen a little girl chasing cattle to the drinking-trough; but it was the last day, and the last time perhaps, that we should pass that way.

A muddy stretch of land, into which we sank up to our ankles, extends from Carnac to the village of Pô. A boat was waiting for us; we entered it, and they hoisted the sail and pushed off. Our sailor, an old man with a cheerful face, sat aft; he fastened a line to the gunwale and let his peaceful boat go its own way. There was hardly any wind; the blue sea was calm and the narrow track the rudder ploughed in the waters could be seen for a long time. The old fellow was talkative; he spoke of the priests, whom he disliked, of meat, which he thought was a good thing to eat even on fast days, of the work he had had when he was in the navy, and of the shots he had received when he was a customs officer.... The boat glided along slowly, the line followed us and the end of the tape-cul hung in the water.

The mile we had to walk in order to go from Saint-Pierre to Quiberon was quickly covered, in spite of a hilly and sandy road, and the sun, which made our shoulders smart beneath the straps of our bags, and a number of “men-hirs” that were scattered along the route.

CHAPTER IV.

QUIBERON.

In Quiberon, we breakfasted at old Rohan Belle-Isle's, who keeps the Hôtel Penthievre. This gentleman had his bare feet stuck in old slippers, on account of the heat, and was drinking with a mason, a fact which does not prevent him from being the descendant of one of the first families of Europe; an aristocrat of the old stock! a real aristocrat! Vive Dieu! He immediately set to work to pound a steak and to cook us some lobsters. Our pride was flattered to its innermost fibre.

The past of Quiberon is concentrated in a massacre. Its greatest curiosity is a cemetery, which is filled to its utmost capacity and overflows into the street. The head-stones are crowded together and invade and submerge one another, as if the corpses were uncomfortable in their graves and had lifted up their shoulders to escape from them. It suggests a petrified ocean, the tombs being the waves, and the crosses the masts of shipwrecked vessels.

In the middle, an open ossuary contains skeletons that have been exhumed in order to make room for other corpses. Who has said: "Life is a hostelry, and the grave is our home?" But these corpses do not remain in their graves, for they are only tenants and are ejected at the expiration of the lease. Around this charnel-house, where the heaps of bones resemble a mass of fagots, is arranged, breast-high, a series of little black boxes, six inches square, surmounted by a cross and cut out in the shape of a heart in front, so that one can see the skulls inside. Above the heart-shaped opening are the following words in painted letters: "This is the head of — — — —, deceased on such and such a day, in such and such a year." These heads belonged to persons of a certain standing, and one would be considered an ungrateful son if, after seven years, he did not give his parents' skulls the luxury of one of these little black boxes. The remainder of the bodies is thrown into the bone-house, and twenty-five years afterwards the heads are sent to join them. A few years ago they tried to abolish the custom; but a riot ensued and the practice continued.

Perhaps it is wicked to play with those round skulls which once contained a mind, with those empty circles in which passion throbbed. Those boxes surrounding the ossuary and scattered over the graves, over the wall and in the grass, without any attempt at order, may appear horrible to a few and ridiculous to many; but those black cases rotting even as the bones blanch and crumble to dust; those skulls, with noses eaten away and foreheads streaked by the slimy trails of snails, and hollow, staring eyes; those thigh-bones piled up as in the great charnel-houses mentioned in the Bible; those pieces of skulls lying around filled with earth, in which a flower springs up sometimes and grows through the holes of the eyes; even the vulgarity of those inscriptions, which are as similar as the corpses they identify — all this human rottenness appeared beautiful to us, and procured us a splendid sight.

If the post of Auray had arrived, we should have started at once for Belle-Isle; but they were waiting for it. Transient sailors with bare arms and open shirts sat in the kitchen of the inn, drinking to pass away the time.

“At what time is the post due here in Auray?”

“That depends; usually at ten o’clock,” replied the innkeeper.

“No, at eleven,” put in a man.

“At twelve,” said M. de Rohan.

“At one.”

“At half-past one.”

“Sometimes it doesn’t reach here until two o’clock.”

“It isn’t very regular!”

We were aware of that; it was already three. We could not start before the arrival of this ill-fated messenger, which brings Belle-Isle the despatches from terra firma, so we had to resign ourselves. Once in a while some one would get up, go to the door, look out, come back, and start up again. Oh! he will not come to-day. — He must have stopped on the way. — Let’s go home. — No, let’s wait for him. — If, however, you are tired of waiting gentlemen.... After all, there may not be any letters.... No, just wait a little longer. — Oh! here he comes! — But it was some one else, and the dialogue would begin all over again.

At last we heard the beating of tired hoofs on the cobblestones, the tinkling of bells, the cracking of a whip and a man’s voice shouting: “Ho! Ho! Here’s the post! Here’s the post!”

The horse stopped in front of the door, hunched its back, stretched its neck, opened its mouth, disclosed its teeth, spread its hind legs and rose on its hocks.

The animal was lean and tall, and had a moth-eaten mane, rough hoofs and loose shoes; a seton bobbed up and down on its breast. Lost in a saddle that swallowed him up, supported at the back by a valise and in front by the mail-bag, which was passed through the saddle-bow, its rider sat huddled on it like a monkey. His small face, adorned with straggling blond whiskers and as wrinkled and rough as a winter apple, was hidden by a large oil-cloth hat lined with felt; a sort of gray coustil coat was drawn up to his hips and bagged around his stomach, while his trousers stopped at the knees and disclosed his bare legs reddened by the rubbing of the stirrup-straps, and his blue hose, which hung over his shoes. The harness was held together with strings, the rider's clothes had been mended with threads of different colours; all sorts of patches and all kinds of spots, torn linen, greasy leather, dried mud, recent dust, hanging straps, bright rags, a dirty man and a mangy horse, the former sickly and perspiring, the latter consumptive and almost spent; the one with his whip and the other with its bells — all this formed but one object which had the same colour and movement and executed almost the same gestures, which served the same purpose, the conducting of the Auray post.

After another hour, when all the packages and commissions had been attended to and we had waited for several passengers who were to come, we finally left the inn and went aboard. At first there was nothing but a confused mass of people and luggage, oars that caused us to stumble, sails that dropped on our heads, men falling over each other and not knowing where to go; then everything quieted down, each one found his nook, the luggage was put in the bottom of the boat, the sailors got on the benches, and the passengers seated themselves as best they could.

There was no breeze and the sails clung limply to the masts. The heavy boat hardly moved over the almost motionless sea, which swelled and subsided with the gentle rhythm of a sleeping breast.

Leaning against one of the gunwales, we gazed at the water, which was as blue and calm as the sky, and listened to the splashing of the oars; sitting in the shadow of the sail, the six rowers lifted their oars regularly to make the forward stroke, and when they dipped them into the water and brought them up again, drops of crystal clung to their paddles. Reclining on the straw, or sitting on the benches, with their legs dangling and their chins in their hands, or leaning against the sides of the boat, between the big jambs of the hull, the tar of which was melting in the heat, the silent passengers hung their heads and closed their eyes to shut out the glare of the sun, that shone on the flat ocean as on a mirror.

A white-haired man was sleeping at my feet, a gendarme was sweltering under his three-cornered hat, and two soldiers had unfastened their knapsacks and used them as pillows. Near the bowsprit stood a cabin-boy looking into the stay-sail and whistling for wind, while the skipper remained aft and managed the tiller. Still no wind arose. Orders were given to haul in the sails; slowly and gently they came down and fell in a heap on the benches; then each sailor took off his waistcoat, stowed it away under the bow of the boat, and the men began to row again with all their might.

Our departure had been so delayed that there was hardly any water left in the harbour and we had great difficulty in landing. Our boat grated on the pebbles, and in order to leave it, we were compelled to walk on an oar as if it were a tight-rope.

Ensnconced between the citadel and its ramparts, and cut in two by an almost empty port, the Palay appeared to us a useless little town overcome with military ennui, and put me in mind, I do not know why, of a gaping sous-officier.

One fails to see the low-crowned, broad-brimmed black felt hats of Le Morbihan, that give protection to the shoulders as well as the head. The women do not affect the big, white caps that stand out from their faces, and reach down their backs like those worn by the nuns, so that when worn by little girls they cover half of their bodies. Their gowns are made without the wide stripe of velvet applied on each shoulder and rounding away under the arms. Nor do they wear the low shoes with square toes, high heels, and long black ribbon streamers. Here, as elsewhere, we found faces that resemble other faces, costumes that really are no costumes at all, cobblestones, and even a sidewalk.

Was it worth while to expose ourselves to seasickness (which, by the way, we escaped, a fact that inclined us to leniency), only to see a citadel that we do not admire, a lighthouse that did not appeal to us in the least, and a rampart built by Vauban, of whom we were already heartily tired? But people had spoken to us of Belle-Isle's rocks. So we started at once, and taking a short cut across the fields, walked to the beach.

We saw one grotto, only one (the day was near its close), but it appeared so beautiful to us (it was draped with sea-weed and decorated with shells, and water dripped from the top), that we resolved to spend a day in Belle-Isle, in order to discover more of them, if there were any, and feast our eyes leisurely upon their beauties.

The following day, at dawn, having filled our flasks and put some sandwiches in our knapsacks, we decided to go where we pleased; so, without a guide or information of any sort (this is the best way), we set out to walk, having resolved that we would go anywhere, provided it were far, and would return home at any time, provided it were late.

We began by a path which led to the top of a cliff, then followed its asperities and valleys and continued around the whole island. When we reached places where landslips had obliterated it, we struck out into the country and let our eyes roam over the horizon of the sea, the deep blue line of which touched the sky; then we walked back to the edge of the rocks, which had suddenly reappeared at our side. The perpendicular cliff, the top of which we were treading, concealed the flank of the rocks, and we could only hear the roaring of the breakers below us.

Sometimes the rock was split in its entire length, disclosing its two almost straight sides, streaked with layers of silica, with tufts of yellow flowers scattered here and there. If we threw a stone, it appeared suspended in the air for a time, would then strike the sides of the cliff, rebound from the one to the other, break into a thousand bits, scattering earth and pebbles in its course, and finally land at the bottom of the pit, where it frightened the cormorants, which shrieked and took flight.

Frequent storms and thaws have pushed a part of the upper grounds into these gorges, and so their steep slope has grown less abrupt, and one is able to climb down to the bottom. We attempted to do so by sliding down like children, holding ourselves back with our hands and feet, and finally we landed safely on the soft, wet sand.

The tide was going out, but in order to be able to pass, we had to wait until the breakers receded. We watched them approach us. They dashed against the rocks, swirled in the crevices, rose like scarfs on the wind, fell back in drops and sprays, and with one long, sweeping libration, gathered their green waters together and retreated. When one wave left the sand, its currents immediately joined, and sought lower levels. The sea-weed moved its slimy branches; the water bubbled between the pebbles, oozed through the cracks of the rocks and formed a thousand rivulets and fountains. The drenched sand absorbed it all, and soon its yellow tint grew white again through the drying action of the sun.

As soon as we could, we jumped over the rocks and continued on our way. Soon, however, they increased in numbers, their weird groups being crowded together, piled up and overturned on one another. We tried to hold on with our hands and feet, but we slid on their slippery asperities. The cliff was so very high that it quite frightened us to look up at it. Although it crushed us by its formidable placidity, still it fascinated us, for we could not help looking at it and it did not tire our eyes.

A swallow passed us and we watched its flight; it came from the sea; it ascended slowly through the air, cutting the luminous, fluid atmosphere with its sharp, outstretched wings that seemed to enjoy being absolutely untrammelled. The bird ascended higher and higher, rose above the cliff and finally disappeared.

Meanwhile we were creeping over the rocks, the perspective of which was renewed by each bend of the coast. Once in a while, when the rocks ended, we walked on square stones that were as flat as marble slabs and seamed by almost symmetrical furrows, which appeared like the tracks of some ancient road of another world.

In some places were great pools of water as calm as their greenish depths and as limpid and motionless as a woodland stream on its bed of cresses. Then the rocks would reappear closer than before and more numerous. On one side was the ocean with its breakers foaming around the lower rocks; on the other, the straight, unrelenting, impassive coast.

Tired and bewildered, we looked about us for some issue; but the cliff stretched out before us, and the rocks, infinitely multiplying their dark green forms, succeeded one another until their unequal crags seemed like so many tall, black phantoms rising out of the earth.

We stumbled around in this way until we suddenly perceived an undulating series of rough steps which enabled us to climb up to flat land again.

It is always a pleasure, even when the country is ugly, to walk with a friend, to feel the grass under one's feet, to jump over fences and ditches, to break thistles with one's stick, to pull leaves from the bushes and wheat from the fields, to go where one's fancy dictates, whistling, singing, talking, dreaming, without strange ears to listen to one's conversation, and the sound of strange footsteps behind one, as absolutely free as if one were in the desert!

Ah! Let us have air! air! And more space! Since our contracted souls suffocate and die on the window-sill, since our captive spirits, like the bear in its cage, turn around and around, and stagger against the walls of their prison, why not, at least, let our nostrils breathe the different perfumes of all the winds of the earth, why not let our eyes rove over every horizon?

No steeple shone in the distance, no hamlet with thatched roofs and square yards framed by clusters of trees, appeared on the side of a hill; not a soul was to be seen, not even a peasant, a grazing sheep, or a stray dog.

All those cultivated fields look uninhabited; the peasants work in them, but they do not live there. One is led to believe that they benefit by them but do not care about them in the least.

We saw a farm and walked in; a ragged woman served us some ice-cold milk in earthen cups. The silence all around was peculiar. The woman watched us eagerly, and we soon took our departure.

We walked into a valley, the narrow gorge of which appeared to extend to the ocean. Tall grass with yellow flowers reached up to our waists, and we had to take long strides in order to advance. We could hear the murmur of flowing water near by, and we sank ankle-deep into the marshy soil. Presently the two hills parted; their barren sides were covered with short, stubby grass and here and there were big yellow patches of moss. At the foot of one hill a stream wends its way through the drooping boughs of the stunted shrubs that grow on its edges, and loses itself in a quiet pond where long-legged insects disport themselves on the leaves of the water-lilies. The sun beat down on us. The gnats rubbed their wings together and bent the slender ends of the reeds with the weight of their tiny bodies. We were alone in the tranquillity of this desert.

At this point, the valley curved and widened and formed a sharp bend. We climbed a little hill, in order to locate ourselves, but the horizon either ended abruptly, enclosed by another hill, or else stretched out over new plains. We did not lose courage, however, and continued to advance, while we thought of the travellers on desert islands who climb on promontories in the hope of sighting some vessel setting sail towards them.

The soil was growing less moist, and the grass less high; presently the ocean came in view, ensconced in a narrow bay, and soon the shore, strewn with débris of shells and madrepores, crunched beneath our footsteps. We let ourselves drop to the ground and as we were exhausted, we soon fell asleep. An hour later the cold woke us up, and we started homeward without any fear of losing our way this time. We were on the coast facing France, and Palay was on our left. It was here, the day before, that we had discovered the grotto we admired so much. It did not take us long to find others, higher and deeper even than the first one.

They always opened through large, pointed arches which were either upright or inclined, their bold columns supporting enormous pieces of rock. Black, veined with purple, fiery red, or brown streaked with white, these beautiful grottoes displayed for their visitors the infinite variety of their shapes and colouring, their graces and their grand caprices. There was one all of silver veined with deep red; in another, tufts of flowers resembling periwinkles had grown on glazings of reddish granite, and drops of water fell from the ceiling on the fine sand with never-ceasing regularity. In the background of another grotto, beneath a long semi-circle, a bed of polished white gravel, which the tide no doubt turns and makes fresh every day, seemed to be waiting to receive the body of a mermaid; but the bed is empty and has lost her forever! Only the moist seaweed remains on which she used to stretch her delicate nude limbs when she was tired of swimming, and on which she reclined till daybreak, in the pale light of the moon.

The sun was setting, and the tide was coming in over the rocks that melted in the blue evening mist, which was blanched on the level of the ocean by the foam of the tumbling waves. In the other part of the horizon, the sky streaked with orange stripes looked as if it had been swept by a gale. Its light reflected on the waters and spread a gleaming sheen over them, and projected on the sand, giving it a brownish tinge and making it glitter like steel.

Half a mile to the south, the coast is covered by a line of rocks that extends to the sea. In order to reach them, we should have been compelled to tramp as we had already done that morning. We were tired, and it was far; but a temptation seemed to push us forward. The breeze played in the cracks of the rocks and wrinkled the surface of the pools; the sea-weed, cleaving to the sides of the cliff, shook in the wind, and from the part of the sky where the moon was to rise, a pale light spread over the waters. It was the hour when the shadows lengthen. The rocks appeared larger, and the breakers a deeper green. The sky seemed to expand, and all nature assumed a different appearance.

So we started, without giving a thought to the incoming tide or whether or not we should find later a way to get back to land. We wished to enjoy our pleasure to the fullest extent. We seemed lighter than in the morning, and ran and jumped without the slightest feeling of fatigue. An abundance of animal spirits impelled us onward and we felt a peculiarly robust twitching in our muscles. We shook our heads in the wind and touched the grasses with our fingers. We breathed the salt air of the ocean, and noted and assimilated every color, every sunbeam, every sound, the design of the seaweed, the softness of the sand, the hardness of the rocks that echoed under our footsteps, the height of the cliffs, the fringe of the waves, the accidents of the coast, and the voice of the horizon; and the breeze that passed over our faces like intangible kisses, the sky with its passing clouds, the rising moon, the peeping stars. Our souls bathed in all this splendour, and our eyes feasted on it; we opened our ears and nostrils wide; something of the very life of the elements, forced from them undoubtedly by the attraction of our eyes, reached us and was assimilated, so that we were able to comprehend them in a closer relation and feel them more keenly, thanks to this complex union.

By thus entering and penetrating into nature, we became a part of it, diffused ourselves in it, and were claimed by it once more; we felt that it was overpowering us, and we rejoiced; we desired to be lost in it, to be borne away, or to carry it away with us. As in the raptures of love, one wishes more hands with which to caress, more lips with which to kiss, more eyes with which to see, more soul with which to worship; spreading ourselves out in nature, with a joyful and delirious abandon, we regretted that our eyes could not penetrate to the innermost parts of the rocks, to the bottom of the sea, to the end of the heavens, in order to see how the stones grow, how the breakers are made, how the stars are lighted; we regretted that our ears could not catch the rumour of the fermentation of the granite in the bowels of the earth, could not hear the sap circulate in the plants and the coral roll in the solitudes of the ocean. And while we were under the spell of that contemplative effusion, we wished that our souls, radiating everywhere, might live all these different lives, assume all these different forms, and, varying unceasingly, accomplish their metamorphoses under an eternal sun!

But man was made to enjoy each day only a small portion of food, colours, sounds, sentiments and ideas. Anything above the allotted quantity tires or intoxicates him; it becomes the idiocy of the drunkard or the ravings of the ecstatic. O, God! How small is our glass and how large is our thirst! What weak heads we have!

CHAPTER V.

RETURN.

In order to return to Quiberon, we were compelled, on the following day, to arise before seven o'clock, a feat which required some courage. While we were still stiff from fatigue and shivering with sleep, we got into a boat along with a white horse, two drummers, the same one-eyed gendarme and the same soldier who, this time, however, did not lecture anybody. As drunk as a lord, he kept slipping under the benches and had all he could do to keep his shako on his head and extricate his gun from between his feet. I could not say which was the sillier of the two. The gendarme was sober, but he was very stupid. He deplored the soldier's lack of manners, enumerated the punishments that would be dealt out to him, was scandalised by his hiccoughs and resented his demeanour. Viewed from the side of the missing eye, with his three-cornered hat, his sabre and his yellow gloves, the gendarme presented one of the sorriest aspects of human life. Besides, there is something so essentially grotesque about gendarmes that I cannot help laughing at them; these upholders of the law always produce the same comic effect on me, and so do attorneys for the king, magistrates, and professors of literature.

Tipped to one side, the boat skimmed lightly through the foaming waves. The three sails were comfortably swelled; the masts creaked and the wind rattled the pulleys. A cabin-boy stood at the helm singing. We could not catch the words, but it was some slow, monotonous lay which neither rose nor fell and was repeated again and again, with long-drawn-out inflections and languid refrain. And it swept softly and sadly out over the ocean, as some confused memory sweeps through one's mind.

The horse stood as straight as it could on its four legs and pulled at a bundle of hay. The sailors, with folded arms, looked absently at the sails and smiled a far-away smile.

So we journeyed on without speaking a word and as best we could, without reaching the edge of the bay, where it looked as if Plouharnel might be. However, after a while we arrived there. But when we did, we were confronted by the ocean, for we had followed the right side of the coast instead of the left, and were forced to turn back and go over a part of the route.

A muffled sound was heard. A bell tinkled and a hat appeared. It was the Auray post. Again the same man, the same horse, the same mail-bag. He was ambling quietly towards Quiberon; he would be back directly and return again the next day. He is the guest of the coast; he passes in the morning and again at night. His life is spent going from one point to another; he is the only one who gives the coast some animation, something to look forward to, and, I was almost going to say, some charm.

He stopped and talked to us for a few minutes, then lifted his hat and was off again.

What an ensemble! What a horse, and what a rider! What a picture! Callot would probably have reproduced it, but it would take Cervantes to write it.

After passing over large pieces of rock that have been placed in the sea in order to shorten the route by cutting the back of the bay in two, we finally arrived at Plouharnel.

The village was quiet; chickens cackled and scratched in the streets, and in the gardens enclosed by stone walls, weeds and oats grew side by side.

While we were sitting in front of the host's door, an old beggar passed us. He was as red as a lobster, dirty and unkempt and covered with rags and vermin. The sun shone on his dilapidated garments and on his purple skin; it was almost black and seemed to transude blood. He kept bellowing in a terrible voice, while beating a tattoo on the door of a neighbouring house.

CHAPTER VI.

QUIMPER.

Quimper, although it is the centre of the real Brittany, is distinctly different from it. The elm-tree promenade that follows the winding river, which has quays and boats, renders the town very pretty and the big Hôtel de la Préfecture, which alone covers the little western delta, gives it a thoroughly administrative and French appearance. You are aware that you are in the chef-lieu of a department, a fact brought home to you by the latter's division in arrondissements, with their large, medium, and small parishes, its committee of primary instruction, its saving banks, its town council and other modern inventions, which rob the cities of local colour, dear to the heart of the innocent tourist.

With all due deference to the people who pronounce the name of Quimper-Corentin as the synonyme of all that is ridiculous and provincial, it is a most delightful place, and well worth other more respected ones. You will not, it is true, find the charms and riotous wealth of colouring possessed by Quimperlé; still, I know of few things that can equal the charming appearance of that alley following the edge of the river and shaded by the escarpment of a neighbouring mountain, which casts the dark shadows of its luxuriant foliage over it.

It does not take long to go through cities of this kind, and to know their most intimate recesses, and sometimes one stumbles across places that stay one's steps and fill one's heart with gladness.

Small cities, like small apartments, seem warmer and cosier to live in. But keep this illusion! There are more draughts in such apartments than in a palace, and a city of this kind is more deadly monotonous than the desert.

Returning to the hotel by one of those paths we dearly love, that rises and falls and winds, sometimes through a field, sometimes through grass and brambles, sometimes along a wall, which are filled in turn with daisies, pebbles and thistles, a path made for light thoughts and bantering conversation, — returning, I said, to the city, we heard cries and plaintive wails issue from under the slated roof of a square building. It was the slaughter-house.

At that moment I thought of some terrible city, of some frightful and immense place like Babylon or Babel, filled with cannibals and slaughter-houses, where they butchered men instead of animals; and I tried to discover a likeness to human agonies in those bleating and sobbing voices. I thought of groups of slaves brought there with ropes around their necks, to be tied to iron rings, and killed in order to feed their masters, who would eat their flesh from tables of carved ivory and wipe their lips on fine linen. Would their attitudes be more dejected, their eyes sadder or their prayers more pitiful?

While we were in Quimper, we went out one day through one side of the town and came back through the other, after tramping about eight hours.

Our guide was waiting for us under the porch of the hotel. He started in front of us and we followed. He was a little white-haired man, with a linen cap and torn shoes, and he wore an old brown coat that was many sizes too large for him. He stuttered when he spoke, and when he walked he knocked his knees together; but in spite of all this, he managed to advance very quickly, with a sort of nervous, almost febrile perseverance. From time to time, he would pull a leaf off a tree and clap it over his mouth to cool his lips. His business consists in going from one place to another, attending to letters and errands. He goes to Douarnenez, Quimperlé, Brest and even to Rennes, which is forty miles away (a journey which he accomplished in four days, including going and coming). His whole ambition, he said, was to return to Rennes once more during his lifetime. And only for the purpose, mind you, of going back, of making the trip, and being able to boast of it afterwards. He knows every road and every commune that has a steeple; he takes short cuts across the fields, opens gates, and when he passes in front of a farm, he never fails to greet its owners. Having listened to the birds all his life, he has learned to imitate their chirpings, and when he walks along the roads, under the trees, he whistles as his feathered friends do, in order to charm his solitude.

Our first stop was at Loc-Maria, an ancient monastery, given in olden times by Conan III to the abbey of Fontevault; it is situated a quarter of a mile from the town. This monastery has not been shamefully utilised like the abbey of poor Robert d'Arbrissel. It is deserted, but has not been sullied. Its Gothic portal does not re-echo the voices of jailers, and though there may not be much of it, one experiences neither disgust nor rebellion. In that little chapel, of a rather severe Romance style, the only curious thing is a large granite holy-water basin which stands on the floor and is almost black. It is wide and deep and represents to perfection the real Catholic holy-water basin, made to receive the entire body of an infant, and not in the least like those narrow shells in our churches in which you can only dip your fingers. With its clear water rendered more limpid by the contrast of a greenish bed, the vegetation which has grown all around it during the religious calm of centuries, its crumbling angles, and its great mass of bronzed stone, it looks like one of those hollowed rocks which contain salt water.

After we had inspected the chapel carefully, we walked to the river, crossed it in a boat, and plunged into the country.

It is absolutely deserted and strangely empty. Trees, bushes, sea-rushes, tamarisks, and heather grow on the edge of the ditches. We came to broad stretches of land, but we did not see a soul anywhere. The sky was bleak and a fine rain moistened the atmosphere and spread a grey veil over the country. The paths we chose were hollow and shaded by clusters of foliage, the branches of which, uniting, drooped over our heads and almost prevented us from walking erect. The light that filtered through the dome of leaves was greenish, and as dim as on a winter evening. But farther away, it was brilliant, and played around the edges of the leaves and accentuated their delicate pinking. Later we reached the top of a barren slope, which was flat and smooth, and without a blade of grass to relieve the monotony of its colour. Sometimes, however, we came upon a long avenue of beech-trees with moss growing around the foot of their thick, shining trunks. There were wagon-tracks in these avenues, as if to indicate the presence of a neighbouring castle that we might see at any moment; but they ended abruptly in a stretch of flat land that continued between two valleys, through which it would spread its green maze furrowed by the capricious meanderings of hedges, spotted here and there by a grove, brightened by clumps of sea-rushes, or by some field bordering the meadows which rose slowly to meet the hills and lost themselves in the horizon. Above these hills, far away in the mist, stretched the blue surface of the ocean.

The birds are either absent or they do not sing; the leaves are thick, the grass deadens one's footfalls, and the country gazes at you like some melancholy countenance. It looks as if it had been created expressly to harbour ruined lives and shattered hopes, and to foster their bitterness beneath its weeping sky, to the low rustling of the trees and the heather. On winter nights, when the fox creeps stealthily over the dry leaves, when the tiles fall from the pigeon-house and the reeds bend in the marshes, when the beech-trees stoop in the wind, and the wolf ambles over the moonlit snow, while one is alone by the dying embers listening to the wind howl in the empty hallways, how charming it must be to let one's heart dwell on its most cherished despairs and long forgotten loves!

We spied a hovel with a Gothic portal; further on was an old wall with an ogive door; a leafless bush swayed there in the breeze. In the courtyard the ground is covered with heather, violets, and pebbles; you walk in, look around and go out again. This place is called "The temple of the false gods," and used to be, it is thought, a commandery of Templars.

Our guide started again and we followed him. Presently a steeple rose among the trees; we crossed a stubble-field, climbed to the top of a ditch and caught a glimpse of a few of dwellings: the village of Pomelin. A rough road constitutes the main street and the village consists of several houses separated by yards. What tranquillity! or rather what forlornness! The thresholds are deserted; the yards are empty.

Where are the inhabitants? One would think that they had all left the village to lie in wait behind the furze-bushes to catch a glimpse of the Blues who are about to pass through the ravine.

The church is poor and perfectly bare. No beautiful painted saints, no pictures on the walls or on the roof, no hanging lamp oscillating at the end of a long, straight cord. In a corner of the choir, a wick was burning in a glass filled with oil. Round wooden pillars hold up the roof, the blue paint of which has been freshened recently. The bright light of the fields, filtering through the green foliage which covers the roof of the church, shines through the white window-panes. The door, a little wooden door that closes with a latch, was open; a flight of birds came in, chirping and beating their wings against the walls; they fluttered for awhile beneath the vault and around the altar, two or three alighted upon the holy-water basin, to moisten their beaks, and then all flew away as suddenly as they had come.

It is not an unusual thing to see birds in the Breton churches; many live there and fasten their nests to the stones of the nave; they are never disturbed. When it rains, they all gather in the church, but as soon as the sun pierces the clouds and the rain-spouts dry up, they repair to the trees again. So that during the storm two frail creatures often enter the blessed house of God together; man to pray and allay his fears, and the bird to wait until the rain stops and to warm the naked bodies of its frightened young.

A peculiar charm pervades these churches. It is not their poverty that moves us, because even when they are empty, they appear to be inhabited. Is it not, then, their modesty that appeals to us? For, with their unpretentious steeples, and their low roofs hiding under the trees, they seem to shrink and humiliate themselves in the sight of God. They have not been upreared through a spirit of pride, nor through the pious fancy of some mighty man on his death-bed. On the contrary, we feel that it is the simple impression of a need, the ingenuous cry of an appetite, and, like the shepherd's bed of dried leaves, it is the retreat the soul has built for itself where it comes to rest when it is tired. These village churches represent better than their city sisters the distinctive features of the places where they are built, and they seem to participate more directly in the life of the people who, from father to son, come to kneel at the same place and on the same stone slab. Every day, every Sunday, when they enter and when they leave, do they not see the graves of their parents, are these not near them while they pray, and does it not seem to them as if the church was only a larger family circle from which the loved ones have not altogether departed? These places of worship thus have a harmonious sense, and the life of these people is influenced by it from the baptismal font to the grave. It is not the same with us, because we have relegated eternity to the outskirts of the city, have banished our dead to the faubourgs and laid them to rest in the carpenter's quarter, near the soda factories and night-soil magazines.

About three o'clock in the afternoon, we arrived at the chapel of Kerfeunteun, near the entrance to Quimper. At the upper end of the chapel is a fine glass window of the sixteenth century, representing the genealogical tree of the Holy Trinity. Jacob forms the trunk, and the top is figured by the Cross surmounted by the Eternal Father with a tiara on His head. On each side, the square steeple represents a quadrilateral pierced by a long straight window. This steeple does not rest squarely on the roof, but instead, by means of a slender basis, the narrow sides of which almost touch, it forms an obtuse angle near the ridge of the roof. In Brittany, almost every church has a steeple of this kind.

Before returning to the city, we made a détour in order to visit the chapel of La Mère-Dieu. As it is usually closed, our guide summoned the custodian, and the latter accompanied us with his little niece, who stopped along the road to pick flowers. The young man walked in front of us. His slender and flexible figure was encased in a jacket of light blue cloth, and the three velvet streamers of his black hat, which was carefully placed on the back of his head, over his knotted hair, hung down his back.

At the bottom of a valley, or rather a ravine, can be seen the church of La Mère-Dieu, veiled by thick foliage. In this place, amid the silence of all these trees and because of its little Gothic portal (which appears to be of the thirteenth century, but which, in reality, is of the sixteenth), the church reminds one of the discreet chapels mentioned in old novels and old melodies, where they knighted the page starting for the Holy Land, one morning when the stars were dim and the lark trilled, while the mistress of the castle slipped her white hand through the bars of the iron gate and wept when he kissed her goodbye.

We entered the church. The young custodian took off his hat and knelt on the floor. His thick, blond hair uncoiled and fell around his shoulders. It clung a moment to the coarse cloth of his jacket, and then, little by little, it separated and spread like the hair of a woman. It was parted in the middle and hung on both sides over his shoulders and neck. The golden mass rippled with light every time he moved his head bent in prayer.

The little girl kneeled beside him and let her flowers fall to the ground. For the first time in my life, I understood the beauty of a man's locks and the fascination they may have for bare and playful arms. A strange progress, indeed, is that which consists in curtailing everywhere the grand superfetations nature has bestowed upon us, so that whenever we discover them in all their virgin splendour, they are a revelation to us.

CHAPTER VII.

PONT-L'ABBÉ.

At five o'clock in the evening, we arrived at Pont-l'Abbé, covered with quite a respectable coating of mud and dust, which fell from our clothing upon the floor of the inn with such disastrous abundance, every time we moved, that we were almost mortified at the mess we made.

Pont-l'Abbé is a peaceful little town, cut in two in its entire length by a broad, paved street. Its modest inhabitants cannot possibly look any more stupid or insignificant than the place itself.

For those who must see something wherever they go, there are the unimportant remains of the castle and the church, an edifice that would be quite passable were it not for the thick coat of paint that covers it. The chapel of the Virgin was a bower of flowers; bunches of jonquils, pansies, roses, jessamine, and honeysuckle were arranged in blue glasses or white china vases and spread their bright colours over the altar and upward between the two tall candlesticks framing the Virgin's face and her silver crown, from which fell a long veil caught on the gold star of the plaster Infant she held in her arms. One could smell the odour of the holy water and the flowers. It was a perfumed, mysterious little nook all by itself, a hidden retreat decorated by loving hands, and peculiarly adapted for the exhalation of mystical desires and long, heart-broken orisons. All his heart's sensuousness, compressed by the climate and numbed by misery, is brought here by man and laid at the feet of Mary, the Divine Mother, and he is thus able to satisfy his unquenchable longing for love and enjoyment. No matter if the roof leaks and there are no benches or chairs in the rest of the church, you will always find the chapel of the Virgin bright with flowers and lights, for it seems as if all the religious tenderness of Brittany has concentrated there; it is the softest spot of its heart; it is its weakness, its passion, its treasure. Though there are no flowers in these parts, there are flowers in the church; though the people are poor, the Virgin is always sumptuous and beautiful. She smiles at you, and despairing souls go to warm themselves at her knees as at a hearthstone that is never extinguished. One is astonished at the way these people cling to their belief; but does one know the pleasure and voluptuousness they derive from it? Is not asceticism superior epicureanism, fasting, refined gormandising? Religion can supply one with almost carnal sensations; prayer has its debauchery and mortification its raptures; and the men who come at night and kneel in front of this dressed statue, feel their hearts beat thickly and a sort of vague intoxication, while in the streets of the city, the children on their way home from school stop and gaze dreamily at the woman who smiles at them from the stained window of the church.

But you must attend a fête in order to gain an insight into the gloomy character of these people. They don't dance; they merely turn; they don't sing; they only whistle. That very evening we went to a neighbouring village to be present at the inauguration of a threshing-floor. Two biniau players were stationed on top of the wall surrounding the yard, and played continuously while two long lines of men and women, following in one another's footsteps, trotted around the place and described several figures. The lines would turn, break up and form again at irregular intervals. The heavy feet of the dancers struck the ground without the slightest attempt at rhythm, while the shrill notes of the music succeeded one another rapidly and with desperate monotony. The dancers who tired withdrew without interrupting the dance, and when they had rested, they re-entered it. During the whole time we watched this peculiar performance, the crowd stopped only once, while the musicians drank some cider; then, when they had finished, the lines formed anew and the dance began again. At the entrance of the yard was a table covered with nuts; beside it stood a pitcher of brandy and on the ground was a keg of cider; near by stood a citizen in a green frock coat and a leather cap; a little farther away was a man wearing a jacket and a sword suspended from a white shoulder-belt; they were the commissaire de police, of Pont-l'Abbé and his garde-champêtre. Suddenly, M. le commissaire pulled out his watch and motioned to the garde. The latter drew several peasants aside, spoke to them in a low tone, and presently the assembly broke up.

All four of us returned to the city together, which afforded us the opportunity of again admiring mother of the harmonious combinations of Providence which had created this commissaire de police for this garde-champêtre and this garde-champêtre for his commissaire de police. They were made for each other. The same fact would give rise in both of them to the same reflections; from the same idea both would draw parallel conclusions. When the commissaire laughed, the garde grinned; when he assumed a serious expression, his shadow grew gloomy; if the frock-coat said, "This must be done," the jacket replied, "I think so, too;" if the coat added, "It is necessary;" the waistcoat affirmed: "It is indispensable." Notwithstanding this inward comprehension, their outward relations of rank and authority remained unchanged. For the garde spoke in a lower tone than the commissaire, and was a trifle shorter and walked behind him. The commissaire was polished, important, fluent; he consulted himself, ruminated, talked to himself, and smacked his tongue; the garde was deferential, attentive, pensive and observing, and would utter an exclamation from time to time and scratch his nose. On the way, he inquired about the news, asked the commissaire's advice, and solicited his orders, while his superior questioned, meditated, and issued commands.

We had just come in sight of the first houses of the city, when we heard shrieks issue from one of them. The street was blocked by an excited crowd, and several persons rushed up to the commissaire and exclaimed: "Come, come quickly, Monsieur, they're having a fight! Two women are being killed!"

"By whom?"

"We don't know."

"Why?"

"They are bleeding."

"But with what?"

"With a rake."

"Where's the murderer?"

"One on the head and the other on the arm. Go in, they're waiting for you; the women are there."

So the commissaire went in and we followed. We heard sobs, screams, and excited conversation and saw a jostling, curious mob. People stepped on one another's toes, dug one another's ribs, cursed, and caused general confusion.

The commissaire got angry; but as he could not speak Breton, the garde got angry for him and chased the crowd out, taking each individual by his shoulders and shoving him through the door into the street.

When the room had been cleared of all except a dozen persons, we managed to discover in a corner, a piece of flesh hanging from an arm and a mass of black hair dripping with blood. An old woman and a young girl had been hurt in the fight. The old woman was tall and angular and had skin as yellow and wrinkled as parchment; she was standing up, groaning and holding her left arm with her right hand; she did not seem to be suffering much, but the girl was crying. She was sitting on a chair with her hands spread out on her knees and her head bent low; she was trembling convulsively and shaking with low sobs. As they replied by complaints to all our questions, and as the testimony of the witnesses was conflicting, we could not ascertain who had started the fight or what it was about. Some said that a husband had surprised his wife; others, that the women had started the row and that the owner of the house had tried to kill them in order to make them stop. But no one knew anything definite. M. le commissaire was greatly perplexed and the garde perfectly nonplussed.

As the doctor was away, and as it might be that the good people did not wish his services, because it meant expense, we had the audacity to offer the help of our limited knowledge and rushed off for our satchels, a piece of cerecloth, and some linen and lint which we had brought with us in anticipation of possible accidents.

It would really have been an amusing sight for our friends, had they been able to see us spread out our bistoury, our pincers, and three pairs of scissors, one with gold branches, on the table of this hut. The commissaire praised our philanthropy, the women watched us in awed silence, and the tallow candle melted and ran down the iron candlestick in spite of the efforts of the garde, who kept trimming the wick with his fingers. We attended to the old woman first. The cut had been given conscientiously; the bare arm showed the bone, and a triangle of flesh about four inches long hung over it like a cuff. We tried to put this back in its place by adjusting it carefully over the edge of the gaping wound and bandaging the arm. It is quite possible that the violent compression the member was subjected to caused mortification to set in, and that the patient may have died.

We did not know exactly what ailed the girl. The blood trickled through her hair, but we could not see whence it came; it formed oily blotches all over it and ran down into her neck. The garde, our interpreter, bade her remove the cotton band she wore on her head, and her tresses tumbled down in a dull, dark mass and uncoiled like a cascade full of bloody threads. We parted the thick, soft, abundant locks, and found a swelling as large as a nut and pierced by an oval hole on the back of her head. We shaved the surrounding parts; and after we had washed and stanching the wound, we melted some tallow and spread it over some lint, which we adapted to the swelling with strips of diachylum. Over this we placed first a bandage, then the cotton band, and then the cap. While this was taking place, the justice of the peace arrived. The first thing he did was to ask for the rake, and the only thing he seemed to care about was to examine it. He took hold of the handle, counted the teeth, waved it in the air, tested the iron and bent the wood.

"Is this," he demanded, "the instrument with which the assault was committed? Jérôme, are you sure it is?"

"They say so, Monsieur."

"You were not present, Monsieur le commissaire?"

"No, Monsieur le juge de paix."

"I would like to know whether the blows were really dealt with a rake or whether they were given with a blunt instrument. Who is the assailant? And did the rake belong to him or to some one else? Was it really with this that these women were hurt? Or was it, I repeat, with a blunt instrument? Do they wish to lodge a complaint? What do you think about it, Monsieur le commissaire?"

The victims said little, remarking only that they suffered great pain; so they were given over night to decide whether or not they wished to seek redress by law. The young girl could hardly speak, and the old woman's ideas were muddled, seeing that she was drunk, according to what the neighbours intimated, — a fact which explained her insensibility when we had endeavoured to relieve her suffering.

After they had looked at us as keenly as they could in order to ascertain who we were, the authorities of Pont-l'Abbé bade us good night and thanked us for the services we had rendered the community. We put our things back into our satchel, and the commissaire departed with the garde, the garde with his sword, and the justice of the peace with the rake.

CHAPTER VIII.

ROAMING.

En route! the sky is blue, the sun is shining, and our feet are eager to tread on the grass. From Crozon to Leudevenec the country is quite flat, and there is not a house nor a tree to be seen. As far as the eye can reach, reddish moss spreads over the ground. Sometimes fields of ripe wheat rise above the little stunted sea-rushes. The latter are flowerless now, and look as they did before the springtime. Deep wagon-tracks, edged by rolls of dried mud, make their appearance and continue for a long time; then they suddenly describe a bend and are lost to the eye. Grass grows in large patches between these sunken furrows. The wind whistles over the flats; we walk on; a welcome breeze dries the beads of perspiration on our cheeks, and when we halted we were able to hear, above the sound of our beating arteries, the rustling of the wind in the grass.

From time to time, a mill with rapidly revolving wheels would rise up and point the way. The creaking wooden fans descended, grazed the ground and then rose. Standing erect in the open garret-window, the miller watched us pass.

We walked on; coming to a hedge of elm-trees which probably concealed a village, we caught sight of a man standing in a tree, at the foot of which was a woman with her blue apron spread out to catch the plums he was throwing to her. I recollect a crop of dark hair falling in masses over her shoulders, two uplifted arms, the movement of the supple neck and the sonorous laughter that floated over the hedge to me.

The path we were following grew narrower. Presently the plain disappeared and we found ourselves on the crest of a promontory dominating the ocean. Looking towards Brest, it seemed to extend indefinitely; but on the other side, it projected its sinuosities into the land, between short hills covered with underwood. Each gulf is ensconced between two mountains; each mountain is flanked by two gulfs, and nothing can equal the beauty of those vast green slopes rising almost in a straight line out of the sea. The hills have rounded tops and flattened bases, and describe a wide, curved chain which joins the plateaux with the graceful sweep of a Moorish arch; following so closely upon one another, the colour of their foliage and their formation are almost exactly alike. Propelled by the sea-breeze, the breakers dashed up against the foot of these hills, and the sun, falling on them, made them gleam; the whole surface of the ocean was blue and glittering with silver, and we could not get enough of its beauty. Then we watched the sunbeams glide over the hills. One of the latter had already been deserted by them, and appeared more indistinct than the rest, while a broad black shadow was rapidly gathering over another. As we approached the level of the shore the mountains that faced us a moment ago seemed to grow loftier; the gulfs deepened and the ocean expanded. We walked on, oblivious to everything, and let our eyes roam at will, and the pebbles that our feet dislodged rolled down the hill quickly and disappeared in the bushes edging the road.

The roads followed hedges that were as compact and thick as walls; we climbed up and we climbed down; meanwhile, it was growing dark, and the country was settling into the deep silence characteristic of midsummer evenings.

As we failed to meet anybody who could show us the way, the few peasants we had questioned having responded by unintelligible cries, we produced our map and our compass, and, locating ourselves by the setting sun, we resolved to head straight for Daoulas. Instantly our vigour returned, and we started across the fields, vaulting fences and ditches, and uprooting, tearing and breaking everything in our way, without giving a thought to the stiles we left open or the damaged crops.

At the top of a slope, we discovered the village of l'Hôpital lying in a meadow watered by a stream. A bridge spans the latter and on this bridge is a mill; beyond the meadow is a hill, which we started to climb nimbly, when suddenly we saw, by a ray of light, a beautiful yellow and black salamander creeping along the edge of a ditch with its slender tail dragging in the dust and undulating with every motion of its speckled body. It had come from its retreat under a big stone covered with moss, and was hunting insects in the rotten trunks of old oak-trees.

A pavement of uneven cobblestones echoed beneath our feet, and a street stretched out before us. We had arrived in Daoulas. There was light enough to enable us to distinguish a square sign swinging on an iron rod on one of the houses. We should have recognised the inn even without the sign, as houses, like men, have their professions stamped on their faces. So we entered, for we were ravenous, and told the host above all things not to keep us waiting.

While we were sitting in front of the door, waiting for our dinner, a little girl in rags came along with a basket of strawberries on her head. She entered the inn and came out again after a short while, holding a big loaf of bread in both hands. Uttering shrill cries, she scampered off with the alertness of a kitten. Her dusty hair fluttered in the wind and stood out straight from her wizened face, and her bare legs, which she lifted high in the air when running, disappeared under the rags that covered her form.

After our meal, which comprised, besides the unavoidable omelet and the fatal veal, the strawberries the little girl had brought, we went up to our rooms.

The winding staircase with its worm-eaten steps groaned beneath our weight, like a sensitive woman under a new disillusion. At the top was a room with a door that closed on the outside with a hook. We slept there. The plaster on the once yellow walls was crumbling away; the beams of the ceiling bent beneath the weight of the slated roof, and on the window-panes was a layer of dust that softened the light like a piece of unpolished glass. The beds, four walnut boards carelessly put together, had big, round, worm-eaten knobs, and the wood was split by the dryness. On each bed was a mattress and a matting, covered with a ragged green spread. A piece of mirror in a varnished frame, an old game-bag on a nail, and a worn silk cravat which showed the crease of its folds, indicated that the room belonged to some one who probably slept there every night.

Under one of the red cotton pillows I discovered a hideous object, a cap of the same color as the coverlet, but coated with a greasy glazing which prevented its texture from being recognisable; a worn, shapeless, clammy, oily thing. I am sure that its owner prizes it highly and that he finds it warmer than any other cap. A man's life, the perspiration of an entire existence, is secreted in this layer of mouldy cerate. How many nights it must have taken to make it so thick! How many nightmares have galloped under this cap? How many dreams have been dreamed beneath it? And charming ones, too, perhaps, — why not?

If you are neither an engineer, nor a blacksmith, nor a builder, Brest will not interest you very much. The port is magnificent, I admit; beautiful, if you say so; gigantic, if you wish. It is imposing, you know, and gives the impression of a powerful nation. But those piles of cannons and anchors and cannon-balls, the infinite extension of those quays, which enclose a calm, flat sea that appears to be chained down, and those big workshops filled with grinding machinery, the never-ceasing clanking of galley chains, the convicts who pass by in regular gangs and work in silence, — this entire, pitiless, frightful, forced mechanism, this organized defiance, quickly disgusts the soul and tires the eye. The latter can rest only on cobblestones, shells, piles of iron, madriers, dry docks containing the naked hulls of vessels, and the grey walls of the prison, where a man leans out of the windows and tests the iron bars with a hammer.

Nature is absent and more completely banished from this place, than from any other spot on the face of the earth; everywhere can be seen denial and hatred of it, as much in the crowbar which demolishes the rocks, as in the sabre of the garde-chiourme who watches over the convicts.

Outside of the arsenal and the penitentiary, there is nothing but barracks, corps-de-garde, fortifications, ditches, uniforms, bayonets, sabres and drums. From morning until night, military music sounds under your windows, soldiers pass through the streets, come, go, and drill; the bugle sounds incessantly and the troops file past. You understand at once that the arsenal constitutes the real city and that the other is completely swallowed up by it. Everywhere and in every form reappear discipline, administration, ruled paper. Factitious symmetry and idiotic cleanliness are much admired. In the navy hospital for instance, the floors are so highly polished that a convalescent trying to walk on his mended leg would probably fall and break the other. But it looks nice. Between each ward is a yard, but the sun never shines in it, and the grass is carefully kept out. The kitchens are beautiful, but are situated so far from the main building that in winter the food must be cold before it reaches the patients. But who cares about them? Aren't the saucepans like polished suns? We saw a man who had broken his skull in falling from a vessel, and who for eighteen hours had received no medical assistance whatsoever; but his sheets were immaculate, for the linen department is very well kept.

In the prison ward I was moved like a child by the sight of a litter of kittens playing on a convict's bed. He made them little paper balls, and they would chase them all over the bed-spread, and cling to its edges with their claws. Then he would turn them over, stroke them, kiss them and cuddle them to his heart. More than once, when he is put back to work and sits tired and depressed on his bench, he will dream of the quiet hours he spent alone with the little animals, and of the softness of their fur on his rough hands and the warmth of their little bodies against his breast. I believe, though, that the rules forbid this kind of recreation and that probably he had them through the kindness of the sister in charge.

But here, as well as elsewhere, rules have their exceptions, for, in the first place, the distinction of caste does not disappear (equality being a lie, even in the penitentiary). Delicately scented locks sometimes show beneath the numbered caps, just as the sleeve of the red blouse often reveals a cuff surrounding a well-kept hand. Moreover, special favours are shown toward certain professions, certain men. How have they been able, in spite of the law and the jealousy of their fellow-prisoners, to attain this eccentric position which makes them almost amateur convicts, and keep it without anybody trying to wrest it from them? At the entrance to the workshop, where boats are built, you will find a dentist's table filled with instruments. In a pretty frame on the wall, rows of plates are exhibited, and when you pass, the artist utters a little speech to advertise his ability. He stays in his place all day, polishing his instruments and stringing teeth; he can talk to visitors without feeling the restraint of being watched, be informed of what is going on in the medical world, and practise his profession like a licensed dentist. At the present time, I daresay, he must use ether. More than that, he may have pupils and give lectures. But the man who has the most enviable position of all is the curé Delacollonge. He is the mediator between the convicts and the ban; the authorities use his ascendancy over the prisoners, and they, in turn, address themselves to him when they want to obtain any favours.

He lives apart from the rest of them in a neat little room, has a man to wait on him, eats big bowls of Plougastel strawberries, takes his coffee and reads the newspapers.

If Delacollonge is the head of the penitentiary, Ambroise is its arm. Ambroise is a superb negro almost six feet tall, who would have made a fine servant for a sixteenth century man of quality. Heliogobalus must have kept some such fellow to furnish amusement for himself and his guests by strangling lions and fighting gladiators single-handed. His polished skin is quite black, with steely reflections; his body is well knit and as vigorous as a tiger's, and his teeth are so white that they almost frighten one.

King of the penitentiary by right of strength, all the convicts fear and admire him; his athletic reputation compels him to test every newcomer, and up to the present time, all these contests have turned out in his favour. He can bend iron rods over his knee, carry three men with one hand, and knock down eight by opening his arms; he eats three times as much as an ordinary man, for he has an enormous appetite and a heroic constitution.

When we saw him, he was watering the plants in the botanical garden. He is always hanging around the hot-house behind the plants and the palm-trees, digging the soil and cleansing the wood-work.

On Thursday, when the public is admitted, Ambroise receives his mistresses behind the boxed orange-trees; he has several of them, in fact, more than he wishes. He knows how to procure them, whether by his charms, his strength or his money, which he always carries in quantities about his person and spends lavishly whenever he wishes to enjoy himself. So he is very popular among a certain class of women, and the people who have put him where he is, have never perhaps been loved as much as Ambroise.

In the middle of the garden, in a little lake shaded by a willow-tree and bordered by plants, is a swan. With one stroke of its leg it can swim from one side of the pond to the other, and although it crosses it a hundred times a day and catches gold fishes to while away the time, it never thinks of wandering away.

Further on, in a line against the wall, are some cages for rare animals from foreign lands destined for the Museum of Paris. Most of the cages, however, were empty. In front of one, in a narrow grated yard, a convict was teaching a young wild-cat to obey commands like a dog. Hasn't this man had enough of slavery himself? Why does he torment this poor little beast? The lashes with which he is threatened he gives the wild-cat, which, some day, will probably take its revenge by jumping over the iron railing and killing the swan.

One moonlit evening, we decided to take a stroll through the streets known to be frequented by filles de joie. They are very numerous. The navy, the artillery, the infantry, each has its own particular streets, without mentioning the penitentiary, which covers a whole district of the city. Seven parallel streets ending at its walls, compose what is called Keravel, and are filled by the mistresses of jailers and convicts. They are old frame houses, crowded together, with every door and window closed tight. No sound issues from them, nobody is seen coming out, and there are no lights in the windows; at the end of each street is a lamp-post which the wind sways from side to side, thus making its long yellow rays oscillate on the sidewalk. The rest of the quarter is in absolute darkness. In the moonlight, these silent houses with their uneven roofs projected fantastic glimmerings.

When do they open? At unknown hours, at the most silent time of the darkest nights. Then comes the jailer who has slipped away from his watch, or the convict who has managed to escape from the prison, though sometimes they arrive together, aiding and abetting each other; then, when daylight dawns, the jailer turns his head away and nobody is the wiser.

In the sailor's district, on the contrary, everything is open and above-board. The disreputable houses are full of noise and light; there is dancing and shouting and fighting. On the ground floors, in the low rooms, women in filmy attire sit on the benches that line the white-washed walls lighted by an oil lamp; others, in the doorway, beckon to you, and their animated faces stand out in relief on the background of the lighted resort, from which issues the sound of clinking glasses and coarse caresses. You can hear the kisses which fall on the opulent shoulders of the women and the laughter of the girl who is sitting on some tanned sailor's lap, her unruly locks slipping from under her cap and her bare shoulders issuing from her chemise. The street is thronged, the place is packed, the door is wide open, anybody who wishes may go in. Men come and peep through the windows or talk in an undertone to some half-clad creature, who bends eagerly over their faces. Groups stand around and wait their turn. It is all quite informal and unrestrained.

Being conscientious travellers, and desiring to see and study everything at close range, we entered.

In a room papered in red, three or four girls were sitting at a round table, and a man with a cap on his head and a pipe in his mouth was reclining on the sofa; he bowed politely when we entered. The women wore Parisian dresses and were modest in their demeanour. The mahogany furniture was covered with red plush, the floor was polished and engravings of battles decorated the walls. O Virtue! you are beautiful, for very stupid is vice. The woman who was sitting by my side had hands which were sufficient in themselves to make a man forget her sex, and not knowing how to spend our time we treated the whole company to drinks. Then I lighted a cigar, stretched out on the divan, and, sad and depressed, while the voices of the women rose shrilly and the glasses were being drained, I said to myself:

Where is she? Where can she be? Is she dead to the world, and will men never see her again?

She was beautiful, in olden times, when she walked up the steps leading to the temple, when on her shell-like feet fell the golden fringe of her tunic, or when she lounged among Persian cushions, twirling her collar of cameos and chatting with the wise men and the philosophers.

She was beautiful when she stood naked on the threshold of her cella in the street of Suburra, under the rosin torchlight that blazed in the night, slowly chanting her Campanian lay, while from the Tiber came the refrains of the orgies.

She was beautiful, too, in her old house of the Cité behind the Gothic windows, among the noisy students and dissipated monks, when, without fear of the sergeants, they struck the oaken tables with their pewter mugs, and the worm-eaten beds creaked beneath the weight of their bodies.

She was beautiful when she leaned over the green cloth and coveted the gold of the provincials; then she wore high heels and had a small waist and a large wig which shed its perfumed powder on her shoulders, a rose over her ear and a patch on her cheek.

She was beautiful also among the goat-skins of the Cossacks and the English uniforms, pushing her way through the throngs of men and letting her bare shoulders dazzle them on the steps of the gambling houses, under the jewellers' windows, beneath the lights of the cafés, between starvation and wealth.

What are you regretting? I am regretting the fille de joie.

On the boulevard, one evening, I caught a glimpse of her as she passed under the gaslight, with watchful and eager eyes, dragging her feet over the sidewalk. I saw her pale face on the street-corner, while the rain wet the flowers in her hair, and heard her soft voice calling to the men, while her flesh shivered in her low-necked bodice.

It was her last day; after that she disappeared.

Fear not that she will ever return, for she is dead, quite dead! Her dress is made high, she has morals, objects to coarse language, and puts the sous she earns in a savings bank.

Cleared of her presence, the street has lost the only poetry it still retained; they have filtered the gutter and sorted the garbage.

In a little while, the mountebanks will also have disappeared, in order to make room for magnetic séances and reform banquets, and the rope-dancer with her spangled skirt and long balancing-pole will be as remote from us as the bayadère of the Ganges.

Of all that beautiful, glittering world as flighty as fancy itself, so melancholy and sonorous, so bitter and yet so gay, full of inward pathos and glaring sarcasms, where misery was warm and grace was sad, the last vestige of a lost age, a distant race, which, we are told, came from the other end of the earth and brought us in the tinkling of its bells the echo and vague memory of idolised joys; some covered wagon moving slowly along the road, with rolled tents on its roof and muddy dogs beneath it, a man in a yellow jacket, selling muscade in tin cups, the poor marionnettes in the Champs-Élysées, and the mandolin players who visit the cafés in the outskirts of the city, are all that is left.

Since then, it is true, we have had a number of farces of a higher class of humour. But is the new as good as the old? Do you prefer Tom Thumb or the Museum of Versailles?

On a wooden stand that formed a balcony around a square tent of grey canvas, a man in a blouse was beating a drum; behind him was a big painted sign representing a sheep and a cow, and some ladies, gentlemen, and soldiers. The animals were the two young phenomena from Guérande, with one arm and four shoulders. Their exhibitor, or editor, was shouting himself hoarse and announcing that besides these two beautiful things, battles between wild beasts would take place at once. Under the wooden stand stood a donkey and three bears, and the barking of the dogs, which proceeded from the interior of the tent, mingled with the beating of the drum, the shouts of the owner of the two phenomena and the cries of another fellow who was not as jovial and fat as the former, but tall and lanky, with a funereal expression and ragged clothes. This was the partner; they had met on the road and had combined their shows. The lean one contributed his bears, his dogs and his donkey, while the fat man brought his two phenomena and a grey felt hat which was used in their performance.

The theatre was roofless and its walls were of grey canvas; they fluttered in the wind and would have blown down had it not been for the poles which held them. Along the sides of the ring was a railing, behind which was the audience, and in a reserved corner we perceived the two phenomena nibbling at a bundle of hay half concealed by a gorgeous blanket. In the middle of the ring a high post was sunk in the ground, and here and there, attached to smaller posts, were dogs, barking and tugging at their chains. The men continued to shout and beat the drum, the bears growled, and the crowd began to file in.

First they brought out a poor, half-paralyzed bear, which seemed considerably bored. It wore a muzzle and had a big collar with an iron chain around its neck, a rope in its nose, to make it obey commands promptly, and a sort of leather hood over its ears. They tied bruin to the centre post, and the barks grew louder and fiercer. The dogs stood up, a bristling, scratching crew, their hind-quarters elevated, their snouts near the ground, their legs spread, while their masters stood in opposite corners of the ring and yelled at them in order to increase their ferocity. They let three bull-dogs go and the brutes rushed at the bear, which began to dodge around the post. The dogs followed, crowding and barking; sometimes the bear would upset them and trample them with its huge paws, but they would immediately scramble to their feet and make a dash for its head, clinging to its neck so that it was unable to shake off their wriggling bodies. With watchful eye, the two masters waited the moment when it looked as if the bear would be strangled; then they rushed at the dogs, tore them away, pulled their necks and bit their tails to make them unlock their jaws. The brutes whined with pain, but they would not let go. The bear struggled to free itself from the dogs, the dogs bit the bear, and the men bit the dogs. One young bull-dog especially, was remarkable for its ferocity; it clung to the bear's back and would not let go, though they chewed and bent its tail, and lacerated its ears. The men were compelled to get a mattock to loosen its jaws. When they had all been disentangled, everyone took a rest; the bear lay down on the ground, the gasping dogs hung their tongues out, and the perspiring men pulled the hairs from between their teeth, while the dust that had arisen during the fight scattered in the atmosphere and settled on the heads of the spectators.

Two more bears were led into the ring, and one acted the gardener of the fable, went on a hunting trip, waltzed, took off its hat, and played dead. After this performance came the donkey. But it defended itself well; its kicks sent the dogs flying through the air like balloons; with its tail between its legs and its ears back, it ran around the ring trying to get its foes under its forelegs while they endeavoured to run around it and fasten their teeth in its throat. When the men finally rescued it, it was completely winded and shaking with fright; it was covered with drops of blood which trickled down its legs (on which repeated wounds had left scars), and, mingling with sweat, moistened its worn hoofs.

But the best of the performance was the general fight between the dogs; all took part in it, the big and the little ones, the bull-dogs, the sheep-dogs, the white ones, the black ones, the spotted ones, and the russet variety. Fully fifteen minutes were spent in bringing them to the proper pitch of excitement. The owners held them between their legs and pointing their heads in the direction of their adversaries, would knock them together violently. The thin man, especially, worked with great gusto. With much effort he succeeded in producing a ferocious, hoarse chest-note that maddened the whole irritated pack. As serious as an orchestra leader, he would absorb the discordant harmony, and direct and strengthen its emission; but when the brutes were let loose and the howling band tore one another to pieces, he would be in a frenzy of enthusiasm and delight. He would applaud and bark and stamp his feet and imitate all the motions of the dogs; he would have enjoyed biting and being bitten, would gladly have been a dog himself with a snout, so that he could wallow in the dust and blood, and sink his teeth in the hairy skins and warm flesh, and enjoy the fray to his heart's content.

There was a critical moment when all the dogs, one on top of another, formed a wriggling mass of legs, backs, tails and ears, which oscillated to and fro in the ring without separating, and in another instant had torn down the railing and threatened to harm the two young phenomena. The owner's face paled and he hastily sprang forward, while his partner rushed to his side. Then tails were bitten, and kicks and blows were distributed right and left! They grabbed the dogs everywhere, pulled them away and flung them over their shoulders like bundles of hay. It was all over in a second, but I had seen the moment when the two young phenomena were near being reduced to chopped meat, and I trembled for the safety of the arm which grows on their back.

Flustered, no doubt, by their narrow escape, they did not care to be shown off. The cow backed and the sheep bucked; but finally the green blanket with yellow fringe was removed and their appendage was exhibited to the public, and then the performance ended....

CHAPTER IX.

BREST.

At the light-house of Brest. Here the Old World ends. This is its most advanced point; its farthest limit. Behind you spread Europe and Asia; before you lies the entire ocean. As great as space appears to our eye, does it not always seem limited as soon as we know that it has a boundary? Can you not see from our shores, across the Channel, the streets of Brighton and the fortresses of Provence; do you not always think of the Mediterranean as an immense blue lake ensconced in rocks, with promontories covered with falling monuments, yellow sands, swaying palm-trees and curved bays? But here nothing stops your eye. Thought can fly as rapidly as the winds, spread out, divagate, and lose itself, without finding anything but water, or perhaps vague America, nameless islands, or some country with red fruits, humming-birds and savages; or the silent twilight of the pole, with its spouting whales; or the great cities lighted by coloured glass, Japan with its porcelain roofs, and China with its sculptured staircases and its pagodas decorated with golden bells.

Thus does the mind people and animate this infinity, of which it tires so soon, in order that it may appear less vast. One cannot think of the desert without its caravans, of the ocean without its ships, of the bowels of the earth without evoking the treasures that they are supposed to conceal.

We returned to Conquet by way of the cliff. The breakers were dashing against its foot. Driven by a sea-breeze, they would come rushing in, strike the rocks and cover them with rippling sheets of water. Half an hour later, in a char-à-banc drawn by two sturdy little horses, we reached Brest, which we left with pleasure two days afterwards. When you leave the coast and approach the Channel, the country undergoes a marked change; it becomes less wild, less Celtic; the dolmens become scarcer, the flats diminish as the wheat fields grow more numerous, and, little by little, one reaches the fertile land of Léon, which is, as M. Pitre-Chevalier has gracefully put it, “the Attica of Brittany.”

Landerneau is a place where there is an elm-tree promenade, and where we saw a frightened dog running through the streets with a pan attached to its tail.

In order to go to the Château de la Joyeuse-Garde, one must first follow the banks of the Eilorn and then walk through a forest, in a hollow where few persons go. Sometimes, when the underwood thins out and meadows appear between the branches, one catches sight of a boat sailing up the river.

Our guide preceded us at quite a distance. Alone together we trod the good old earth, flecked with bunches of purple heather and fallen leaves. The air was perfumed with the breath of violets and strawberries; slender ferns spread over the trunks of the trees. It was warm; even the moss was hot. A cuckoo, hidden in the foliage, now and then gave out its long cry, and gnats buzzed in the glades. We walked on with a feeling of inward peace, and let our conversation touch on many subjects; we spoke of sounds and colours, of the masters and their works, and of the joys of the mind; we thought of different writings, of familiar pictures and poses; we recited aloud some wonderful verses, the beauty of which thrilled us so that we repeated the rhythm again and again, accentuating the words and cadencing them so that they were almost sung. Foreign landscapes and splendid figures rose before our mind's eye, and we dwelt with rapture on soft Asiatic nights with the moon shining on the cupolas; or our admiration was aroused by some sonorous name; or we delighted in the artlessness of some sentence standing out in relief in an ancient book.

Stretched out in the courtyard of Joyeuse-Garde, near the filled-up subterranean vaults, beneath the semi-circle of its unique ivy-covered arcade, we talked of Shakespeare and wondered whether the stars were inhabited.

Then we started off again, having given but a hasty glance at the crumbling home of good old Lancelot, the one a fairy stole from his mother and kept in a shining palace at the bottom of a lake. The dwarfs have disappeared, the drawbridge has flown away, and lizards now crawl where formerly the entrancing Geneviève dreamed of her lover gone to fight the giants in Trébizonde.

We went back through the same paths to the forest; the shadows were lengthening, the flowers and shrubs were hardly visible, and the blue peaks of the low mountains opposite seemed to grow taller against the fading sky. The river, which is bordered by artificial quays for half a mile outside the city, now becomes free to spread its waters at will over the meadow; its wide curve stretched far away into the distance, and the pools of water coloured by the setting sun looked like immense golden platters forgotten on the grass.

Till it reaches Roche-Maurice, the Eilorn follows the road, which winds around the foot of the rocky hills, the uneven eminences of which extend into the valley. We were riding in a gig driven by a boy who sat on one of the shafts. His hat had no strings and consequently blew off occasionally, and during his efforts to catch it, we had plenty of time to admire the landscape.

The Château de la Roche-Maurice is a real burgrave's castle, a vulture's nest on the top of a mountain. It is reached by an almost perpendicular slope along which great blocks of stone are strewn in place of steps. At the top is a wall built of huge stones laid one above another, and in the wall are large windows, through which the whole surrounding country can be viewed; the woods, the fields, the river, the long, white road, the mountains with their uneven peaks, and the great meadow, which separates them through the middle.

A crumbling flight of steps leads to a dilapidated tower. Here and there stones crop out among the grass, and the rock shows amid the stones. Sometimes it seems as if this rock assumed artificial shapes, and as if the ruins, on the contrary, by crumbling more and more, had taken on a natural appearance and gone back to original matter.

A whole side of the wall is covered with ivy; it begins at the bottom and spreads out in an inverted pyramid, the color of which grows darker towards the top. Through an aperture, the edges of which are concealed by the foliage, one can see a section of the blue sky.

It was in these parts that the famous dragon lived, which was killed in olden times by knight Derrien, who was returning from the Holy Land with his friend, Neventer. Derrien attacked it as soon as he had rescued the unfortunate Eilorn who, after giving over his slaves, his vassals and his servants (he had no one left but his wife and son), had thrown himself headlong from the top of the tower into the river; but the monster, mortally wounded, and bound by the sash of its conqueror, soon drowned itself in the sea, at Poulbeunzual, like the crocodile of Batz island, which obeyed the behest of Saint Pol de Léon and drowned itself with the stole of the Breton saint wound around it. The gargoyle of Rouen met a similar fate with the stole of Saint Romain.

How beautiful those terrific old dragons were, with their gaping, fire-spitting jaws, their scales, their serpent-tails, their bat-wings, their lion-claws, their equine bodies and fantastic heads! And the knight who overpowered them was a wonderfully fine specimen of manhood! First, his horse grew frightened and reared, and his lance broke on the scales of the monster, whose fiery breath blinded him. Finally he alighted, and after a day's battle, succeeded in sinking his sword up to the hilt in the beasts belly. Black blood flowed in streams from the wound, the audience escorted the knight home in triumph, and he became king and married a fair maiden.

But where did the dragons come from? Are they a confused recollection of the monsters that existed before the flood? Were they conceived from the contemplation of the carcasses of the ichthyosaurus and pteropod, and did the terror of men hear the sound of their feet in the tall grass and the wind howl when their voices filled the caves? Are we not, moreover, in the land of fairies, in the home of the Knights of the Round Table and of Merlin, in the mythological birthplace of vanished epopees? These, no doubt, revealed something of the old worlds which have become mythical, and told something of the cities that were swallowed up, of Is and Herbadilla, splendid and barbaric places, filled with the loves of their bewitching queens, but now doubly wiped out, first, by the ocean which has obliterated them and then by religion, which has cursed their memory.

There is much to be said on this subject. And, indeed, what is there on which much cannot be said? It might perhaps be Landivisian, for even the most prolix man is obliged to be concise in his remarks, when there is a lack of matter. I have noticed that good places are usually the ugliest ones. They are like virtuous women; one respects them, but one passes on in search of others. Here, surely, is the most productive spot of all Brittany; the peasants are not as poor as elsewhere, the fields are properly cultivated, the colza is superb, the roads are in good condition, and it is frightfully dreary.

Cabbages, turnips, beets and an enormous quantity of potatoes, all enclosed by ditches, cover the entire country from Saint Pol de Léon to Roscoff. They are forwarded to Brest, Rennes, and even to Havre; it is the industry of the place, and a large business is done with them.

Roscoff has a slimy beach and a narrow bay, and the surrounding sea is sprinkled with tiny black islands that rise like the backs of so many turtles.

The environs of Saint Pol are dreary and cheerless. The bleak tint of the flats mingles without transition with the paleness of the sky, and the short perspective has no large lines in its proportions, nor change of colour on the edges. Here and there, while strolling through the fields, you may come across some silent farm behind a grey stone wall, an abandoned manor deserted by its owners. In the yard the pigs are sleeping on the manure heap and the chickens are pecking at the grass that grows among the loose stones; the sculptured shield above the door has worn away under the action of rain and atmosphere. The rooms are empty and are used for storage purposes; the plaster on the ceiling is peeling off, and so are the remaining decorations, which, besides, have been tarnished by the cobwebs of the spiders one sees crawling around the joists. Wild mignonette has grown on the door of Kersa-lion; near the turret is a pointed window flanked by a lion and a Hercules, which stand out in bold relief on the wall like two gargoyles. At Kerland, I stumbled against a wolf-trap while I was ascending the large winding staircase. Ploughshares, rusted shovels, and jars filled with dried grain were scattered around the rooms or on the wide stone window-seats.

Kerouséré has retained its three turrets with machicolations; in the courtyard can still be seen the deep furrows of the trenches that have been filled up little by little, and are now on level with the ground; they are like the track of a bark, which spreads and spreads over the water till it finally disappears. From the platform of one of the towers (the others have pointed roofs), one can see the ocean between two low, wooded hills. The windows on the first floor are half stopped up, so as to keep the rain out; they look out into a garden enclosed by a high wall. The grass is covered with thistles and wheat grows in the flower-beds surrounded by rose-bushes.

A narrow path wends its way between a field where the ripe wheat sways in the breeze and a line of elm-trees growing on the edge of a ditch. Poppies gleamed here and there amongst the wheat; the ditch was edged with flowers, brambles, nettles, sweet-brier, long prickly stems, broad shining leaves, blackberries and purple digitalis, all of which mingled their colours and various foliage and uneven branches, and crossed their shadows on the grey dust like the meshes of a net.

When you have crossed a meadow where an old mill reluctantly turns its clogged wheel, you follow the wall by stepping on large stones placed in the water for a bridge; you soon come to the road that leads to Saint-Pol, at the end of which rises the slashed steeple of Kreisker; tall and slender, it dominates a tower decorated with a balustrade and produces a fine effect at a distance; but the nearer one gets to it, the smaller and uglier it becomes, till finally one finds that it is nothing more than an ordinary church with a portal devoid of statues. The cathedral also is built in a rather clumsy Gothic style, and is overloaded with ornaments and embroideries: but there is one notable thing, at least, in Saint-Pol, and that is the table d'hôte of the inn.

The girl who waits on it has gold earrings dangling against her white neck and a cap with turned up wings, like Molière's soubrettes, and her sparkling blue eyes would incline anyone to ask her for something more than mere plates. But the guests! What guests! All habitués! At the upper end sat a creature in a velvet jacket and a cashmere waistcoat. He tied his napkin around the bottles that had been uncorked, in order to be able to distinguish them. He ladled the soup. On his left, sat a man in a light grey frock-coat, with the cuffs and collar trimmed with a sort of curly material representing fur; he ate with his hat on and was the professor of music at the local college. But he has grown tired of his profession and is anxious to find some place that would bring him from eight to twelve hundred francs at the most. He does not care so much about the salary, what he desires is the consideration that attaches to such a place. As he was always late, he requested that the courses be brought up again from the kitchen, and if he did not like them, he would send them back untouched; he sneezed and expectorated and rocked his chair and hummed and leaned his elbows on the table and picked his teeth.

Everybody respects him, the waitress admires everything he says, and is, I am sure, in love with him. The high opinion he has of himself shows in his smile, his speech, his gestures, his silence, and in his way of wearing his hair; it emanates from his entire obnoxious personality.

Opposite to us sat a grey-haired, plump man with red hands and thick, moist lips, who looked at us so persistently and annoyingly, while he masticated his food, that we felt like throwing the carafes at him. The other guests were insignificant and only contributed to the picture.

One evening the conversation fell upon a woman of the environs who had left her husband and gone to America with her lover, and who, the previous week, and passed through Saint-Pol on her way home, and had stopped at the inn. Everybody wondered at her audacity, and her name was accompanied by all sorts of unflattering epithets. Her whole life was passed in review by these people, and they all laughed contemptuously and insulted her and grew quite hot over the argument. They would have liked to have her there to tell her what they thought of her and see what she would say. Tirades against luxury, virtuous horror, moral maxims, hatred of wealth, words with a double meaning, shrugs, everything, in fact, was used to crush this woman, who, judging by the ferocity these ruffians displayed in their attacks, must have been pretty, refined, and charming. Our hearts beat indignantly in our breasts, and if we had taken another meal in Saint-Pol, I am sure that something would have happened.

CHAPTER X.

SAINT-MALO.

Saint-Malo, which is built right on the ocean and is enclosed by ramparts, looks like a crown of stones, the gems of which are the machicolations. The breakers dash against its walls, and when the tide is low they gently unfurl on the sand. Little rocks covered with seaweed dot the beach and look like black spots on its light surface. The larger ones, which are upright and smooth, support the fortifications, thus making them appear higher than they really are.

Above this straight line of walls, broken here and there by a tower or the pointed ogive of a door, rise the roofs of the houses with their open garret-windows, their gyrating weather-cocks, and their red chimneys from which issue spirals of bluish smoke that vanishes in the air.

Around Saint-Malo are a number of little barren islands that have not a tree nor a blade of grass, but only some old crumbling walls, great pieces of which are hurled into the sea by each succeeding storm.

On the other side of the bay, opposite the city and connected with dry land by a long pier, which separates the port from the ocean, is Saint-Servan, a large, empty, almost deserted locality, which lies peacefully in a marshy meadow. At the entrance to Saint-Servan rise the four towers of the Château de Solidor, which are connected by curtains and are perfectly black from top to bottom. These alone are sufficient compensation for having made that extended circuit on the beach, under the broiling July sun, among the dock-yards and tar-pots and fires.

A walk around the city, over the ramparts, is one of the finest that can be taken. Nobody goes there. You can sit down in the embrasures of the cannons and dangle your feet over the abyss. In front of you lies the mouth of the Rance, which flows between two green hills, the coast, the islands, the rocks, and the ocean. The sentinel marches up and down behind you, and his even footsteps echo on the sonorous stones.

One evening we remained out for a long time. The night was beautiful, a true summer night, without a moon, but brilliant with stars and perfumed by the sea-breeze. The city was sleeping. One by one the lights went out in the windows, and the lighthouses shone red in the darkness, which was quite blue above us and glittering with myriads of twinkling stars. We could not see the ocean, but we could hear and smell it, and the breakers that lashed the walls flung drops of foam over us through the big apertures of the machicolations.

In one place, between the wall and the city houses, a quantity of cannon-balls are piled up in a ditch. From that point you can see these words written on the second floor of one of the dwellings:
“Chateaubriand was born here.”

Further on, the wall ends at the foot of a tower called Quiquengrogne; like its sister, La Générale, it is high, broad, and imposing, and is swelled in the middle like a hyperbola.

Though they are as good as new and absolutely intact, these towers would no doubt be improved if they lost some of their battlements in the sea and if ivy spread its kindly leaves over their tops. Indeed, do not monuments grow greater through recollection, like men and like passions? And are they not completed by death?

We entered the castle. The empty courtyard planted with a few sickly lime-trees was as silent as the courtyard of a monastery. The janitress went and obtained the keys from the commander. When she returned, she was accompanied by a pretty little girl who wished to see the strangers. Her arms were bare and she carried a large bunch of flowers. Her black curls escaped from beneath her dainty little cap, and the lace on her pantalettes rubbed against her kid shoes tied around the ankles with black laces. She ran up stairs in front of us beckoning and calling.

The staircase is long, for the tower is high. The bright daylight passes through the loop-holes like an arrow. When you put your head through one of these openings, you can see the ocean, which seems to grow wider and wider, and the crude colour of the sky, which seems to grow larger and larger, till you are afraid you will lose yourself in it. Vessels look like launches and their masts like walking-sticks. Eagles must think we look like ants. I wonder whether they really see us. Do they know that we have cities and steeples and triumphal arches?

When we arrived on the platform, and although the battlement reached to our chest, we could not help experiencing the sensation one always feels at a great height from the earth. It is a sort of voluptuous uneasiness mingled with fear and delight, pride and terror, a battle between one's mind and one's nerves. You feel strangely happy; you would like to jump, fly, spread out in the air and be supported by the wind; but your knees tremble and you dare not go too near the edge.

Still, one night, in olden times, men climbed this tower with ropes. But then, it is not astonishing for those times, for that wonderful sixteenth century, the epoch of fierce convictions and frantic loves! How the human instrument vibrated then in all its chords! How liberal-minded, productive, and active men were! Does not this phrase of Fénelon apply wonderfully well to that period: "A sight well calculated to delight the eye?" For, without making any reference to the foreground of the picture, — beliefs crumbling at their foundation like tottering mountains, newly discovered worlds, lost worlds brought to light again, Michael-Angelo beneath his dome, laughing Rabelais, observant Shakespeare, pensive Montaigne, — where can be found a greater development in passions, a greater violence in courage, a greater determination in willpower, in fine, a more complete expansion of liberty struggling against all native fatalities? And with what a bold relief the episode stands out in history, and still, how wonderfully well it fits in, thereby giving a glimpse of the dazzling brightness and broad horizons of the period. Faces, living faces, pass before your eyes. You meet them only once; but you think of them long afterwards, and endeavour to contemplate them in order that they may be impressed more deeply upon your mind. Was not the type of the old soldiers whose race disappeared around 1598, at the taking of Vervins, fine and terrible? It was a type represented by men like Lamouche, Heurtand de Saint-Offange, and La Tremblaye, who came back holding the heads of his enemies in his hand; also La Fontenelle, of whom so much has been said. They were men of iron, whose hearts were no softer than their swords, and who, attracting hundreds of energies which they directed with their own, entered towns at night, galloping madly at the heads of their companies, equipped corsairs, burned villages, and were dealt with like kings! Who has thought of depicting those violent governors of the provinces, who slaughtered the people recklessly, committed rapes and swept in gold, like D'Epernon, an atrocious tyrant in Provence and a perfumed courtier at the Louvre; like Montluc, who strangled Huguenots with his own hands, or Baligui, the king of Cambrai, who read Machiavel in order to copy the Valentinois, and whose wife went to war on horseback, wearing a helmet and a cuirass.

One of the forgotten men of the period, or at least one of those whom most historians mention only slightly, is the Duke of Mercœur, the intrepid enemy of Henri IV, who defied him longer than Mayenne, the Ligue, and Philip II. Finally he was disarmed, that is, won over and appeased (by terms that were such that twenty-three articles of the treaty were not disclosed); then, not knowing what to do, he enlisted in the Hungarian army and fought the Turks. One day, with five thousand men, he attacked a whole army, and, beaten again, returned to France and died of the fever in Nuremberg, at the age of forty-four.

Saint-Malo put me in mind of him. He always tried to get it, but he never could succeed in making it his subject or his ally. They wished to fight on their own account, and to do business through their own resources, and although they were really ligueurs, they spurned the duke as well as the Béarnais.

When De Fontaines, the governor of the city, informed them of the death of Henri III, they refused to recognize the King of Navarre. They armed themselves and erected barricades; De Fontaines intrenched himself in the castle and everybody kept upon the defensive. Little by little, the people encroached upon him; first, they requested him to declare that he was willing to maintain their franchises. De Fontaines complied in the hope of gaining time. The following year (1589), they chose four generals who were independent of the governor. A year later, they obtained permission to stretch chains. De Fontaines acceded to everything. The king was at Laval and he was waiting for him. The time was close at hand when he would be able to take revenge for all the humiliations he had suffered, and all the concessions he had been forced to make. But he precipitated matters and was discovered. When the people of Saint-Malo reminded him of his promises, he replied that if the king presented himself, he (De Fontaines) would let him enter the city. When they learned this, they decided to act.

The castle had four towers. It was the highest one, La Générale, the one on which De Fontaines relied the most, which they climbed. These bold attempts were not infrequent, as proved by the ascension of the cliffs of Fécamp by Bois-Rosé, and the attack of the Château de Blein, by Guebriant.

The rebels connived and assembled during several evenings at the place of a certain man named Frotet, sieur de La Lanbelle; they entered into an understanding with a Scotch gunner, and one dark night they armed themselves, went out to the rampart, let themselves down with ropes and approached the foot of La Générale.

There they waited. Soon a rustling sound was heard on the wall, and a ball of thread was lowered, to which they fastened their rope ladder. The ladder was then hoisted to the top of the tower and attached to the end of a culverin which was levelled in an embrasure of the battlement.

Michel Frotet was the first to ascend, and after him came Charles Anselin, La Blissais and the others. The night was dark and the wind whistled; they had to climb slowly, to hold their daggers between their teeth and feel for the rungs of the ladder with their hands and feet. Suddenly (they were midway between the ground and the top), they felt themselves going down; the rope had slipped. But they did not utter a sound; they remained motionless. Their weight had caused the culverin to tip forward; it stopped on the edge of the embrasure and they slowly resumed their ascension and arrived one after another on the platform of the tower.

The sleepy sentinels did not have time to give the alarm. The garrison was either asleep or playing dice on the drums. A panic seized the soldiers and they fled to the dungeon. The conspirators pursued them and attacked them in the hallways, on the staircase, and in the rooms, crushing them between the doors and slaughtering them mercilessly. Meanwhile the townspeople arrived to lend assistance; some put up ladders, and entered the tower without encountering any resistance and plundered it. La Pérandière, lieutenant of the castle, perceiving La Blissais, said to him: "This, sir, is a most miserable night." But La Blissais impressed upon him that this was not the time for conversation. The Count of Fontaines had not made his appearance. They went in search of him, and found him lying dead across the threshold of his chamber, pierced by a shot from an arquebuse that one of the townspeople had fired at him, as he was about to go out, escorted by a servant bearing a light. "Instead of rushing to face the danger," says the author of this account, "he had dressed as leisurely as if he were going to a wedding, without leaving one shoulder-knot untied."

This outbreak in Saint-Malo, which so greatly harmed the king, did not in the least benefit the Duke de Mercœur. He had hoped that the people would accept a governor from his hands, his son, for example, a mere child, for that would have meant himself, but they obstinately refused to listen to it. He sent troops to protect them, but they refused to let them enter, and the soldiers were compelled to take lodgings outside of the city.

Still, in spite of all this, they had not become more royalist, for some time later, having arrested the Marquis of La Noussaie and the Viscount of Denoual, it cost the former twelve thousand crowns to get out of prison and the latter two thousand.

Then, fearing that Pont-Brient would interrupt commercial relations with Dinan and the other cities in the Ligue, they attacked and subjected it.

Presuming that their bishop, who was the temporal master of the city, might be likely to deprive them of the freedom they had just acquired, they put him in prison and kept him there for a year.

The conditions at which they finally accepted Henri IV are well-known: they were to take care of themselves, not be obliged to receive any garrison, be exempt from taxes for six years, etc.

Situated between Brittany and Normandy, this little people seems to have the tenacity and granite-like resistance of the former and the impulses and dash of the latter. Whether they are sailors, writers, or travellers on foreign seas, their predominant trait is audacity; they have violent natures which are almost poetical in their brutality, and often narrow in their obstinacy. There is this resemblance between these two sons of Saint-Malo, Lamennais and Broussais: they were always equally extreme in their systems and employed their latter years in fighting what they had upheld in the earlier part of their life.

In the city itself are little tortuous streets edged with high houses and dirty fishmongers' shops. There are no carriages or luxuries of any description; everything is as black and reeking as the hold of a ship. A sort of musty smell, reminiscent of Newfoundland, salt meat, and long sea voyages pervades the air.

“The watch and the round are made every night with big English dogs, which are let loose outside of the city by the man who is in charge of them, and it is better not to be in their vicinity at that time. But when morning comes, they are led back to a place in the city where they shed all their ferocity which, at night, is so great.”

Barring the disappearance of this four-legged police which at one time devoured M. du Mollet, the existence of which is confirmed by a contemporaneous text, the exterior of things has changed but little, no doubt, and even the civilized people living in Saint-Malo admit that it is very much behind the times.

The only picture we noticed in the church is a large canvas that represents the battle of Lepante and is dedicated to Nôtre-Dame des Victoires, who can be seen floating above the clouds. In the foreground, all Christianity, together with crowned kings and princesses, is kneeling. The two armies can be seen in the background. The Turks are being hurled into the sea and the Christians stretch their arms towards heaven.

The church is ugly, has no ornamentation, and looks almost like a Protestant house of worship. I noticed very few votive offerings, a fact that struck me as being rather peculiar in this place of sea perils. There are no flowers nor candles in the chapels, no bleeding hearts nor bedecked Virgin, nothing, in fact, of all that which causes M. Michelet to wax indignant.

Opposite the ramparts, at a stone's throw from the city, rises the little island of Grand-Bay. There, can be found the tomb of Chateaubriand; that white spot cut in the rock is the place he has designated for his body.

We went there one evening when the tide was low and the sun setting in the west. The water was still trickling over the sand. At the foot of the island, the dripping sea-weed spread out like the hair of antique women over a tomb.

The island is deserted; sparse grass grows in spots, mingled here and there with tufts of purple flowers and nettles. On the summit is a dilapidated casemate, with a courtyard enclosed by crumbling walls. Beneath this ruin, and half-way up the hill, is a space about ten feet square, in the middle of which rises a granite slab surmounted by a Latin cross. The tomb comprises three pieces: one for the socle, one for the slab, and another for the cross.

Chateaubriand will rest beneath it, with his head turned towards the sea; in this grave, built on a rock, his immortality will be like his life — deserted and surrounded by tempests. The centuries and the breakers will murmur a long time around his great memory; the breakers will dash against his tomb during storms, or on summer mornings, when the white sails unfold and the swallow arrives from across the seas; they will bring him the melancholy voluptuousness of far-away horizons and the caressing touch of the sea-breeze. And while time passes and the waves of his native strand swing back and forth between his cradle and his grave, the great heart of René, grown cold, will slowly crumble to dust to the eternal rhythm of this never-ceasing music.

We walked around the tomb and touched it, and looked at it as if it contained its future host, and sat down beside it on the ground.

The sky was pink, the sea was calm, and there was a lull in the breeze. Not a ripple broke the motionless surface of ocean on which the setting sun shed its golden light. Blue near the coast and mingled with the evening mist, the sea was scarlet everywhere else and deepened into a dark red line on the horizon. The sun had no rays left; they had fallen from its face and drowned their brilliancy in the water, on which they seemed to float. The red disc set slowly, robbing the sky of the pink tinge it had diffused over it, and while both the sun and the delicate color were wearing away, the pale blue shades of night crept over the heavens. Soon the sun touched the ocean and sank into it to the middle. For a moment it appeared cut in two by the horizon; the upper half remained firm, while the under one vacillated and lengthened; then it finally disappeared; and when the reflection died away from the place where the fiery ball had gone down, it seemed as if a sudden gloom had spread over the sea.

The shore was dark. The light in one of the windows in a city house, which a moment before was bright, presently went out. The silence grew deeper, though sounds could be heard. The breakers dashed against the rocks and fell back with a roar; long-legged gnats sang in our ears and disappeared with a buzzing of their transparent wings, and the indistinct voices of the children bathing at the foot of the ramparts reached us, mingled with their laughter and screams.

Young boys came out of the water, and, stepping gingerly on the pebbles, ran up the beach to dress. When they attempted to put on their shirts, the moist linen clung to their wet shoulders and we could see their white torsos wriggling with impatience, while their heads and arms remained concealed and the sleeves flapped in the wind like flags.

A man with his wet hair falling straight around his neck, passed in front of us. His dripping body shone. Drops trickled from his dark, curly beard, and he shook his head so as to let the water run out of his locks. His broad chest was parted by a stubby growth of hair that extended between his powerful muscles. It heaved with the exertion of swimming and imparted an even motion to his flat abdomen, which was as smooth as ivory where it joined the hips. His muscular thighs were set above slender knees and fine legs ending in arched feet, with short heels and spread toes. He walked slowly over the beach.

How beautiful is the human form when it appears in its original freedom, as it was created in the first day of the world! But where are we to find it, masked as it is and condemned never to reappear. That great word, Nature, which humanity has repeated sometimes with idolatry and sometimes with fear, which philosophers have sounded and poets have sung, how it is being lost and forgotten! If there are still here and there in the world, far from the pushing crowd, some hearts which are tormented by the constant search of beauty, and forever feeling the hopeless need of expressing what cannot be expressed and doing what can only be dreamed, it is to Nature, as to the home of the ideal, that they must turn. But how can they? By what magic will they be able to do so? Man has cut down the forests, has conquered the seas, and the clouds that hover over the cities are produced by the smoke that rises from the chimneys. But, say others, do not his mission and his glory consist in going forward and attacking the work of God, and encroaching upon it? Man denies His work, he ruins it, crushes it, even in his own body, of which he is ashamed and which he conceals like a crime.

Man having thus become the rarest and most difficult thing in the world to know (I am not speaking of his heart, O moralists!), it follows that the artist ignores his shape as well as the qualities that render it beautiful. Where is the poet, nowadays, even amongst the most brilliant, who knows what a woman is like? Where could the poor fellow ever have seen any? What has he ever been able to learn about them in the salons; could he see through the corset and the crinoline?

Better than all the rhetoric in the world, the plastic art teaches those who study it the gradation of proportions, the fusion of planes, in a word, harmony. The ancient races, through the very fact of their existence, left the mark of their noble attitudes and pure blood on the works of the masters. In Juvenal, I can hear confusedly the death-rattles of the gladiators; Tacitus has sentences that resemble the drapery of a laticlave, and some of Horace's verses are like the body of a Greek slave, with supple undulations, and short and long syllables that sound like crotala.

But why bother about these things? Let us not go so far back, and let us be satisfied with what is manufactured. What is wanted nowadays is rather the opposite of nudity, simplicity and truth? Fortune and success will fall to the lot of those who know how to dress and clothe facts! The tailor is the king of the century and the fig-leaf is its symbol; laws, art, politics, all things, appear in tights! Lying freedom, plated furniture, water-colour pictures, why! the public loves this sort of thing! So let us give it all it wants and gorge the fool!

CHAPTER XI.

MONT SAINT-MICHEL.

The road from Pontorson to the Mont Saint-Michel is wearying on account of the sand. Our post-chaise (for we also travel by post-chaise), was disturbed every now and then by a number of carts filled with the grey soil which is found in these parts and which is transported to some place and utilised as manure. They became more numerous as we approached the sea, and defiled for several miles until we finally saw the deserted strand whence they came. On this white surface, with its conical heaps of earth resembling huts, the fluctuating line of carts reminded us of an emigration of barbarians deserting their native heath.

The empty horizon stretches out, spreads, and finally mingles its greyish flats with the yellow sand of the beach. The ground becomes firmer and a salt breeze fans your cheeks; it looks like a vast desert from which the waters have receded. Long, flat strips of sand, superposed indefinitely in indistinct planes, ripple like shadows, and the wind playfully designs huge arabesques on their surfaces. The sea lies far away, so far, in fact, that its roar cannot be heard, though we could distinguish a sort of vague, ærial, imperceptible murmur, like the voice of the solitude, which perhaps was only the effect produced by the intense silence.

Opposite us rose a large round rock with embattled walls and a church on its top; enormous counterparts resting on a steep slope support the sides of the edifice. Rocks and wild shrubs are strewn over the incline. Half-way up the slope are a few houses, which show above the white line of the wall and are dominated by the brown church; thus some bright colours are interspersed between the two plain tints.

The post-chaise drove ahead of us and we followed it, guiding ourselves by the tracks of the wheels; finally it disappeared in the distance, and we could distinguish only its hood, which looked like some big crab crawling over the sand.

Here and there a swift current of water compelled us to move farther up the beach. Or we would suddenly come upon pools of slime with ragged edges framed in sand.

Beside us walked two priests who were also going to the Mont Saint-Michel. As they were afraid of soiling their new cassocks, they gathered them up around their legs when they jumped over the little streams. Their silver buckles were grey with mud, and their wet shoes gaped and threw water at every step they took.

Meantime the Mount was growing larger. With one sweep of the eye we were able to take in the whole panorama, and could see distinctly the tiles on the roofs, the bunches of nettles on the rocks, and, a little higher, the green shutters of a small window that looks out into the governor's garden.

The first door, which is narrow and pointed, opens on a sort of pebble road leading to the ocean; on the worn shield over the second door, undulating lines carved in the stone seem to represent water; on both sides of the doors are enormous cannons composed of iron bars connected by similar circular bands. One of them has retained a cannon-ball in its mouth; they were taken from the English in 1423, by Louis d'Estouteville, and have remained here four hundred years.

Five or six houses built opposite one another compose the street; then the line breaks, and they continue down the slopes and stairs leading to the castle, in a sort of haphazard fashion.

In order to reach the castle, you first go up to the curtain, the wall of which shuts out the view of the ocean from the houses below. Grass grows between the cracked stones and the battlements. The rampart continues around the whole island and is elevated by successive platforms. When you have passed the watch-house, which is situated between the two towers, you see a little straight flight of steps; when you climb them, the roofs of the houses, with their dilapidated chimneys, gradually grow lower and lower. You can see the washing hung out to dry on poles fastened to the garret-windows, or a tiny garden baking in the sun between the roof of one house and the ground-floor of another, with its parched leeks drooping their leaves over the grey soil; but the other side of the rock, the side that faces the ocean, is barren and deserted, and so steep that the shrubs that grow there have a hard time to remain where they are and look as if they were about to topple over every minute.

When you are standing up there, enjoying as much space as the human eye can possibly encompass and looking at the ocean and the horizon of the coast, which forms an immense bluish curve, or at the wall of La Merveille with its thirty-six huge counterparts upreared on a perpendicular cliff, a laugh of admiration parts your lips, and you suddenly hear the sharp noise of the weaving-looms. The people manufacture linen, and the shrill sound of the shuttles produces a very lively racket.

Between two slender towers, which represent the uplifted barrels of two cannons, is the entrance to the castle, a long, arched hallway, at the end of which is a flight of stone steps. The middle of the hall is always dark, being insufficiently lighted by two skylights one of which is at the bottom of the hall and the other at the top, between the interval of the drawbridge; it is like a subterranean vault.

The guard-room is at the head of the stairs as you enter. The voice of the sergeants and the clicking of the guns re-echoed along the walls. They were beating a drum.

Meanwhile a garde-chiourme returned with our passports, which M. le gouverneur had wished to see; then he motioned us to follow him; he opened doors, drew bolts, and led us through a maze of halls, vaults and staircases. Really, one can lose oneself in this labyrinth, for a single visit does not enable you to understand the complicated plan of these combined buildings, where a fortress, a church, an abbey, a prison and a dungeon, are mingled, and where you can find every style of architecture, from the Romance of the eleventh century to the bewildering Gothic of the sixteenth. We could catch only a glimpse of the knights' hall, which has been converted into a loom-room and is for this reason barred to the public. We saw only four rows of columns supporting a ceiling ornamented with salient mouldings; they were decorated with clover leaves. The monastery is built over this hall, at an altitude of two hundred feet above the sea level. It is composed of a quadrangular gallery formed by a triple line of small granite, tufa, or stucco columns. Acanthus, thistles, ivy, and oak-leaves wind around their caps; between each mitred ogive is a cut-out rose; this gallery is the place where the prisoners take the air.

The cap of the garde-chiourme now passes along these walls where, in olden times, passed the shaved heads of industrious friars; and the wooden shoes of the prisoners click on the slabs that used to be swept by the trailing robes of monks and trodden by their heavy leather sandals.

The church has a Gothic choir and a Romance nave, and the two architectures seem to vie with each other in majesty and elegance. In the choir, the arches of the windows are pointed, and are as lofty as the aspirations of love; in the nave, the arcades open their semi-circles roundly, and columns as straight as the trunk of a palm-tree mount along the walls. They rest on square pedestals, are crowned with acanthus leaves, and continue in powerful mouldings that curve beneath the ceiling and help support it.

It was noon. The bright daylight poured in through the open door and rippled over the dark sides of the building.

The nave, which is separated from the choir by a green curtain, is filled with tables and benches, for it is used also as a dining-hall. When mass is celebrated, the curtain is drawn and the condemned men may be present at divine service without removing their elbows from the table. It is a novel idea.

In order to enlarge the platform by twelve yards on the western side of the church, the latter itself has been curtailed; but as it was necessary to reconstruct some sort of entrance, one architect closed the nave by a façade in Greek style; then, perhaps, feeling remorseful, or desiring (a presumption which will be accepted more readily), to embellish his work still further, he afterwards added some columns "which imitate fairly well the architecture of the eleventh century," says the notice. Let us be silent and bow our heads. Each of the arts has its own particular leprosy, its mortal ignominy that eats its face away. Painting has the family group, music the ballad, literature the criticism, and architecture the architect.

The prisoners were walking around the platform, one after another, silent, with folded arms, and in the beautiful order we had the opportunity to admire at Fontevrault. They were the patients of the hospital ward taking the air.

Tottering along with the file was one who lifted his feet higher than the rest and clung to the coat of the man ahead of him. He was blind. Poor, miserable wretch! God prevents him from seeing and his fellow-men forbid him to speak!

The following day, when the tide had again receded from the beach, we left the Mount under a broiling sun which heated the hood of the carriage and made the horses sweat. They only walked; the harness creaked and the wheels sank deep into the sand. At the end of the beach, when grass appeared again, I put my eye to the little window that is in the back of every carriage, and bade goodbye to Mont Saint-Michel.

CHAPTER XII.

COMBOURG.

A letter from the Viscount Vésin was to gain us entrance to the castle. So as soon as we arrived, we called on the steward, M. Corvesier. They ushered us into a large kitchen where a young lady in black, marked by smallpox and wearing horn spectacles over her prominent eyes, was stemming currants. The kettle was on the fire and they were crushing sugar with bottles. It was evident that we were intruding. After several minutes had elapsed, we were informed that M. Corvesier was confined to his bed with a fever and was very sorry that he could not be of any service to us, but sent us his regards. In the meantime, his clerk, who had just come in from an errand, and who was lunching on a glass of cider and a piece of buttered bread, offered to show us the castle. He put his napkin down, sucked his teeth, lighted his pipe, took a bunch of keys from the wall and started ahead of us through the village.

After following a long wall, we entered through an old door into a silent farm-yard. Silica here and there shows through the beaten ground, on which grows a little grass soiled by manure. There was nobody around and the stable was empty. In the barns some chickens were roosting on the poles of the wagons, with their heads under their wings. Around the buildings, the sound of our footsteps was deadened by the dust accumulated from the straw in the lofts.

Four large towers connected by curtains showed battlements beneath their pointed roofs; the openings in the towers, like those in the main part of the castle, are small, irregular windows, which form uneven black squares on the grey stones. A broad stoop, comprising about thirty steps, reaches to the first floor, which has become the ground-floor of the interior apartments, since the trenches have been filled up.

The yellow wall-flower does not grow here, but instead, one finds nettles and lentisks, greenish moss and lichens. To the left, next to the turret, is a cluster of chestnut-trees reaching up to the roof and shading it.

After the key had been turned in the lock and the door pushed open with kicks, we entered a dark hallway filled with boards and ladders and wheelbarrows.

This passage led into a little yard enclosed by the thick interior walls of the castle. It was lighted from the top like a prison yard. In the corners, drops of humidity dripped from the stones. We opened another door. It led into a large, empty, sonorous hall; the floor was cracked in a hundred places, but there was fresh paint on the wainscoting.

The green forest opposite sheds a vivid reflection on the white walls, through the large windows of the castle. There is a lake and underneath the windows were clusters of lilacs, petunia-blossoms and acacias, which have grown pell-mell in the former parterre, and cover the hill that slopes gradually to the road, following the banks of the lake and then continuing through the woods.

The great, deserted hall, where the child who afterwards wrote René, used to sit and gaze out of the windows, was silent. The clerk smoked his pipe and expectorated on the floor. His dog, which had followed him, hunted for mice, and its nails clicked on the pavement.

We walked up the winding stairs. Moss covers the worn stone steps. Sometimes a ray of light, passing through a crack in the walls, strikes a green blade and makes it gleam in the dark like a star.

We wandered through the halls, through the towers, and over the narrow curtain with its gaping machicolations, which attract the eye irresistibly to the abyss below.

On the second floor is a small room which looks out into the inside courtyard and has a massive oak door that closes with a latch. The beams of the ceiling (you can touch them), are rotten from age; the whitewashed walls show their lattice-work and are covered with big spots; the window-panes are obscured by cobwebs and their frames are buried in dust. This used to be Chateaubriand's room. It faces the West, towards the setting sun.

We continued; when we passed in front of a window or a loop-hole, we warmed ourselves in the warm air coming from without, and this sudden transition rendered the ruins all the more melancholy and cheerless. The floors of the apartments are rotting away, and daylight enters through the fireplaces along the blackened slab where rain has left long green streaks. The golden flowers on the drawing-room ceiling are falling off, and the shield that surmounts the mantelpiece is broken into bits. While we were looking around, a flight of birds entered, flew around for a few minutes and passed out through the chimney.

In the evening, we went to the lake. The meadow has encroached upon it and will soon cover it entirely, and wheat will grow in the place of pond-lilies. Night was falling. The castle, flanked by its four turrets and framed by masses of green foliage, cast a dark shadow over the village. The setting sun made the great mass appear black; the dying rays touched the surface of the lake and then melted in the mist on the purplish top of the silent forest.

We sat down at the foot of an oak and opened René. We faced the lake where he had often watched the nimble swallow on the bending reeds; we sat in the shadow of the forest where he had often pursued rainbows over the dripping hills; we harkened to the rustling of the leaves and the whisperings of the water that had added their murmur to the sad melody of his youth. As the darkness gathered on the pages of the book, the bitterness of its words went to our hearts, and we experienced a sensation of mingled melancholy and sweetness.

A wagon passed in the road, and the wheels sank in the deep tracks. A smell of new-mown hay pervaded the air. The frogs were croaking in the marshes. We went back.

The sky was heavy and a storm raged all night. The front of a neighbouring house was illumined and flared like a bonfire at every flash of lightning. Gasping, and tired of tossing on my bed, I arose, lighted a candle, opened the window and leaned out.

The night was dark, and as silent as slumber. The lighted candle threw my huge shadow on the opposite wall. From time to time a flash of lightning blinded me.

I thought of the man whose early life was spent here and who filled half a century with the clamouring of his grief.

I thought of him first in these quiet streets, playing with the village boys and looking for nests in the church-steeple and in the woods. I imagined him in his little room, leaning his elbows on the table, and watching the rain beating on the window-panes and the clouds passing above the curtain, while his dreams flew away. I thought of the bitter loneliness of youth, with its intoxications, its nausea, and its bursts of love that sicken the heart. Is it not here that our own grief was nourished, is this not the very Golgotha where the genius that fed us suffered its anguish?

Nothing can express the gestation of the mind or the thrills which future great works impart to those who carry them; but we love to see the spot where we know they were conceived and lived, as if it had retained something of the unknown ideal which once vibrated there.

His room! his room! his childhood's poor little room! It was here that he was tormented by vague phantoms which beckoned to him and clamoured for birth: Attala shaking the magnolias out of her hair in the soft breeze of Florida, Velléda running through the woods in the moonlight, Cymodocée protecting her white bosom from the claws of the leopards, and frail Amélie and pale René!

One day, however, he tears himself away from the old feudal homestead, never to return. Now he is lost in the whirl of Paris and mingles with his fellow-men; and then he feels an impulse to travel and he starts off.

I can see him leaning over the side of the ship, I can see him looking for a new world and weeping over the country he has left. He lands; he listens to the waterfalls and the songs of the Natchez; he watches the flowing rivers and the bright scales of the snakes and the eyes of the savages. He allows his soul to be fascinated by the languor of the Savannah. They tell each other of their native melancholy and he exhausts its pleasures as he exhausted those of love. He returns, writes, and everyone is carried away by the charm of his magnificent style with its royal sweep and its supple, coloured, undulating phrase, as stormy as the winds that sweep over virgin forests, as brilliant as the neck of a humming-bird, and as soft as the light of the moon shining through the windows of a chapel.

He travels again; this time he goes to ancient shores; he sits down at Thermopylæ and cries: Leonidas! Leonidas! visits the tomb of Achilles, Lacedæmon, and Carthage, and, like the sleepy shepherd who raises his head to watch the passing caravans, all those great places awake when he passes through them.

Banished, exiled, laden with honours, this man who had starved in the streets will dine at the table of kings; he will be an ambassador and a minister, will try to save the tottering monarchy, and after seeing the ruin of all his beliefs, he will witness his own glorification as if he were already counted among the dead.

Born during the decline of one period and at the dawn of another, he was to be its transition and the guardian of its memories and hopes. He was the embalmer of Catholicism and the proclaimer of liberty. Although he was a man of old traditions and illusions, he was constitutional in politics and revolutionary in literature. Religious by instinct and education, it is he, who, in advance of everyone else, in advance of Byron, gave vent to the most savage pride and frightful despair.

He was an artist, and had this in common with the artists of the eighteenth century: he was always hampered by narrow laws which, however, were always broken by the power of his genius. As a man, he shared the misery of his fellow-men of the nineteenth century. He had the same turbulent preoccupations and futile gravity. Not satisfied with being great, he wished to appear grandiose, and it seems that this conceited mania did not in the least efface his real grandeur. He certainly does not belong to the race of dreamers who have made no incursion into life, masters with calm brows who have had neither period, nor country nor family. But this man cannot be separated from the passions of his time; they made him what he was, and he in turn created a number of them. Perhaps the future will not give him credit for his heroic stubbornness and no doubt it will be the episodes of his books that will immortalise their titles with the names of the causes they upheld.

I stayed at the window enjoying the night and feeling with delight the cold morning air on my lids. Little by little the day dawned; the wick of the candle grew longer and longer and its flame slowly faded away. The roof of the market appeared in the distance and a cock crowed; the storm had passed; a few drops of water remained in the dust of the road and made large round spots on it. As I was very tired, I went back to bed and slept.

We felt very sad on leaving Combourg, and besides, the end of our journey was at hand. Soon this delightful trip which we had enjoyed for three months would be over. The return, like the leave-taking, produces an anticipated sadness, which gives one a proof of the insipid life we lead.

I

1<sup>er</sup> mai 1847.

Chemin de fer. — Anglais v....é et son enfant qui lisait des vaudevilles français. — Grainetiers, 2 expressions de marchand, l'accapareur sournois et l'exploiteur jovial et féroce. — Les deux jeunes gens se croyant charmants.

Blois. — Près le débarcadère une allée de vieux ormeaux à tronc large, à branches diffuses, les vrais arbres XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle, arbres de théâtre sous lesquels les fillettes dansent au son du violon. — Rues silencieuses intimes dans lesquelles on placerait quelque douce et bénigne passion. — En sortant de la cathédrale pour descendre à la rivière il y en a une, à marches, comme celles qui mènent à Fourvières. — Vieille femme dont la tête en coiffe blanche saillissait à sa fenêtre à guillotine. — Près l'église Saint-Nicolas, une rue longue (avec des portes cochères donnant sur des jardins) courbée, herbue ; au fond, une boutique de modes.

Église Saint-Nicolas, entré par derrière, chapiteaux ; grand portail noir avec des ravenelles ; église de l'ogive primitive. — Cathédrale XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle, transition de la Renaissance. — Château, côté du nord, élevé sur des remparts ; pour y entrer on passe sous une voûte. — Le côté gauche, dans la cour, est de la reine Anne, charmant ; le fond de Louis XIV atroce ; côté de droite réparé, charmant ; tourelle carrée ; délicieuse corniche François I<sup>er</sup> intérieur. — Oratoire d'Henri III à côté de sa chambre ; à côté son cabinet au nord. — Troupiers avec leurs brocs de vin pour la fête du roi. — Partout la cordelière d'Anne et le cygne percé d'une flèche de Claude de France.

Chambord. — Terrains sablonneux, maigres, dégarnis d'arbres. — Façade, rivière, oiseaux qui volaient bas ; tristesse de la ruine qui n'est pas ruine. — Dans la cour l'âne et son ânon, chien joyeux. — Sur le registre, à côté des jérémiades et souhaits, légitimité, ô mania, Louise et Alfred ; "on peut être boiteux sans cesser d'être droit". l'abbé Sam. aumônier du presbytère..... exilé sans cesser d'être roi. — Escalier double à jour ; on a fait 2 étages de ce qui n'était que le rez-de-chaussée.

La salle du BG au 2<sup>e</sup> étage a le plafond comme tout le reste, couvert de salamandres peintes et dorées. — Parc d'artillerie. — Donné au duc de Bordeaux par le colonel Langlois. — Oratoire de François I<sup>er</sup> : plafond sculpté, une salamandre ou un chou, un ornement quelconque dans chaque carré.

Amboise. — Bâti sur deux bras de la Loire ; une ile au milieu. — Pays singulièrement doux et bon, plus pur comme Touraine qu'à Blois ; femmes jolies, braves. — Revue de la garde nationale ; les bisets sont ficelés et semblaient mettre de la prétention dans leur dédain du costume civique. — Promenade plantée à droite au bas du château. — Château, grandes tours. — Au haut, galerie à arcade ; à gauche, une grande tour avec des ravenelles, superbe en couleur bistrée, elle est garnie de fenêtres hautes, resserrées, à plein cintre. — On monte par derrière, jardin charmant, élevé, en pleine vue sur la campagne ; horizon doux fuyant, avec deux grandes voiles au fond. — A pic sous soi les toits pointus des maisons, vieux hôtels déserts.

Intérieur du château, nul ; les éternels bustes du roi, de la reine et de M<sup>me</sup> Adélaïde dans plusieurs appartements. — Dans un pan de mur qui faisait partie d'une ancienne terrasse, le porc-épic. — La chapelle : délicieuse, ouvrage de fouillure de ciselé, d'élégance, et dont le style fait penser aux fraises à la Médicis à cause de ses broderies, de ses boutons et de ses découpures. — Sur la porte un saint Hubert descendu de cheval, à genoux ; un ange vient mettre une couronne sur son bonnet, le saint est agenouillé devant le cerf qui porte un crucifix entre ses cornes ; les chiens sont à côté et jappent ; un serpent rampe sur une montagne où l'on aperçoit des cristaux, on voit sa tête plate de vipère au pied des arbres, l'arbre dévot, théologique des bibles, petit et sec de feuillage, mais large de branches. — Saint Christophe porte Jésus ; saint Antoine est dans sa cellule, son cochon rentre, on ne lui voit que le derrière, cela fait parallèle à un autre animal (lièvre ?) dont la tête sort.

Tour par où montent les voitures, garnie de fenêtres de même style que l'autre : médaillons représentant différents sujets grotesques, obscènes ; il y a une intention dans la gradation des scènes en prenant le sujet d'en bas. Ainsi à partir d'en bas, on voit l'Aristoteles equitatus ( ?) et on en arrive à un homme qui visite une dame par derrière. — Plusieurs médaillons intermédiaires ont été enlevés exprès, de sang-froid, “parce qu’il y en avait beaucoup qui étaient inconvenants pour les dames”, a dit le garde d’un air pénétré de cette vérité.

Route de Chenonceaux à travers la forêt monte jusqu’à Bléré à peu près. — Chemin frais, à cause de la fraîcheur de la pluie ; nous fumions dans la voiture après un excellent dîner à Amboise.

Chenonceaux. — Le soir, 2 mai, 9 heures. — Le soir nous avons été fumer sous les arbres verts, à la pluie. — Le château d’un beau style du XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle. — Le Cher passe dessous. — Salle d’armes dans le vestibule à ogives ; salle à manger avec les tentures de l’époque ; grande cheminée. — Partout les ameublements ont été conservés. — Masse d’armes de François I<sup>er</sup>.

Portraits : l’original de ceux de Rabelais ; Isabeaude Bavière, figure toute blonde, toute blanche, grasse avec des sourcils bruns, des bourrelets aux sourcils ; M<sup>me</sup> d’Humières, petite bouche en cœur, singulièrement sensuelle ; M<sup>me</sup> Dupin, figure spirituelle, nez retroussé, mine agaçante, yeux bruns (dans la grande galerie qui servait de salle de bal), lèvres minces et roses ; Louise de Vaudemont, femme d’Henri III ; deux grands portraits à cheval de MM. de Beauvilliers, l’un amiral, l’autre colonel de cavalerie ; sur une porte un tableau représente Gabrielle d’Estrées, vue de face jusqu’à la ceinture, avec sa coiffure frisée montée, blonde, un collier de perles sur sa poitrine ; sa sœur nue également, vue de dos, détournant la tête ; au fond, une nourrice en costume de paysanne qui sourit ou plutôt qui rit et donne à têter au duc de Vendôme au maillot.

De Chenonceaux à Bléré ; route à pied, au bord du Cher dans l’herbe ; soleil. — Bléré à Tours ; à partir de Montlouis, grand paysage de la Loire, gras, riche, doux, plein de verdure et d’eau.

Le 1<sup>er</sup> mai 1847, à huit heures et demie du matin, les deux monades dont l’agglomération va servir à barbouiller de noir le papier subséquent sortirent de Paris dans le but d’aller respirer à l’aise au milieu des bruyères et des genêts, ou au bord des flots sur les grandes plages de sable.

On n’avait d’autre ambition que celle de chercher quelque coin de ciel pur, floconné de nuages enroulés, ou de découvrir au revers d’une roche blanche, caché sous les houx et les chênes, assis entre le fleuve et la colline, un de ces pauvres petits villages comme on en rencontre encore, avec des maisons en bois, de la vigne qui monte aux murs, du linge qui sèche sur la haie et des vaches à l'abreuvoir.

A d'autres temps, pour plus tard, les grands voyages à travers le monde, au dos des chameaux sur des selles turques, ou sous le tendelet des éléphants ; à d'autres temps, si jamais ça arrive, le grelot des mules andalouses, les pérégrinations rêveuses dans la Marenne, et les mélancolies de l'histoire, surgissant, avec les vapeurs du crépuscule, du fond de ces horizons où se sont passées les choses que l'on rêve dans les vieux livres.

Aujourd'hui, sans trop quitter le coin de sa cheminée où on laisse pour les y retrouver, presque tièdes encore, sa pipe et ses songeries, et sans aucun des poignants arrachements du départ, on s'en va, sac au dos, souliers ferrés aux pieds, gourdin en main, fumée aux lèvres et fantaisie en tête, courir les champs pour coucher dans les auberges dans de grands lits à baldaquin, pour écouter les oiseaux sous les arbres quand il a plu et pour voir, le dimanche, les paysannes sous le porche de l'église sortir de la messe avec leurs grands bonnets blancs et leurs gros jupons rouges, et quoi encore ? pour se hâler la peau à coup sûr et pour attraper des poux peut-être ? Voilà donc ce qui a fait que deux êtres doués de raison (définition de l'homme dans les livres) ont, pendant sept mois, médité la forme, le dessin, la couleur, le relief et l'arrangement harmonique entre eux des objets suivants, à savoir :

Un chapeau de feutre gris ;

Un bâton de maquignon, venu exprès de Lisieux ;

Une paire de souliers forts (cuir blanc, clous en dents de crocodiles) ;

Dito vernis (costume de ville pour les visites diplomatiques, s'il s'en trouve à faire, ou les courses à Paphos si par hasard les oies de cette divinité nous enlèvent dans le char de la Déesse) ;

Une paire de guêtres en cuir, appropriée aux souliers forts ;

Dito en drap pour protéger de la poussière nos chaussettes, les jours de souliers vernis ;

Une veste de toile (chic garçon d'écurie) ;

Un pantalon de toile, démesurément large pour être mis dans les guêtres ;

Un gilet de toile, dont la coupe élégante rachète la vulgarité de l'étoffe.

Ajoutez à cela la répétition du même costume en drap.

De plus, un couteau modèle, deux gourdes, une pipe en bois, trois chemises de foulard, ce qu'il faut à un Européen pour ses ablutions quotidiennes, et vous aurez le cadre dans lequel nous nous sommes présentés en Bretagne, dans lequel nous avons vécu durant quelques semaines, à la pluie et au soleil. Jamais habit de bal ne fut médité avec plus de tendresse, et, ce qu'il y a de certain, porté avec aussi peu de gêne.

Le canon tonnait pour fêter le roi, les gardes nationaux s'apprêtaient à se hausser le menton dans leur habit et les allumeurs de la liste civile préparaient leur suif pour la solennité du soir, quand, après avoir dit adieu à nos deux amis Fritz et Louis, nous sommes montés dans notre wagon ; on a fermé la portière, la bête de fer a renâclé comme un cheval qui piaffe, et nous sommes partis.

Autrefois, quand vous vous transportiez d'un lieu à un autre, soit en voiture ou en bateau, vous aviez le temps de voir quelque chose et d'avoir des aventures ; un voyage de Paris à Rouen pouvait fournir un livre. J'ai connu des gens qui avaient mis dans leur jeunesse trois jours à l'accomplir : on s'en allait coucher, le premier, à Pont-de-l'Arche ; le deuxième, à Meulan et on s'estimait heureux si, le troisième, on était arrivé à Paris à temps pour souper. Je lis dans un vieil itinéraire de la France publié vers la fin du règne d'Henri IV : "Pour aller de Rouen à Dieppe, il y a un messenger qui part trois fois par semaine ; on est un jour ; la dînée se fait à Tôtes où l'on reste trois heures". Les hommes, qui maintenant jouent au gendarme, et les femmes, qui font des dînes-dînes dans le jardin, ne sauront que par tradition ce que c'était seulement que la diligence, avec son conducteur en veste bordée d'astrakan et les postillons en blouse poussant leur cri sonore du haut de leur siège ; ils penseront à la rotonde et à l'impériale, aux relais de la poste où les chevaux crottés et fumants s'attachent, en arrivant, aux anneaux de la muraille, comme nous rêvons, nous autres, aux anciennes nuitées dans les auberges, avec les méprises de lits, les chandelles soufflées dans les corridors, le vacarme des servantes, l'hôte qui jure, l'hôtesse qui crie. Où sont maintenant les histoires de carrosses embourbés et des grandes dames à falbalas qui versaient dans les fondrières, en se rendant dans leurs châteaux ? Est-ce que ce seul mot, le coche d'Auxerre, ne nous fait pas penser à M. de Pourceaugnac débarquant à Paris avec ses hauts-de-chausses trop courts, son habit du règne passé et son accent limousin ? Aurions-nous les charmantes pages de Chapelle et de Bachaumont si, au lieu de s'en aller de province en province, portés dans les lourdes voitures de leurs amis MM. les gouverneurs et les fermiers, ils eussent été entraînés sur un chemin de fer ou dans un bateau à vapeur ?

Tout ce que nous avons donc remarqué de Paris à Blois, c'est que la route, quelque peu qu'elle ait duré, dura trop encore, agacés que nous sommes toujours de ce mode aride de locomotion et fort ennuyés, d'ailleurs, par la société de deux marchands de grains, grands parleurs, grands rieurs, gens enrichis probablement et fort satisfaits d'eux-mêmes. L'un décoré, jovial, gros, gras, lèvres épaisses, fort d'encolure et de voix rude, représentait l'accapareur hardi, le spéculateur en gros, qui est maire de sa commune, qui sera député de sa ville et plus tard ministre tout comme un autre, tandis que son voisin, petit homme maigre à face ridée, à bouche rentrée, à nez saillant, et faisant avec un indicible sourire de satisfaction et de malice sauter dans le creux de sa main des échantillons de blé, avait plutôt l'air du marchand rapace et souterrain, du travailleur entêté, qui suce le sac dont il a vidé les écus, de l'homme féroce aimant l'argent pour l'argent et épris du trafic pour le trafic même ; race de gens fort commune aujourd'hui, qui ambitionne d'avoir des vignes pour n'en pas boire le vin ! Il y avait encore à côté de nous un pauvre Anglais malade et boiteux qui m'avait l'air rongé par un autre métal que par l'argent ; sa petite fille, à figure laide, mais d'expression déjà mûre comme l'est en général celle des enfants qui n'ont pas de mère, lisait des vaudevilles du Palais-Royal et du Gymnase pour s'initier à la langue, aux mœurs et au bon goût français.

A Orléans nous eûmes la vue de M. Berryer qui, assis à la buvette, emplissait sa large poitrine, et nous prîmes deux aimables jeunes gens qui devaient appartenir à une administration quelconque : il y avait de l'un à l'autre la différence du bête au sot, et du nul au vide.

Le souvenir de la jeunesse du poète qui s'est écoulée à Blois nous a pris dès en y entrant ; allant par ses rues tortueuses pleines de silence nous pensions que lui aussi s'y promenait il y a quelque vingt ans, regardant comme nous une de ces maisons-là pour y placer sa Marion de Lorme, et nous demandions à l'air, aux arbres, aux murs, à ce je ne sais quoi de persistant et d'individuel qui réside en un lieu, en constitue la couleur, et en est l'âme, le secret des premières floraisons du grand homme, alors que sa poésie, dans les pièces sans titre de ses premiers recueils, débordait en strophes chevelues pendantes comme des lianes, épanouissait ses métaphores comme des soleils, tressaillait en rythmes multiples et en harmonies incessantes. Que d'idées devenues des œuvres, que de rêves devenus des marbres ont éclos au coin de ce mur, au bord de ce fleuve, sous cet arbre, le matin à la rosée, dans les gouttes de l'herbe, ou par les soirs d'été, par ces beaux soirs ardents et tristes comme le premier amour, quand le ciel est rayé de longues lignes droites et que les essaims de moucherons tournent dans l'air comme des roues d'or !

Est-ce pour cela que Blois nous a charmés ? Près le débarcadère, d'ailleurs, n'y a-t-il pas une large avenue d'ormeaux à feuillage épaté et touffu, avec des branches robustes partant exprès d'en bas comme pour y suspendre la musette ? Vrais ormeaux XVIII<sup>e</sup> siècle, poussés larges pour qu'on danse dessous, au son du violon du ménétrier qui, monté sur une barrique, bat la mesure de son pied sonore pendant que les cottes volent au vent, que les boucles poudrées se dénouent, et que les garçons prennent la taille aux fillettes qui en rient d'effroi et s'en pâment de plaisir.

Les rues à Blois sont vides, l'herbe croît entre les pavés ; des deux côtés s'étendent de longs murs gris enfermant de grands jardins, percés de quelques petites portes discrètes qui ne semblent s'ouvrir que la nuit au visiteur mystérieux. On sent que tous les jours doivent s'y passer pareils, qu'ils doivent y être, à cette calme monotonie, douce pourtant comme la sonnerie du cadran des églises, pleins de mélancolie savoureuse et de langueurs émouvantes. On se plaît à rêver, dans ces paisibles demeures, quelque profonde et grande histoire intime, une passion malade qui dure jusqu'à la mort, amour continu de vieille fille dévote ou de femme vertueuse ; on y met malgré soi comme à sa place voulue quelque beauté pâle aux ongles longs et aux mains fines, dame aristocratique aux froides manières, mariée à un bourru, à un avare, à un jaloux, et qui se meurt de la poitrine.

Ces réflexions, qui nous sont revenues plus tard, à Amboise, à Chinon et dans les autres villes de la Touraine, nous ont fait nous demander si M. de Balzac, qui est de ce pays, y a puisé ses héroïnes, si c'est là, enfin, qu'il a découvert La femme de trente ans, cette création immortelle ! inconnue à l'antiquité comme le christianisme dont elle relève et que je prise plus que la plupart de celles de l'industrie moderne (j'en excepte cependant les allumettes chimiques et la fricassée de poulet froid de Tortoni).

Exhumer dans ce qu'on rejetait comme hors d'usage des trésors nouveaux de plastique et de sentiment, découvrir dans l'univers de l'amour un continent nouveau et appeler à son exploitation des milliers d'êtres qui s'en trouvaient rejetés, cela n'est-il pas spirituel et sublime ? Prolonger l'exercice d'un sexe, n'est-ce pas presque en inventer un autre ? Aussi quel enthousiasme nous vîmes ! Ça été comme la découverte de l'Amérique : au lieu de routiers congédiés et de juifs en faillite y courant pour faire fortune, une foule de sentiments aux abois et de décadences encore robustes s'est ruée avec ardeur sur cette grande trouvaille de La femme de trente ans ; il y a eu engouement au début, puis réaction en sens inverse, mais on y reviendra plus tard comme à tout ce qui est vrai, comme à tout ce qui est bon, comme au système de Galilée et comme aux gilets longs ; on verra ce qu'on n'a qu'entrevu, on sondera ce qu'on n'a qu'effleuré, la mine est neuve encore, la veine profonde ; préparées par cette question, il en est d'autres, consécutives de celle-là, qui ne demandent plus qu'un grand moraliste, un grand artiste pour être mises au jour, telles que celle du teton lyrique, dont toute l'importance et la justesse m'ont été si bien révélées par mon illustre ami Pradier.

Quant à notre problème de tout à l'heure, il en est un peu de l'influence des lieux sur les livres et de celle des livres sur les lieux comme du problème de l'œuf et de la poule : est-ce la poule qui a fait l'œuf, ou l'œuf qui a fait la poule ? Sont-ce les livres de Balzac qui m'ont fait songer dans les rues de Blois à ce qui s'y passe ou bien est-ce ce qui s'y passe qui a causé des livres ? Qui de Dieu ou de l'homme a arrangé les choses comme nous les voyons ?

Allant à l'aventure dans une de ces rues désertes au fond de laquelle, par un hasard ironique se dressait, peint en rouge, l'écriteau d'une marchande de modes, nous tombâmes en une étroite allée, menant à une espèce de cul-de-sac qui contient l'abside de l'église

Saint-Nicolas. C'est un coin lugubre et de haut goût, comme empli de bitume ; tout est noir, la pierre du sol, la couleur de l'air elle-même ; ça a un aspect austère et dur de robe de prêtre, c'est beau de nudité, de crudité et de brutalité. Sur la place, devant le portail, en plein soleil, des maçons taillaient des pierres, de grandes ravenelles accrochées aux angles des chapiteaux romans tranchaient par la joyeuseté de leurs tons jaunes avec la couleur sombre du vieil édifice ; mobiles et folâtres dans l'air, elles étaient là rien que pour montrer comme elles étaient jolies.

Château de Blois. — Du côté du nord, le château de Blois, dressé sur des murs formidables, présente une galerie à double arcade d'un charmant effet ; là était la chambre d'Henri III. A côté se trouve son oratoire, coïncidence qui n'a rien de rare en soi-même, mais qui frappe ici, dans cette âme où la volupté s'aiguissait de religion, où la cruauté se ravivait à la peur. Quand nous eûmes passé sous une voûte tournante et traversé la place, nous entrâmes dans la cour intérieure du château. Il y avait grande joie : la garnison avait reçu une bouteille de vin par homme, et les soldats portaient des brocs pleins d'un liquide bleu et s'apprêtaient à le boire à la santé du monarque dont la fête leur occasionnait ce régal. La cour du château est un carré régulier. Le côté de l'entrée, du temps de Louis XII, n'a qu'un seul étage avec une galerie soutenue par des colonnes courtes, couvertes de losanges, et est orné partout de la cordelière de la reine Anne et des hermines de Bretagne ; le côté gauche (sud), un peu antérieur, n'a pas été terminé, il est plus sobre d'ornementation, plus rude, plus reculé dans son moyen âge. En face, un corps de logis des plus bêtes, construction de Louis XIV, jure d'une manière détestable, avec son classique de collège et son goût sobre qui est le goût pauvre ; mais auprès d'elle éclate et reluit en grand costume la belle architecture du xvi<sup>e</sup> siècle, celle de la bonne époque, avant l'envahissement du pilastre attique, avant que la Renaissance n'allât s'aplatir dans le grec abâtardi de Marie de Médicis. Sur ce corps de logis sont accrochés les deux plus délicieux escaliers du monde, bâtis à jour, ciselés d'un ciseau vivace et tout découpés, comme les hautes collerettes des grandes dames qui, il y a trois cents ans, en montaient les marches. Nous avons vu, au rez-de-chaussée, la salle où se tinrent les États de 1588. Un gentilhomme gascon y assista, envoyé par la noblesse de Bordeaux ; il dut, j'imagine, prendre peu de part aux discussions qui retentissaient sous ces voûtes de bois. Assis à l'écart, dans son élégant costume noir, et jouant avec une badine qu'il portait toujours, sans doute qu'il remâchait en lui-même quelque passage de Salluste ou quelque vers de Lucain que les circonstances présentes lui remettaient en mémoire. Sans passions au milieu de toutes ces passions hurlantes, sans croyances à côté de tant de convictions violentes, il était là comme le symbole de ce qui reste à côté de ce qui passe : il s'appelait Michel de Montaigne.

J'ai vu en dehors du château, sur une plate-forme d'où l'on découvre toute la ville et la Loire bordée de peupliers et la campagne à l'entour, remontant au ciel par de lentes perspectives insensibles, une tourelle qui sert à mettre les poudres de la garnison : c'était là qu'habitait Ruggieri, l'astrologue d'Henri III. On avait tendu du linge sur l'esplanade, les cordes où séchaient les chemises du concierge la zigzaguaient dans tous les sens ; la sentinelle qui veillait à la porte de la poudrière avait posé son fusil dessus, elle l'y balançait en équilibre et jouait à faire claquer le ressort de batterie en attendant qu'on la vînt relever de sa faction.

D'illustres hôtes ont dormi sous ces murs : VaJentine de Milan, Isabeau de Bavière, Anne de Bretagne, Charles VIII, Louis XII, François Ier, Claude de France, Henri III, Catherine et Marie de Médicis, et les Guise qui y ont laissé leur sang ; il a coulé à cette place. Vainement l'œil le cherche encore sur le plancher, avec les prunes de Damus que le Balafré avait jetées à côté dans la salle des gardes en disant « qui en veut » ; on a bouché l'escalier par où il descendit dans la chambre du roi, on ne voit plus rien, et cependant on regarde.

Après avoir servi aux noces du duc d'Alençon avec Marguerite d'Anjou, à celles d'Henri IV avec Marguerite de Valois, et aux sanglantes tragédies des Guise, le château de Blois resta tout ouvert pour recevoir d'autres fortunes : Marie de Médicis y fut enfermée et s'enfuit par cette fenêtre qu'on montre encore ; en 1716, Marie-Casimir, reine de Pologne, l'habita ; en 1814, Marie-Louise s'y réfugia après la prise de Paris, et aujourd'hui les touriourous y fument leur pipe et chantent la gaudriole ; le sang a été lavé, le bruit des sarabandes et des menuets s'est évanoui avec le rire des pages et les frôlements des robes à queue. Que reste-t-il de ce que l'histoire en sait ? et de tout ce qu'elle ne sait pas ? Ce qui est plus tentant à connaître et ce qu'on s'en va demandant aux vieux lambris, aux vieux portraits muets qui vous regardent, aux tombeaux vides qui bâillent, secret qu'ils gardent pour eux seuls et qu'ils se murmurent dans leur solitude. L'histoire est, comme la mer, belle par ce qu'elle efface : le flot qui vient enlève sur le sable la trace du flot qui est venu, on se dit seulement qu'il y en a eu, qu'il y en aura encore ; c'est là toute sa poésie et sa moralité peut-être ?

Le lendemain nous visitâmes une ruine plus ruinée : je parle de Chambord. Après nous être perdus dans la sotte campagne qui l'environne, nous y arrivâmes enfin par un long chemin dans le sable, au milieu d'un bois maigre, propriété de rentier gêné qui fait des coupes anticipées ; le château n'a ni jardin ni parc, pas le moindre arbuste, pas une fleur autour de lui ; il montre sa façade devant une grande place d'herbe grêle, au bas de laquelle coule une petite rivière. Quand nous sommes entrés un jeune chien s'est mis à aboyer ; la pluie tombait, l'eau coulait sur les toits et passait par les fenêtres brisées. On nous a introduits dans le logement du garde, où, en attendant que sa bonne, qui tient lieu de concierge, fût revenue de la messe, nous avons parcouru le livre des visiteurs.

Il est rempli de doléances légitimistes, jérémiades sur le maître et la maison, vœux pour le retour de l'auguste exilé, etc. Un certain abbé Sam..., aumônier du presbytère de X..., a écrit ce vers magnifique :

On peut être boiteux sans cesser d'être droit.

Un anonyme plus hardi a fait cette variante :

On peut être exilé sans cesser d'être roi. Quelqu'un, indigné sans doute, a écrit au beau milieu du livre : "ô mania". Mais ce qui nous a le plus arrêtés, ce sont deux seuls mots : "Louise et Alfred" qui se trouvent perdus sous les marquis, les comtes, les chevaliers de Saint-Louis, les fils des victimes de Quiberon, les pèlerins de Belgrave-Square et toute cette racaille de noblesse postiche qui vit, comme le romantisme de M. de Marchangy, sur la sempiternelle poésie des tourelles, des damoiselles, du palefroi, des fleurs de lis de l'oriflamme de saint Louis, du panache blanc, du droit divin et d'un tas d'autres sottises aussi innocentes. Parmi tant de prétentions pleurardes, grimacières, arrogantes, ces simples noms d'inconnus nous ont paru avoir quelque chose de simple et de bon et de meilleur goût que tout le reste.

Château de Chambord. — Nous nous sommes promenés le long des galeries vides et dans les chambres abandonnées où l'araignée étend sa toile sur les salamandres de François Ier. Ce n'est pas la ruine de partout, avec le luxe de ses débris noirs et verdâtres, la broderie de ses fleurs coquettes et ses draperies de verdure ondulant au vent, comme des lambeaux de damas. C'est au contraire une misère honteuse qui brosse son habit râpé et fait la décente. On répare le parquet dans cette pièce, on le laisse pourrir dans cette autre. Vous sentez partout un effort stérile pour conserver ce qui meurt et pour rappeler ce qui a fui. Chose étrange ! cela est triste et cela n'est pas grand.

Et puis, on dirait que tout a voulu contribuer à lui jeter l'outrage, à ce pauvre Chambord, que le Primatice avait dessiné, que Germain Pilon et Jean Cousin avaient ciselé et sculpté. Bâti par François Ier, à son retour d'Espagne, après l'humiliant traité de Madrid (1526), monument de l'orgueil qui veut s'étourdir lui-même, pour se payer de ses défaites, c'est d'abord Gaston d'Orléans, un prétendant vaincu, qu'on y exile ; puis c'est Louis XIV qui d'un seul étage en fait trois, gâtant ainsi l'admirable escalier double qui allait d'un seul jet, lancé comme une spirale, du sol au faîte. Et enfin, c'est Molière qui y joue pour la première fois le Bourgeois gentilhomme, au deuxième étage, côté qui donne sur la façade, sous ce beau plafond couvert de salamandres et d'ornements peints dont les couleurs s'en vont. Ensuite on l'a donné au maréchal de Saxe ; on l'a donné aux Polignac, on l'a donné à un simple soldat, à Berthier ; on l'a racheté par souscription et on l'a donné au duc de Bordeaux. On l'a donné à tout le monde, comme si personne n'en voulait ou ne pouvait le garder. Il semble n'avoir jamais servi et avoir été toujours trop grand. C'est comme une hôtellerie abandonnée où les voyageurs n'ont pas même laissé leurs noms aux murs. Je n'y ai vu qu'un seul meuble, un jouet d'enfant ; un modèle de parc d'artillerie offert par le colonel Langlois au duc de Bordeaux, et précieusement conservé sous des couvertures de toile.

En allant par une galerie extérieure vers l'escalier d'Orléans, pour examiner les cariatides qui sont censées représenter François Ier, Mme de Châteaubriant et Mme d'Étampes, et tournant autour de la fameuse lanterne qui termine le grand escalier, nous avons, à plusieurs reprises, passé la tête par-dessus la balustrade, pour regarder en bas : dans la cour, un petit ânon, qui tétait sa mère, se frottait contre elle, secouait ses oreilles, allongeait son nez, sautait sur ses sabots. Voilà ce qu'il y avait dans la cour d'honneur du château de Chambord ; voilà ses hôtes maintenant : un chien qui joue dans l'herbe et un âne qui tette, ronfle, braie, fiente et gambade sur le seuil des rois !

“*” Inédit, pages 20 à 22. allures retiennent quelque chose du calme du Nord ; tandis que la vivacité du Midi anime, dans l'expression, le sourire ; et cependant, malgré le caractère bâtard qui résulte ordinairement de la fusion de nuances opposées, la Touraine me paraît avoir une originalité distincte, pas bien forte il est vrai, mais fine, intime, qui n'est ni prose ni poésie et qui s'exprimerait, je crois, d'un seul mot, si je ne craignais qu'on ne le prît dans une acception trop élevée : ce serait celui de prose chantée.

Comme nous traversons le pont d'Amboise — il y en a deux, la ville étant bâtie sur les deux rives de son fleuve et au milieu ayant une île ; — il y a deux ponts, disons-nous, mais c'est le second qui est beau, un de ces vénérables ponts, un de ces vieux ponts bossus, étroits, gris, racornis au soleil et à l'eau, où il semble, on ne sait pourquoi, qu'une traînée de cavaliers passant dessus avec des bruits d'armures et de pieds de chevaux allant au pas ferait un bon effet et où on regrette de ne pas entendre chanter, assis sur la borne, un mendiant aveugle tournant sa vielle, ou une gitana nu-pieds dans la poussière, secouant son tambourin dont le son court et brusque est emporté par le bruit large de l'eau qui passe sous les arches. Donc, pendant que nous étions sur le pont, nous vîmes apparaître, débusquant de la promenade au pied du château, la garde nationale du lieu qui s'en revenait de la revue. Sur trente hommes environ qu'ils étaient, cinq ou six portaient l'uni-forme, les officiers seulement, le reste n'était que bisets, mais des bisets rares, vraiment en grande tenue avec des habits à queue de morue, des gilets jaunes et des gants noirs. Le dandysme du lieu consiste, je crois, dans cette affectation à mépriser le costume civique. Je dois avouer, à l'honneur d'Amboise, que je n'ai pas vu dans les rangs ou dans le rang (et je m'y attendais) aucun enfant habillé en artilleur tenant son papa par la main. Est-ce que cette monstruosité serait inconnue à cette bienheureuse ville ? ou bien la mode en est-elle passée ? ou bien les fortunes des particuliers ne sont-elles pas assez considérables pour atteindre à cette folle dépense ? N'importe, c'est honorable pour Amboise, car l'enfant habillé en artilleur et récitant des fables est le dernier degré de l'ignominie humaine.

Château d'Amboise. — Le château d'Amboise, dominant la ville qui semble jetée à ses pieds comme un tas de petits cailloux au bas d'un rocher, a une noble et imposante figure de château fort, avec ses grandes et grosses tours percées de longues fenêtres étroites, à plein cintre ; sa galerie arcade qui va de l'une à l'autre, et la couleur fauve de ses murs rendue plus sombre par les fleurs qui pendent d'en haut, comme un panache joyeux sur le front bronzé d'un vieux soudard. Nous avons passé un grand quart d'heure à admirer, à chérir la tour de gauche qui est superbe, qui est bistrée, jaune par places, noire dans d'autres, qui a des ravenelles adorables appendues à ses créneaux et qui est, enfin, un de ces monuments parlants qui semblent vivre et qui vous tiennent tout béants et rêveurs sous eux, ainsi que ces portraits dont on n'a pas connu les originaux et qu'on se met à aimer sans savoir pourquoi. Riez de cela, braves gens, on n'a pas écrit cette phrase pour vous.

On monte au château par une pente douce qui mène dans un jardin élevé en terrasse, d'où la vue s'étend en plein sur toute la campagne d'alentour. Elle était d'un vert tendre ; les lignes de peupliers s'étendaient sur les rives du fleuve ; les prairies s'avançaient au bord, estompant au loin leurs limites grises dans un horizon bleuâtre et vapoureux qu'enfermait vaguement le contour des collines. La Loire coulait au milieu, baignant ses îles, mouillant la bordure des prés, passant sous les ponts, faisant tourner les moulins, laissant glisser sur sa sinuosité argentée les grands bateaux attachés ensemble qui cheminaient, paisibles, côte à côte, à demi endormis au craquement lent du large gouvernail qui les remue, et au fond il y avait deux grandes voiles éclatantes de blancheur au soleil.

Des oiseaux partaient du sommet des tours, des angles des mâchicoulis, allaient se nicher ailleurs, volaient, poussaient leurs petits cris dans l'air, et passaient. A cent pieds sous nous, on voyait les toits pointus de la ville, les cours désertes des vieux hôtels et le trou noir des cheminées fumeuses. Accoudés dans l'anfractuosité d'un créneau, nous regardions, nous écoutions, nous aspirions tout cela, jouissant du soleil qui était beau, de l'air qui était doux et tout imbibé de la bonne odeur des plantes des ruines. Et là, sans méditer sur rien du tout, sans phraser, même intérieurement, sur quoi que ce soit, je songeais aux cottes de mailles souples comme des gants, aux baudriers de buffle trempés de sueur, aux visières fermées sous lesquelles brillaient des regards rouges ; aux assauts de nuit, hurlants, désespérés, avec des torches qui incendiaient les murs, des haches d'armes qui coupaient les corps ; et à Louis XI, à la guerre des amoureux, à d'Aubigné, et aux ravenelles, aux oiseaux, aux beaux lierres lustrés, aux ronces toutes chauves, savourant ainsi dans ma dégustation rêveuse et nonchalante, des hommes, ce qu'ils ont de plus grand : leur souvenir ; de la nature, ce qu'elle a de plus beau : ses envahissements ironiques et son éternel sourire.

Dans le jardin, au milieu des lilas et des touffes d'arbustes, s'élève la chapelle, bijou d'orfèvrerie lapidaire du XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle, plus travaillé encore au dedans qu'au dehors, taillé à jour comme un manche d'ombrelle chinoise. Sur la porte un bas-relief très réjouissant représente la rencontre de saint Hubert avec le cerf mystique qui porte un crucifix entre les cornes. Le saint est à genoux ; plane au-dessus un ange qui va lui mettre une couronne sur son bonnet ; à côté, son cheval regarde de sa bonne figure d'animal ; ses chiens jappent, et, sur la montagne dont les tranches et les facettes figurent des cristaux, le serpent qui rampe avance sa tête plate au pied d'arbres ressemblant à des choux-fleurs. C'est l'arbre qu'on rencontre dans les vieilles bibles, sec de feuillages, gros de branches et de tronc, qui a du bois et du fruit, mais pas de verdure ; l'arbre symbolique, l'arbre théologique et dévot, presque fantastique dans sa laideur impossible. Non loin de là, saint Christophe porte Jésus sur ses épaules et saint Antoine est dans sa cellule, bâtie sur un rocher ; le cochon rentredans son trou ; on n'en aperçoit que son derrière et sa queue terminée en trompette, tandis que près de lui un lièvre sort les oreilles de son terrier.

Ce bas-relief sans doute est un peu lourd et d'une plastique qui n'est pas rigoureuse. Mais il y a tant de vie et de mouvement dans ce bonhomme et ses animaux, tant de gentillesse et de bonne foi dans les détails, qu'on donnerait beaucoup pour emporter ça et pour l'avoir chez soi. Ça vaudrait bien les statuettes genre moyen âge qu'on trouve chez les coiffeurs, les sujets équestres d'Alfred de Dreux qu'on trouve chez les filles entretenues, et la Putiphar de M. Steuben qu'on ne trouve, Dieu merci, nulle part.

Dans l'intérieur du château, l'insipide ameublement de l'Empire se reproduit dans chaque pièce avec ses pendules mythologiques ou historiques et ses fauteuils de velours à clous dorés. Presque toutes sont ornées des bustes de Louis-Philippe et de Mme Adélaïde. La famille régnante actuelle a la rage de se reproduire en portraits. Elle peuple de sa figure tous les pans de murs, toutes les consoles et les cheminées où elle peut l'y établir ; mauvais goût de parvenu, manie d'épicier enrichi dans les affaires et qui aime à se considérer avec du rouge, du blanc et du jaune, avec ses breloques au ventre, ses favoris au menton et ses enfants à ses côtés.

On a construit sur une des tours, en dépit du bon sens le plus vulgaire, une rotonde vitrée pour faire une salle à manger. De là, la vue qu'on découvre est superbe. Mais le bâtiment est d'un si choquant effet, qu'on aimerait mieux, je crois, ne rien voir ou aller manger à la cuisine.

Pour regagner la ville, nous avons descendu par une tour qui servait aux voitures à monter jusque dans la place. La pente douce, garnie de sable, tourne autour d'un axe de pierres comme les marches d'un escalier et la voûte est, de place en place, éclairée par le jour rare des meurtrières. Les consoles où s'appuie l'extrémité intérieure de l'arc de voûte portent des sujets grotesques ou obscènes. Une intention dogmatique semble avoir présidé à leur composition. Il faudrait prendre l'œuvre à partir d'en bas, qui commence par l'Aristoteles equitatus (sujet traité déjà sur une des miséricordes du chœur de la cathédrale de Rouen), et l'on arrive, en suivant les transitions, à un monsieur qui s'amuse avec une dame dans la posture perfide recommandée par Lucrèce et par l'Amour conjugal. La plupart des sujets intermédiaires ont du reste été enlevés, au grand désespoir des chercheurs de fantaisies drolatiques, enlevés de sang- froid, exprès, par décence, et comme nous le disait, d'un ton convaincu, le domestique de Sa Majesté, "parce qu'il y en avait beaucoup qui étaient inconvenants pour les dames".

(*) Personne ne peut m'accuser de m'avoir entendu gémir sur n'importe quelle dévastation que ce soit, sur n'importe quelle ruine ni débris ; je n'ai jamais soupiré à propos du ravage des révolutions ni des désastres du temps ; je ne serais même pas fâché que Paris fût retourné sens dessus dessous par un tremblement de terre ou se réveillât un beau matin avec un volcan au beau milieu de ses maisons, comme un gigantesque brûle-gueule qui fumerait dans sa barbe : il en résulterait peut-être des aquarelles assez coquettes et des ratatouilles grandioses dans le goût de Martins. Mais je porte une haine aiguë et perpétuelle à quiconque taille un arbre pour l'embellir, châtre un cheval pour l'affaiblir ; à tous ceux qui coupent les oreilles ou la queue des chiens, à tous ceux qui font des paons avec des ifs, des sphères et des pyramides avec du buis ; à tous ceux qui restaurent, badigeonnent, corrigent, aux éditeurs d'expurgata, aux chastes voileurs de nudités profanes, aux arrangeurs d'abrégés et de raccourcis ;

(*) Inédit, pages 27 à 29. à tous ceux qui rasant quoi que ce soit pour lui mettre une perruque, et qui, féroces dans leur pédantisme, impitoyables dans leur ineptie, s'en vont amputant la nature, ce bel art du bon Dieu, et crachant sur l'art, cette autre nature que l'homme porte en lui comme Jéhovah porte l'autre et qui est la cadette ou peut-être l'aînée. Qui sait ? C'est du moins l'idée d'Hegel que l'école empirique a toujours trouvée fort ridicule — et moi ?

Moi, j'ai des remords d'avoir eu la lâcheté de n'avoir pas étranglé de mes dix doigts l'homme qui a publié une édition de Molière "que les familles honnêtes peuvent mettre sans danger dans les mains de leurs enfants" ; je regrette de n'avoir pas à ma disposition, pour le misérable qui a sali Gil Blas des mêmes immondices de sa vertu, des supplices stercoraires et des agonies outrageantes ; et quant au brave idiot d'ecclésiastique belge qui a purifié Rabelais, que ne puis-je dans mon désir de vengeance réveiller le colosse pour lui voir seulement souffler dessus son haleine et pour lui entendre pousser sa hurlée titanique !

Le beau mal, vraiment, quand on aurait laissé intactes ces pauvres consoles où l'on devait voir de si jolies choses ; ça faisait donc venir bien des rougeurs aux fronts des voyageurs, ça épouvantait donc bien fort les vieilles Anglaises en boa, avec des engelures aux doigts et leurs pieds en battoirs, ou ça scandalisait dans sa morale quelque notaire honoraire, quelque monsieur décoré qui a des lunettes bleues et qui est cocu ! On aurait pu au moins comparer ça aux coutumes anciennes, aux idées de la Renaissance et aux manières modernes, qu'on aurait été retremper aux bonnes traditions, lesquelles ont furieusement baissé, depuis le temps qu'on s'en sert. N'est-ce pas, monsieur ? Qu'en dit madame ?

Mais il y a des heures où l'on est en plus belle humeur que d'autres. L'excellent dîner que nous fîmes à Amboise et dont nous avons besoin (ayant de tout le jour plus nourri la Muse que la Bête) nous remit un peu de calme dans les veines et le soir, trottant lestement sur la route de Chenonceaux, nous fumions nos pipes et humions l'odeur de la forêt dans un état très satisfaisant.

Avant de nous mettre au lit, nous avons été nous livrer au même passe-temps sous les arbres qui entourent le château. La pluie tombait sur les feuilles vertes ; à l'abri sous elles, le dos appuyé sur le tronc des gros charmes, et cirant le cuir de nos chaussures sur la mousse humide, nous nous amusions du bruit des gouttes d'eau qui tombaient sur nos chapeaux.

Château de Chenonceaux. — Je ne sais quoi d'une suavité singulière et d'une aristocratique sérénité transpire au château de Chenonceaux. Placé au fond d'une grande allée d'arbres, à quelque distance du village, qui se tient respectueusement à l'écart, bâti sur l'eau, entouré de bois, au milieu d'un vaste parc à belles pelouses, il lève en l'air ses tourelles, ses cheminées carrées. Le Cher passe en murmurant au bas sous ses arches dont les arêtes pointues brisent le courant. Son élégance est robuste et douce et son calme mélancolique sans ennui ni amertume.

Vous entrez par une salle en ogives qui servait autrefois de salle d'armes, et où, malgré la difficulté de semblables ajustements, quelques armures qu'on y a mises ne choquent point et semblent à leur place. Partout, du reste, les tentures et les ameublements de l'époque sont conservés avec intelligence. Les vénérables cheminées du XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle ne recèlent pas, sous leur manteau, les ignobles et économiques cheminées à la prussienne qui savent se nicher sous de moins grandes.

Dans les cuisines contenues dans une arche du château, une servante épluchait des légumes, un marmiton lavait des assiettes, et, debout aux fourneaux, le cuisinier faisait bouillir pour le déjeuner un nombre raisonnable de casseroles luisantes. Tout cela est bien, a un bon air, sent son honnête vie de château, sa paresseuse et intelligente existence d'homme bien né. J'aime les propriétaires de Chenonceaux.

N'y a-t-il pas, d'ailleurs, partout de bons vieux portraits à vous faire passer de longues heures en vous figurant le temps où vivaient leurs modèles, et les ballets où tournoyaient les vertugadins de ces belles dames roses, et les bons coups d'épée que ces gentilshommes s'allongeaient avec leurs rapières. Voilà une des tentations de l'histoire. On voudrait savoir si ces gens-là ont aimé comme nous et les différences qu'il y avait entre leurs passions et les nôtres. On voudrait que leurs lèvres s'ouvrissent, pour nous dire les récits de leur cœur, ce qu'ils ont fait autrefois, même de futile, quelles furent leurs angoisses et leurs voluptés. C'est une curiosité irritante et séductrice, une envie rêveuse de savoir, comme on en a pour le passé inconnu d'une maîtresse, afin d'être initié à tous les jours qu'elle a vécus sans vous et d'en avoir sa part. Mais ils restent sourds aux questions de nos yeux ; ils restent là, muets, immobiles dans leurs cadres de bois ; nous passons. Les mites picotent leur toile, on les revernit, ils sourient encore que nous sommes pourris et oubliés. Et puis d'autres viennent aussi les regarder jusqu'au jour où ils tomberont en poussière, où l'on rêvera de même devant nos propres images.

Et l'on se demandera ce qu'on faisait dans ce temps-là, de quelle couleur était la vie, et si elle n'était pas plus chaude.

(*) Il y a, par exemple, deux grands portraits à cheval de MM. de Beauvilliers, l'un amiral, l'autre colonel de cavalerie ; ils sont bottés jusqu'aux cuisses, en grand habit vert, blanchi aux épaules par les tire-bouchons poudrés de leurs perruques, gantés à la crispin, coiffés du petit chapeau, et droits, fichés sur leur grosse mecklembourgeoise

(*) Inédit, pages 31 à 34. qui, rassemblée sur ses jarrets de derrière, se cabre convenablement pour faire le fougueux. Il vous revient là devant comme un souvenir des carrousels de Louis XIV et des grandes chasses à courre, avec des lévriers jaunes à taches blanches, une nuée de piqueurs en livrée entourés des meutes aboyantes, et les grandes trompes passées autour du corps, sonnante dans les clairières des hallalis prolongés.

Sur un dessus de porte une toile de chevalet vous montre de face la belle Gabrielle d'Estrées, nue jusqu'à la ceinture ; un gros collier de perles du même ton blond que sa peau pend sur sa poitrine, sa coiffure blonde, montée et crépelée, donne à son visage un air étonné plein d'une agacerie naïve ; à côté d'elle sa sœur, vue de dos, nue également jusqu'aux reins, détourne sa mine brune et vous regarde curieusement, tandis que, dans le fond, une paysanne en bavolet rouge et en cape blanche présente le sein à M. le duc de Vendôme, charmant maillot, tout ficelé et raide dans ses linges, qui écarquille les yeux, tend les bras et rit de sa petite bouche rose aux agaceries de sa bonne nourrice.

Nous avons encore remarqué, dans l'appartement qui sert de salon et où se trouve sur une table la masse d'armes de François I<sup>er</sup>, un beau portrait de Rabelais, figure bistrée, hilarante, sanguine, robuste, yeux petits et vifs, cheveux rares, barbe et menton de satyre, c'est évidemment le type d'après lequel on a fait tous les portraits du grand homme. Celui d'Isabeau de Bavière, au-dessous un peu à gauche, est singulièrement expressif : elle n'est pas coiffée de son grand bonnet pointu, que je lui avais vu ailleurs, et ce n'est plus la tête pâle et dolente du musée de Versailles ; une espèce de coiffure plate, à l'italienne, couvre les longs bandeaux blonds, à demi défaits, qui entourent sa figure blanche, à la fois sympathique et ardente, pleine d'irrésolutions et d'élans contrariés, elle a les lèvres avancées, le menton court et de grands yeux verts dont l'expression pleurarde est relevée par les bourrelets rouges de ses paupières inférieures.

Il y a encore sur tous les murs beaucoup d'autres toiles qu'on voudrait regarder plus longtemps tout seul et bien à son aise, sans qu'un concierge fût sur vos talons, tenant la clef de la porte à la main et vous invitant du geste à vous dépêcher d'en finir. Je me rappelle encore un portrait en pied de Louis XIII en Apollon, avec son menton pointu, ses petites moustaches droites et sa grande perruque noire qui retombe sur ses épaules et ombrage sa figure triste. Je n'ai jamais pensé à Louis XIII sans une certaine douleur, il me semble que c'est l'homme qui s'est le plus ennuyé sur la terre.

Nous n'avons pas pu entrer dans la salle du spectacle où fut joué le Devin de village, on la réparait ; mais nous avons vu un bon portrait de M<sup>me</sup> Dupin par Nattier. La figure est brune, éveillée, coquette, le nez retroussé, les lèvres roses, le regard noir et droit, l'air franc, amical, fripon et bon enfant, plus spirituel de beaucoup que celui de M<sup>me</sup> d'Humières, par exemple, avec sa bouche rose en cœur si sensuelle et tout humide.

Je ne parlerais plus de toutes ces belles dames, si le grand portrait de M<sup>me</sup> Deshoulières, en grand déshabillé blanc, debout (c'est du reste un noble visage et, comme le talent si décrié et si peu connu de ce poète, meilleur peut-être au second aspect qu'au premier), ne m'avait rappelé par le caractère infailible de la bouche, qui est grosse, avancée, charnue et charnelle, la brutalité du portrait de M<sup>me</sup> de Staël, par Gérard. Quand je le vis, il y a deux ans, à Coppet, la fenêtre était ouverte, le soleil l'éclairait en face, je ne pus m'empêcher d'être frappé par ces lèvres rouges et vineuses, par ces narines larges, renflantes, aspirantes. La tête de George Sand offre quelque chose d'analogue. Chez toutes ces femmes à moitié hommes, la spiritualité ne commence qu'à la hauteur des yeux. Le reste est resté dans les instincts du sexe. Presque toutes aussi sont grasses et ont des tailles viriles : M<sup>me</sup> Deshoulières, M<sup>me</sup> de Sévigné, M<sup>me</sup> de Staël, G. Sand et M<sup>me</sup> Colet. Je ne connais que M<sup>me</sup> Annaïs Ségalas qui soit maigre.

Nous avons vu dans la chambre de Diane de Poitiers, le grand lit à baldaquin de la royale concubine, tout en damas bleu et cerise. S'il m'appartenait, j'aurais bien du mal à m'empêcher de ne m'y pas mettre quelquefois. Coucher dans le lit de Diane de Poitiers, même quand il est vide, cela vaut bien coucher avec quantité de réalités plus palpables. N'a-t-on pas dit qu'en ces matières le plaisir n'était qu'imagination ? Concevez-vous donc alors, pour ceux qui en ont quelque peu, la volupté singulière, historique et XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle, de poser sa tête sur l'oreiller de la maîtresse de François Ier et de se retourner sur ses matelas ? (Oh ! que je donnerais volontiers toutes les femmes de la terre pour avoir la momie de Cléopâtre !) Mais je n'oserais pas seulement, de peur de les casser, toucher aux porcelaines de Catherine de Médicis qui sont dans la salle à manger, ni mettre mon pied dans l'étrier de François Ier, de peur qu'il n'y restât, ni poser les lèvres sur l'embouchure de l'énorme trompe qui est dans la salle d'armes, de peur de m'y rompre la poitrine.

(*) Nous lui avons cependant dit adieu à ce pauvre Chenonceaux, nous l'avons laissé avec ses beaux souvenirs, ses beaux portraits, ses belles armes et ses vieux meubles, dormant au bruit de sa rivière roucoulante, à l'ombre de ses grands arbres, sur son herbe verte ; et pleins de bonne humeur et les gourdes remplies, nous avons fait l'inauguration de nos sacs en allant à pied gagner Bléré, pour de là nous rendre à Tours en carriole.

Cette promenade n'a rien de récréatif, c'est une longue prairie assez maigre avec de rares peupliers pâles.

A Bléré, pendant qu'on donnait l'avoine au

(*) Inédit, pages 35 à 36. cheval et qu'on tirait de la remise le cabriolet qui s'y rongeait aux vers, comme un vieux roquefort oublié dans une armoire, nous avons été voir l'église où commence le goût d'ornements rococo, fleurs artificielles, rubans, pompons, guirlandes de papier peint, si remarquable à quelques lieues plus loin, dans les villes de l'Anjou, province qui semble avoir conservé de ses anciens maîtres des prédilections italiennes.

Jusqu'à Tours vraiment la route est belle, la campagne est ample et nourrie, riche à l'œil et bien portante, sans les exubérances presque sombres de la Normandie, ni les finesses de lumière du Midi. On passe sous de beaux arbres qui recouvrent le chemin comme des berceaux, ou au milieu de larges prairies qu'égayent çà et là des villes et des clochers, et, à partir de Montlouis, on va tout le long de la Loire, rencontrant l'un après l'autre, se succédant et revenant sans cesse, des châteaux au haut des collines, des vignes à côté des blés, des îles oblongues avec une couronne de peupliers et une frange de roseaux. Le vent est tiède sans volupté, le soleil doux sans ardeur ; tout le paysage enfin joli, varié dans sa monotonie, léger, gracieux, mais d'une beauté qui caresse sans captiver, qui charme sans séduire et qui, en un mot, a plus de bon sens que de grandeur et plus d'esprit que de poésie : c'est la France. Tours. — Saint-Julien ; portail nu d'un roman superbe ; trois charmants pleins cintres au haut ; intérieur délabré, magasins ; transept de gauche couvert de toiles d'araignée, magnifique de ton ; au fond par la porte on voyait un bazar parisien ambulante.

Plessis-les-Tours ; rue dans une campagne plate ; grand enclos de murs. — Maison de Tristan, petite, à ogive, ouverte. — Cathédrale de la fin du XV<sup>e</sup> siècle, ornée, lourde, intérieur plus pur, magnifique serrurerie dans le chœur.

Chinon. — A gauche en descendant la côte, les tours du château. —

Vue du château, à l'ombre duquel la ville est bâtie. — Chinon à l'air resserré, comprimé entre la Vienne et le château ; elle a été forcée de s'étendre en long. — A partir du pied, de l'endroit où le terrain monte, c'est la ville vieille, rues tortueuses et les voûtes silencieuses, les coques noires comme à Carcassonne et à Provins ; les ânes paissent dans les rues, les m..... de Gargantua s'écrasent sous vos pieds. — Le château sur la hauteur, forme d'un carré long alterné de tours rondes et carrées ; des arbres dans les fossés et de l'herbe qui remonte au mur. — Du côté de la tour d'Agnès Sorel, du côté opposé à la ville, le cimetière est au pied des tours ; deux gros noyers. — La tour de la cage de fer a trois étages. — Dans les deux étages inférieurs (la cage était dans le premier) il y avait une cheminée, anneau au plafond, inscriptions de prisonniers, chapelets, saints ciboires. — Partout au milieu des ruines, des lilas en fleur, de l'herbe. — Dans la chambre où Jeanne d'Arc a été reçue, des narcisses en fleur et des églantiers penchés les uns sur les autres. — A la tour qui sert d'entrée on voit la coulisse de la herse. — Partout à Chinon je cherche le souvenir de Rabelais et je ne trouve rien ; Rabelais au reste est-il un génie local ?

De Chinon à Fontevault, route charmante avec des sinuosités entre la verdure ; ce sont de grands arbres à large touffe. La nuit nous prit avant.

Fontevault, enfoncé un peu comme Jumièges, sans que l'on voie grande colline autour de l'abbaye. — Ce qu'il y a de plus curieux, c'est l'église dont l'abside (extérieure) est d'un beau roman avec des rotondes attenantes. — Salle capitulaire d'un gothique primitif ; cloître, gothique comme celui de Saint-Wandrille. — Directeur en robe de chambre bleue dans son cabinet, bègue, pointu, grand ignorantin. — Prisonniers au réfectoire, à la promenade, un à un, en silence forcé, à la queue du loup. — Pauvre Robert d'Arbrissel, âme d'amour, te doutais-tu de ces choses honteuses ? — Gendarmes, troupiers d'Afrique.

De Fontevault à Saumur. — Par le soleil qui chauffait les roches couvertes de verdure ; singulier pays pour sa douceur. — L'Anjou me semble une espèce de Normandie.

Saumur. — Officiers de cavalerie en costume de cheval. — Église. — Petites rues mal pavées, tortueuses avec des fleurs aux fenêtres. — Église Notre-Dame, rotonde. — Panthéon d'Agrippa. A gauche en entrant, sous une roche artificielle sombre et profonde, une femme en robe blanche, à manches à gigot, avec deux mèches de cheveux noirs, une qui pend à côté, l'autre qui passe sur sa taille, elle couchée au milieu des pierres, sur des rochers ; l'ombre de la voûte contraste avec le blanc du vêtement et la pâleur du visage. Malgré le laid de l'invention et le mauvais goût de tout cela il y a là quelque chose qui frappe et qu'on se rappelle. — Un saint Siméon de Philippe de Champagne ; belle tête du saint, blonde, éclairée, douce, émue ; un enfant à gauche qui marche. — Saint-Pierre, entrée latérale charmante, d'un roman exquis, mais ce qu'il y a de plus beau, c'est la couleur de la pierre qui est verte, bleue, etc. ; les chapelles intérieures sont couvertes de fleurs ; il y en a une qui représente une passion avec des rochers en relief en toile peinte ; partout l'élément moyen âge ogival disparaît sous le badigeon et sous l'ornementation italienne. La foi est évidemment aux chapelles, c'est là qu'on va ; les gravures religieuses sont entrelacées de guirlandes de lierre (comme à Bléré au petit autel latéral). — L'Anjou sent l'Italie. Est-ce souvenir ? reste d'influence ? ou l'effet de la douce Loire, le plus sensuel des fleuves de France ? — Nantilly est d'un roman pur, le plein cintre est large et fort ; on y monte par une pente, ancien escalier de cailloux ; elle est entourée de grands arbres. Comme ce serait beau sans l'affreuse couleur blanche !

L'allée couverte de Bagneux, large d'environ douze pas, longue d'à peu près trente, haute de huit pieds ; pierres monstrueuses ; la pluie tombait par les interstices et faisait des flaques d'eau dans l'intérieur ; deux trous dans le pan du fond laissant passer un jour vif et blanc ; les feuilles des arbres brillaient sous la pluie qui ruisselait ; l'intérieur des pierres était vert par places, plus blanc dans d'autres. — Conducteur inepte de notre américaine. — Troupeau de bœufs vendéens que nous avons croisés. — Art de la taille des arbres publié par l'Administration des ponts et chaussées ; l'idéal de l'ineptie et la haine de la nature s'est réalisé à Saumur sur la route de Poitiers, en sortant de Saumur. — Nos hôtes. — Encore le veau ! — Le salon de province : le velours d'Utrecht rouge paraît être, comme le veau, une des bases des mœurs de la province. — Le veau est parmi la viande de boucherie la viande universitaire et académique.

De Saumur à Ancenis par la Loire. — Fleuve doux, large, étendu, mais les peupliers donnent quelque chose de grêle au paysage. —

Tours rondes à Angers. — Saint-Florent à gauche sur une hauteur. — Mais la Seine est plus belle ; je ne mets la Loire qu'après la Seine et le Rhône ; nulle part je ne vois rien de pareil à Dieppedalle, à la Mailleraye, à Caudebec ; la Loire est plus française, plus douce, plus bourgeoise, plus prose. — Bateau à vapeur : la jeune fille et sa mère ; figure blanche froide ; l'officier de cavalerie, sa femme et son moutard ; des MM. Le bateau à vapeur est le bateau à vapeur.

Ancenis est ce qu'on appelle une affreuse petite ville, mal pavée, tortueuse, avec des maisons grises et pauvres, comme les petites villes du Languedoc, mais son dénuement lui donne un chic étrange ; personne dans les rues. — L'Hôtel de la Marine, femme de 40 ans, grasse, gracieuse ; la grand'mère, les deux petites filles ; les MM. de la table d'hôte s'ennuyant fort du pays et convoitant les délices de la capitale. — Jolie vue sur la Loire, une des plus belles du fleuve à coup sûr. — L'église est d'un nu rare et d'une ineptie curieuse : trois pyramides au pied d'une croix de la mission bardées du haut en bas de cœurs percés de flèches ; baldaquins en marbres ; ornements d'un goût déplorable. — Le château n'a plus que ses murs extérieurs garnis de créneaux et les deux grosses tours d'entrée dont l'une porte encore un boulet de pierre. L'intérieur est délabré, occupé par un jardin potager ; la concierge nous y promène avec ses enfants. Des ravenelles, des ronces, les belles plantes vivaces, les belles feuilles vertes se cramponnent partout, pendent dans les coins ; la vue du haut du donjon est singulièrement contrariée par l'aspect du pont suspendu. — Atroce charge de la pierre druidique dans la plaine druidique. — Plaisanterie pleine d'à-propos de mon honorable ami sur la pierre branlante. D'Ancenis à la Mailleraye, le paysage est triste quoique vert et fourni. Partout des enclos, des haies ; il y a quelque chose de sombre et de méfiant dans la campagne. On rencontre peu de monde quoique ce soit le dimanche ; les petites filles ont de grands bonnets comme les femmes qui sont toutes fort laides ; on voit des jeunes filles assises par deux ou trois au bord des fossés, tournant le dos à la grande route. — Les genêts se multiplient à mesure qu'on avance, les arbres deviennent plus forts et plus petits, plus râblés. — A Priailé, procession avec des drapeaux blancs. — Notre conducteur, normand de Domfront, cheveux presque blancs, yeux noirs qui me rappellent ceux du père Langlois, déteste les chouans ; en 1831 il ne nous aurait pas conduits par là pour 100,000 francs.

La Meilleraye est à découvert au milieu des bois abattus. — A la porte, des bœufs entraient comme nous sortions. — On nous a introduits au premier dans une salle de réception élevée, avec des fauteuils xviii<sup>e</sup> siècle ; air moitié monacal moitié château de campagne. Un moine est venu nous demander si nous n'avions pas besoin de quelque chose ; puis le frère hôtelier pour nous demander nos noms. On nous a menés à la chapelle, puis au parloir. Deux moines blancs sont venus se prosterner à nos pieds à plat ventre ; ils nous ont reconduits à la chapelle le temps de dire un ave et un credo et sont revenus dans le parloir nous lire un passage de l'Imitation n° 3, ch. xx. — Dîner dans une grande salle, nappe assez propre, couverts de fer. Un vieil abbé breton, petite figure ouverte, cheveux blancs, a servi des œufs durs à l'oseille, une espèce de bouillie en colle que j'avais prise pour des mattes, des pruneaux cuits. — J'ai pensé à la vertu grotesque et théologique que Henri Estienne leur attribue dans son apologie pour Hérodoté. — Figures : à ma gauche, un ancien militaire, calotte de laine, nez retroussé, favoris empire, l'air du carliste panné, grand amateur de beurre salé ; à ma droite, un paysan en faillite ? en face, grand jeune homme, bouche épaisse, mystique, mains fortes, tout à fait mystique ; en face, un curé d'environ 40 ans, homme de puissante encolure et de bonnes manières, en pénitence probablement ; à gauche, de mon côté, un vicaire en cheveux blancs, bas du visage singulièrement charnel et ignoble, front droit et assez intelligent, fort en chimie selon le vieil abbé breton qui a fait la conversation avec nous dans le jardin après le dîner. — Parmi les pensionnaires un affreux petit bonhomme en habit noir, casquette par-dessus son bonnet de soie noire.

La chapelle. — Après le salve nous sommes descendus de la tribune, les moines se sont mis à genoux, nous sommes au milieu d'eux pour réciter des litanies à la Vierge. La chapelle de la Vierge était tendue d'un rideau blanc ouvert comme un lit, l'autel avait un transparent rose recouvert de dentelles ; des fleurs artificielles ou vraies entouraient la femme de plâtre ; on a allumé les cierges et les voix sont parties. Il y avait dans l'arrangement de tout cela quelque chose de voluptueux, de conjugal ; ces pauvres hommes avaient l'air d'avoir préparé avec amour la couche de leur épouse céleste. Les voix étaient fortes, puissantes ; l'énergie de la vie y rapparaissait, s'y àiaissait jour. Quand nous sommes entrés dans l'église, il faisait jour encore ; le soleil, comme l'ironie de la nature, colorait en rose les parois et la muraille blanchies à la craie. — Agent voyer ami de l'établissement. — Dur noviciat des moines. — On ménage la vie de l'abbé à cause des droits de mutation à payer, aussi couche-t-il sur un matelas. — Trait de la mort de la mère d'un des moines annoncée au réfectoire. (Écrit le dimanche 9 mai dans la cellule de Saint- Théodore, 10 heures du soir.)

Dans le parloir, parmi les objets à vendre, une gravure intitulée "les faux plaisirs". On voit sur le premier plan un adolescent vêtu d'une robe, tenant un chapelet à la main et regardant en haut ; dans le ciel des anges jouent de la viole, avec leurs ailes pointues ; sur la terre, au contraire, on voit deux demoiselles décolletées et en manches à gigot dont l'une joue de la guitare et l'autre danse (celle-là a des manches à sabot et des bracelets), elles charment un jeune troubadour en veste et en culotte courte portant des favoris et leur jetant un regard en coulisse ; au fond un lac avec des peupliers. Il y a écrit au-dessous :

La volupté vous tente,
Fuyez, ne cédez pas,
Une joie innocente
Suivra tous vos combats.

On n'est pas venu me réveiller à 2 heures pour aller aux matines, la nuit s'est passée assez mal dans un lit taché de sang. Le matin, un matin gris et pâle, le déjeuner avec les mêmes inconcevables pensionnaires. Il y a une grande tristesse dans la nécessité de se lever de bonne heure pour manger. — Visite dans l'établissement : dans les ateliers pas de chants, un silence stupide ; salutations dans les corridors quand les moines vous rencontrent ; le petit bœuf dont on tournait les cornes ; ils ne nous ont pas parlé et ils voyaient que nous avions besoin d'explications, mais leurs yeux ! Deux moines en retraite dans le chapitre ; ceux-là vraiment jouaient bien ; au fond le siège de l'abbé avec la crosse. Réfectoire, couvert en bois, odeur humide et fade. — On pue beaucoup dans ce lieu de sainteté ! — Le réfectoire ainsi que le dortoir sont des lieux qu'on respecte spécialement, il n'est pas permis même aux étrangers d'y parler. — Le dortoir est d'une seule couleur et d'un bel aspect austère, gris couleur de bois ; le plafond comme le plancher est de bois, lit à colonnes carrées allant jusqu'au plafond ; entre chaque lit il y a un petit rideau en toile à matelas ; une pailleasse ; un pot de chambre sous chaque lit. — Cimetière, toutes tombes pareilles avec des croix noires ; la seule différence est qu'aux moines on met la croix aux pieds, aux abbés à la tête. — Le frère hôtelier n'avait pas au cimetière la tenue confite des ecclésiastiques, il marchait sur les tombes sans façon. — Ce qu'il y a de mieux à la Meilleraye.

Nous étions si pressés d'en partir que nous n'avons pas attendu la messe. — Notre joie dans les champs, portant le sac, retrouvant la liberté et le soleil. — Au bourg, après une omelette qui nous a paru excellente et des rognons délicieux, nous avons été dans le bois fumer sous les arbres.

Nort, indescriptibles fresques.

L'Erdre s'élargit tout à coup, gentille rivière avec de jolis aspects, des arbres dans le goût des vieilles gravures xvii<sup>e</sup> siècle, où on voit un homme pêcher à la ligne en culottes courtes, en chemise bouffante au nombril, tandis qu'à côté de lui une bergère arrange des fleurs dans son tablier et qu'un chien est couché à plat ventre sur le foin. — Nous retrouvons sur le bateau les MM. de la Meilleraye, le gros beau et le petit cancre en lunettes, que nous avons vus tout à l'heure s'agenouiller dans l'église de Nort. — Canotiers peu habitués aux lorgnons. — Verrières. — Entrée à Nantes ; nous y travaillons depuis avant-hier matin. (13 mai, 10 heures, Nantes.)

Ce sommaire a été développé par Maxime Du Camp. III

Nantes. — Grand lieu ; danses ; bonnet de flanelle blanche.

Musée : Elisabeth par Tibaldi. Prodigieuse fraise à gros tuyaux, brodée de noir ; menton avançant, figure longue, grands yeux bleus sortis, roulant, très animés ; sourcils ébouriffés à la base ; lèvre inférieure grosse, front haut, chevelure blond roux haut montée, avec des œilletons rouges sur le côté gauche ; elle est vêtue de noir et passe la main droite dans une chaîne d'or qui lui pend du cou.

Scène de carnaval de Lancret. Dans une grande chambre boisée une dame en corsage jaune et en jupon rose, avec de longs repentirs aux bras, est entre un pierrot et un danseur qui l'invite. On regarde autour. La teinte générale brun de madère est relevée par le costume rose et jaune de la dame et par l'habit gris des deux danseurs qui l'entourent.

Id. Camargo dansant en plein vent, robe de satin blanc avec des rubans bleus, des guirlandes de roses ; à sa droite un joueur de tambour et de fifre ; à gauche un violon, un basson, une femme qui regarde.

Un portrait de femme de Murillo : robe bleue, figure terreuse, ton verdâtre, yeux noirs, retroussés, mystiques et profonds ; elle tient un petit livre ; bandeaux noir de suie mal peignés, air idiot et profond.

Apollon et statues nues avec des feuilles de vigne en fer-blanc découpé.

Adoration des mages, avec des nègres, des gens qui regardent aux fenêtres ; figure stupide et crâne déprimé de celui qui est aux pieds du Seigneur.

Tableau de Daniel dans la fosse, de Zigler.

Musée d'histoire naturelle : deux petits fœtus de cochons ; td. d'hommes ; modèles de têtes de nègre et de chimpanzé, oreilles saillantes de la tête. Tête boucanée d'habitant du fleuve des Amazones, on lui a mis des dents dans les yeux ; à côté sont le collier et le bonnet de plumes bizarres. Tête boucanée de la Zélande, tatouage, soleils qu'on distingue encore sur son cuir brun, chevelure négligée, longues mèches pleines de férocité et de volupté !

Maison de la duchesse de Berry : impression triste, toute petite chambre, un sale papier bleu gris, nue, une table, plaque.

Château : tours, boulets et canon, pantalon rouge passant par une fenêtre, troupiers dormant sur l'herbe.

Cathédrale, vilaine à l'intérieur, trop courte à l'extérieur ; belle nef d'un beau jet, mais d'une vilaine voûte ; réparations de menuiserie en pitoyable chic moyen âge. — Aux chapelles, femme qui priait près d'un confessionnal. — Tombeau de François II, charmantes figures des petits anges qui portent les coussins. — A côté de l'église une boutique de « mercerie et objets de piété ».

Clisson, au confluent de la Sèvre et de la Moine. — Cascade qui gâte l'effet de ce paysage simple. — Toits plats en tuile. — Le château, les prodigieux lierres, arbre qui sort du mur. — L'intérieur, arbres, troncs verts. — Donjon des ormeaux, d'où l'on voit la prairie des chevaliers ; prison des femmes, crocs, porte ; impression si forte qu'elle n'en est pas triste. — Prodigieuse cheminée, grand pan de mur avec des fenêtres grillées par où le ciel bleu. — Triple enceinte. — La Garenne. — Le temple de Vesta. — Goût italien de l'empire en face de ces choses si vieilles et si belles d'elles-mêmes. — Temple à l'amitié.

Tiffauges, ruine tout ouverte dans la campagne solitaire. — Tour carrée le pied dans l'eau, nénufars, pas un bruit d'oiseau, vent qui ride les blés et fait trembler le lierre ; fenêtre carrée encadrée. — Restes de chapelle dans une tour où nous avons compté quatre étages ; au haut une cheminée avec des herbes et des fleurs dessus comme sur une jardinière. — Silence général. — Un enfant qui jetait des pierres.

(*> Sortant de chez les frères de la Trappe, il nous a semblé agréable de revoir des figures humaines et des biftecks au beurre d'anchois ; encore tout réjouis des fresques de Nort et tout épouvantés du souvenir de la Meilleraye, nous avons fait, le soir de notre arrivée à Nantes, la meilleure digestion qu'on se puisse sentir. Convenablement installés à l'Hôtel de France, nous avons pendant huit jours mené une vie fort plaisante. Nous avons pour nous servir une de ces canailles alertes et gracieuses qui plaisent aux gens bien nés, drôle intelligent, qui vendait de bons cigares et de bonne parfumerie. Nous écrivions dans notre chambre fraîche, nous nous lavions dans de grandes cuvettes ; nous nous amusions dans la cour avec un petit singe qui déchiquetait de ses dents et de ses ongles nos vieux gants blancs d'une façon à faire croire que c'était pour lui qu'on les avait inventés, ou bien nous allions dans le passage Pommeraye acheter des stores de Chine, des sandales turques ou des paniers du Nil, afin d'examiner à l'aise et de toucher avec nos mains toutes les babioles ve-

Inédit, pages 37 à 64. nues d'au delà des mers, dieux, chaussures, parasols et lanternes, futilités splendides en couleur qui font rêver à d'autres mondes, niaiseries sans usage qui pour nous sont des choses graves.

Je crois que Nantes est une ville assez bête, mais j'y ai tant mangé de salicoques que j'en garde un doux souvenir.

Ce qui prouve que Nantes ne nous a pas ennuyés, c'est que nous étions sur le point d'en partir quand nous nous sommes dit qu'il fallait cependant la voir.

Ce n'est pas la saleté sombre de Lyon, ni le mouvement du Havre ou de Marseille, ni l'alignement de Bordeaux, ville si joliment bâtie qui ressemble à un bel homme bien cravaté ; ça ne vaut pas Rouen qui serait beau si on ne l'embellissait et que j'aimerais si je n'y étais né. Du haut de la cathédrale, pourtant, on découvre un horizon qui vous récompense de vous être essoufflé à grimper les escaliers : en bas, à pic, les maisons se pressent et tassent leurs toits comme les chapeaux pointus d'une foule qui se serre aux épaules ; à gauche, une large prairie se mouille au bord du fleuve large et gris qui se divise et fait un coude, tandis que les deux cours de l'Erdre et de la Sèvre, multipliant leurs bras et leurs îles, découpent la campagne en grandes lignes grises. Ce jour-là le ciel était d'une lumière pâle qui, harmonisant sa teinte aux couleurs bourbeuses des eaux, donnait à cet ensemble un aspect tranquille et triste. La campagne est vaste, étendue, plus verte et plus vivante en remontant la Loire du côté de la Touraine, niais monotone et comme engourdie en s'avan- Çant vers les sables du côté de la mer. A tout prendre, l'horizon est large et beau, mais quel est l'horizon qui ne soit beau quand il est grand, et tous les horizons ne sont-ils pas grands quand on plane sur eux ?

Montez n'importe où, pourvu que vous mon- tiez haut, et vous découvrirez des perspectives démesurées aux paysages les plus plats. Quelle est aussi l'idée qui ne soit longue quand on y court jusqu'au bout, le cœur qui ne paraisse im- mense quand on y laisse couler la sonde ?

J'ai passé autrefois de bonnes heures dans les clochers d'églises ; appuyé aussi sur le parapet, je regardais les nuages rouler dans le ciel et les cor- beaux nichés dans les gargouilles s'envoler avec des cris rauques et de grands battements d'ailes. C'était assez fréquemment, pendant ma rhéto- rique, ma manière de suivre la classe ; y perdai-je beaucoup, et cela aussi n'était-ce pas du style ?

Une chose fort ordinaire m'a choqué et m'a fait nre, c'est le télégraphe que tout à coup, en me retournant, j'ai aperçu en face sur une tour. Les bras raides de la mécanique se tenaient immobiles, et sur l'échelle qui mène à sa base un moineau sautillait d'échelon en échelon ; placé au-dessus de tout ce qu'on voyait à l'entour, au-dessus de 'église et de la croix qui la termine, cet instru- ment disgracieux me semblait comme la grimace fantastique du monde moderne. Qu'est-ce qui passe dans l'air maintenant, entre les nuages et les oiseaux, dans la région pure où vient mourir la voix des cloches, et où s'évaporent les parfums de la terre ? C'est la nouvelle que la rente baisse, que les suifs remontent ou que la reine d'Angleterre est accouchée.

Quelle drôle de vie que celle de l'homme qui reste là dans cette petite cabane à faire mouvoir ces deux perches et à tirer sur ces ficelles, rouage inintelligent d'une machine muette pour lui ! Il peut mourir sans connaître un seul des événements qu'il a appris, un seul mot de tous ceux qu'il aura dits. Le but ? le but ? le sens ? qui le sait ? Est-ce que le matelot s'inquiète de la terre où le pousse la voile qu'il déploie, le facteur des lettres qu'il porte, l'imprimeur du livre qu'il imprime, le soldat de la cause pour laquelle il tue et se fait tuer ? Un peu plus, un peu moins, ne sommes-nous pas tous comme ce brave homme, parlant des mots qu'on nous a appris et que nous apprenons sans les comprendre. Espacés en ligne et se regardant à travers les âbîmes qui les séparent, les siècles se transmettent ainsi de l'un à l'autre l'éternelle énigme qui leur vient de loin pour aller loin, ils gesticulent, ils remuent dans le brouillard, et ceux qui, postés sur des sommets, les font se mouvoir n'en savent pas plus long que les pauvres diables d'en bas qui lèvent la tête pour tâcher d'y deviner quelque chose.

Où en étais-je donc ? à Nantes, je crois, à la cathédrale. Elle est dans le goût anglais du xv<sup>e</sup> siècle tout chargé de ciselures épaisses, tout alourdi des enjolivements stériles du gothique en décadence, et vilaine à l'extérieur, trop courte à l'intérieur ; la nef est d'un bon jet, mais la voûte assez laide et d'une courbe écrasée. Nous avons remarqué sous le portail, occupant l'entre-colonnement des nervures ogivales, des espèces de fûts de pierres simulant des troncs d'arbres, avec des naissances de branches coupées, comme serait un bâton de houx émondé. Cette particularité se reproduit dans plusieurs églises de la Bretagne. En fait de hideux, et de hideur rare, il faut signaler dans une des chapelles latérales une sorte de lambris plaqué sur les murs, fabriqué dans un chic moyen âge déplorable et atteignant aux dernières limites du rococo imitatif. Mais une chose vraiment belle, c'est le tombeau de François II et de Marguerite de Foix, sa seconde femme. Ils sont tous deux dans leurs beaux costumes du temps, couronne ducal en tête, étendus sur leur marbre, ayant aux pieds, le duc un lion, la duchesse un lévrier ; trois anges soulèvent le coussin où repose leur tête aux yeux fermés ; de grandes figures symboliques se tiennent aux quatre coins du monument. Le visage de la femme est gras, triste, nez relevé et paupières grosses ; celui de François II, assez dur, intelligent et rusé, un peu mêlé de force et de faiblesse comme fut sa vie, révèle bien le vieil ennemi de Louis XI, l'homme habile comme lui à conclure des traités équivoques et à nouer des alliances clandestines. Ils se trompaient à l'envi.

4- A la réconciliation d'Arras, 1477, *<sup>1</sup> fut stipulé qu'on jurerait la paix sur telles reliques que l'on voudrait, sauf sur le corps de J.-C. et sur la vraie croix, parce que le parjure en mourrait infailliblement dans l'année. Pendant qu'il parlementait avec le roi, il s'alliait avec l'Angleterre et faisait venir des armes d'Italie ; le roi, de son côté, promettait la Bretagne aux Ecossais et soudoyait le sire de Lescun, son conseiller. Une fois pourtant il eut un beau mouvement, qui fut de refuser le collier de Saint-Michel, 1470 ; d'après les statuts de l'ordre, il eût été forcé, en effet, de servir le roi envers et contre tous et de renoncer à toute autre alliance, or il préférait avec raison celle du comte de Charolais et du duc de Berry. Il aurait pu jurer et ne pas tenir, il faut lui savoir gré de la franchise. Louis XI, qui toute sa vie le combattit et qui le haïssait déjà avant d'être roi, mourut sans l'avoir pu vaincre, et quatre ans plus tard cependant, comme pour faire voir combien les gens médiocres triomphent parfois des grands hommes pour succomber ensuite sous de plus faibles qu'eux-mêmes, il est forcé de subir l'humiliant traité du Verger, 1488, et il en meurt de tristesse. Quoiqu'il ait établi des manufactures de soie à Vitré et de tapisseries à Rennes (ce qu'on a soin de mettre dans les livres où on le représente comme le défenseur dévoué de l'indépendance bretonne), j'ai toujours eu peu de sympathie pour cet homme terne qui faisait combattre un lion contre des ânes (celui que lui avait donné, quelque temps avant de mourir, l'amiral de Montauban) et qui si lâchement abandonna tour à tour son conseiller Chauvin à son favori Landois, et Landois aux ennemis de Chauvin, tiraillé en tous sens par mille liaisons qu'il dénouait, par mille influences qui se succédaient ; il est bien le père, quant au manque de cœur et à la sécheresse de caractère, de la froide et hypocrite Anne qui est pour moi une des figures les plus mal plaisantes du xvi<sup>e</sup> siècle.

Puisque nous parlons d'histoire, à cent pas de là, en face le vieux château, se trouve la maison où fut surprise la duchesse de Berry en 1832. Le cœur se serre dans cette petite chambre nue tendue d'un sale papier gris et à peine éclairée par des carreaux jaunes. Nous vîmes la plaque derrière laquelle se cachèrent la princesse et ses compagnons ; on a peine à croire qu'ils y aient pu tenir. Toute cette demeure est discrète et froide, on n'y entend aucun bruit, point d'enfant qui joue ni de chien qui aboie. Habitée par deux vieilles filles dévotes, avec son étroite cour sombre, son allée humide, son escalier de bois qui se pourrit à la pluie, elle a quelque chose de découragé, de ruiné, de honteux comme si elle sentait jusque dans ses pierres l'amertume du souvenir.

Il ne reste du vieux château que les deux tours d'entrée, celle dû pied-de-biche à gauche du pont-levis, celle de la boulangerie à droite. Il y a encore d'à peu près intact un autre corps de logis percé de fenêtres de la fin du x<sup>v</sup>e siècle, et dans la cour un vieux et beau puits orné d'un élégant couronnement de fer pour y suspendre des poulies. Des canons, cirés comme des bottes, sont rangés en ligne sur l'herbe à côté de boulets mis distinctement suivant leur calibre, comme les mètres de cailloux sur le bord des routes ; deux ou trois soldats couchés sur le dos dormaient tranquillement au soleil et sans doute rêvaient à quoi ? probablement que ce n'était ni au duc de Mercœur, qui fit bâtir le bastion de la Croix de Lorraine, maintenant délabré, ni au cardinal de Retz qui s'en évada, et pas davantage à la reine Anne qui se maria à Louis XII dans la chapelle du fer à cheval, convertie en poudrière. S'ils rêvaient, n'était-ce pas plutôt aux bonnes parties de boules que l'on faisait le dimanche après vêpres, au jour où ils apercevront le coq du clocher par-dessus les arbres de leur village ou à la payse qu'ils y ont laissée ? Il n'y a que les gens ayant pour métier de penser, qui se fourrent dans le cerveau les passions des époques disparues ; les braves gens ont assez des leurs ; ils font l'histoire — et nous, nous la lisons.

Deux ou trois hommes en chemises chantaient dans la caserne en brossant leurs habits et en polissant les boutons de cuivre avec de la craie. Au second étage, sur le rebord d'une ravissante fenêtre carrée, un pantalon rouge, étalé tout ouvert, laissait tomber ses deux jambes le long du mur, et déployait avec une impudence bête son grand pont à doublure grise. Quand nous fûmes sortis du château, nous allâmes visiter le musée. Le conservateur, occupé dans un coin à peinturlurer quelque chose, se dérangea de sa besogne et vint officieusement lier avec nous une conversation artistique, mais bientôt nous ayant vus admirer un Delacroix, le brave homme remit sa casquette sur sa tête et nous tourna les talons, ce qui nous le fit suspecter de se livrer au paysage Bertin ou au genre histoire romaine, à grands renforts de lances en queue de billard et de casques en pots à l'eau. Nous sommes restés longtemps devant un tableau dans la vieille manière allemande, représentant une Adoration des Mages ; le dessin en est d'une naïveté presque iro- nique : un mage, vêtu d'une sorte de manteau d'évêque, se prosterne aux pieds du Christ avec un air si stupide et un front si déprimé qu'on croirait volontiers que c'est une malice du peintre ; il y a des nègres singuliers, ajustés dans des cale- çons rouges et couverts de colliers de corail ; à une fenêtre, des femmes et des hommes passent la tête et montrent une mine ébahie. Tout cela est vivant et drôle, heurté en tons rouges et verts (un peu comme la Tentation de Saint Antoine de Breu- ghel), intense d'expression, amusant de détail, original d'ensemble et d'un effet impossible à faire comprendre quand on ne l'a pas vu.

Nous avons aussi remarqué la Scène de carnaval, Par Lancret. Dans une grande chambre boisée, une belle dame en corsage jaune et en jupon rose, avec de longues manches aux coudes, est entre un danseur et un pierrot qui l'invitent au menuet. Des deux côtés, sur des sièges, des amis sourient et causent. Au premier plan un petit enfant traîne un joujou ; c'est là une bonne maison où il fait chaud, une maison où l'on s'amuse ; on sent que dehors il pleut et que les masques courent dans la crotte, le temps est gris, un vrai temps de car- naval, on jouera tout à l'heure la comédie et l'on mangera ce soir des beignets.

J'aime beaucoup aussi du même auteur un por- trait de la Camargo. Elle danse en plein vent, sur l'herbe, en robe de satin blanc avec des rubans bleus et des guirlandes de roses ; à sa droite un tambour remue ses baguettes et un fifre enfle ses joues ; à gauche un violon, un basson et une femme qui regarde. La Camargo ! quel nom ! est-ce qu'il n'est pas tout résonnant de grelots ver- meils ? est-ce qu'il ne vous envoie pas, comme dans une ritournelle folâtre, avec le vent chaud d'une jupe qui tourne, une odeur de poudre d'iris ou de jasmin d'Espagne et des aperçus de rotules blanches qui se raidissent sur des édredons de soie jaune dans un boudoir plein de porcelaines de Saxe et tout couvert de pastels ?

L'antithèse, comme peinture, comme visage et comme idée, se trouve en face, dans ce portrait de femme qu'on attribue à Murillo.

Elle est vêtue d'une robe bleue blanchie par l'usage ; ses cheveux noirs de suie et mal peignés surplombent d'un ton mort sa figure verdâtre, sous son front bas et mélancolique ses yeux bruns retroussés vous envoient un regard idiotement profond qui déplaît tout en attirant ; à la main elle tient un petit livre, un livre de prières, elle passe sa vie dans les bas côtés de l'église, à l'ombre "humide des piliers, éblouie par les illuminations de l'autel, incessamment éperdue dans les emportements de l'amour mystique, et le soir elle rentre dans son grenier nu où elle a des apparitions de la Vierge et des voix d'anges qui l'appellent par son nom. Voici un rare et bon portrait, celui d'Elisabeth d'Angleterre, par Tibaldi. Il faut renoncer, s'il n'est pas ressemblant, à se faire jamais une idée des gens que l'on n'a pas connus, ce qui serait triste vu que tous ceux que l'on connaît d'ordinaire ne sont pas si récréatifs. Une prodigieuse fraise à gros tuyaux empesés, brodée d'un fil noir, enserre sa longue tête osseuse, aux pommettes saillantes et aux lèvres rouges ; son front pâle est droit, élevé et fièrement intelligent. Sous des sourcils blonds, rares à leur jonction, ses grands yeux bleus, sortis, grands ouverts, roulent et regardent avec vivacité et réflexion ; le menton pointu, le bout du nez rond, la bouche avancée où l'on pressent des dents longues décèlent la férocité sensuelle, tandis que la chevelure d'un blond roux, très montée et ondulée en demi-cercles successifs, et ornée d'œilletons rouges sur le côté gauche, lui donne un air raide et noble, un ragoût bizarre d'une distinction imposante. C'est celle-là qu'on appelait de son temps « l'émeraude des mers, la perle de l'Occident », et pour laquelle, jouant Richard III, Shakespeare s'arrêta tout à coup afin de lui ramasser son mouchoir.

Je donnerais bien le Villemain complet que j'ai acheté dans mon enfance, action insensée qui ne m'a pas fait interdire, ce qui prouve la débonnaireté de ma famille ; je donnerais aussi le cours de M. Saint-Marc Girardin que je conserve, comme dit René pour m'ôter à l'avenir tout mouvement de joie, j'y ajouterais même une vieille paire de babouches marocaines qui l'été m'est très commode, et de plus mes droits de citoyen, l'estime de mes compatriotes et le reste d'une bouteille de beau vernis qui commence à s'épaissir, oui, je donnerais tout cela de grand cœur et sur l'heure pour savoir le nom, l'âge, la demeure, la profession et la figure du monsieur qui a inventé pour les statues du musée de Nantes des feuilles de vignes en fer-blanc, qui ont l'air d'appareils contre l'onanisme. L'Apollon du Belvédère, le Discobole et un joueur de flûte sont enharnachés de ces honteux caleçons métalliques qui reluisent comme des casseroles. On voit, d'ailleurs, que c'est un ouvrage médité de longtemps et exécuté avec amour, c'est escalope sur les bords et enfoncé avec des vis dans les membres des pauvres plâtres, qui s'en sont écaillés de douleur. Par ce temps de bêtises plates qui court, au milieu des stupidités normales qui nous encombre, il est réjouissant, ne fût-ce que par diversion, de rencontrer au moins une bêtise échevelée, une stupidité gigantesque. Malgré tous mes efforts je ne suis parvenu à me rien figurer sur le créateur de cette pudique immondicité. J'aime à croire que le Conseil municipal en entier y a pris part, que MM. les ecclésiastiques l'avaient sollicitée, et que les dames l'ont trouvée convenable.

Nous avons été ensuite au muséum d'histoire naturelle, maigre collection qui, je pense, n'est pas curieuse pour un savant, mais où il y a néanmoins une momie égyptienne, debout, à côté de son cercueil peint, des coraux tout roses, des coquilles nacrées et des crocodiles suspendus au plafond. Il y a aussi dans un bocal d'esprit-de-vin deux petits cochons unis ensemble par le ventre et qui, cabrés sur leurs pattes de derrière, relevant la queue et clignant des yeux, sont, ma foi, fort plaisants. Placés ainsi à côté de deux fœtus humains, de monstruosité analogue, ils en disent peut-être plus long que beaucoup de nos œuvres. Mais quel est celui qui saura voir, dans ces manifestations irrégulières de la vie, les expressions multiples et graduées de cet art inconnu, qui gît dans son immobilité mystérieuse au fond des océans, dans les profondeurs du globe, dans le foyer de la lumière, y variant les créations successives et perpétuant l'Être.

Depuis six mille ans qu'il l'étudie, l'homme commence peut-être à épeler la première lettre de cet alphabet qui n'a pas d'oméga. Quand pourra-t-il lire une phrase ?

Si ce que l'on appelle les monstruosité de la nature ont entre elles leurs rapports anatomiques, c'est-à-dire plastiques, et leurs lois physiologiques, c'est-à-dire nécessaires pour exister, pourquoi n'auraient-elles pas (partant de ce principe et dès lors nous plaçant dans ce monde qui paraît la négation du nôtre et qui, peut-être, en est bien le corollaire), pourquoi donc tout cela n'aurait-il pas sa beauté aussi, son idéal ? Les anciens ne le croyaient-ils pas ? et leur mythologie est-elle autre chose qu'un univers monstrueux et fantastique, revêtu de formes impossibles à notre nature et belles pourtant, tant elles sont justes en elles-mêmes et harmoniques l'une à l'autre ? N'adorez-vous pas les longs cheveux glauques des Naïades et la voix des Sirènes, gouffre de mélodie qui faisait tourbillonner les navires ? Qu'est-ce qui n'a pas trouvé la Chimère charmante, aimé sa narine de lion, ses ailes d'aigle qui bruissent et sa croupe à reflets verts ? — Ne croyez-vous pas, comme s'ils avaient existé, aux Satyres ricaneurs qui pas-saient leurs oreilles pointues derrière les bouquets de myrtes et dont les pieds de boucs tombaient en cadence la nuit sur le gazon des jardins ? — Et ces rêves-là, pas plus que ceux de la nature, n'ont été non plus créés par un homme, ni mis au monde en un jour ; comme les métaux, comme les ro-chers, comme les fleuves, comme les mines d'or, et comme les perles, ils ont sourdi lentement, goutte à goutte, se formant par couches successives, se produisant d'eux-mêmes et se tirant du néant par leur force interne. Nous les contemplons pareille-ment avec un ébahissement inquiet et rétrospectif, cherchant peut-être au delà du souvenir si, avant notre vie, comme eux aussi nous n'avons pas existé, si nos pensées n'ont pas cohabité dans une patrie commune avec ces pensées devenues formes, si le principe de notre forme à nous n'a pas couvé jadis au sein de la chrysalide univer-selle, avec la graine des chênes et les sources qui ont fait la mer.

La belle chose qu'une tête de sauvage ! Je me souviens de deux qui étaient là, noires et luisantes à force d'être boucanées, superbes en couleurs brunes, avec des teintes d'acier et de vieil argent. La première (celle d'un habitant du fleuve des Amazones) porte des dents qu'on lui a enfoncées dans les yeux ; parée d'ornements d'un goût moui, couronnée de toutes sortes de plumages, et les gencives à nu, elle grimace d'une façon horrible et charmante ; à côté sont suspendus les colliers bigarrés de plumes d'oiseaux qu'autrefois dans la savane, quand elle criait et remuait, elle a pris sur les ennemis vaincus ; les colliers sont nombreux, ce qui prouve que c'était un brave, qui avait expédié beaucoup d'âmes à Areskoni, car ces petites choses-là sont l'inverse de nos mé-dailles de sauvetage. On a mis près d'elfe une tête d'homme de la Nouvelle-Zélande, sans autre orne-ment que les tatouages qui l'ont engravée comme des hiéroglyphes et que les soleils que l'on distingue encore sur le cuir brun de ses joues, sans autre coiffure que ses longs cheveux noirs, débouclés, pendants, et qui semblent humides comme des branches de saule. Avec ses plumes vertes sur les tempes, ses longs cils abaissés, ses paupières demi-closes, elle a un air exquis de férocité, de volupté et de langueur. On comprend en la regardant toute la vie du sauvage, ses sensualités de viande crue, ses tendresses enfantines pour sa femme, ses hurlements à la guerre, son amour pour ses armes, ses soubresauts soudains, sa paresse subite et les mélancolies qui le surprennent sur les grèves en regardant les flots.

Tout cela existe encore, ce n'est pas un conte, il y a encore des hommes qui marchent nus, qui vivent sous les arbres, pays où les nuits de noces ont pour alcôve toute une forêt, pour plafond le ciel entier. Mais il faut partir vite, si vous les voulez voir ; on leur expédie déjà des peignes d'écaille et des brosses anglaises pour nettoyer leur chevelure, écumeuse de la sueur des courses, plaquée de rouge par le sang caillé des bêtes féroces ; on leur taille des sous-pieds pour les pantalons qu'on leur fait ; on leur prépare des lois pour les villes qu'on leur bâtit ; on leur envoie des martres d'école, des missionnaires et des journaux.

Nous évitons généralement ce qu'on a soin de nous indiquer comme curieux, ainsi nous n'avons vu ni la colonie de Mettray, près Tours, ni l'hôpital des fous, à Nantes, ni les forges d'Indret, ni le fort Penthièvre, ni le phare de Belle-Isle et nous ne sommes pas encore entrés dans aucun des beaux cafés des villes où nous passons, mais nous sommes allés à Clisson. Sur un coteau au pied duquel se joignent deux rivières, dans un frais paysage égayé par les claires couleurs des toits en tuiles abaissés à l'italienne et groupés là ainsi que dans les croquis d'Hubert, près d'une longue cascade basse qui fait tourner un moulin, tout caché dans le feuillage, le château de Clisson montre sa tête ébréchée par-dessus les grands arbres. A l'entour, c'est calme et doux. Les maisonnettes rient comme sous un ciel chaud ; les eaux font leur bruit, la mousse floconne sur le courant où se trempent de molles touffes de verdure. L'horizon s'allonge, d'un côté, dans une perspective de prairies et, de l'autre, remonte tout à coup, enclos par un vallon boisé dont le flot vert s'évase et descend jusqu'en bas.

Quand on a passé le pont et qu'on se trouve au pied du sentier raide qui mène au château, on voit, debout, hardi et dur sur le fossé où il s'appuie dans un aspect vivace et formidable, un grand pan de muraille tout couronné de mâchicoulis éventrés, tout empanaché d'arbres et tout tapissé de lierres dont la masse ample et nourrie, découpée sur la pierre grise en déchirures et en fusées, frissonne au vent dans toute sa longueur et semble un immense voile vert que le géant couché remue, en rêvant, sur ses épaules. Les herbes sont hautes et sombres, les plantes sont fortes et dardues ; le tronc des lierres, noueux, rugueux, tordu, soulève les murs comme avec des leviers, ou les retient dans le réseau de ses branchages. Un arbre vert a percé l'épaisseur de la muraille et, sorti horizontalement, suspendu en l'air, a poussé tout à l'aise l'irradiation de ses rameaux. Les fossés dont la pente s'adoucit par la terre qui s'émiette des bords et par les pierres qui tombent des créneaux ont une courbe profonde, et la porte, avec sa vigoureuse ogive un peu cintrée et ses deux baies servant à relever le pont-levis, a l'air d'un grand casque qui regarde par les trous de sa visière.

Entré dans l'intérieur, vous êtes surpris, émerveillé par le mélange des ruines et des arbres, la ruine faisant valoir la jeunesse verdoyante des arbres, et cette verdure rendant plus âpre la tristesse de la ruine. Voilà bien l'éternel et beau rire, le rire éclatant de la nature sur le squelette des choses ; toutes les insolences de sa richesse, la grâce profonde de ses fantaisies, les envahissements de son silence. Un enthousiasme grave vous prend à l'âme ; on sent que la sève coule dans les arbres et que les herbes poussent, en même temps que les pierres s'écaillent et que les murailles s'affaissent. Un art sublime a arrangé, dans l'accord suprême des discordances secondaires, la forme vagabonde des lierres au galbe sinueux des ruines, la chevelure des ronces au fouillis des pierres éboulées, la transparence de l'air aux sailles résistantes des masses, la teinte du ciel à la teinte du sol, et vous en tressaillez intérieurement comme si cette double vie fonctionnait en vous-même, tant survient, brutale et immédiate, la perception de ses harmonies et la conscience de ses développements.

Au pied de deux grands arbres dont les troncs s'entre-croisent, un jour verdâtre passe sur la mousse, et le dôme des feuilles vous rabat une claire lumière qui, largement, illuminant tous ces débris, en épaissit les ombres et en dévoile toutes les finesses.

On s'avance, on s'en va, errant le long des barbacanes, passant sous les arcades qui s'éventrent et d'où s'épand quelque longue plante frissonnante. Les voûtes comblées qui contiennent des morts résonnent sous vos pas ; les lézards courent sous les broussailles, les insectes grimpent contre les murs, le ciel brille et la ruine assoupie continue son sommeil.

Avec sa triple enceinte, ses donjons, ses cours intérieures, ses mâchicoulis, ses souterrains, ses remparts mis les uns sur les autres, comme écorce sur écorce et cuirasse sur cuirasse, le vieux château des Clisson se peut reconstruire en entier et réapparaître pour nous. Le souvenir des rudes existences d'autrefois en découle comme de lui-même, avec l'émanation des orties et la fraîcheur des lierres.

De longues traînées noires montent encore en diagonales le long des murs, comme au temps où flambaient les bûches dans les cheminées larges de dix-huit pieds. Des trous symétriques alignés dans la maçonnerie indiquent la place des étages où l'on arrivait jadis par ces escaliers tournants qui s'écroulent et qui ouvrent sur l'abîme leurs portes vides. Quelquefois un oiseau, débusquant de son nid accroché dans les ronces, au fond d'un angle sombre, s'abaissait, les ailes étendues, et passait par l'arcade d'une fenêtre pour s'en aller dans la campagne.

Au haut d'un pan de muraille élevé, nu, gris, sec, des baies carrées, inégales de grandeur et d'alignement, laissaient éclater à travers leurs barreaux croisés le bleu vif du ciel qui tirait l'œil à lui par la séduction de sa couleur. Les moineaux dans les arbres poussaient leur cri aigre et répété. Une vache broutait, qui marchait là dedans comme dans un herbager, épatant sur l'herbe sa corne fendue.

Il y a une fenêtre, donnant sur une prairie que l'on appelle la prairie des Chevaliers. C'était, de dessus ces bancs de pierres entaillées dans l'épaisseur de la muraille, que les grandes dames d'alors pouvaient voir les chevaliers entrechoquer le poitrail bardé de fer de leurs chevaux et la masse d'armes descendre sur les cimiers, les lances se rompre, les hommes tomber sur le gazon. Par un beau jour d'été comme aujourd'hui, peut-être, quand ce moulin qui claque sa cliquette et met en bruit tout le paysage n'existait pas, quand il y avait des toits au haut de ces murailles, des cuirs de Flandre sur ces parois, des lames de corne à ces fenêtres, moins d'herbe, et des voix et des rumeurs de vivants, oui, là, plus d'un cœur, serré dans sa gaine de velours rouge, a battu d'angoisse et d'amour. D'adorables mains blanches ont frémi de peur sur cette pierre que recouvrent maintenant les orties, et les barbes brodées des grands hennins ont tressailli dans ce vent qui remue les bouts de ma cravate et qui courbait le panache des gentilshommes.

Nous sommes descendus dans le souterrain où fut enfermé Jean V. Dans la prison des hommes nous avons vu encore au plafond le grand crochet double qui servait à pendre ; et nous avons touché avec des doigts curieux la porte de la prison des femmes. Elle est épaisse de quatre pouces environ, serrée avec des vis, cerclée, plaquée et comme capitonnée de fers. Par le petit guichet grillé pratiqué au milieu on jetait dans la fosse ce qu'il fallait pour que la condamnée ne mourût point, car la porte, bouche discrète des plus terribles confidences, était de celles qui se ferment et ne s'ouvrent pas. Quel bon temps pour la haine ! Quand on haïssait quelqu'un, quand on l'avait enlevé dans une surprise, ou pris en trahison dans une entrevue, mais quand on l'avait enfin, qu'on le tenait, on pouvait à son aise le sentir mourir d'heure en heure, de minute en minute, compter ses angoisses, boire ses larmes, On descendait dans son cachot, on lui parlait, on marchandait son supplice pour rire de ses tortures, on débattait sa rançon ; on vivait sur lui, de lui, de sa vie qui s'éteignait, de son or qu'on lui prenait. Toute votre demeure, depuis le sommet des tours jusqu'au pied des douves, pesait sur lui, l'écrasait, l'ensevelissait ; et les vengeances de famille s'accomplissaient ainsi, dans la famille, et par la maison elle-même qui en constituait la force et en symbolisait l'idée.

Quelquefois, cependant, quand ce misérable était un grand seigneur, un homme riche, quand il allait mourir, quand on en était repu et que les larmes de ses jeux avaient fait à la haine de son maître comme des saignées rafraîchissantes, alors on parlait de le relâcher. Le prisonnier promettait tout : il rendrait ses places fortes, il remettrait les clefs de ses meilleures villes, il donnerait sa fille en mariage, il doterait des églises, il irait à pied au Saint-Sépulcre. Et de l'argent ! de l'argent encore ! Il en ferait plutôt faire par les juifs ! Donc on signait le traité, on le contre-signait, on l'antidatait ; on apportait les reliques, on jurait dessus, et le prisonnier revoyait le soleil. Il enfourchait un cheval, partait au galop, rentrait chez lui, faisait baisser la herse, convoquait ses gens et décrochait son épée. Sa haine éclatait au dehors en explosions féroces. C'était le moment des colères terrifiantes et des rages victorieuses. Le serment ? le pape vous en relevait, et pour la rançon, on ne la payait pas.

Lorsque Clisson fut enfermé dans le château de l'Hermine, il promit pour en sortir cent mille francs d'or, la restitution des places appartenant au duc de Penthievre, la non-exécution du mariage de sa fille Marguerite avec le duc de Penthievre. Et, dès qu'il fut sorti, il commença par attaquer Chatelaudren, Guingamp, Lamballe et Saint-Malo, qui furent pris ou capitulèrent. Le duc de Penthievre se maria avec sa fille, et quant aux cent mille francs d'or qu'il avait soldés, on les lui rendit. Mais ce furent les peuples de Bretagne qui payèrent. 1

Lorsque Jean V fut enlevé, au pont de Loroux, par le comte de Penthievre, il promit une rançon d'un million ; il promit sa fille aînée, fiancée déjà au roi de Sicile. Il promit Moncontour, Sesson et Jugon, et ne donna ni sa fille, ni l'argent, ni les places fortes. Il avait fait le vœu d'aller au Saint-Sépulcre. Il s'en acquitta par procureur. Il avait fait vœu de ne plus lever ni tailles ni subsides ; le pape l'en dégagea. Il avait fait vœu de donner à Notre-Dame de Nantes son pesant d'or ; mais comme il pesait près de deux cents livres, il resta fort endetté. Avec tout ce qu'il put ramasser et prendre, il forma bien vite une ligue et força les Penthievre à lui acheter cette paix, qu'ils avaient vendue.

De l'autre côté de la Sèvre, et s'y trempant les P'eds, s'étend sur la colline le bois de « la Garenne », parc très beau de lui-même, malgré ses beautés factices. M. Lemot (le père du propriétaire actuel), qui était un peintre de l'Empire et un artiste lauréat, a travaillé là du mieux qu'il a pu à reproduire ce froid goût italien, républicain, romain, si fort à la mode du temps de Canova et de madame de Staël. On était pompeux, grandiose et digne. C'était le temps où on sculptait des urnes sur les tombeaux, où l'on vous peignait en manteau et chevelure au vent, où Corinne chantait sur sa lyre, à côté d'Oswald qui a des bottes à la russe, et où il fallait enfin qu'il y eût sur toutes les têtes beaucoup de cheveux épars et dans tous les paysages beaucoup de ruines.

Ce genre noble ne manque pas à la Garenne. Il y a un temple de Vesta et, en face, un temple à l'Amitié, grand tombeau renfermant deux amis (M. Lemot et le sénateur Cacot), ce qui fait passer un peu par-dessus le ridicule du nom qu'ils ont choisi pour leur boîte commune. Ne nions pas, en effet, les sentiments prétentieux et les enthousiasmes déclamatoires, on peut pleurer de bonne foi tout en arrondissant gracieusement Je coude pour tirer son mouchoir, faire une pièce de vers sur un bonheur ou un malheur quel- conque et le faire sentir aussi bien que ceux qui n'en font pas, et il n'est pas encore absolument prouvé qu'il soit impossible d'aimer la femme que l'on appelle sa déité ou son bel ange d'amour.

Les inscriptions, les rochers composés, les ruines artificielles sont prodigués ici avec naïveté et conviction. Sur un morceau de granit, on lit cet illustre vers de Delille :

Sa masse indestructible a fatigué le temps.

Plus loin, vingt vers du même Delille ; ailleurs, sur une pierre taillée en forme de tombe : In Ar- cadia ego, non-sens dont je n'ai pu découvrir l'in- tention. Mais toutes les richesses poétiques sont réunies dans la grotte d'Héloïse, sorte de dolmen naturel sur le bord de la Sèvre.

(#) "Ce que nous éprouvons dans ces lieux, dit M. Richer, auteur d'un voyage dans la Loire-Infé- rieure, Héloïse l'a éprouvé, elle a senti, admiré, et rêvé comme nous. » Eh bien, je l'avoue, je ne suis pas comme M. Richer ni comme Héloïse, j'ai senti peu de chose, je n'ai admiré que les arbres, trouvant que la grotte qu'ils ombragent serait très congruante pour y déjeuner, l'été, en compagnie de quelques amis et d'Héloïses quelconques, d'au- tant que la proximité de l'eau permettrait d'y mettre rafraîchir les bouteilles, et je n'ai rien rêvé du tout. Mais il y a des gens heureux, des gens bien doués, sensibles, imaginatifs, qui sont tou- jours à la hauteur des circonstances, qui ne man- quent pas de pleurer à tous les enterrements, de rire à toutes les noces, et d'avoir des souvenirs devant toutes les tuiles cassées et toutes les bi- coques non construites à la mode du jour. Ceux- là vous disent que la vue de la mer leur inspire de grandes pensées et que la contemplation d'une forêt élève leur âme vers Dieu. Ils sont tristes en regardant la lune, et gais en regardant la foule. « Ce nom consacré, continue M. Richer, c'était lui seul que cette grotte devait offrir. L'inscription qu'on y lit est peut-être inutile, car le sentiment est toujours plus prompt que la parole. » Quoique que je pense comme lui que l'inscription n'était pas utile, je ne peux cependant résister au plaisir de la transcrire.

Inédit, pages 71 à 73. je sois volontiers de l'avis de M. Richer et

Héloïse peut-être erra sur ce rivage,
Quand aux yeux des jaloux dérobant son séjour
Dans les murs du Pollet elle vint mettre au jour Un fils, cher et malheureux gage De ses plaisirs furtifs et de son tendre amour.

Peut-être en ce réduit sauvage, Seule plus d'une fois elle vint souponner Et goûter librement la douceur de pleurer.

Peut-être, sur ce roc assise,
Elle rêvait k son malheur. J'y veux rêver aussi ! j'y veux remplir mon cœur

Du doux souvenir d'Héloïse.

Et là-dessus le visiteur ingénu s'efforce à se figurer Héloïse errante sur ce rivage avec le petit Astrolabe qu'elle tient par la main, il s'apitoie sur le résultat de ses plaisirs furtifs et de son tendre amour ; il est vrai que si l'idée du tendre amour l'afflige, le tableau des plaisirs furtifs le ragailardit un peu ; il tâche de trouver sauvage ce réduit, il ne s'en doutait pas tout à l'heure, mais cependant if fe trouve sauvage en effet ; enfin if fa voit pleurant sur le roc assise, rêvant à son malheur, et il veut rêver aussi, il veut remplir son cœur du doux souvenir d'Héloïse. Il le remplit donc ou du moins il fait tout son possible pour le remplir. Mais non, il ne le remplit pas assez, il ne le remplit pas à son gré, il voudrait l'en remplir tout à fait, l'en combler, l'en bourrer, l'en faire craquer... n'importe ! Il s'en retourne, écrit son nom sur l'album du concierge, tire sa pièce de 30 sols et part heureux : il a eu des émotions, il a eu des souvenirs.

Pourquoi donc a-t-on fait de cette figure d'Hé- •oïse, qui était une si noble et si haute figure, quelque chose de banal et de niais, le type fade de tous les amours contrariés et comme l'idéal étroit de la fillette sentimentale ? Elle méritait mieux pourtant, cette pauvre maîtresse du grand Abélard, celle qui l'aima d'une admiration si dévouée, quoiqu'il fût dur, quoiqu'il fût sombre et qu'il ne lui épargnât ni les amertunes ni les coups. Elle craignait "de l'offenser plus que Dieu même, et désirait lui plaire plus qu'à lui ». Elle ne voulait pas qu'il l'épousât, trouvant que « c'était chose messéante et déplorable que celui que la nature avait créé pour tous... une femme se l'apropriât et le prit pour elle seule... », sentant, di- sait-elle “plus de douceur à ce nom de maîtresse et de concubine qu’à celui d’épouse, qu’à celui d’impératrice », et, s’humiliant en lui, espérant gagner davantage dans son cœur.

O créatures sensibles, ô pécores romantiques qui, le dimanche, couvrez d’immortelles son mau- solée coquet, on ne vous demande pas d’étudier ‘a théologie, le grec ni l’hébreu dont elle tenait école, mais tâchez de gonfler vos petits cœurs et d’élargir vos courts esprits pour admirer dans son Nîtelligence et dans son sacrifice tout cet immense amour. Le parc n’en est pas moins un endroit dés- agréable. Les allées serpentent dans le bois taillis, les touffes d’arbres retombent dans la rivière. On entend l’eau couler, on sent la bonne odeur des feuilles. Si nous avons été irrités du mauvais goût qui s’y trouve, c’est que nous sortions de Clisson qui est d’une beauté si solide et si simple, et puis que ce mauvais goût, après tout, n’est plus notre mauvais goût à nous autres. Mais d’ailleurs, qu’est- ce donc que le mauvais goût ? N’est-ce pas inva- riablement le goût de l’époque qui nous a pré- cédés. Tous les enfants ne trouvent-ils pas leur père ridicule ? Le mauvais goût du temps de Ron- sard, c’était Marot ; du temps de Boileau, c’était Ronsard ; du temps de Voltaire, c’était Corneille, et c’était Voltaire du temps de Chateaubriand que beaucoup de gens, à cette heure, commencent à trouver un peu faible. O gens de goût des siècles futurs, je vous recommande les gens de goût de maintenant. Vous rirez un peu de leurs crampes d’estomac, de leurs dédains superbes, de leur prédilection pour le veau et pour le laitage et des grimaces qu’ils font quand on leur sert de la viande saignante et des poésies trop chaudes.

Comme ce qui est beau sera laid, comme ce qui est gracieux paraîtra sot, comme ce qui est riche semblera pauvre, nos délicieux bou- doirs, nos charmants salons, nos ravissants cos- tumes, nos intéressants feuillets, nos drames palpitants, nos livres sérieux, oh ! oh ! comme on nous fourrera au grenier, comme on en fera de la bourre, du papier, du fumier, de l’engrais ! Ô postérité ! n’oublie pas surtout nos parloirs gothiques, nos ameublements Renaissance, les discours de M. Pasquier, la forme de nos chapeaux et l’esthétique de la Revue des Deux-Mondes !

C’est en nous laissant aller à ces considérations philosophiques que notre carriole nous traîna jusqu’à Tiffauges. Placés tous deux dans une espèce de cuve en fer-blanc, nous écrasions de notre poids l'imperceptible cheval qui ondulait dans les brancards : c'était le frétillement d'une anguille dans le corps d'un rat de Barbarie. Les descentes le poussaient en avant, les montées le tiraient en arrière, les débords le jetaient de côté et le vent l'agitait sous la grêle des coups de fouet. Pauvre bête ! Je n'y puis penser sans de certains remords.

La route, taillée dans la côte, descend en tournant, couverte sur ses bords par des massifs d'ajoncs, ou par de larges banques d'une mousse roussâtre. A droite, au pied de la colline, sur un mouvement de terrain qui se soulève du fond du vallon, de grands pans de muraille inégaux allongent les uns par-dessus les autres leurs sommets ébréchés.

On suit une haie, on prend un sentier, on entre sous un porche tout ouvert qui s'est enfoncé dans le sol jusqu'aux deux tiers de son ogive. Les hommes qui y passaient jadis à cheval n'y passeraient plus qu'en se courbant maintenant. Quand la terre s'ennuie de porter un monument trop longtemps sur elle, elle s'enfle de dessous, monte sur lui, le gagne, et pendant que le ciel lui rogne la tête elle lui enfouit les pieds. La cour est déserte, l'en- ceinte est vide, les herbes ne remuent pas, l'eau dormante des fossés reste plate et immobile sous les ronds nénufars.

Le ciel était blanc, sans nuages, mais sans soleil. Sa courbe pâle s'étendait au large, couvrait la campagne d'une monotonie froide et dolente. On n'entendait aucun bruit, il faisait silence, les oiseaux ne chantaient pas, l'horizon même n'avait point de murmure, et les sillons vides — c'était un dimanche — ne vous envoyaient ni les glapissements des corneilles qui s'envolent, ni le bruit doux du fer des charrues. Nous sommes descendus à travers les ronces dans une douve profonde, cachée au pied d'une tour qui se baigne dans l'eau et dans les roseaux. Une seule fenêtre s'ouvre, un carré d'ombre coupé par la raie grise de son croisillon de pierre. Une touffe folâtre de chèvre-feuille sauvage s'est pendue sur le rebord et passe en dehors sa bouffée verte et parfumée. Les grands mâchicoulis, quand on lève la tête, laissent voir d'en bas, par leurs ouvertures béantes, le ciel seulement ou quelque petite fleur inconnue qui s'est nichée là, apportée par le vent, un jour d'orage, et dont la graine aura poussé à l'abri, dans la fente des pierres.

Tout à coup un souffle de vent est venu, doux et long, comme un soupir qui s'exhale, et les arbres dans les fossés, les herbes sur les pierres, les joncs et les lentilles dans l'eau, les plantes des ruines et les gigantesques lierres qui, de la base au faite, revêtaient la tour sous leur couche uniforme de verdure luisante, ont tous frémi et clapoté leur feuillage ; les blés dans les champs ont roulé leurs vagues blondes, qui s'allongeaient, sur les têtes mobiles des épis. La mare d'eau s'est ridée et a poussé un flot sur le pied de la tour ; les feuilles des lierres ont toutes frissonné ensemble, et un pommier en fleur a laissé tomber ses boutons roses.

Rien, le vent qui passe, l'herbe qui pousse, le ciel à découvert. Pas d'enfant en guenilles gardant une vache qui broute la mousse dans les cailloux ; pas même, comme ailleurs, quelque chèvre solitaire sortant sa tête barbue par une crevasse de remparts et qui s'enfuit effrayée en faisant remuer les broussailles ; pas un oiseau chantant, pas un nid, pas un bruit ! Ce château est comme un fantôme, muet, abandonné dans cette campagne déserte ; il a l'air maudit et plein de ressouvenances farouches. Il fut habité pourtant, ce séjour triste dont les hiboux maintenant semblent ne pas vouloir. Dans le donjon, entre quatre murs livides comme le fond des vieux abreuvoirs, nous avons compté la trace de cinq étages. A trente pieds en l'air, ayant encore ses deux piliers ronds et sa plaque noircie, une cheminée est restée suspendue. Il est tombé de la terre dessus et des plantes y sont venues comme dans une jardinière qui serait restée là. Au delà de la seconde enceinte, dans un champ labouré, on reconnaît les restes d'une chapelle, aux fûts brisés d'un portail ogival. L'avoine y a poussé, et les arbres ont remplacé les colonnes. Cette chapelle, jadis, était pleine d'ornements d'or et de soie, d'encensoirs, de chandeliers, de calices, de croix, de pierreries, de plats de vermeil, de burettes d'or ; un chœur de trente chanteurs, chapelains, musiciens, enfants, y poussaient des hymnes aux sons d'un orgue qui les suivait quand ils allaient en voyage. Ils étaient couverts d'habits d'écarlate fourrés de petit-gris et de menu-vair. Il y en avait un que l'on appelait l'archidiacre, un autre que l'on appelait l'évêque, et on demandait au pape qu'il leur fût permis de porter la mitre comme à des chanoines ; car cette chapelle était la chapelle et ce château était un des châteaux de Gilles de Laval, sire de Rouci, de Montmorency, de Retz et de Craon, lieutenant général du duc de Bretagne et maréchal de France, brûlé à Nantes, le 25 octobre 1440, dans la Prie de la Madeleine, comme faux monnayeur, assassin, sorcier, sodomite et athée.

Il avait en meubles plus de cent mille écus d'or, trente mille livres de rente, et les profits de ses fiefs, et les gages de son office de maréchal ; cinquante hommes magnifiquement vêtus l'escortaient à cheval. Il tenait table ouverte, on y servait les viandes les plus rares, les vins les plus lointains, et on représentait des mystères chez lui comme dans les villes aux entrées des rois. Quand il n'eut plus d'argent, il vendit ses terres ; quand il eut vendu ses terres, il chercha l'or ; et quand il eut détruit ses fourneaux, il appela le diable. Il lui écrivit qu'il lui donnerait tout, sauf son âme et sa vie. Il fit des sacrifices, des encensements, des aumônes et des solennités en son honneur. C'était là que vivait cet homme. Ces caveaux se rougissaient sous le vent incessant des soufflets magiques, ces murs s'illuminaient la nuit à l'éclat des torches qui brûlaient au milieu des hanaps pleins de vin des îles, et parmi les jongleurs bohèmes ; on invoquait l'enfer, on se régalaient avec la mort, on égorgeait des enfants, on avait d'épouvantables joies et d'atroces plaisirs ; le sang coulait, les instruments jouaient, tout retentissait de voluptés, d'horreurs et de délires.

Quand il fut mort, quatre ou cinq demoiselles firent ôter son corps du bûcher, l'ensevelirent et le firent porter aux Carmes où, après des obsèques fort honorables, il fut inhumé solennellement.

On lui éleva sur un des ponts de la Loire, en face de l'Hôtel de la Boule-d'Or, un monument expiatoire ; c'était une niche dans laquelle se trouvait la statue de la bonne Vierge de Crée-lait qui avait la vertu d'accorder du lait aux nourrices ; on y apportait du beurre et d'autres offrandes rustiques. La niche y est encore, mais la statue n'y est plus, de même qu'à l'hôtel de ville la boîte où contenait le cœur de la reine Anne est vide aussi. Nous étions peu curieux de voir cette boîte, nous n'y avons pas seulement songé. J'aurais préféré contempler la culotte du maréchal de Retz, que le cœur de madame Anne de Bretagne ; il y a eu plus de passions dans l'une que de grandeur dans l'autre. IV

De Nantes À Saint-Nazaire. — La Loire, large et plate.

De Saint-Nazaire à Pornichet, aubépines, ajoncs. — Chemins à travers les haies de Pornichet au Pouliguen. — La baie déserte ; au bord des flots, sur le sable dur, des coquilles roses et blanches ; dunes couvertes de jons. — Le bac. — Le Pouliguen. — Jusqu'au Bourg-de-Batz, marais salins, pas un arbre ; paludiers. — Cabaret de Baz, bar-riques, deux lits hauts ; sur la cheminée une Vierge en costume ; à une fenêtre le mari, la mariée, trogne rouge d'un homme. — Vieille abbaye d'un bon gothique, toute découverte. — Surprise et curiosité des enfants à nos aspects. — Femme qui met sur les murs de la bouse de vache, ça remet les pierres et sert de mortier. — Jusqu'au Croisic plus rien que des plaines de sable recouvertes d'une herbe maigre ; le ciel bleu pâle à grandes lignes blanches ; les vaches sont petites, les moutons noirs.

Le Croisic. — Le beau temps. — Dune ; varech sous l'eau en allant au bout de la jetée. — Charlotte, bonnet égyptien.

Do Croisic à Guérande. — Au bord de la mer et à travers les marais. — Guérande sur une hauteur qui domine le pays ; les fortifications entourées d'arbres, petits peupliers ; à gauche de l'entrée Nord l'eau baigne le pied des tours ; nous retrouvons ce que nous avons vu à Clisson. — Caractère doux de ces ruines ; ces fortifications me font

6 penser à Avignon. — Moucharabieh éventré, lierres ; mais la beauté naturelle est au pied, dans l'eau sur laquelle les petites plantes vertes ont fait comme une grande couche de peinture.

Église anglaise de caractère ; portail haut, d'une ogive assez pure et pas trop ornementée pour son époque. A la place de la rosace on a accolé l'orgue. Sur un cartouche, il y a, presque illisible, « le peuple français reconnaît un Dieu suprême et l'immortalité de l'âme ». Les deux entrées latérales ont un portique couvert comme l'église de Louviers, à laquelle du reste celle-ci ressemble. A droite du portail d'entrée, en dehors du mur, une chaire en pierre, couverte. — Intérieur : un mauvais tableau qui représente des membres du parlement en costume et un personnage adonnant Jésus-Christ sur la croix ( la coiffure indique le commencement du XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle ) ; au pied du Christ agonisant, un évêque avec la crosse et la mitre ; dans l'air, des anges qui volent.

Vitraux beaux. — Montreur de phénomènes curieux ; enseigne. — C'était une large figure animée, intelligente, dents blanches ; sa manœuvre avec les enfants qu'il faisait mettre à genoux ; vaches et moutons ; nous avons été désillusionnés de ce que le phénomène fût vrai ! Comme d'autres l'auraient été s'ils l'avaient reconnu faux, tant il est vrai qu'on n'aime pas à changer ses idées toutes faites et à voir ce à quoi on ne s'attendait pas. — Nous avons fait une deuxième fois le tour de la ville. — Caractère doux ; nous trouvons que c'est un lieu propre aux promenades amoureuses par la taille, sans parler, le soir, à cette heure-ci. — Marché encombré de paysans et de bœufs accouplés deux à deux.

Nous partons le jeudi 20 à 6 h. du matin, avec un verre de madère et une croûte dans le ventre et nous filons lestement sur Piriac. La campagne est nue, le chemin monte et descend ; à gauche, une grande vue de mer ; au fond, et jusqu'à la mer, une plaine immense tachée çà et là de flaques d'un brun acier. Ce sont les marais salins. PIRIAC. — Désert ; bon air de la mer ; les rues pleines de sable ; pas même de filets aux portes ; jolie baie avec du sable ; deux ou trois barques sans mâture ni voiles, échouées silr le rivage. — Inconcevable auberge : du veau et des œufs ; le soir à manger du veau et des oeufs ! toujours le veau ! toujours le veau ! — Maire dudit endroit chez lequel nous étions adressés par M. Mérés, bonne robe de chambre, bonne tabatière, bon cabinet du solitaire, collection du Moniteur, les manuels Roret, livres de droit, l'His- toire de Tbiers, un gros livre relié à clous de cuivre sur le- quel était écrit "Arrêtés et délibérations".

Excursion à l'île. — Canot ; le vieux pilote blanc, barbe longue ; le matelot, le mousse ; un jeune homme fils de l'entrepreneur des travaux, figure singulièrement brutale, tenait la barre, il a déserté ; les travaux n'ont pas l'air de mordre. — Beaux rochers presque tous noirs et marbres. — Je rejouis de la mer, je repense à Trouville et à mes vacances au cottage ; comme autrefois j'ai fumé au soleil dans un trou de rocher. — Rocher en arc, avec des petites marguerites roses et blanches, il y avait sur les roches une verdure pâle comme celle qui vient aux marbres, une verdure de velours vert tirant sur le jaune ; beau fucus que nous avons pris et manié, jabot, festons dentelés et remuants. — Retour vent arrière. — Odeur du suif et chanson de la mère qui endormait son enfant pendant que je bouclais nos sacs. — Le vieux mendiant paralysé à mi-chemin de Piriac ; un vagabond estropié qui espère coucher dans les métairies, qui ramasse des morceaux de pain ; il était hier au marché de Guérande. — Sieste au soleil, sur l'herbe de la falaise. — Dans un chemin ombragé, charrette de deux bœufs avec l'enfant ; ils sont entrés dans une grande ferme où l'on voit des restes de vieilles constructions ; portail ruiné.

^eMesquera Herbignac, route assez laide, montante et descendante ; la lande rousse pâle sous un ciel bleu blanc.

Grandes masses de sapins qui enclosent un parc. —

6. La charrette Herbignac. — A i kilomètre d'Herbignac, le château du maréchal de Rieux (qumrouet) ; pas de lierres ni d'arbres sur les murs, de la mousse sèche qui est rouge ; tours démantelées se baignant dans une mare ; nous sommes entrés par une fenêtre. — Dans l'intérieur un plant de choux. Les murs ont l'air démantelés régulièrement ; les pans se tiennent debout. Tout la ruine. Elle a quelque chose de bourgeois comme le maréchal de Rieux lui-même. L'enfant qui nous conduisait grimpait pour dénicher des nids et avec un bâton en faisait tomber la poussière à nos pieds. — Déjeuner à Herbignac dans la boutique de l'épicier.

La Roche-Bernard. — La Vilaine sans arbre au bord, entre les rochers d'un vert pâle recouverts d'ajoncs d'or. — Le pont gâte la simplicité du paysage. — Souterrain bête. — A l'entrée un mendiant aveugle et manchot récitant son chapelet ; une inscription adressée à la bourse des voya- geurs indique que c'est un mineur du port que le travail de l'endroit a ainsi favorisé. — Dîner. — M. Poulman (Balzac), l'employé des contributions indirectes un Mont- morency !

Vannes. — Sarzeau ; maison de Le Sage.

Sucinio, dans la campagne, en vue de la mer, percé de larges fenêtres, semble avoir été plutôt une habitation qu'une forteresse. — Tours. — On pourrait facilement le reconstruire ; escaliers dont les degrés restent. — L'intérieur de la cour avec ses mâchicoulis, ses pans de mur percés de fenêtres et de jours, et le soleil et le ciel bleu, ça avait un air moresque. — Sur la tour de droite, en regardant la façade (du dehors), fenêtre trilobée dans un cadre carré. — Des animaux sont entrés comme nous étions sur l'herbe, petits bœufs, moutons, deux chèvres.

Retour à Sarzeau. — Promenade dans la campagne. — M.....capitaine d'état-major.

De Sarzeau À Logeot. — Dans les champs paysannes se rendant à la messe, avec leur bavolet noir ; presque toutes en noir ; grand tablier quelquefois en soie gorge-pigeon.

Logeot. — Les exécrables brutes ; haine des médailles d'hon- neur.

L'Île d'Arz. — L'église. — Cimetière, tombes avec un pot de fleurs couvert par une ardoise ; ossuaire à travers des barreaux au milieu des futailles et des bouts de bois. — Bordées que nous avons courues sur la mer.

L'Île de Gavr'inis couverte de longues fleurs bleues à clochette sur tige.

Galgol, avec une allée couverte. Dessous, l'entrée du sous-terrain est décorée par deux grandes touffes de genêts. L'allée a quelque trente pieds de long. Toutes les pierres sont couvertes de lignes faites au ciseau, régulières et figurant assez d'innombrables côtes ou branches partant d'un thorax ou tronc, et dans le bas les lignes remontent. Du reste il faudrait avoir bonne volonté pour y voir la reproduction de quoi que ce soit. — L'allée est plus profonde au fond qu'à l'entrée, les pierres aussi y sont plus larges ; sur la gauche, dans une pierre, comme les courroies d'un bouclier creusées à même.

En nous rembarquant nous avons admiré avec amour de grandes plantes qui, partant d'une unique racine, s'irradiaient en fusées comme des chevelures et s'épalaient sur la surface de l'eau ; au fond, à travers un jour vert bleu, on voyait des mousses, des herbes.

Locmariaker. — Peulvan abattu, brisé dans sa largeur (7 pieds environ), long de 7a. — Deux allées couvertes : dans l'une, nous retrouvons des dessins pareils, mais plus effacés que ceux de Gavr'inis ; dans l'autre, un tronc pour les pauvres.

De Locmariaquer à Carnac, genêts, genêts, haies d'ajoncs, avec des aubépines par places. — La route monte et descend, se perd. — On ne parle presque plus français. — On voit la mer. — Passage en bac à la pointe d'une presqu'île. — Vieillard grave, figure maigre avec son énorme chapeau.

Le clocher de Carnac de loin semblant sur une hauteur quoique Carnac soit au bord de la mer. — Chapelle Saint-Michel bâtie sur un borran ; on monte par un escalier, on descend par une pente. — La mer. — La campagne verte, séparée en carrés bruns ou gris par des haies et des murs en pierres sèches. — Une croix avec un christ sculpté si mal que ça en a du caractère et rappelle, si ce n'est que c'est plus lourd, le vieux roman. En venant, nous avons vu une autre croix du même genre érigée à l'endroit où fut tué en 1800 un certain M. Lebaron, recteur.

Ce sommaire a été développé par Maxime Du Camp. V

Carnac. — Chez la veuve Gitdas. — Logés dans une grande chambre à deux lits, nous arrêtons d'y séjourner ; les lits sont à baldaquin et on ne borde pas par le pied la couverture afin qu'on puisse la plier et montrer la large raie rouge qui en fait la bordure. Les murs sont tapissés de l'histoire de Joseph, de gravures religieuses : portraits de saint Stanislas, de saint Louis de Gonzague, etc., certificats de première communion avec vignettes représentant l'intérieur de l'église et des communians ; une dame qui revient de la Sainte Table a l'air de d..... dans ses maines. Sur la cheminée sont rangées des tasses à café dorées sur lesquelles il y a écrit « liberté, ordre public », et aux deux bouts deux carafes dans lesquelles il y a la représentation en bois peint, enrichi de perles et de plumes, du tombeau de l'empereur, entouré de six troupiers de divers grades portant des couronnes vertes oblongues comme des cornichons. Dans l'autre on voit le Saint Sacrifice de la messe, avec deux enfants de chœur ayant des pains de sucre rouges sur la tête en guise de calottes ; l'autel est entouré de quatre colonnes en perles. Sur une grande armoire, quatre cuvettes de Russie. Au plafond sur ma tête deux paniers d'osier.

Après avoir fumé une pipe et bu une bonne bouteille de bière blanche, nous avons été voir les pierres. — Femme en casaquin rouge, nu-pieds, avec son long bonnet qui volait au vent ; c'était vigoureux et hardi. — Les pierres de Carnac nous ont peu émus ( nous y avons causé de Very et de Chemery ! ) ; elles vont grandissant vers le côté de la mer à mesure qu'elles s'en éloignent et elles diminuent et finissent par devenir presque des bornes.

On avait retrouvé un homme perdu à la mer il y avait trois semaines ; on l'a apporté à l'église sur une charrette à boeufs. 11 faisait presque nuit, quatre cierges aux coins du catafalque, enfant avec sa chandelle tenant la porte ouverte, clochettes des porteurs ; les femmes se sont mises au fond, les hommes au haut, plus près, ordre qui a été conservé au cimetière ; les femmes du reste en bien plus grande quantité. L'office fut court, tout le monde à genoux dans le cimetière sur la terre des tombes. Froid des soirs d'été, crépuscule vert, bonnets se levant au vent. Une femme noire gloussait, c'étaient des pleurs. Le bruit étouffé des sanglots ressemble au rire. On a jeté de la terre sur la fosse, on s'en est allé. Un jeune homme a dit près de moi en français : « Nom de Dicul le bougre pue-t-il ! il est presque tout pourri ; depuis trois semaines c'est pas étonnant. » En rentrant nous avons trouvé notre jeune hôtesse donnant à teter à son enfant.

Aujourd'hui 2$, nous avons été fumer une pipe sur le sable en plein soleil ; nous nous sommes joués avec le sable, nous avons fait des trous avec nos bâtons, Max a poussé un bon somme en rentrant, j'ai repassé mes notes.

Depuis Sarzeau environ jusqu'ici les femmes portent par-dessus un petit bonnet plissé une ample cape blanche très avançante comme celle des religieuses et retombant sur le dos. Ce vêtement couvre au moins la moitié du corps aux petites filles. Quant au corsage un ruban de velours noir collé sur l'étoffe (noire) fait le contour de l'omoplate, prenant ainsi l'épaule dans une espèce de bracelet plat qui attire l'œil sur l'aisselle ; souliers à bout rond, orné de longs rubans plats tombant des deux côtés presque jusqu'à terre.

Par un beau temps, mer bleue et brise à peine sensible, nous nous embarquons à Pô pour Saint-Pierre. — Vieux douanier, bonne figure douce et saige, vivant de la pêche, tranquille dans sa barque, aimant peu les prêtres et peu dévot.

De Saint-Pierre à Quiberon. — Terrains nus et sablonneux ; le soleil tapait, la mer brillait en bleu. — L'auberge ; grande femme noire et grosse. — L'hôte : Rohan-Belisle, un vrai noble, en chemise et nu-pieds dans ses souliers vu la chaleur, trinquant avec M. Léon, entrepreneur du lieu, et me battant des biftecks. — Un troupier est entré avec un gendarme, air pourfendant et crâne, le gendarme borgne. — Après le déjeuner bain de soleil. En faisant un long somme sur le sable dans un coin de rocher, ça a réchauffé mes souliers et mes bas que j'avais mouillés en allant de Carnac à Pô.

Cimetière bourré de tombes ; ossuaire au milieu. Sur les quatre faces, petites boîtes en bois noir avec un cœur au milieu par lequel on voit une tête de mort. Il n'y a que les gens riches qu'on traite ainsi ; c'est la piété filiale du pays. Le milieu de l'ossuaire rempli d'os pêle-mêle ; on les voit très aisément. Effet effrayant que fait là dedans le clair de lune, au dire de notre hôtesse qui nous explique cet usage. — Les marins pour Belle-Isle attendaient dans l'auberge ; importance de l'heure de la poste. — Le courrier d'Auray (Callot, Bellanger). Aspect singulièrement pittoresque varié de la barque, les rameurs entrecroisés debout sur les bancs, passagers, deux soldats qu'on envoyait en discipline, la petite casquette ; l'autre un paysan ; deux caractères distincts du troupier ; gendarme, soldat qui les moralisait. Peu à peu la blague du flambart tomba. — Avilissement de la discipline. — Un vieux grand chapeau dormant à mes pieds. — Calme plat. — Aviron. — Le soir à Belle- Isle qui a la tristesse du soldat qui s'ennuie. Nous avons été voir des roches. — Deux ou trois cavernes ; refuges de la Naïade ou du monstre marin. — Hôtel : portraits xviii' : Je chevalier d'Éon.

Le lendemain, grande journée de marche à travers la campagne et les rochers. Nous avons déjeuné sous un bois de petits pins, le soir nous étions gris de la nature. Après nous être reposés deux heures sur le sable, nous étions repartis, emportés par la fièvre des rochers, des goémons, des varechs. — Caverne chocolat. — Une avec des herbes vert feu de bengale et distillant des gouttes d'eau ; un grand pan en glaci, etc., etc. ; forme variée des herbes, couleur d'argent, veines de sang ; grands pans réguliers qui font penser à des ruines de palais antédiluviens.

De Belle-Isle à Quiberon, bon vent. — Jeune mousse blond qui chantait dans la brise et dont on n'entendait pas les paroles. — Un cheval. — Deux voyageurs pour le commerce : le vieux blanchi dans l'exercice ; l'autre, vaudeville Achard, tutoyant les marins, etc. — Déjeuner à Quiberon avec eux. — Un monsieur de l'endroit, nullité complète, tout oreilles, le troupier de l'avant-veille gris perdu.

Du fort Penhièvre À Plouharnel, route triste dans les sables au bord de la mer qui reluisait en bleu et pétillait à notre gauche avec ses vagues blanches pressées. — Nous rencontrons la poste de Quiberon. — Chaussée pour rejoindre Plouharnel, grosses pierres.

Plouharnel. — Chez Demame, aubergiste. — Vieux mendiant birsutus, sudans purpureusque. — Le chercheur de sangsues. — Couteau celtique du maire. — Nous dinons avec les deux voyageurs qui se rembouriffent de nous ; le maire veut prendre un verre de champagne et écoute. — A  $\frac{3}{4}$  de lieue dolmens.

(#)Il faisait chaud, le bon soleil de mai nous mordait le cou, et nos chemises de soie nous collaient dans le dos. Aussi notre premier soin en arrivant à Carnac, chez la veuve Gildas, notre hôtesse, fut-il “*” Inédit, pages 81 à 96. de nous rafraîchir avec une bouteille de bière blanche qui fut suivie d’une autre, lesquelles nous gonflèrent le ventre, chose importante à dire.

Le gîte était propre et d’honnête apparence. On nous mit dans une grande chambre dont deux lits à baldaquin, recouverts d’indienne, et une table longue pareille à celle d’un réfectoire de collège, formaient l’ameublement principal. Un raffinement de coquetterie avait laissé le pied des lits non bordé pour qu’on pût voir sur le bout de la couverture une large raie rouge qui en faisait la bordure, et une précaution de propreté avait cloué sur la table une belle toile cirée verte comme du bronze. Sur les murs, dans des cadres de bois noir, il y a l’histoire de Joseph, y compris la scène avec M<sup>TM</sup> Putiphar, le portrait de saint Stanislas, celui de saint Louis de Gonzague, qui est bien le saint le plus bête du monde, et des certificats de première communion avec vignettes représentant l’intérieur de l’église et les communiant et assistants dans leurs costumes respectifs. Des tasses à café, décorées de ces mots écrits en lettres d’or “liberté, ordre public”, sont rangées le long de la cheminée dans l’espace que leur laissent deux carafes. Ah ! quelles carafes ! quel dommage si on en cassait une ! où retrouver la paire ? Elles n’étaient pourtant pas de verre de Venise, ni ciselées, ni taillées, mais de verre tout bonnement, comme de simples carafes ; elles n’ont pas même de bouchons, mais dans la première, autour d’un Napoléon, grand d’un demi-pouce et tout raide étendu sur son tombeau piqué de perles et hérissé de plumes, six militaires, de grades différents, se tiennent majestueusement, portant, chacun à la main, des palmes oblongues comme des cornichons, et dans la seconde s’accomplit le Saint Sacrifice de la messe : on voit le prêtre, le calice, l’autel, quatre colonnes de perles, aux quatre coins du sanctuaire, plus deux enfants de chœur surchargés d’énormes pains de sucre rouges qui sont censés être les calottes de ces jeunes drôles.

Ce lieu était si honnête, si bénin, exhalait un tel parfum de candeur, une modestie si bête, mais si douce, la grande armoire à ferrements de cuivre brillait si propre sous les cuvettes de Russie qui en ornaient la corniche, et les paniers d’osier croches au sommier avaient l’air, comme tout le reste, si tranquille et si bonhomme que nous décrétâmes de suite que Carnac nous plaisait et que nous y resterions quelque temps.

Nos fenêtres donnaient sur la place de l'Eglise, où des enfants jouaient aux billes à l'ombre d'un tilleul. C'était là l'unique bruit du village, il n'y passe pas de voiture, il n'y a pas de boutiques et tout le pain qu'on y mange se cuit là en bas, dans la cuisine, dont la moitié est consacrée à une bou- langerie.

Quoique ne parlant pas le français et décorant leurs intérieurs de cette façon, on vit donc là tout de même, on y dort, on y boit, on y fait l'amour et on y meurt tout comme chez nous ; ce sont aussi des humains que ces êtres-là. Mais comme ils s'oc- cupent peu du Salon ! et même de l'Exposition de l'industrie ; comme ils s'embarrassent médio- crement de l'Opéra qui va rouvrir et du Rocher de Cancale qui est fermé ; comme ils ne causent pas de ce dont on cause : le Jockey-Club, 'es courses de Chantilly, les dettes de Dumas, les cuirs de M. de Rambuteau, le nez d'Hya- cinthe, etc.

C'est une chose dont on ne peut se défendre que cet étonnement imbécile qui vous prend à consi- dérer les gens vivant où nous ne vivons point et passant leur temps à d'autres affaires que les nôtres. Vous rappelez-vous souvent, en traversant un village le matin, quand le jour se levait, avoir aperçu quelque bourgeois ouvrant ses auvents ou balayant le devant de sa porte, et qui s'arrêtait bouche bée à vous regarder passer ? A peine s'il a pu distinguer votre visage ni vous le sien, et dans cet éclair pourtant tous les deux, au même instant, vous vous êtes ébahis dans un immense étonnement ; il se disait en vous regardant fuir : "Où va-t-il donc celui-là et pourquoi voyage-t-il ? », et vous qui couriez : « Qu'est-ce qu'il fait là ? disiez- vous, est-ce qu'il y reste toujours ? »

Il faut assez de réflexion et de force d'esprit pour saisir nettement que tout le monde n'habite pas la même ville, ne se chausse pas chez votre bottier, ne s'habille pas chez votre tailleur, dîne à d'autres heures que vous, et n'ait pas vos idées ; niais je ne comprends point encore comment on existe lorsqu'on est notaire, comment il se peut faire que l'on soit employé dans un bureau, com- ment on se lève avant dix heures et on se couche avant minuit, et je me demande sérieusement s'il est possible qu'il y ait des êtres sur la terre s'occu- pant à autre chose qu'à aligner des phrases et à chercher des adjectifs.

Il serait trop absurde, étant à Carnac, de ne pas aller voir les fameuses pierres de Carnac ; aussi nous reprîmes nos bâtons et nous nous dirigeâmes vers le lieu où elles gisent. Nous allions dans l'herbe, tête baissée et devisant sur je ne sais quoi, quand un frôlement nous a fait lever les yeux et nous avons vu une femme s'avancer par le sentier qui descendait, nu-pieds, nu-jambes, sans fichu, son grand bonnet remuant, sa jupe claquant au vent, une main sur la hanche et de l'autre rete- nant une énorme gerbe de foin qu'elle portait sur la tête ; elle marchait avec des torsions de taille, hardie et belle, dans son corsage rouge. Elle a passé près de nous. Son souffle était large et fort et la sueur coulait en filets sur la peau brune de ses bras ronds.

Bientôt, enfin, nous aperçûmes dans la cam- pagne des rangées de pierres noires(1), alignées à intervalles égaux, sur onze files parallèles qui vont diminuant de grandeur à mesure qu'elles s'é- loignent de la mer ; les plus hautes ont vingt pieds environ et les plus petites ne sont que de simples

W Flaubert a utilisé ce texte pour en faire un article spécial : « Les Pierres de Carnac et l'archéologie celtique » qui parut dans l'Artiste, en 1858. blocs couchés sur le sol. Beaucoup d'entre elles ont •a pointe en bas, de sorte que leur base est plus mince que leur sommet. Cambry dit qu'il y en avait quatre mille et Fréminville en a compté douze cents ; ce qu'il y a de certain, c'est qu'il y en a beaucoup.

Voilà donc ce fameux champ de Carnac qui a fait écrire plus de sottises qu'il n'a de cailloux ; il est vrai qu'on ne rencontre pas tous les jours, des promenades aussi rocailleuses. Mais, malgré notre penchant naturel à tout admirer, nous ne vîmes qu'une facétie robuste, laissée là par un âge inconnu pour exercer l'esprit des antiquaires et stupéfier les voyageurs. On ouvre, devant, des yeux naïfs et, tout en trouvant que c'est peu com- mun, on s'avoue cependant que ce n'est pas beau. Nous comprîmes donc parfaitement l'ironie de ces granits qui, depuis les Druides, rient dans leurs barbes de lichens verts à voir tous les imbéciles qui viennent les visiter. H y a des gens qui ont passé leur vie à chercher à quoi elles servaient et n'admirez-vous pas d'ailleurs cette éternelle préoc- cupation du bipède sans plumes de vouloir trou- ver à chaque chose une utilité quelconque ? Non content de distiller l'océan pour saler son pot- au-feu et de chasser les éléphants pour avoir des ronds de serviette, son égoïsme s'arrête encore lorsque s'exhume devant lui un débris quelconque dont il ne peut deviner l'usage.

A quoi donc cela était-il bon ? sont-ce des tom- beaux ? était-ce un temple ? Saint Corneille un jour, poursuivi par des soldats qui le voulaient tuer, était à bout d'haleine et allait tomber dans la mer, quand il lui vint l'idée, pour les empêcher de l'attraper, de les changer tous en autant de pierres. Aussitôt, les soldats furent pétrifiés, ce qui sauva le saint. Mais cette explication n'était bonne tout au plus que pour les niais, les petits enfants et pour les poètes, on en chercha d'autres.

Au xvie siècle, le sieur Olaûs Magnus, arche- vêque d'Upsal (et qui, exilé à Rome, s'amusa à écrire, sur les antiquités de son pays, un livre estimé partout, si ce n'est dans ce même pays, la Suède, où personne ne le traduisit), avait décou- vert de lui-même que lorsque les pierres sont plantées sur une seule et longue ligne droite, cela veut dire qu'il y a dessous des guerriers morts en se battant en duel ; que celles qui sont disposées en carré sont consacrées à ceux qui périrent dans une mêlée ; que celles qui sont rangées circulairement sont des sépultures de famille, et enfin que celles qui sont disposées en coin ou sur un ordre angulaire sont les tombeaux des cavaliers ou même des gens de pied, surtout ceux dont le parti avait triomphé. Voilà qui est clair, explicite, satisfaisant. Mais Olaûs Magnus aurait bien dû nous dire quelle était la sépulture que l'on donnait à deux cousins germains ayant fait coup double dans un duel à cheval. Le duel, de lui-même, voulait que les pierres fussent droites, la sépulture de famille exigeait qu'elles fussent circulaires, mais comme c'étaient des cavaliers, il fallait bien les disposer en coin. Il est vrai qu'on n'y eut pas été absolument contraint, car on n'enterrait ainsi que ceux surtout dont le parti avait triomphé. Ô brave Olaüs Magnus, vous aimiez donc bien fort le Monte Pulciano et combien vous a-t-il fallu de rasades pour nous apprendre toutes ces belles choses ?

Un certain docteur Borlase, qui avait observé en Cornouailles des pierres pareilles, a dit aussi son petit mot là-dessus. Selon lui, on a enterré là des soldats à l'endroit même où ils avaient combattu. Où diable a-t-il vu qu'on les charriât ordinairement au cimetière ? « Leurs tombeaux, ajoute-t-il, sont rangés en ligne droite comme le front d'une armée dans les plaines qui ont été le théâtre de quelques grandes actions. » Cette comparaison est d'une poésie si grandiose qu'elle m'enlève et je suis un peu de l'avis du docteur Borlase.

On a été ensuite chercher les Grecs, les Egyp- tiens et les Cochinchinois. Il y a un Karnak en Egypte, s'est-on dit, il y en a un en Basse-Bretagne, nous n'entendons ni le cophte, ni le breton ; or, il est probable que le Carnac d'ici descend du Kar- nak de là-bas, cela est sûr, car là-bas, ce sont des sphinx alignés, ici ce sont des blocs, des deux cotés de la pierre. D'où il résulte que les Égyptiens (peuple qui ne voyageait pas) seront venus sur ces côtes (dont ils ignoraient l'existence), y auront fondé une colonie ( car ils n'en fondaient nulle part) et qu'ils y auront pas laissé ces statues brutes (eux qui en faisaient de si belles), témoignage positif de leur passage (dont personne ne parle).

Ceux qui aiment la mythologie ont vu là les colonnes d'Hercule ; ceux qui aiment l'histoire naturelle y ont vu une représentation du serpent Python, parce qu'au rapport de Pausanias, une réunion de pierres semblables placées sur la route de Thèbes à Elissonte s'appelait la tête du serpent, "et d'autant plus que les alignements de Carnac offrent des sinuosités comme un serpent ». Ceux qui aiment la cosmographie y ont vu un zodiaque, comme M. de Cambry entre autres, qui a reconnu, dans ces onze rangées de pierres, les douze signes du zodiaque « car il faut dire, ajoute-t-il, que les anciens Gaulois n'avaient que onze signes au zodiaque ».

Un monsieur qui était membre de l'Institut a estimé que c'était le cimetière des Vénètes, qui habitaient Vannes, à six lieues de là, et lesquels fondèrent Venise comme chacun sait. Un autre a pensé que ces bons Vénètes vaincus par César élevèrent ces pierres à la suite de leur défaite, uniquement par esprit d'humilité et pour honorer César. Mais on en avait assez des cimetières, du serpent Python et du zodiaque ; on se mit en quête d'autre chose et on trouva un temple druidique. Le peu de documents authentiques que l'on ait sur cette époque, épars dans Plinie et dans Dion Cassius, s'accordent à dire que les Druides choisissaient pour leurs cérémonies religieuses des lieux sombres, le fond des forêts « et leur vaste silence ». Aussi comme Carnac est au bord de la mer, dans une campagne stérile où il n'a jamais poussé autre chose que les conjectures de ces Messieurs, le premier grenadier de France, qui ne me paraît pas avoir été le premier homme d'esprit, suivi de Pelloutier et de M. Mahé, chanoine de la cathédrale de Vannes, a décidé que c'était un temple des Druides dans lequel on devait aussi convoquer les assemblées politiques.

Tout cependant n'était pas encore dit et ce fait acquis à la science n'eût pas été complet si l'on n'eût démontré à quoi servaient, dans l'alignement, les espaces vides où il ne se trouve pas de pierre. « Cherchons-en la raison, ce que personne ne s'est encore avisé de faire » s'est dit M. Mahé, et s'ap- puyant sur cette phrase de Pomp. Mêla : « Les Druides enseignent beaucoup de choses à la no- blesse qu'ils instruisent secrètement en des cavernes et en des forêts écartées », il établit, en consé- quence, que les Druides non seulement desser- vaient les sanctuaires, mais y faisaient leur demeure et y tenaient des collèges : “Puis donc que le Monument de Carnac est un sanctuaire comme •étaient les forêts gauloises (ô puissance de l'in- duction ! où pousses-tu le père Mahé, chanoine de Vannes et correspondant de l'Académie d'agri- culture de Poitiers ?) i7 y a lieu de croire que les mtervalles vides qui coupent les lignes des pierres renfermaient des files de maisons où les Druides habitaient avec leurs familles et leurs nombreux élèves et où les principaux de la nation qui se rendaient au sanctuaire, aux jours de grande solennité, trouvaient des logements préparés.” Bons Druides ! excellents ecclésiastiques ! comme on les a calomniés, eux qui habitaient là si honnêtement avec leurs familles et leurs nombreux élèves, et qui même poussaient l'amabilité jusqu'à préparer des logements pour les principaux de la nation.

Mais un homme est venu, enfin, qui, pénétré du génie de l'antiquité et dédaignant les routes battues, a osé dire la vérité à la face de son siècle. Il a su reconnaître en ce lieu les restes d'un camp romain, et précisément d'un camp de César qui n'avait fait élever ces pierres “que pour servir d'appui aux tentes de ses soldats et pour les empêcher d'être emportées par le vent”. Quelles bourrasques il devait faire autrefois sur les côtes de l'Armorique !

L'homme qui a restitué à César la gloire de cette précaution sublime s'appelait M. de la Sauvagère et était, de son métier, officier du génie.

L'amas de toutes ces gentillesse constitue ce qui s'appelle l'archéologie celtique, science aux charmes de laquelle nous ne pouvons résister d'initier le lecteur. Une pierre posée sur d'autres s'appelle un dolmen, qu'elle soit horizontale ou verticale ; un rassemblement de pierres debout et recouvertes sur leur sommet par des dalles consécutives, formant ainsi une série de dolmens, est une grotte aux fées, roche aux fées, table des fées, table du diable ou palais des géants, car, ainsi que ces maîtres de maison qui vous servent un vin iden- tique sous des étiquettes différentes, les Celtomanes, qui n'avaient presque rien à nous offrir, ont décoré de noms divers des choses pareilles. Quand ces pierres sont rangées en ellipse, sans aucun chapeau sur les oreilles, il faut dire : Voilà un cromlech ; lorsqu'on aperçoit une pierre étalée horizontalement sur deux autres verticales on a affaire à un lichaven ou trilithe, mais je préfère lichaven comme plus scientifique, plus local, plus essentiellement celtique. Quelquefois deux énormes blocs sont supportés l'un sur l'autre, ne semblant se toucher que par un seul point de contact, et on lit dans les livres "qu'elles sont équilibrées de telle façon que le vent même suffit quelquefois pour imprimer au bloc supérieur une oscillation marquée", assertion que je ne nie pas (tout en me méfiant quelque peu du vent celtique), quoique ces pierres prétendues branlantes n'aient jamais remué sous tous les coups de pied que nous avons eu la candeur de leur donner ; elles s'appellent alors pierres roulantes ou roulées, pierres retournées ou transportées, pierres qui dansent ou pierres dansantes, pierres qui virent ou pierres virantes. Il reste à vous faire connaître ce que c'est qu'une fichade, une pierre fiche, une pierre fixée ; ce qu'on entend par haute borne, pierre latte et pierre lait ; en quoi une pierre fonte diffère d'une pierre fiette et quels rapports existent entre une chaire au diable et une pierre droite ; après quoi vous en saurez à vous seul aussi long que jamais n'en surent ensemble Pelloutier, Deric, Latour d'Au- vergne, Penhoët et autres, doublés de Mahé et renforcés de Fréminville. Apprenez donc que tout cela signifie un peulvan, autrement dit un menhir, et n'exprime autre chose qu'une borne, plus ou moins grande, placée toute seule au beau milieu des champs ; les colonnes creuses du boulevard, vues du côté du trottoir, sont donc autant de peulvans placés là par la sollicitude paternelle de la police pour le soulagement des Parisiens, qui ne se doutent guère, les misérables, en lisant l'affiche des capsules Mothes, qu'ils soient momentanément contenus dans un petit menhir. J'allais oublier les tumulus ! Ceux qui sont composés à la fois de cailloux et de terre sont appelés borrows en haut style, et les simples monceaux de cailloux, galgals.

Les fouilles que l'on a faites sous ces diverses espèces de pierres n'ont amené à aucune conclusion sérieuse. On a prétendu que les dolmens et les trilithes étaient des autels, quand ils n'étaient pas des tombeaux ; que les roches aux fées étaient des lieux de réunion ou bien des sépultures et que les conseils de fabrique d'alors s'assemblaient dans les cromlechs. M. de Cambry a entrevu dans les pierres branlantes les emblèmes du monde suspendu dans l'espace, mais on s'est assuré depuis que ce n'étaient que des pierres probatoires dont on faisait usage pour rechercher la culpabilité des accusés, et qu'ils étaient convaincus du crime imputé quand ils ne pouvaient remuer le rocher mobile.

Les galgals et les borrows ont été sans doute des tombeaux, et quant aux menhirs, on a poussé la bonne volonté jusqu'à trouver qu'ils ressemblaient à des phallus ! D'où l'on a induit le règne d'un culte ithyphallique dans toute la basse Bretagne. Ô chaste indécence de la science, tu ne respectes rien, pas même les peulvans !

Pour en revenir aux pierres de Carnac, ou plutôt pour les quitter, je ne demanderais pas mieux comme un autre que de les avoir contemplées lorsqu'elles étaient moins noires et que les lichens n'y avaient pas encore poussé. La nuit, quand la lune roulait dans les nuages et que la mer mugissait sur le sable, les druidesses errantes parmi ces pierres (si elles y erraient toutefois) devaient être belles il est vrai avec leur faucille d'or, leur couronne de verveine et leur traînante robe blanche rougie du sang des hommes. Longues comme des ombres, elles marchaient sans toucher terre, les cheveux épars, pâles sous la pâleur de la lune. D'autres que nous déjà se sont dit que ces grands blocs immobiles peut-être les avaient vues jadis, d'autres comme nous viendront aussi là sans comprendre, et les Mahé des siècles à naître s'y briseront le nez et y perdront leur peine.

Une rêverie peut être grande et engendrer au moins des mélancolies fécondes quand, partant d'un point fixe, l'imagination, sans le quitter, voltige dans son cercle lumineux ; mais lorsque, se cramponnant à un objet dénué de plastique et privé d'histoire, elle essaie d'en tirer une science et de rétablir toute une société perdue, elle demeure elle-même plus stérile et plus pauvre que cette matière inerte à laquelle la vanité des bavards pré-tend trouver une forme et donner des chroniques.

Après avoir exposé les opinions de tous les savants cités plus haut, que si l'on me demande à mon tour, quelle est ma conjecture sur les pierres de Carnac, car tout le monde a la sienne, j'émettrai une opinion irréfutable, irréfragable, irrésistible, une opinion qui ferait reculer les tentes de M. de la Sauvagère et pâlir l'égyptien Penhoet ; une opinion qui casserait le zodiaque de Cambry et mettrait le serpent Python en tron- çons, et cette opinion la voici : les pierres de Car- nac sont de grosses pierres.

Nous nous en retournâmes donc à l'auberge où, servis par notre hôtesse qui avait de grands yeux bleus, de fines mains qui s'achèteraient cher et une douce figure d'une pudeur monacale, nous dînâmes d'un bel appétit qu'avaient creusé nos cinq heures de marche. Il ne faisait pas encore nuit pour dormir, on n'y voyait plus pour rien faire, nous allâmes à l'église.

Elle est petite, quoique portant nef et bas côtés, comme une grande dame d'église de ville. De gros piliers de pierre, trapus et courts, soutien- nent sa voûte de bois bleu, d'où pendent de petits navires, ex- voto promis.dans les tempêtes. Les araignées courent sur leurs voiles et la pous- sière pourrit leurs cordages.

On ne disait aucun office, la lampe du chœur brûlait seule dans son godet d'huile jaune, et en haut, dans l'épaisseur de la voûte, les fenêtres non fermées laissaient passer de larges rayons blancs, avec le bruit du vent qui courbait les arbres. Un homme est venu, a rangé les chaises, a mis deux chandelles dans des girandoles de fer- blanc accrochées au pilier, et a tiré dans le milieu une façon de brancard à pied dont le bois noir avait de grosses taches blanches. D'autres gens sont entrés dans l'église, un prêtre en surplis a passé devant nous ; on a entendu un bruit de clo- chettes s'arrêtant et reprenant par intervalles, et la porte de l'église s'est ouverte toute grande ; personne ne venait, on attendait quelqu'un. Le son saccadé de la petite cloche s'est mêlé à un autre qui lui répondait, et toutes deux, s'appro- chant en grandissant, redoublaient leurs batte- ments secs et cuivrés.

Une charrette traînée par des bœufs a paru dans la place et s'est arrêtée devant le portail. Un mort était dessus. Ses pieds pâles et mats, comme de l'albâtre lavé, dépassaient le bout du drap blanc qui l'enveloppait de cette forme indé- cise qu'ont tous les cadavres en costume. La foule survenue se taisait. Les hommes restaient découverts ; le prêtre secouait son goupillon en marmottant des oraisons, et les bœufs accouplés, remuant lentement la tête, faisaient crier leur gros joug de cuir. L'église, où brillait une étoile au fond, ouvrait sa grande ombre noire que refou- lait du dehors le jour vert des crépuscules plu- vieux, et l'enfant qui éclairait sur le seuil passait toujours la main devant sa chandelle, pour em- pêcher le vent de l'éteindre.

On l'a descendu de la charrette ; sa tête s'est cognée contre le timon. On l'a entré dans l'église, on l'a mis sur le brancard. Un flot d'hommes et de femmes a suivi. On s'est agenouillé sur le pavé, les hommes près du mort, les femmes plus loin, vers la porte, et le service a commencé.

Il ne dura pas longtemps, pour nous du moins, car les psalmodies basses bourdonnaient vite, couvertes de temps à autre par un sanglot faible qui partait de dessous les capes noires, en bas de la nef. Une main m'a effleuré et je me suis reculé pour laisser passer une femme courbée. Serrant les poings sur sa poitrine, baissant la tête, allant en avant sans remuer les pieds, essayant de regarder, tremblant de voir, elle s'est avancée vers la ligne de lumières qui brûlaient le long du brancard. Lentement, lentement, en levant son bras comme pour se cacher dessous, elle a tourné la tête sur le coin de son épaule et elle est tombée sur une chaise, affaissée, aussi morte et molle que ses vêtements mêmes. A la lueur des cierges, j'ai vu ses yeux fixes dans leurs paupières rouges, éraillés comme par une brûlure vive, sa bouche idiote et crispée, grelottante de désespoir, et toute sa pauvre figure qui pleurait comme un orage.

C'était son mari, perdu à la mer, que l'on venait de retrouver sur la grève et qu'on allait enterrer tout à l'heure.

Le cimetière touchait à l'église. On y passa par une porte de côté, et chacun y reprit son rang, tandis que dans la sacristie on clouait le mort dans son cercueil. Une pluie fine mouillait l'air, on avait froid ; il faisait gras marcher, et les fos- soyeurs, qui n'avaient pas fini, rejetaient avec peine la terre lourde et molle qui collait sur leurs louchets. Au fond, les femmes, à genoux dans l'herbe, avaient découvert leurs capuchons et leurs grands bonnets blancs, dont les pans empesés se soulevaient au vent, faisaient de loin comme un grand linceul qui se lève de terre et qui ondoie.

Le mort a reparu, les prières ont recommencé, les sanglots ont repris. On les entendait à travers le bruit de la pluie qui tombait.

Près de nous sortait par intervalles égaux une sorte de gloussement étouffé qui ressemblait à un rire. Partout ailleurs, en l'écoutant, on l'eût pris pour l'explosion réprimée de quelque joie violente ou pour le paroxysme contenu d'un délire de bonheur. C'était la veuve qui pleurait. Puis, elle s'approcha jusqu'au bord, elle fit comme les autres, et la terre peu à peu reprit son niveau et chacun s'en retourna.

Comme nous enjambions l'escalier du cimetière, un jeune homme qui passait à côté de nous dit en français à un autre : "Le bougre puait-il ! If est presque tout pourri ! Depuis trois semaines qu'il est à l'eau, c'est pas étonnant !"

(*) En rentrant chez nous, nous avons trouvé notre

Inédit, pages 107 à 109. hôtesse qui donnait à teter à son enfant et qui l'endormait en se dandinant sur une chaise. Il n'y avait pour nous plus rien de curieux à Carnac. Nous avions vu à loisir sur le portail latéral de son église l'affreux baldaquin qui rentre généralement dans le goût de l'architecture des pâtisseries, j'entends celle qui décore ces odieuses inventions connues sous le nom de pièces montées dont les tranches d'orange confite font les arcades et les bouts de chocolat les colonnes, avec un obélisque en sucre rose terminé par une fleur, et nous avons contemplé dans l'intérieur la statue de saint Corneille, plus entourée de cordes qu'un saucisson de Lyon ne l'est de ficelles. Les cordes qui ont touché le saint ont la vertu de guérir les animaux malades, aussi y a-t-il au-dessus de la grande porte de l'église une sorte d'enseigne peinte, représentant deux paysans présentant l'un sa vache et l'autre son bœuf à ce bon saint vétérinaire. Quand ces cordes sont restées autour de lui un certain temps, elles ont acquis leur diplôme, on les emporte et on les garde chez soi, on se les emprunte de voisin à voisin et de village à village. Honteux reste des superstitions dont la France éclairée s'est purgée, dirait le National.

Nous n'en restâmes pas moins trois jours encore à Carnac, à n'y faire autre chose que de nous promener au bord de la mer et à nous coucher sur le sable, où nous dessinions avec nos bâtons des arabesques qu'effaçait le flot montant, et sur lequel, étendus en plein soleil, nous dormions comme des lézards. L'un près de l'autre, assis par terre, nous prenions du sable dans nos mains, nous le regardions couler à travers nos doigts, nous retournions la carcasse séchée de quel- que vieux crabe évidé, nous cherchions des galets creux pour nous faire des encriers, nous ramas- sions des coquillages, et la journée passait. Le soleil s'abaissait sur la mer qui variait ses couleurs, continuait son bruit et laissait sur la plage son long feston de varechs et d'écume, nous ouvrons nos poitrines, nous humions le parfum des vagues, douce et acre senteur mêlée d'eau, de brise et d'herbes, qui accourt vers nous du fond de l'océan, et des bouffées d'air chaud venaient d'entre les trous des dunes dont les joncs minces s'accrochaient aux boucles de nos guêtres. Quand le soir était arrivé, nous retournions au gîte en regardant dans le ciel les grandes traînées de pourpre qui s'étendaient sur son azur.

Un matin pourtant nous partîmes comme les autres matins ; nous prîmes le même sentier, nous traversâmes la haie d'ormeaux et la prairie incli- née où nous avions vu, la veille, une petite fille chassant ses bestiaux vers l'abreuvoir ; mais ce fut le dernier jour et la dernière fois peut-être que nous passâmes par là.

Un terrain vaseux où nous enfoncions jusqu'aux chevilles s'étend de Carnac jusqu'au village de Pô. Un canot nous y attendait, nous montâmes dedans, on poussa du fond avec la rame et on hissa la voile. Notre marin, vieillard à figure gaie, s'assit à l'arrière, y attacha au plat-bord une ligne pour prendre du poisson, et laissa partir sa barque tranquille. A peine s'il faisait du vent ; la mer toute bleue n'avait pas de rides et gardait long- temps sur elle le sillage étroit du gouvernail. Le bonhomme causait ; il nous parlait des prêtres qu'il n'aime pas, de la viande qui est une bonne chose à manger, même les jours maigres, du mal qu'il avait quand il était au service, des coups de fusil qu'il a reçus quand il était douanier..... Nous allions doucement, la ligne tendue suivait toujours et le bout du tape-cul trempait dans l'eau.

La lieue qui nous resta à faire à pied pour aller de Saint-Pierre à Quiberon fut lestement avalée, malgré une route montueuse à travers des sables, malgré le soleil qui faisait crier sur nos épaules la bretelle de nos sacs, et nonobstant quantité de menhirs qui se dressaient dans la campagne.

A Quiberon, nous déjeunâmes chez le sieur Rohan Belle-Isie qui tient l'Hôtel Penhièvre. Ce gentilhomme était nu-pieds dans ses savates, vu la chaleur, et trinquait avec un maçon, ce qui ne l'empêche pas d'être le descendant d'une des premières familles d'Europe. Un noble de vieille race ! un vrai noble, vive Dieu ! qui nous a tout de suite fait cuire des homards et s'est mis à nous battre des biftecks.

Notre orgueil en fut flatté dans sa fibre la plus reculée et encore maintenant je ne puis m'empêcher, en pensant à cet honneur, de remercier d'un seul coup la Providence de tous ceux dont elle m'a comblé dans ma vie. J'ai été embrassé par des princesses de sang royal, j'ai dîné avec un Montmorency (il m'a même offert du cidre), j'ai été servi par un Rohan, j'ai trinqué avec Louis Fessard et j'ai tapé sur la bedaine aux cardinaux !

Tout le passé de Quiberon se résume dans un massacre. Sa plus rare curiosité est un cimetière ; il est plein, il regorge, il fait craquer ses murs, il déborde dans la rue. Les pierres tassées se brisent aux angles, montent les unes sur les autres, s'envahissent, se submergent et se confondent, comme si les morts, gênés dessous, soulevaient leurs épaules pour sortir de leurs tombeaux. On dirait de quelque océan pétrifié dont toutes ces tombes font les vagues et où les croix seraient les mâts des vaisseaux perdus.

Au milieu, un grand ossuaire tout ouvert reçoit les squelettes de ceux que l'on désensevelit pour faire place aux autres. De qui donc cette pensée : la vie est une hôtellerie, c'est le cercueil qui est la maison ? Ceux-ci ne restent pas dans la leur, ils n'en sont que les locataires et on les en chasse à la fin du bail. Tout autour de cet ossuaire, où cet amas d'ossements ressemble à un fouillis de bourrées, est rangée, à hauteur d'homme, une série de petites boîtes en bois noir, de six pouces carrés chacune, recouvertes d'un toit, surmontées d'une croix, et percées sur la face antérieure d'un cœur à jour qui laisse voir dedans une tête de mort. Au-dessus du cœur, on lit en lettres peintes : "Ceci est le chef de***, décédé tel an, tel jour." Ces têtes n'ont appartenu qu'à des gens d'un certain rang, et l'on passerait pour un mauvais fils, si au bout de sept ans on ne donnait au crâne de ses parents le luxe de ce petit coffre. Quant au reste du corps, on le rejette dans l'ossuaire ; vingt-cinq ans après, on y jette aussi la tête. Il y a quelques années, je ne sais qui voulut abolir cette coutume. Une émeute se fit, elle resta.

Il peut être mal de jouer ainsi avec toutes ces boules rondes qui ont contenu la pensée, avec ces cercles vides où battait l'amour. Toutes ces boîtes le long de l'ossuaire, sur les tombes, dans l'herbe, sur le mur, pêle-mêle, peuvent sembler horribles à plusieurs, ridicules à d'autres ; mais ces bois noirs se pourrissent à mesure que les os qu'ils renferment blanchissent et s'égrènent ; toutes ces têtes vous regardant avec leur nez rongé, leurs orbites creuses et leur front qui luit par place sous la traînée gluante des limaçons ; ces fémurs entassés là comme tous les grands charniers de la Bible ; ces fragments de crânes qui roulent pleins de terre, et où parfois, comme dans un pot de porcelaine, a poussé quelque fleur qui sort par le trou des yeux ; la vulgarité même de ces inscriptions toutes pareilles les unes aux autres, comme le sont entre eux les morts qu'elles désignent ; toute cette pourriture humaine, disposée de cette façon, nous a paru fort belle et nous a procuré un solide et bon spectacle.

Si la poste d'Auray eût été arrivée, nous fus- sions partis tout de suite pour Belle-Isle ; mais on attendait la poste d'Auray. Assis dans la cui- sine de l'auberge, en chemise et les bras nus, les marins de passage patientaient en buvant chopine.

— A quelle heure arrive-t-elle donc la poste d'Auray ?

— C'est selon ; à dix heures d'ordinaire, ré- pondit le patron.

— A midi, fit M. de Rohan.

— A une heure.

— A une heure et demie.

— Souvent elle n'est pas ici avant deux heures.

— C'est pas régulier !

Nous en étions convaincus, il en était trois.

On ne pouvait partir avant l'arrivée de ce mal-encontreux courrier qui apporte pour Belle-Isle les dépêches de la terre ferme. Il fallait se rési- gner. On allait sur le devant de la porte, on re- gardait dans la rue, on rentrait, on ressortait. « Ah ! il ne viendra pas aujourd'hui. — Il sera resté en route. — Faut nous en aller. — Non, attendons- le. — Si ces messieurs s'ennuient trop après tout... — Au fait, peut-être n'y a-t-il pas de lettres ? — Non, encore un petit quart d'heure. — Ah ! c'est lui ! » Ce n'était pas lui, et le dialogue recom- mençait.

Enfin, un trot de cheval fatigué qui bat le bri- quet, un bruit de grelots, un coup de fouet, un homme qui crie : “Ho ! ho ! voilà la poste ! voilà la poste !”

Le cheval s'arrêta net à la porte, rentra son

8 échine, tendit le cou, allongea le museau en montrant les dents, écarta les jambes de derrière et se leva sur les jarrets.

La rosse était haute, cagneuse, osseuse, sans poils à la crinière, le sabot rongé, les fers battants ; la croupière lui déchirait la queue ; un séton suintait à son poitrail. Perdu dans une selle qui l'engouffrait, retenu en arrière par une valise, en avant par le grand portefeuille aux lettres passé dans l'arçon, son cavalier, juché dessus, se tenait ratatiné comme un singe. Sa petite figure à poils rares et blonds, ridée et racornie comme une pomme de rainette, disparaissait sous un chapeau de toile cirée doublé de feutre ; une sorte de paletot de coutil gris lui remontait jusqu'aux hanches et lui entourait le ventre d'un cercle de plis ramassés, tandis que son pantalon sans sous-pieds, qui se relevait et s'arrêtait aux genoux, laissait voir à nu ses mollets rougis par le frottement des étrivières, avec ses bas bleus descendus sur le bord de ses souliers. Des ficelles rattachaient les harnais de la bête ; des bouts de fil noir ou rouge avaient recousu le vêtement du cavalier ; des reprises de toutes couleurs, des taches de toutes formes, de la toile en lambeaux, du cuir gras, de la crotte séchée, de la poussière nouvelle, des cordes qui pendaient, des guenilles qui brillaient, de la crasse sur l'homme, de la gale sur la bête, l'un chétif et suant, l'autre étique et soufflant, le premier avec son fouet, le second avec ses grelots ; tout cela ne faisait qu'une même chose ayant même teinte et même mouvement, exécutant presque mêmes gestes, servant au même usage, dont l'ensemble s'appelle la poste d'Auray.

Au bout d'une heure encore, quand on eut pris dans le pays nombre suffisant de paquets et de commissions et qu'on eut encore attendu quelques passagers qui devaient venir, on quitta enfin l'auberge et l'on avisa à s'embarquer. Ce fut d'abord un pêle-mêle de bagages et de gens, d'avirons qui vous barraient les jambes, de voiles qui vous retombaient sur le nez, l'un s'embarrassant dans l'autre et ne trouvant pas où se mettre ; chacun prit son coin, trouva sa place, les bagages au fond, les marins debout sur les bancs, les passagers où ils purent.

Nulle brise ne soufflait, et les voiles pendaient droites le long des mâts. La lourde chaloupe se soulevait à peine sur la mer presque immobile qui se gonflait et s'abaissait avec le doux mouvement d'une poitrine endormie.

Appuyés sur l'un des plats-bords, nous regardions l'eau qui était bleue comme le ciel et calme comme lui ; et nous écoutions le bruit des grands avirons qui battaient l'onde et criaient dans les tolets. A l'ombre des voiles, les six rameurs entre-croisés les levaient lentement en mesure et les poussaient devant eux ; ils tombaient et se relevaient, égrenant des perles au bout de leurs palettes.

Couchés dans la paille, sur le dos, assis sur les bancs, les jambes ballantes et le menton dans les mains ou postés contre les parois du bateau,

8. entre les gros jambages de la membrure dont le goudron se fondait à la chaleur, les passagers silencieux baissaient la tête et fermaient les yeux à l'éclat du soleil frappant sur la mer plate comme un miroir.

Un homme à cheveux blancs dormait par terre à mes pieds ; un gendarme suait sous son tricorne, deux soldats avaient ôté leurs sacs et s'étaient couchés dessus. Près du beaupré, le mousse regardait dans le foc et sifflait pour appeler le vent ; debout, à l'arrière, le patron faisait tourner la barre.

Le vent ne venait pas. On abattit les voiles qui descendirent tout doucement en faisant sonner le fer des rocambots et affaissèrent sur les bancs leur draperie lourde ; puis chaque matelot défit sa veste, la serra sous l'avant, et tous alors recommencèrent, en poussant de la poitrine et des bras, à mouvoir les immenses avirons qui se ployaient dans leur longueur.

(*L'air était d'une transparence bleuâtre, sa lumière crue enveloppant tout, frappant tout, pénétrait jusque dans leurs pores les vieux bois gris de la barque, les fils épais de la voile, la peau des hommes grelottante de sueur ; ils haletaient d'accord, on entendait à la fois leur poitrine respirer et les avirons tomber dans l'eau.

Après chaque mouvement de tous ces bras qui se déplaient et s'abaissaient, une traction sourde * ! Inédit, pages 116 à 119. vous glissait en avant, on entendait autour du gou vernail l'eau clapoter plus clair et dans le silence la barque s'avancait, puis, secouée, repartait.

Derrière, on voyait Quiberon reculant graduellement sa plage de sable ; à gauche les îles d'Houat et d'Hoedie bombant sur la surface du pôle azur leurs masses d'un vert noir, Belle-Isle grandissant les pans à pic de ses rochers couronnés d'herbe et la citadelle dont la muraille plonge dans la mer, qui se levait lentement de dessous les flots.

On y envoyait dans un régiment de discipline les deux soldats escortés par le gendarme, et que moralisait de son mieux un fusilier qu'il avait pris comme renfort pour les contenir. Le matin déjà, pendant que nous déjeunions, l'un d'eux, en compagnie du brigadier, était entré dans l'auberge d'un air crâne, la moustache retroussée, les mains dans les poches, le képi sur l'oreille, en demandant à manger « tout de suite » et à boire n'importe quoi, fût-ce de l'arsenic, appelant, jurant, criant, faisant sonner ses sous et damner le pauvre gendarme ; maintenant il riait encore, mais des lèvres seulement, et sa joie devenait plus rare à mesure qu'à l'horizon se dressait le grand mur blanc où il allait bêcher la terre et traîner le boulet. Son compagnon était plus calme. C'était une grosse figure lourde et laide, une de ces natures d'une vulgarité si épaisse que l'on comprend de suite, l'immense mépris qu'ont pour elle ceux qui poussent sur le canon cette viande animée, et le bon marché qu'ils en font. Il n'avait jamais vu la mer, il la regardait en ouvrant ses deux yeux, et il dit se parlant à lui-même : « C'est curieux tout de même, ça donne tout de même un aperçu de ce qui existe », appréciation que j'ai trouvée profonde et aussi émue par le sentiment de la chose même que toutes les expressions lyriques que j'ai entendu faire à bien des dames.

L'autre soldat ne cachait pas pour lui le dédain qu'il avait et quoiqu'ils fussent amis, il haussait les épaules de pitié en le regardant. Quand il se fut suffisamment amusé de lui en essayant de faire rire sur son compte la société qui l'entourait, il le laissa dormir dans son coin et se tourna vers nous. Alors il nous parla de lui-même, de la prison qu'il va subir, du régiment qui l'ennuie, de la guerre qu'il souhaite, de la vie dont il est las. Peu à peu ainsi sa joie étudiée s'en alla, son rire forcé disparut ; il devint simple et doux, mélancolique et presque tendre. Trouvant enfin une oreille ouverte à tout ce qui depuis longtemps surchargeait son cœur exaspéré d'ennui, il nous exposa longuement toutes les misères du soldat, les dégoûts de la caserne, les exigences taquines de l'étiquette / toutes les cruautés de l'habit, l'arrogance brutale des sergents, l'humiliation des obéissances aveugles, l'assassinat permanent de l'instinct et de la volonté sous la massue du devoir.'

Il est condamné à un an de discipline pour avoir vendu un pantalon.

« A beaucoup, disait-il, ça ne fait rien, comme à ça par exemple, en désignant son compagnon ; des paysans, c'est habitué à remuer la terre, mais moi, ça me salira les mains. »

O orgueil ! ton goût d'absinthe remonte donc dans toutes les bouches et tous les cœurs te ruinent ! Qu'était-il, lui qui se plaignait de tant souffrir au contact des autres ? Un enfant du peuple, un ouvrier de Paris, un garçon sellier. J'ai plaint, j'ai plaint cet homme ardent et triste, malade de besoins, rongé d'envies longues, qui s'impatientait du joug et que le travail fatigue. Il n'y a pas que nous, au coin de nos cheminées, dans l'air étouffé de nos intérieurs, qui ayons des faiseurs d'âme et des colères vagues dont on tâche de sortir avec du bruit en essayant d'aimer, en voulant écrire ; celui-là fait de même dans son cercle inférieur, avec les petits verres et les donzelles ; lui aussi il souhaite l'argent, la liberté, le grand air, il voudrait changer de lieu, fuir ailleurs, n'importe où, il s'ennuie, il attend sans espoir.

Les sociétés avancées exhalent comme une odeur de foule, des miasmes écœurants, et les duchesses ne sont pas les seules à s'en évanouir. Ne croyez pas les mains sans gants plus robustes que les autres ; on peut être las de tout sans rien connaître, fatigué de tramer sa casaque sans avoir lu Werther ni René, et il n'y a pas besoin d'être reçu bachelier pour se brûler la cervelle.

On avait tant tardé à partir, qu'à peine s'il y avait de l'eau dans le port, et nous eûmes grand mal à y entrer. Notre quille frôlait contre les petits cailloux du fond, et pour descendre à terre il nous fallut marcher sur une rame comme sur la corde raide.

Resserré entre la citadelle et ses remparts et coupé au milieu par un port presque vide, le Palais nous parut une petite ville assez sotte, qui transude un ennui de garnison et a je ne sais quoi d'un sous-officier qui bâille.

Ici, on ne voit plus les chapeaux de feutre noir du Morbihan, bas de forme, immenses d'envergure et abritant les épaules. Les femmes n'ont pas ces grands bonnets blancs qui s'avancent devant leur visage comme ceux des religieuses et, par derrière, retombent jusqu'au milieu du dos, vêtant ainsi chez les petites filles la moitié du corps. Leurs robes sont privées du large galon de velours appliqué sur l'épaule qui, dessinant le contour de l'omoplate, va se perdre sous les aisselles. Leurs pieds non plus ne portent point ces souliers découverts, ronds du bout, hauts de talons et ornés de longs rubans noirs qui frôlent la terre. C'est, comme partout, des figures qui se ressemblent, des costumes qui n'en sont pas, des bornes, des maisons, des pavés et même un trottoir.

Etait-ce la peine de s'être exposé au mal de mer, que nous n'avions pas eu d'ailleurs, ce qui nous rendait indulgents, pour n'avoir à contempler que la citadelle, dont nous nous soucions fort peu, le phare, dont nous nous inquiétions encore moins, ou le rempart de Vauban qui nous ennuyait déjà. Mais on nous avait parlé des roches de Belie-Isle. Incontinent donc, nous dépassâmes les portes, et coupant net à travers champs, rabattîmes sur le bord de la mer.

Nous ne vîmes qu'une grotte, une seule (le jour tombait), mais qui nous parut si belle (elle était tapissée de varechs et de coquilles et avait des gouttes d'eau qui tombaient d'en haut), que nous résolûmes de rester le lendemain à Belle-Isle pour en chercher de pareilles, s'il y en avait, et nous repaître à loisir les jeux du régal de toutes ces couleurs.

Le lendemain donc, sitôt qu'il fit jour, ayant rempli une gourde, fourré dans un de nos sacs un morceau de pain avec une tranche de viande, nous prîmes la clef des champs, et, sans guide ni renseignement quelconque (c'est là la bonne façon), nous nous mîmes à marcher, décidés à aller n'importe où, pourvu que ce fût loin, et à rentrer n'importe quand, pourvu que ce fût tard.

Nous commençâmes par un sentier dans les herbes, il suivait le haut de la falaise, montait sur ses pointes, descendait dans ses vallons et continuait dessus en faisant le tour de l'île.

Quand un éboulement l'avait coupé, nous remontions plus haut dans la campagne et, nous réglant sur l'horizon de la mer, dont la barre bleue touchait le ciel, nous regagnions ensuite le haut de la côte que nous retrouvions à l'improviste ouvrant son abîme à nos côtés. La pente à pic sur le sommet de laquelle nous marchions ne nous laissait rien voir du flanc des rochers, nous entendions seulement au-dessous de nous le grand bruit battant de la mer.

Quelquefois la roche s'ouvrant dans toute sa grandeur montrait subitement ses deux pans presque droits que rayaient des couches de silex et où avaient poussé de petits bouquets jaunes. Si on jetait une pierre, elle semblait quelque temps suspendue, puis se heurtait aux parois, déboulait en ricochant, se brisait en éclats, faisait rouler de la terre, entraînait des cailloux, finissait sa course en s'enfouissant dans les graviers ; et on entendait crier les cormorans qui s'envolaient.

Souvent les pluies d'orage et les dégels avaient chassé dans ces gorges une partie des terrains supérieurs qui, s'y étant écoulés graduellement, en avaient adouci la pente, de manière à y pouvoir descendre. Nous nous risquâmes dans l'une d'elles, et, nous laissant glisser sur le derrière en nous écorant des pieds et nous retenant des mains, nous arrivâmes enfin en bas sur du beau sable tout mouillé.

La marée baissait ; il fallait, pour passer, attendre le retrait des vagues. Nous les regardions venir. Elles écumaient dans les roches, à fleur d'eau, tourbillonnaient dans les creux, sautaient comme des écharpes qui s'envolent, retombaient en cascades et en perles, et dans un long balancement ramenaient à elles leur grande nappe verte. Quand une vague s'était retirée sur le sable, aussitôt les courants s'entre-croisaient en fuyant vers des niveaux plus bas. Les varechs remuaient leurs lanières gluantes, l'eau débordait des petits cailloux, sortait par les fentes des pierres, faisait mille clapotements, mille jets. Le sable trempé buvait son onde, et, se séchant au soleil, blanchissait sa teinte jaune.

Dès qu'il y avait de la place pour nos pieds, sautant par-dessus les roches, nous continuions devant nous. Elles augmentèrent bientôt leur amoncellement désordonné ; tournées, bousculées, entassées dans tous les sens, renversées l'une sur l'autre, nous nous cramponnions de nos mains qui glissaient, de nos pieds qui se crispaient en vain sur leurs aspérités visqueuses.

La falaise était haute, si haute qu'on en avait presque peur quand on levait la tête. Elle vous écrasait de sa placidité formidable et elle vous charmait pourtant ; car on la contemplait malgré soi et les yeux ne s'en lassaient pas.

Il passa une hirondelle, nous la regardâmes voler ; elle venait de la mer, elle montait doucement, coupant au tranchant de ses plumes l'air fluide et lumineux où ses ailes nageaient en plein et semblaient jouir de se déployer toutes libres. Elle monta encore, dépassa la falaise, monta toujours et disparut.

Cependant nous rampions sur les rochers dont chaque détour de la côte nous renouvelait la perspective, ils s'interrompaient « par moments et alors nous marchions sur de grandes, pierres carrées, plates comme des dalles, où des fentes qui se prolongeaient en avant deux à deux et presque symétriques semblaient les ornières de quelque antique voie d'un autre monde. De place en place, immobiles comme leur fond verdâtre, s'étendaient de grandes flaques d'eau qui étaient aussi limpides, aussi tranquilles, et ne remuaient pas plus qu'au fond du bois, sur son lit de cresson, à l'ombre des saules, la source la plus pure.

Puis de nouveau les rochers se présentaient plus serrés, plus accumulés. D'un côté c'était la mer dont les flots sautaient dans les basses roches ; de l'autre, la côte droite, ardue, infranchissable.

Fatigués, étourdis, nous cherchions une issue. Mais toujours la falaise s'avancait devant nous, et les rochers, étendant à l'infini leurs sombres masses de varechs, faisaient succéder l'une à l'autre leurs têtes inégales qui grandissaient en se multipliant comme des fantômes noirs qui sortaient de dessous terre.

Nous roulions ainsi à l'aventure, quand nous vîmes tout à coup, serpentant en zigzag dans la roche, une valleuse qui nous permettait, comme par une échelle, de regagner la rase campagne.

Quand nous l'eûmes gravie, nous nous trouvâmes sur le plateau qui domine toute la côte de l'île et continuâmes dans la même direction, à travers des champs sans arbres que n'égayait aucune verdure. Il était néanmoins fort doux de n'avoir plus qu'à remuer les pieds et à les pousser devant soi. Un petit bois de pins grêles s'offrit, nous y entrâmes et ayant débouclé le sac qui depuis quatre heures me ballottait aux épaules, nous commençâmes à déchiqueter avec nos ongles et nos mains la tranche de veau froid qui s'y bécotait contre le morceau de pain.

Couchés par terre sur les feuilles tombées, nous dînâmes entre nos jambes, en faisant sécher au bout des branches d'arbres nos chaussettes et 90s souliers tout trempés d'eau de mer. Lorsque la nappe fut ôtée et qu'une bonne pipe nous eut remis de nos fatigues, nous ramassâmes le bâton et nous repartîmes.

Voulant traverser l'île dans sa largeur, nous nous dirigeâmes d'après le soleil et allâmes droit en face de nous ; mais bientôt perdus dans la campagne, nous ne cherchâmes plus dès lors qu'à retrouver la mer dont le rivage, si nous le suivions toujours, devait nous ramener enfin au Palais soit le soir, soit dans la nuit ou le lendemain matin, car nous ne savions plus où il était, ni nous- mêmes où nous étions.

N'importe, c'est toujours un plaisir, même quand la campagne est laide, que de se promener à deux tout au travers, en marchant dans les herbes, en traversant les haies, en sautant les fossés, abattant des chardons avec votre bâton, arrachant avec la main les feuilles et les épis, allant au hasard comme l'idée vous pousse, comme les pieds vous portent, chantant, sifflant, causant, rêvant, sans oreille qui vous écoute, sans bruit de pas derrière vos pas, libres comme au désert !

Ah ! de l'air ! de l'air ! de l'espace encore ! Puisque nos âmes serrées étouffent et se meurent sur le bord de la fenêtre, puisque nos esprits capotés, comme l'ours dans sa fosse, tournent toujours sur eux-mêmes et se heurtent contre ses murs, donnez au moins à mes narines le parfum de tous les vents de la terre, laissez s'en aller mes yeux vers tous les horizons !

Aucun clocher ne montrait au loin son toit reluisant d'ardoises, pas un hameau n'apparaissait au revers d'un pli de terrain, ajustant dans un bouquet d'arbres ses toits de chaume et ses cours carrées ; on ne rencontrait personne, ni paysan qui passe, ni mouton qui broute, ni chien qui rôde..

Tous ces champs cultivés n'avaient pas l'air habités ; on y travaille, on n'y vit point. On dirait que tous ceux qui les ont en profitent, mais ne les aiment pas.

Nous avons vu une ferme, nous sommes entrés dedans ; une femme en guenilles nous a servi dans des tasses de grès du lait frais comme la glace. C'était un silence singulier. Elle nous regardait avidement, et nous sommes repartis.

Nous sommes descendus dans un vallon dont la gorge étroite semblait s'étendre vers la mer. De longues herbes à fleurs jaunes nous montaient jusqu'au ventre. Nous avançons en faisant de grandes enjambées. Nous entendions de l'eau couler près de nous et nous enfoncions dans la terre marécageuse. Les deux collines vinrent à s'écarter, portant toujours sur leurs versants arides un gazon ras que des lichens plaquaient par intervalles comme de grandes taches jaunes. Au pied de l'une d'elles un ruisseau passait parmi les rameaux bas des arbrisseaux rabougris qui avaient poussé sur ses bords, et s'allait perdre plus loin dans une mare immobile où des insectes à grandes pattes se promenaient sur la feuille des nénufars.

Le soleil dardait. Les moucheron bruisaient leurs ailes et faisaient courber la pointe des joncs sous le poids de leurs corps légers. Nous étions seuls tous les deux dans la tranquillité de cette solitude.

En cet endroit le vallon s'arrondissait en s'élargissant et faisait un coude sur lui-même. Nous montâmes sur une butte pour découvrir au delà ; mais l'horizon vite s'arrêtait, enclos par une autre colline, ou bien étendait de nouvelles plaines. Ce pendant nous prîmes courage et continuâmes à avancer, tout en pensant à ces voyageurs abandonnés dans les fies, qui grimpent sur les promontoires pour apercevoir au loin quelque voile venant à eux.

Le terrain devint plus sec, les herbes moins hautes, et la mer tout à coup se présenta devant nous, resserrée dans une anse étroite, et bientôt sa grève faite de débris de madrépores et de coquilles se mit à crier sous nos pas. Nous nous laissâmes tomber par terre et nous nous endormîmes, épuisés de fatigue. Une heure après, réveillés par le froid, nous nous remîmes en marche, sûrs cette fois de ne pas nous perdre ; nous étions sur la côte qui regarde la France, et nous avions le Pailais à notre gauche. C'était sur ce rivage-là que nous avions vu la veille la grotte qui nous avait tant charmés. Nous ne fûmes pas longtemps à en trouver d'autres plus hautes et plus profondes.

Elles s'ouvraient toujours par de grandes ogives, droites ou penchées, poussant leurs jets hardis sur d'énormes pans de rocs aux coupes régulières. Noires et veinées de violet, rouges comme du feu, brunes avec des lignes blanches, elles découvraient pour nous, qui les venions voir, toutes les variétés de leurs teintes et de leurs formes, leurs grâces, leurs fantaisies grandioses. Il y en avait une, couleur d'argent, que traversaient des veines de sang ; dans une autre des touffes de fleurs ressemblant à des primevères s'étaient écloses sur les glacières de granit rougeâtre, et du plafond tombaient sur le sable fin des gouttes lentes qui recommençaient toujours. Au fond de l'une d'elles, sur un cintre allongé, un lit de gravier blanc et poli, que la marée sans doute retournait et refaisait chaque jour, semblait être là pour y recevoir au sortir des flots le corps de la Naïade ; mais sa couche est vide et pour toujours l'a perdue ! Il ne reste que ces varechs encore humides où elle étendait ses beaux membres nus fatigués de la nage et sur lesquels, jusqu'à l'aurore, elle dormait au clair de lune.

Le soleil se couchait. La marée montait au fond sur les roches, qui s'effaçaient dans le brouillard bleu du soir, que blanchissait sur le niveau de la mer l'écume des vagues rebondissantes, et, de l'autre partie de l'horizon, le ciel rayé de longues lignes orange avait l'air balayé comme par de grands coups de vent. Sa lumière reflétée sur les flots les dorait d'une moire chatoyante ; se projetant sur le sable, elle le rendait brun et faisait briller dessus un semis d'acier.

A une demi-lieue vers le Sud, la côte allongeait vers la mer une file de rochers. Il fallait pour les joindre recommencer une marche pareille à celle que nous avions faite le matin. Nous étions fatigués, il y avait loin ; mais une tentation nous poussait vers là-bas, derrière cet horizon. La brise arrivait, dans le creux des pierres les flaques d'eau se ridaient, les goémons accrochés aux flancs des falaises tressaillaient, et du côté d'où la lune allait venir, une clarté pâle montait de dessous les eaux.

C'était l'heure où les ombres sont longues. Les rochers semblaient plus grands, les vagues plus vertes. On eût dit que le ciel s'agrandissait et que toute la nature changeait de visage.

Donc nous partîmes en avant, au delà, sans nous soucier de la marée qui montait, ni s'il y aurait plus tard un passage pour regagner terre. Nous voulions jusqu'au bout abuser de notre plaisir et le savourer sans en rien perdre. Plus légers que le matin, nous sautions, nous courions sans fatigue, sans obstacle, une verve de corps nous emportait malgré nous et nous éprouvions dans les muscles des espèces de tressaillements d'une volupté robuste et singulière. Nous secouions nos têtes au vent, et nous avions du plaisir à toucher les herbes avec nos mains. Aspirant l'odeur des flots, nous humions, nous évoquions à nous tout ce qu'il y avait de couleurs, de rayons, de murmures : le dessin des varechs, la douceur des grains de sable, la dureté du roc qui sonnait sous nos pieds, les altitudes de la falaise, la frange des vagues, les découpures du rivage, la voix de l'horizon ; et puis c'était la brise qui passait, comme d'invisibles baises qui nous coulaient sur la figure, c'était le ciel où il y avait des nuages allant vite, roulant une poudre d'or, la lune qui se levait, les étoiles qui se montraient. Nous nous roulions l'esprit dans la profusion de ces splendeurs, nous en repaissions nos yeux ; nous en écartions les narines, nous en ouvrons les oreilles ; quelque chose de la vie des éléments émanant d'eux-mêmes, sous l'attraction de nos regards, arrivait jusqu'à nous, s'y assimilaient, faisait que nous les comprenions dans un rapport moins éloigné, que nous les sentions plus avant, grâce à cette union plus complexe. A force de nous en pénétrer, d'y entrer, nous devenions nature aussi, nous sentions qu'elle gagnait sur nous et nous en avions une joie démesurée ; nous aurions voulu nous y perdre, être pris par elle ou l'emporter en nous. Ainsi que dans les transports de l'amour, on souhaite plus de mains pour palper, plus de lèvres pour baiser, plus d'yeux pour voir, plus d'âme pour aimer, nous étalant sur la nature dans un ébattement plein de délire et de joies, nous regrettions que nos yeux ne pussent aller jusqu'au sein des rochers, jusqu'au fond des mers, jusqu'au bout du ciel, pour voir comment poussent les pierres, se font les flots, s'allument les étoiles ; que nos oreilles ne pussent entendre graviter dans la terre la formation du granit, la sève pousser dans les plantes, les coraux rouler dans les solitudes de l'océan et, dans la sympathie de cette effusion contemplative, nous eussions voulu que notre âme, s'irradiant partout, allât vivre dans toute cette vie pour revêtir toutes ses formes, durer comme elles, et se variant toujours, toujours pousser au soleil de l'éternité ses métamorphoses.

Mais l'homme n'est fait pour goûter chaque jour que peu de nourriture, de couleurs, de sons, de sentiments, d'idées ; ce qui dépasse la mesure le fatigue ou le grise ; c'est l'idiotisme de l'ivrogne, c'est la folie de l'extatique. Ah ! que notre verre est petit, mon Dieu ! que notre soif est grande ! que notre tête est faible !

Ce soir-là nous n'avions plus la nôtre parfaitement d'aplomb sur les épaules ; nous nous en revenions animés, émus, presque furieux, le cœur battant, les nerfs vibrant comme les cordes d'une harpe que l'on a trop pincées ; nous nous sentions le corps fatigué, le cerveau étourdi, tandis qu'au contraire nos jarrets, saccadant leurs mouvements, d'eux-mêmes nous poussaient en avant et nous faisaient presque bondir. Lorsque nous rentrâmes dans la ville dont on allait fermer les portes, il y avait quatorze heures que nous marchions, nos pieds sortaient par nos souliers et 9- l'on tordit nos chemises qui, deux jours après, n'étaient pas sèches.

Pour nous en retourner à Quiberon, il fallut se lever le lendemain, avant 7 heures, ce qui exigea du courage. Encore raides de fatigue et tout grelottants de sommeil, nous nous empi- lâmes dans la barque, en compagnie d'un cheval blanc, de deux voyageurs pour le commerce, du même gendarme borgne et du même fusilier qui, cette fois, ne moralisait personne. Gris comme un cordelier et roulant sous les bancs, il avait fort à faire pour retenir son shako qui lui vacillait sur la tête et pour se défendre de son fusil qui lui cabriolait dans les jambes. Je ne sais qui de lui ou du gendarme était le plus bête des deux. Le gen- darme n'était pas ivre, mais il était stupide. Il dé- plorait le peu de tenue du soldat, il énumérait les punitions qu'il allait recevoir, il se scandalisait de ses hoquets, il se formalisait de ses manières. Vu de trois quarts, du côté de l'œil absent, avec son tricorne, son sabre et ses gants jaunes, c'était certes un des plus tristes aspects de la vie hu- maine. Un gendarme est, d'ailleurs, quelque chose d'essentiellement bouffon, que je ne puis consi- dérer sans rire ; effet grotesque et inexplicable, que cette base de la sécurité publique a l'avan- tage de m'occasionner, avec les procureurs du roi, les magistrats quelconques et les professeurs de belles-lettres.

Incliné sur le flanc, le bateau coupait les vagues qui filaient le long du bordage en tordant de l'écume. Les trois voiles bien gonflées ar- rondissaient leur courbe douce. La mâture criait, l'air sifflait dans les poulies. Penché sur la proue, le nez dans la brise, un mousse chantait ; nous n'entendions pas les paroles, mais c'était un air lent, tranquille et monotone qui se répétait tou- jours, ni plus haut ni plus bas, et qui prolongeait en mourant des modulations traînantes.

Cela s'en allait doux et triste sur la mer, comme dans une âme un souvenir confus qui passe.

Le cheval se tenait debout, du mieux qu'il pou- vait, sur ses quatre pieds et mordillait sa botte de foin. Les matelots, les bras croisés, souriaient en regardant dans les voiles.

(*'A Quiberon, nous revîmes M. Rohan, sa ru- biconde et haute épouse et son jeu du "trou ma- dame » qui remplace dans son établissement le billard obligé et qui paraît être une des curiosités du pays. Nos deux voyageurs y étaient forts, et quand après avoir déjeuné avec eux nous partîmes pour Plouharnel, nous les laissâmes acharnés mieux que jamais en train de jouer le café avec une de leurs connaissances de l'endroit. Tous deux ils voyageaient dans les draps. Le premier était un assez beau mâle de quelque vingt ans, blond, haut en couleur, ayant poitrine bombée, casquette sur l'oreille, talons hauts et gilet jusqu'aux genoux ; il nous représentait l'incarnation du Vau-

Inédit, pages 133 à 136. deville-Achard, il en avait l'élégance, c'en était le style. Quant à l'autre, sans doute que dans son temps il avait eu l'aimable laisser-aller de son compagnon ; lui aussi, il avait peut-être jadis pris la taille aux bonnes, injurié amicalement les garçons, été brillant sur le carambolage et distrait les ennuis de la grande route en chantant du Béranger dans son cabriolet ; mais l'âge était venu, cette neige du cœur qui avait éteint sa flamme et calmé sa voix.

L'expérience d'un sage, la modération du philosophe se lisaient sur son front qu'avaient ridé les soucis de la vente et les inquiétudes du ballot. Combien dans sa vie avait-il dû écrire de lettres d'affaires ? De combien de maisons n'avait-il pas été mis à la porte ? Que de fois il avait dîné à table d'hôte !

Devant se rendre comme nous le soir à Plouharnel, ces messieurs nous proposèrent de prendre nos sacs dans leur voiture, ce que nous acceptâmes et dont bien nous prit, car de Quiberon à Plouharnel la route est fort sablonneuse, et vingt-cinq livres de plus sur le dos n'auraient pas accéléré notre marche.

Jusqu'au fort Penthievre à peu près, la route étant connue nous ne vîmes rien de nouveau, mais nous revîmes avec ennui quelques-uns de ces bons menhirs allongeant sur l'herbe leur ombre bête.

Nous n'entrâmes pas au fort Penthievre, ce qui étonna beaucoup le factionnaire qui, nous voyant passer, avait eu la prévenance de nous crier de loin « qu'il nous fallait une permission pour le voir », mais nous nous assîmes au bas de son talus sur le versant d'un grand monticule de gazon dont la pente descend vers les sables. Le soleil brillait, la mer pétillait, un vent sec et âpre soufflait sur les joncs des dunes et, comme une nappe d'eau qui eût passé dessus, les courbait tous à la fois.

En face de cette hauteur où nous étions, Plouharnel se montrant sur la côte opposée, le clocher de son église, certes, paraissait facile à atteindre, il n'y avait qu'à suivre tout droit ainsi que disent les paysans. Comme si c'était chose fort aisée à faire que de suivre tout droit n'importe quoi, même quand on a devant les yeux un clocher ou une girouette !

La presqu'île, se découpant au milieu de la mer, prolongeait sa perspective d'un jaune pâle, et les vagues dessinaient sur son double rivage deux longues bordures d'écume blanche. La mer était toute bleue, le ciel tout blanc ; frappés d'a- plomb par le soleil, les sables faisaient miroiter devant nous de grands reflets bruns qui semblaient les faire onduler et en allonger l'étendue. Des monticules ronds formés par des coups de vent, et que piquaient çà et là quelques joncs minces comme des aiguilles, se présentaient sans cesse l'un après l'autre, il fallait les monter et les descendre, des traînées de poussière se levant lentement s'envolaient et nos yeux se fermaient à l'éblouissement du soleil qui flambait sur les flots et chatoyait sur le sable. Le vent nous empourprait le visage, il nous le fouettait à grands coups, nous avançons lentement et avec tristesse sur cette grève abandonnée.

Donc nous allions sans mot dire, du mieux que nous pouvions, sans jamais atteindre au fond de la baie où avait l'air de se trouver Plouharnel. Nous y arrivâmes cependant. Mais là, nous tombions dans la mer. Nous avons pris le côté droit du rivage, tandis qu'on devait suivre le gauche.

Il fallut rebrousser chemin et recommencer une partie de la route.

Un bruit étouffé se fit entendre. Un grelot sonna, un chapeau parut. C'était la poste d'Auray. Toujours même homme, même cheval, même sac aux lettres. Il s'en allait tranquillement vers Quiberon d'où il reviendra tantôt pour y retourner demain. C'est l'hôte du rivage ; il le passe le matin, il le repasse le soir. Sa vie est de le parcourir ; lui seul l'anime, il en fait l'épisode, j'allais presque dire la grâce.

Il s'arrête ; nous lui parlons deux minutes, il nous salue et il repart.

Quel ensemble que celui-là ! Quel homme et quel cheval ! Quel tableau ! Callot, sans doute, l'aurait reproduit ; il n'y avait que Cervantes pour l'écrire.

Après avoir passé sur de grands quartiers de rocs qu'on a essayé d'aligner dans la mer, pour raccourcir la route en coupant le fond de la baie, nous arrivâmes enfin à Plouharnel. Le village était tranquille, les poules gloussaient dans les rues, et dans les jardins enclos de murs, de pierres sèches, les orties sont poussées au milieu de carrés d'avoine.

Comme nous étions devant la maison de notre hôte, assis à prendre l'air, un vieux mendiant a passé. Il était courbé, en guenilles, grouillant de vermine, rouge comme du vin, hérissé, suant, la poitrine débraillée, la bouche baveuse.

Le soleil reluisait sur ses haillons, sa peau violette et presque noire semblait transsuder du sang. Il beuglait d'une voix terrible en frappant à coups redoublés contre la porte d'une maison voisine.

(*') Nous eûmes l'honneur de dîner avec nos deux voyageurs pour le commerce dont la politesse méritait bien l'offre de l'inévitable bouteille de Champagne, aussi leur cœur s'ouvrit-il complètement aux nôtres, et ils versèrent dedans leurs confidences les plus intimes. Nous apprîmes des choses fort intéressantes, que le plus jeune, par exemple, voyageait pour une maison de Lisieux et qu'il avait eu l'an passé une maîtresse qui s'appelait Joséphine et qui avait beaucoup de gorge. C'était, du reste, un gaillard qui avait connu de Cythère le haut et le bas de l'échelle, il lui arrivait souvent de calmer ses sens pour de faibles trésors et il avait couché avec des femmes qui couchaient dans des draps de satin noir.

(*') Inédit, pages 137 à 140. — Eh quoi ! lui dit son compagnon, tu ne leur en a pas pris un peu pour te faire des gilets ?

L'hôte, qui est le maire de l'endroit, vint au dessert trinquer avec nous. Les deux coudes de sa chemise appuyés sur la table, son bonnet de soie noire relevé derrière les oreilles pour mieux entendre, il demeura tout le temps muet et béant à savourer les discours de nos amis et les nôtres, qui ne valaient pas mieux. Du reste, ce dîner ne nous ennuya pas, il est parfois très doux de causer avec des imbéciles.

Le lendemain était un dimanche, et la cuisine était déjà toute pleine de paysans qui venaient boire, quand nous descendîmes pour y prendre notre soupe à l'oignon avant de nous mettre en marche pour Auray.

On entendait, par-dessus les voix et les galoches ferrées qui résonnaient dans le cabaret, le roucoulement d'une tourterelle enfermée dans une cage suspendue à la muraille. Quel doux bruit que celui-là ! Aimez-vous les vieux colombiers où on les voit marcher sur le toit des tuiles en rengeant leur cou, en ouvrant leurs ailes, en baissant leurs pieds roses dans l'eau des gouttières tout en poussant tout le long du jour leurs ronflements plaintifs qui reprennent et s'arrêtent ?

Nous étions levés, nous allions partir, nous le vîmes passer, mais nous ne l'aperçûmes que par derrière. Qu'était-ce par devant ? qui donc ? le chapeau. Quel chapeau ! un vaste et immense chapeau qui dépassait les épaules de son porteur et qui était en osier, quel osier ! du bronze plutôt, planisphère dur et compact fait pour résister à la grêle, que la pluie ne traversait point, que le temps ne devait que durcir et fortifier. L'homme qu'il recouvrait disparaissait dessous et avait l'air d'y être entré jusqu'au milieu du corps, et il le portait cependant (je l'ai vu tourner la tête). Quelle constitution ! quel tempérament il avait donc ! quels muscles cervicaux ! quelle force dans les vertèbres ! Mais aussi quelle ampleur ! quel cercle, ce chapeau ! Il projette une ombre tout à l'entour de lui, et son maître ne doit jamais jouir du soleil. Ah ! quel chapeau ! C'est un couvercle de chaudière à vapeur surmonté d'une colonne, ça ferait un four en y pratiquant des meurtrières ! Il y a des choses inébranlables : le Simplon et l'impudence des critiques, des choses solides : l'arc de l'Étoile et le français de Labruyère, des choses lourdes : le plomb, le bouilli et M. Ni-sard, des choses grandes : le nez de mon frère, l'Hamlet de Shakespeare et la tabatière de Bouilhet, mais je n'ai rien vu d'aussi solide, d'aussi inébranlable, d'aussi grand et d'aussi lourd que ce chapeau de Plouharnel !

Et il avait une couverture en toile cirée ! VI

De Plouharnel à Auray, campagne déserte ; on rencontre peu de maisons, mais de beaux aspects de paysages comme ajoncs et arbres.

Auray, a un bon chic de bonne petite vieille ville avec ses toits et ses maisons ; les femmes plus jolies qu'aux alentours. — Belle vue du haut d'un belvédère de pierre d'Auray, à droite et dedans la terre. — Quelques barques à sec sur la rive à cause de la marée basse ; vieux pont à piles triangulaires avec des avancées dans les piles.

La Chartreuse. — GaUia marena posuit, mausolée, vilain monument dans le goût de la Restauration ; au fond deux bas-reliefs : l'un Mademoiselle d'Angoulême posant la première pierre ; pose du préfet qui lui présente la truelle sur un coussin ; l'autre M. d'Angoulême priant ; son manteau ; quel galbe de bottes ! Et le Monsieur par derrière retenant un gant sur sa poitrine. — On a descendu avec chandelle par un trou et nous avons vu les ossements. — Cloître vitré, fermé, garni de copies de saint Bruno de Lesueur. — Les sœurs grises. — L'abbé se promenant. — Champ des martyrs : une espèce de chapelle totalement insignifiante ; d'un côté un petit bois, une allée d'arbres verts, une longue lande que la mer inonde à chaque marée ; l'endroit était bien choisi.

Pour aller à Sainte-Anne, la route monte. — Lieux charmants avec de l'eau (c'est l'Auray qui coule), des roches, des nénufars sur l'eau, des ajoncs. — Le petit chien qui courait et se baignait partout. — Les haies sont effrayantes tant elles sont multipliées quand on pense à leur usage. — Sous un arbre une vieille femme pâle, agenouillée, priait au coin d'un chemin creux ; c'était l'heure des vêpres. Nous en avons rencontré deux autres qui marchaient tout en priant, sans doute, car Tune a fait le signe de la croix.

Sainte-Anne. — Eglise ornée de tableaux, ex-voto le moulin et les enfants. — Coup de hache. — Boutiques d'objets de piété. — Notre conducteur carliste et dévot, gros bon-homme lourd et nui.

Vannes. — Messieurs et dames endimanchés. — Les jeunes troupiers en bourgeois, moustaches, pantalons tirés ; un pantalon et une paire de bottines 1 — M. Descormiers de Montmorency écarté de tout le monde quoique au milieu.

— L'officier, chapeau en osier noir, redingote de velours noir, cravate blanche, bouche et nez de Marat. On aurait dû le nommer gardien de la promenade avec un logement dans l'hôpital quoiqu'il n'ait pas besoin de ça. — Vannes et sa femme. — La tour du connétable, occupée par un menuisier et des Kiques effroyables. — Eglises sans noms.

— Coin oriental en descendant de l'hôtel vers une petite promenade au bord de l'eau menant à un champ entouré régulièrement de chênes sous lesquels j'écris. — A l'hôtel, dans une pièce qui semble être le salon, deux gravures : le retour et le départ du roi en 1817. M*<sup>r</sup> d'Angoulême en Espagne, grand costume, bottes à l'écuyère ; son épée s'appuie sur un monstre enchaîné qui doit être l'hydre de l'anarchie ; il se tient debout à côté du tronc. Au fond, sur un bouclier pendu à la muraille, il y a écrit : veni, vidi, vici.

De Vannes à Hennebont la route nous semble jolie ; vent frais sur l'impériale. — Bois que la route traverse.

Lorient. — Nullité complète ; rues basses et alignées. — Hôtel de France, gargote, serre dans le jardin. — Musique le soir sous les arbres devant le théâtre. — La calomnie de M. Scribe (M. de Sauvray Raymond), j'en sors malade. — Le port impossible à voir. — Promenade le soir. — Rien dedans. — Hennebont sur le penchant d'un coteau.

De Lorient à Hennebont à pied. — Florentin chantant une chanson génoise et vendant des plâtres. — Plantes violettes dans les ruines ; deux tours conservées avec des toits en ardoise. — En arrivant de Lorient : pan de mur à mâchi- coulis garni de terre. — Sur le haut de la ville, pro- menade, vue sur la rivière ; en face l'Hôtel du Com- merce ; grande allée d'ormeaux. — En relayant, idiot farouche, regard dur, grande redingote verte, pantalon de toile trop court, sabots, nu-pieds, chapeau de paille ; femme couverte ....

D'Hennebont à Ploërmel, sous la bâche. — Le conducteur est une espèce de marin. — Mélancolie en regardant la grande route. — A Vannes le démocrate classique, dési- rant notre intimité. — Procession, soldats, jeunes garçons vêtus de blanc couronnés de roses à Hennebont.

Ploërmel. — Eglise gothique du bon temps avec de jolis vitraux ; portail du commencement du xiv* siècle ; la truie à gauche sur un contrefort, près du portail latéral. — Dans un long vallon plat la campagne est foncée en cou- leur et bleue à l'horizon. — Idiot. — Père de a6 enfants nous récite des vers sur l'empereur.

Josselin, vu de l'angle du pont. — Trois tours, fenêtres carrées (du commencement du XV' siècle). — Bâti sur roc, sur la rivière, rangée de mâchicoulis ; de face dix fenêtres dans le style de la reine Anne à Blois, mais d'un goût plus raide. — Aucune pareille ; l'entrecroisement des galeries également différent. — Enormes gargouilles : élé- phants sans cornes, chien marin, dragon ; de dessous leur ventre part une gouttière en pierre menant jusqu'en bas, à 3 pieds du sol ; et terminée par une autre tête de gar- gouille de même caractère. L'une, vers le milieu, la deuxième en partant de l'angle droit, figurent la tête d'un crocodile dont le corps est la gouttière ; le corps est couvert de bosses et, sur les côtés des nageoires, un peu plus haut, la queue réparaît autour de la colonne.

Eglise de Josselin. — Notre-Dame du Roncier ; robe rouge étalée en éventail renversé.

Ce sommaire a été développé par Maxime Du Camp.

VII

Baud. — A une petite demi-lieue, après avoir passé par un bois de hêtres, la Vénus de Quinipily qui n'est pas plus égyptienne que les deux cascates de Locminé. — Figure plate, écrasée, cheveux aplatis et ondes sur les tempes ; deux bandelettes s'entrecroisent sur son dos après avoir été prises par une espèce d'étole dont le devant, lui retombant sur la poitrine, finit en triangle comme un cale- çon de Samoyède. Cuisses grasses, fortes ; genoux fléchis, mains croisées sur la poitrine ; la tête est enfoncée dans les épaules, ce qui, de profil, lui donne quelque chose de frissonnant ; seins marqués, fesses largement indiquées. Ensemble barbare.

QuiMPERLÉ. — Deux rivières. — En revenant, sentiers entre des murs ruisselant de feuilles et de ronces ; vieux pont tout tapissé de feuillage ; l'eau est limpide, arrêtée par les cail- loux, elle gargouille et fait de petites cascades qui sont comme des voiles blancs accrochés sur le courant.

Saint-Michel. — N'a pas de façade. Le côté de l'ab- side est appuyé sur deux contreforts où sont accolées des maisons ; on passe dessous. A gauche, une vieille maison avec des bonshommes en bois sculpté, l'un broyant dans un mortier ; le porche latéral fleuri, lourd. — Dans l'inté- rieur, une statue en bois d'une Pieta : air Grassot de la mère, air Small. de J. — Un tableau de 1715 représentant la mort d'un évêque : à gauche, dans le bas, les âmes au

Église

10 Purgatoire ; le Père Éternel au haut en pape, le Christ avec sa croix ; la Vierge plus bas ; des anges en sandales descendant vers la terre où se meurt dans son lit un évêque ; un prêtre lui présente la croix, sa servante pleure ; un en- fant de chœur à genoux porte un cierge, souliers. Au pied du lit le Diable dégoûtant à l'air d'une vieille maquerelle grasse ; à la tête du lit l'ange qui invite l'évêque à venir au ciel ; sous la table, où sont quelques ornements d'église, le dragon.

L'église Sainte-Croix est le contraire de l'église Saint- Michel, elle donne plus qu'elle ne promet : roman pur, élevé, noble (blanchi 1) ; chœur monté sur une estrade, on y pénètre par deux escaliers ; sous l'autel une voûte où l'on descend par deux perrons de pierre. On pénètre dessous et on circule. — Plein de monde ; bonnet blanc des fem- mes ; les hommes en longs cheveux, en grègues, en sa- bots ; air vigoureux et gracieux, œil pénétrant et intense d'un jeune homme que j'avais vu descendre en sautant une ruelle en pente, à murs couverts de ronces et de lierres et qui est entré en même temps que moi dans l'église. — Autre assis en face sur les marches ; le jour tombait sur ses sabots ; sa tête se perdait dans la masse noire de ses cheveux retombant sur sa veste blanche. On s'est mis à chanter les litanies, j'entendais sa voix dans la masse. A sa gauche, le premier en face sur un banc, homme en veste bleue, air grave. — Aspect normal et tranquille de tous ces hommes qui semblent représenter leurs ancêtres et leurs descendants. — Cryptes ogive basse, ornements de feuilles aux chapiteaux. — Deux beaux tombeaux d'abbés avec la crosse, celui qui est par terre surtout, tout noir, draperies simples et belles, vrai gothique, quelque chose de carlovingien même, et puis plus loin le peuple qui chantait. La religion là au moins était vraie et ne choquait pas comme un anachronisme.

Rosporden. — Petit lac. — Église. — Femme pâle, maigre, qui priait sur une tombe dans le cimetière avec un air aussi intense que la femme dans l'église de Nantes près le confessionnal. C'était plus douloureux, plus profond, mais moins élevé, moins mystique ; elle avait la tête droite sur la pierre qu'elle perçait du regard ; l'autre, de côté, au ciel où elle entrevoyait quelque chose. — A côté de l'église petit lac. — Marché silencieux, sans rires, sans cris ; pas de cabarets ni de boutiques ; ils sont silencieux dans leurs cheveux comme le pays dans ses arbres. — Les mendiants tombent sur l'étranger et se ruent sur lui avec l'obstination de la faim.

Quimper. — Longue promenade d'ormes sur les bords de l'Odéon, dans le genre de Quimperlé, mais moins herbue, moins simple comme impression. — Les abattoirs. S'il y avait des abattoirs d'hommes ! ai-je songé en entendant les cris des animaux ; un veau lié avait, par terre, des mouvements convulsifs de peur. — Cathédrale : Deux grandes tours avec de longues baies étroites, ogives disgracieuses, peu d'élévation comme style, qui a quelque chose du gothique en décadence, est pauvre ; vierge d'Otton en marbre derrière le chœur, gentil et molasse ; statue de Grallon à genoux avec une inscription expliquant qu'il a fait des fondations pieuses pour l'église.

Eglise Saint-Mathieu : beaux vitraux du fond du sanctuaire.

Journée du samedi. — Petite pluie fine. — Notre guide, petit vieillard d'une vivacité nerveuse, maigrelet, marchant mal et vite. "Tout ce que je voudrais c'est de retourner encore une fois à Rennes." — A travers les haies de genêts et d'ajoncs, les routes voûtées de verdure où l'on peut se tenir à peine debout à cause des branches ;

quelquefois une avenue de hêtres, deux vallons laissant voir la campagne, dans le brouillard, toute cicatrisée de haies ; et puis des cavées profondes, des pentes nues, jaunâtres d'ajoncs ; pas d'oiseaux, pas de village, pas d'hommes ; la verdure sombre et muette au pays féodal et triste.

Locmaria, à un quart de lieue de Quimper. — Vieux roman, portail ogival, affreux saint Christophe ; bénitier, la pierre en est verte.

Plomelin. — Enseveli sous la verdure. — Eglise nue, mais qui ne paraît pas nulle ; on y sent le sentiment malgré la plastique qui semble anti-plastique, c'est-à-dire que la forme est en rapport avec le lieu où elle se trouve. — Temple de faux dieux, mesure ruinée, un portail gothique, plus loin un pan de mur avec une autre entrée ogivale ; les souterrains ont été bouchés.

Église de Kerfeunten. — Clocher carré à jour, en pierre. A gauche sous le porche une inscription en marbre blanc indiquant que le peintre Valentin, né à Guingamp, est enterré là ; belle verrière du fond : arbre généalogique de la Trinité dont le sommet soutient les pieds de la croix où le Christ agonise. — Eglise de la Mère-Dieu. — Jeune homme blond qui nous a apporté la clef ; veste bleue, cheveux contenus sous son chapeau. Quand il s'est agenouillé dans l'église ils ont déroulé comme ceux d'une femme, séparés par une raie sur le milieu de la tête. J'ai compris qu'une femme aussi pouvait aimer à passer sa main dans une chevelure. Quand nous en sommes sortis ils étaient tout répandus et étalés d'eux-mêmes. O les coiffeurs ! Ô l'art appris et montré ! O la bêtise humaine ! — L'intérieur de l'église est nul, mais elle est si chastement cachée dans un nid de feuillage ! Une date indique qu'elle a été construite en 1590 et l'on aurait juré que l'église était des xiii<sup>e</sup> ou xiv<sup>e</sup> siècles.

Il ne reste de Notre-Dame de Guilen que le portail, petit, bas, d'une jolie ogive d'un excellent goût. Ronces, lierres et c'est tout. Sur les deux piliers carrés accolés aux deux côtés du portail, dans chacun un trou carré : lavabo. — La vagabonde.

Costumes. — Les veuves portent un bonnet bleu, le derrière des bonnets fait ceci avec des bouts relevés. Quelques-unes, broderies de couleurs aux parements, sous les aisselles, un galon qui cbrut ; par derrière, leur corsage semble un fragment de fraise à grands tuyaux, mais ce n'est que par derrière, le tuyauté n'est pas par devant ; jupe brune plissée en long ; souliers découverts ronds, à boucles d'argent carrées. — Homme : grègues de cuir, sabots ou souliers à semelles de bois, chapeau rond d'une dimension raisonnable, et non plus fantastique comme dans le Morbihan, placé sur le derrière de la tête ; cela fait un bel effet avec leur chevelure. Veste bleue bordée de jaune, seconde veste par-dessus, sans manche, de même couleur, mais plus foncée ; large plaque de cuivre à la ceinture.

La Procession, les petits anges en bracelets, colliers, rubans, fleurs ; ça fait une impression de prostitution. Deux gamins en veste de nankin brodées, jeunes filles en blanc, l'une jolie, maigre, avec des gants jaunes. — Les chantres, la chasuble de velours violet. — Mine démesurément stupide de celui qui portait le Saint-Esprit. — Les troupiers s'agenouillent quand on encense le Saint-Sacrement ; les gendarmes suivent l'épée tirée ; bruit d'un pompier qui pissait pendant que le canon tirait et que le bourdon bourdonnait. — On est révolté quoiqu'on ne veuille pas l'être. — Hôtel de l'Épée. — Expression âpre de la fille qui nous servait, bavoletbleu, bouts de manches, tablier, bonnet blanc ; pas de cheveux.

ConcARNEAU. — Amabilité naïve ou prétentieuse de la jeune fille de l'établissement. — Arbres le long du quai. — Les mâchicoulis sont restaurés et intacts. — Marée basse, vue plate, au loin la mer. — La pierre branlante de Tregunc ne branle plus. — Cimetière celtique, avec les pierres disséminées au milieu des ajoncs et de l'herbe, font un bel effet. — Pluie, pluie. — La route de Concarneau à Fouesnant doit être ravissante, comme arbres, comme montées et descentes.

La Forêt. — On traverse une chaussée bâtie sur un petit bras de mer, les pointes de terre couvertes d'arbres avancent jusque dans la mer. — Caractère breton de l'église avec son clocher carré à jour. — — Calvaire en pierre ; grc-nouilles et tête de chien (ou d'autre animal) comme ornements.

Fouesnant, lundi soir, 10 heures et demie, 14 juin. — Route jusqu'à Pont-l'Abbé même caractère, couverte d'arbres ; moins de landes que dans le Morbihan.

Bénodet. — On passe en bac.

Pont-l'Abbé. — Église, un seul côté de fait ; le côté droit de la nef s'appuie sur la muraille ; bonnes ogives, mais le tout abîmé sous le badigeon ; toujours le Père éternel en pape portant un petit Christ ; au-dessus le Saint-Esprit.

Danses à un ; entrelacement des rondes, queue allant et revenant. — La deuxième veste des hommes ne leur descend que jusqu'au milieu du dos avec des effilés pareils ; sur le bas de la première des broderies en fil blanc formant des lettres ; chapeau petit, gracieux, couvert de trois rubans de velours. La coiffure des femmes change : des oreillères brodées leur passent sur la tête laissant le derrière des cheveux à découvert ; le chignon relevé est contenu par le bout par un bandeau rouge, sur lequel elles mettent quelquefois un tout petit bonnet ou calotte blanche.

Le commissaire, le garde champêtre, quelle intimité se-crète il doit exister entre eux. — Opérations chirurgicales. — Effet du râteau pièce à conviction ; foule ; le juge de paix ; un instrument contondant ; le bon gendarme.

{#) A une demi-lieue de distance du petit village de Baud, cachée au fond d'un bois de hêtres, se trouve la Vénus de Quinipily. C'est une statue en granit, de six pieds de haut, représentant une femme nue posant les mains sur sa poitrine ; une sorte d'étole qui passe autour du cou lui descend <*' Inédit, pages 150 à 172. jusque sur le ventre où elle s'arrête en triangle comme un caleçon de Samoyède ; deux bande- lettres serrant ses cheveux ondes sont prises sous l'étole et vont s'entre-croiser par derrière à la chute des reins. A voir de profil ses cuisses grasses, sa croupe charnue, ses genoux fléchis et sa grosse tête enfoncée dans les épaules, elle vous semble d'une sensualité à la fois toute barbare et raffinée, la face est plate, le nez camus, les yeux à fleur de tête et la bouche ainsi que les doigts des pieds et des mains indiqués seulement par une simple raie ; sur la poitrine on a voulu figurer des seins. Au bas de son piédestal est une grande cuve de même granit, ayant la forme d'un carré long terminé à l'une de ses extrémités par un demi-cercle ; il peut contenir, dit-on, seize barriques d'eau.

On l'a prise pour une Isis égyptienne à cause de ses bandelettes, ou pour une Vénus romaine à cause des inscriptions du piédestal. Que décider cependant si ces inscriptions, comme on l'assure, n'ont été mises là qu'au xvii<sup>e</sup> siècle par le comte Pierre de Lannion ? Devons-nous en revenir alors à l'hypothèse d'une Isis ? Mais n'est-ce pas voir, comme M. de Penhoet, la rage permanente de l'Egypte, que de reconnaître dans cette œuvre gauche, surabondante et lymphatique, le style élevé, svelte, rythmique des Égyptiens ? et n'y a-t-il pas, d'autre part, une irrévérence trop grossière à supposer les Romains, eux qui aimaient tant les belles femmes, capables jamais d'en avoir fait une si laide ? On sait seulement que jusqu'au xvi<sup>e</sup> siècle cette statue était placée sur la montagne de Castanec où les paysans bretons l'y adoraient comme une idole et lui apportaient des offrandes. Elle guérissait des malades ; les femmes relevant de couches se baignaient dans sa cuve et les jeunes gens désireux des noces accouraient s'y plonger pour se livrer ensuite, sous les yeux de la déesse, aux passe-temps solitaires des mélancolies amoureuses. En 1671 des missionnaires se trouvaient à Baud, ayant, à ce qu'il paraît, des prédilections d'une autre nature, en furent scandalisés et engagèrent le comte de Lannion, gouverneur du pays, à extirper d'un seul coup l'idolâtrie en détruisant l'idole ; le comte se contenta de la renverser et de la rouler du haut de la montagne dans la rivière qui passe au pied. Une inondation survint, les paysans l'attribuèrent à la colère de la déesse, la retirèrent de l'eau, la remirent à sa place et recommencèrent à célébrer son culte avec ces mêmes cérémonies qui révoltaient les honnêtes gens, comme on disait alors, si bien qu'un certain évêque de Vannes, Charles de Rosmadec, supplia à son tour le comte de Lannion (le fils du précédent) de mettre définitivement la pauvre statue en pièces. Le comte n'en fit rien, mais transporta le tout, cuve et femme, dans la cour de son château de Quinipily. Cet enlèvement ne se fit pas sans peine, il fallut que les soldats du gouverneur se défendissent contre les paysans qui la voulaient garder chez eux. Ils devaient y tenir. N'était-ce pas pour eux, au milieu de cette campagne rude et âpre, l'idole féconde et douce, l'idole fortifiante, excitante, guérissante, l'incarnation de la santé et de la chair et comme le symbole même du désir ?

Que ce soit donc la tentative d'un art qui s'éveille ou le fruit pourri d'une civilisation perdue, à quelque culte qu'elle appartienne, de quelque Olympe qu'elle descende, par sa légende et ses formes mêmes est-elle autre chose pour nous qu'une des mille manifestations de cette éternelle religion des entrailles de l'homme ? J'entends celle qui se reconstitue partout sous toutes les autres, s'étalant hier, se cachant aujourd'hui, mais qui pas plus que lui ne peut périr, car ce rêve permanent c'est le rêve individuel de son cœur, ce culte-là c'est le culte de son être : l'adoration de la Vie dans le principe qui la donne.

Le château qui a recueilli la statue est ruiné, rasé, disparu ; la Vénus se dresse au milieu des broussailles sous un dôme de feuilles vertes. Plus d'enceinte sacrée, de cérémonies, d'adorations ; il ne reste d'elle qu'elle seule, c'est-à-dire le Dieu sans la foi, ce qui est peu de chose ou rien du tout. Voilà donc le cadavre de ce qui fut peut-être une religion et ce qui demeure en définitive de la croyance de plusieurs siècles ! L'idole cependant n'est pas morte sans pousser un râle qui s'entend encore : sur la chapelle chrétienne élevée à la place où jadis était son temple, son nom réapparaît comme l'outrage d'un souvenir dont on ne peut se décharger ; cette chapelle est nommée le prieuré de la Couarde(1).

Il y avait autrefois à Quinipily deux autres statues que l'on a transportées à Locminé. Ce sont des hommes trapus, barbus, chevelus et coiffés sur le derrière de la tête d'un bonnet en façon de pyramide tronquée. Une ceinture de feuillage leur entoure le corps, chacun d'eux tient une massue à la main gauche. Je ne puis croire que ces deux espèces de cariatides, taillées par quelque manœuvre de village, aient eu jamais grande valeur ni grand sens, elles ont d'ailleurs par elles-mêmes je ne sais quel air canaille qui me les fit suspecter de n'être pas fort anciennes. Qu'on y voie ce qu'on voudra, des hercules gaulois ou des prêtres égyptiens, «car quant à la barbe et aux cheveux, dit M. de Penhoet, ce sont pour moi autant d'indices qu'il s'agit de prêtres du culte du soleil ou de Sérapis », ils n'en sont pas moins laids, archilais, et, qui pis est, vilains.

Une heure après avoir quitté ces affreux bons-hommes, nous arrivâmes à Quimperlé qui, pour n'offrir rien de celtique, de romain ou de phénicien, n'en est pas moins une des plus agréables bonnes fortunes que nous ayons rencontrées dans notre voyage.

Ici, pas d'alignement, pas de trottoir, aucune espèce de palais de justice, que nous sachions du comme des rochers, et le courant se heurtant contre elles déchire dessus sa nappe unie. De place en place, sûr cette surface d'un bleu pâle, ces marques dans l'eau semblent les arrachures blanches d'un grand voile étendu que le vent ferait lever. D'une rive à l'autre un pont d'une seule arche a jeté sa courbe aplatie, dont la silhouette projetée tremblote sur la rivière avec les herbes suspendues à sa voûte ; elles descendent en chevelure, s'allongent jusqu'en bas, et frôlent du bout le courant qui passe à travers l'ogive de cette verdure aérienne. On voit tous les coudes de la rivière réapparaître au loin dans la prairie où elle s'ébat avec des lignes de peupliers sur l'herbe, des bouquets d'arbres derrière les places d'eau, et ça et là, sur les bords, deux ou trois bicoques de travers mirant obliquement leurs poutres jaunes et leurs plâtres noirs. Puis au fond, tout au fond, dans une perspective se rétrécissant toujours, le vague aperçu des collines et des bois qui se perdent dans la brume.

La ville s'étagant graduellement remonte en face sur une colline avec cette eau, ces arbres, les madriers de ces maisons peints ou vermoulus, ces pignons de plomb, ces toits en tuiles serrés l'un près de l'autre ou régulièrement séparés par la ligne ondoyante de quelque mur tout chevelu ; il semble que Quimperlé n'est venu au monde que pour être un sujet d'aquarelle.

L'église Saint-Michel montre, au-dessus de la ville qui se déroule à ses pieds, les quatre clochetons de sa tour et sa galerie à arcade, mais l'on est fort surpris, quand on arrive auprès, de ne trouver qu'une église assez commune et n'ayant même pour portail qu'un portail latéral divisé par deux portes jumelles dont la forme serait jolie si l'ornementation générale n'en était trop lourde. Sur les contreforts de l'abside deux maisons voisines sont venues appuyer leur premier étage qui, lorsqu'on monte de la ville vers l'église, font l'effet d'un pont jeté sur chacune des rues. La façade de l'une d'elles, noire, obscure, rongée de mites, porte sur les poutres extérieures de sa charpente des personnages sculptés fort amusants ; ils ont des bonnets ronds, des mines sérieuses et des robes longues que leur plisse autour de la taille une ceinture à large boucle. Us sont occupés à différentes besognes qui paraissent très importantes. Un d'eux tenant un pilon broie quelque chose dans un mortier. Probablement que c'était le logis vénéré d'un bon apothicaire-herboriste d'autrefois, lors du vieux temps des élixirs et des juleps, quand on venait chercher chez lui la drogue orientale, le médicament miellé, l'or potable qui prolonge la vie, et puis aussi le remède mystérieux qui se composait la nuit dans la seconde arrièreboutique, derrière les gros alambics verts et les paquets de baume : la potion contre l'épilepsie, faite de raclure de crâne humain et de sang de décapité ou le sirop prolifique pour les vieux maris. Celui qui fit bâtir cette maison fut, j'imagine, quelque gros bourgeois du temps ayant sa stalle dans le chœur et sa métairie hors la ville, qui était marguillier de l'église et doit y être enterré quelque part.

Il n'y a rien à voir dans l'intérieur de Saint-Michel, et nous allions en sortir quand nous découvrimmes une statue en bois et un tableau à l'huile, la statue est une Pieta dont je défie qu'elle donne une idée ; la Vierge, bleue et rouge, ressemble à Grassot, l'acteur ; le Christ, jaune et vert, à Small, coiffeur (Palais-Royal, galerie Maupensier, 7).

Mais que dire du tableau dont la poésie mirifique rappelle (de foin, il est vrai) les extrasublimes fresques de Nort ? Un évêque est dans son lit, il va mourir, ce pauvre vieux, mais il a gardé néanmoins sa calotte rouge pour qu'on voie bien qu'il est évêque jusqu'au bout ; son corps se dessinant sous les draps avec une gentillesse charmante qui rappelle le galbe d'une andouille vue à travers un torchon mouillé ; à ses côtés un prêtre, en surplis, lui présente la croix à baiser, tandis que sa servante, non loin, pleure en s'essuyant les yeux à l'ourlet de son tablier. A la tête du lit un ange emplumé se penche et souffle de bons conseils à Monseigneur, qui hésite quelque peu, car à ses pieds, en effet, un diable vert, avec un bec de corbeau et des mamelles d'une mollassité dégoûtante, essaie de le fasciner par ses contorsions. La chambre est pleine de chapelets, d'encensoirs, de saints ciboires, de saints sacrements, de reliques et d'agnus Dei. Tout près du moribond, à genoux, vu de dos, au premier plan, se tient un enfant de chœur portant un cierge ; la semelle jaune de ses robustes souliers est garnie de clous aussi formidables que les dents des diables, et se présente devant vous avec une naïveté qui fait plaisir, d'autant qu'un raccourci de jambes bien entendu les lui fait remonter jusqu'au milieu des reins. Cependant l'enfer fait rage, l'haleine empestée du démon vert se répand en bouffées noires, des oiseaux sinistres voltigent, des serpents s'enroulent aux barreaux des chaises, il y a sous une table un affreux dragon se tordant, bavant, rugissant ; on a peur, on palpite, on tremble pour l'âme de l'évêque. Quel dommage si un homme pareil allait en enfer ! Ira-t-il ? n'ira-t-il pas ? Tout en conservant le calme de l'enfant de chœur, le spectateur ne peut s'empêcher de partager les transes du vicaire et la douleur de la servante. Heureusement que la sainte Trinité veille au salut de l'évêque. En haut est le Père Éternel habillé en pape ; un peu plus bas, à distance respectueuse, le Christ avec sa croix, et plus bas encore, sur un troisième coussin, la Vierge Marie. Ils envoient vers l'évêque de jolis anges qui traversent l'air, ayant à la main des lis lumineux et qui, marchant dignement sur des nuages de mastic, arrondissent leurs mollets rebondis où se rattachent les cordons roses de leurs cothurnes indigo.

Ô sainte religion catholique, si tu as inspiré des chefs-d'œuvre, que de galettes, en revanche, n'as-tu pas causées !

En contemplant cette épouvantable toile, et en songeant que beaucoup l'ont pu regarder sans rire, qu'à d'autres sans doute elle a semblé belle, que d'autres enfin se sont agenouillés devant, y ont puisé peut-être des inspirations suprêmes, nous avons été pris malgré nous d'une mélan-colie chagrine. Mais qu'y a-t-il donc dans le cœur de l'homme pour que toujours et sans cesse il le jette sur toutes choses et se cramponne avec une ardeur pareille au laid comme au beau, au mesquin comme au sublime ? Hélas ! hélas ! rappelés-nous, pour excuser celui qui a fait cela et encore plus ceux qui l'admirent, nos prédilections malades et nos extases imbéciles ! Évoquons dans notre passé tout ce que nous avons eu jadis d'amour naïf pour quelque femme laide, de candide enthousiasme pour un niais ou d'amitié dévouée pour un lâche...

Sortis de l'église enfin, nous retrouvâmes le soleil, le ciel, l'air, l'espace, et comme un oiseau joyeux qui s'échappe, quelque chose s'envolant de notre âme disait : « C'est cela ! qu'il me faut, car Dieu est là et pas ailleurs. »

Le soir venait, on sonnait la prière dans les clochers. Nous descendîmes vers la ville par une ruelle à gradins de bois, longue, étroite, remplie d'herbes et qui coulait entre deux grands murs. Leur chaperon disparaissait sous le feuillage, partout les lierres s'y accrochaient, les orties blanches en cachaient le pied et ils n'avaient l'air bâtis que pour porter cette végétation charmante. C'était un torrent de verdure ruisselant à travers les maisons du haut de la côte en bas de la ville.

Nous nous en allions lentement, marche à marche, quand nous nous sommes retournés pour laisser passer un jeune garçon qui descendait en sautant. Il était robuste et beau, ses cheveux bruns, que coiffait son chapeau rond de feutre noir, couvraient à demi sa veste bleue et à chacun de ses bonds s'envolaient et retombaient sur ses épaules ; sa taille courte, mais pleine de souplesse, se cambrait d'une façon hardie au mouvement de ses cuisses jouant à l'aise dans son bragow-brass de toile écrue ; son mollet dur, serré dans des grèves blanches, saillissait nerveusement, et son pied chaussé de gros sabots était léger comme celui d'un chamois. Il s'arrêta à quelques pas de nous pour renouer la boucle de sa jarrettière, nous vîmes de profil sa figure pâle sur laquelle, dans cette pose, sa grande chevelure s'avancait comme une draperie et pendait jusqu'au coude. Lorsqu'il eut fini, il se redressa vite et nous le vîmes d'échelon en échelon qui continuait à sauter et de bonds en bonds s'éloignait.

Nous le retrouvâmes dans l'église Sainte-Croix chantant les litanies de la Vierge, à genoux, le front levé sur le ciel ; il nous reconnut, tourna vers nous le regard sérieux de ses yeux noirs, l'y arrêta un instant avec une curiosité méfiante, puis il reprit son maintien et continua sa prière. Cette église Sainte-Croix est une belle église romane du xi<sup>e</sup> siècle, à qui son plan circulaire, sa voûte divisée par arcades, ses colonnes engagées à leur base dans des piliers carrés, ses pleins cintres surhaussés et son chœur placé au milieu auquel on monte par des escaliers de plusieurs marches donnent je ne sais quel air bas-empire et gallo-romain. La lumière arrivant d'en haut par de longues fenêtres étroites descend presque perpendiculaire, comme le jour des ateliers, et déverse sur vous une sérénité blanche et pacifique. Ce

Il n'est pas le christianisme rêveur de l'ogive, avec le souffle mystique des cathédrales gothiques, c'est plus reculé, plus latin, d'une théologie plus primitive, d'une poésie plus chaude, on se rappelle le cloître d'Arles et les grands conciles carlovingiens.

Elle était pleine. Tout le monde priait, nous seuls regardions. La foule chantait avec une joie grave, et des bas côtés, de dessous le porche, de partout, des voix puissantes reprenaient en chœur, après chaque point d'orgue de la voix grêle du prêtre officiant à l'autel. Cela sortait comme d'une seule poitrine un immense cri d'amour. Les femmes agenouillées à une même place inclinaient la tête sous leur bonnet blanc, on n'en pouvait voir le visage, mais on voyait leurs dos courbés en- semble et la file de leurs mains jointes.

Les hommes étaient debout, assis, à genoux, à toutes les places, dans tous les sens, comme ils avaient pu se mettre ou comme la fantaisie les en avait pris ; ils ne semblaient cependant ni con- traints ni distraits, on sentait au contraire qu'ils existaient là comme chez eux, chacun s'isolant dans la solitude de son recueillement ou se ré- chauffant à l'âme de ses frères, et les attitudes de leurs corps étaient nonchalantes ou majestueuses, selon sans doute leurs lassitudes ou leurs redres- sements intérieurs.

C'étaient des figures graves sous de longs che- veux bruns, de rudes regards plus fauves que la lande, de larges poitrines qui respiraient d'une façon puissante, des têtes songeuses, des airs rus- tiques et solennels ; mais ces fronts hâlés, dé- couverts, ces solides épaules qui s'inclinaient, ces mains grises comme le manche des charrues et qui restaient oisives, et même les lourdes chaus- sures que le respect rendait légères, toute cette rudesse tournée en grâce, cette force devenant douceur à son insu avait un grandiose singulière- ment doux, presque attendrissant à force d'être naïf. Ils étaient beaux ces hommes, beaux parce qu'ils étaient vrais et dans la simplicité de leurs costumes faits à leur taille, aptes à leurs corps, plies selon le travail de leur vie, et dans la bonne foi de leur croyance qui s'exhalait à l'aise dans cette église faite pour elle, restes derniers d'une nationalité complète qui s'efface sans métamor- phoses et disparaît sans transition, ainsi que les feuilles de l'if qui tombent sans jaunir. Avec leur costume d'autrefois, leur antique visage et cette religion de leurs ancêtres ils exhibaient ainsi les générations antérieures et semblaient à eux seuls représenter toute leur race. C'est pour cela peut- être qu'ils avaient l'air si pleins, et que chacun d'eux paraissait porter en lui plus de choses qu'il n'y en a ordinairement dans un homme.,

Sous l'église romane se trouve la crypte ro- mane.

Ce souterrain quadrilatéral au lieu de voûte est couvert d'un plafond plat, dallé comme le sol et supporté par quatre rangs de colonnettes soudées ensemble qui se séparent aux deux tiers de leur hauteur ; elles ont toutes de lourds chapiteaux au feuillage allongé, et se relient entre elles par des arcatures surhaussées se succédant sans intervalle.

On tâtonne dans l'ombre, et à la lueur de l'unique fenêtre du fond on aperçoit deux tombeaux noirs, humides, verts, deux vénérables tombeaux. Le premier porte la statue couchée d'un moine. On le reconnaît à la large tonsure qui montre à nu son vieux crâne de pierre ; il tient un livre à la main ; sa figure est rongée, comme à celle des morts le nez disparaît, et son corps maigre est enveloppé de longues draperies qui coulent vers ses pieds à grands plis droits.

Près de lui, sur une lame de pierre, est un abbé avec sa crosse et croisant les bras ; deux chiens soutiennent son écusson burelé sans couleur ; ses pieds, chaussés de chaussures pointues, ne s'appuient sur rien ; un petit dais carré abrite sa tête. On regarde le premier comme étant saint Gurlot, martyrisé à cette place même, aussi son sarcophage est-il percé d'un trou où à certains jours de fête les malades viennent se plonger le bras pour se guérir. Mais le second mort n'a pas laissé son nom. Promenant sur lui notre chandelle nous avons cherché à reconnaître son visage, comme si nous l'eussions connu jadis ! N'est-on pas toujours attiré vers ces choses par un sentiment d'inquiétude curieuse ainsi que vis-à-vis d'un voyageur qui vient de loin ou d'une lettre cachetée. Ainsi se passe une journée en voyage, il n'en faut pas plus pour la remplir : une rivière, des buissons, une belle tête d'enfant, des tombeaux ; on savoure la couleur des herbes, on écoute le bruit des eaux, on contemple les visages, on se promène parmi les pierres, on s'accoude sur les tombes, et le lendemain on rencontre d'autres hommes, d'autres pays, d'autres débris ; on établit des antithèses, on fait des rapprochements. C'est là le plaisir, il en vaut bien un autre.

A Rosporden, par exemple, nous vîmes dans le cimetière une femme en prières qui nous en rappela une autre que nous avions vue dans la cathédrale de Nantes. Elle était à genoux, raidie, immobile, le corps droit, la tête baissée et regardant la terre avec un œil fouilleur plein de rage et de tristesse. Ce regard perçait la dalle blanche, entrait, descendait, pompait à lui ce qu'il y avait dessous ; celle de Nantes, au contraire, dont le teint était blanc comme la cire des cierges, couchée de côté sur un prie-Dieu, la bouche ouverte dans l'extase, les yeux portés au ciel, au delà du ciel, plus haut encore, avait l'âme partie au dehors. Toutes deux priaient avec une aspiration démesurée, et certes qu'il n'y avait plus pour elles rien dans la création que l'objet de ce désespoir et de cette espérance. La première s'acharnait au néant, la seconde montait à Dieu ; ce qui était regret dans l'une était désir dans l'autre ; et le désespoir de celle-ci si acre qu'elle s'y complaisait comme à une volupté dépravée, et le désir de celle-là si fort qu'elle en souffrait comme d'un supplice. Ainsi toutes deux tourmentées par la vie souhaitaient d'en sortir : celle qui priait sur le tombeau, pour rejoindre ce qu'elle avait perdu ; celle qui priait devant la Vierge, pour s'unir à ce qu'elle adorait. Douleur, aspiration, prière, mêmes rêves et quel abîme ! L'un pivotait sur un souvenir, l'autre gravitait vers l'éternité !

Au village de Rosporden nous avons revu les hommes que nous venions de quitter à Quimperlé : mêmes allures, mêmes habits, grand cha-peau, grand gilet, veste bleue ou blanche, large ceinture de cuir, bragow-brass, galoches, mêmes aspects dévisage, mêmes tournures de corps.

C'était jour de marché, la place était pleine de paysans, de charrettes et de bœufs ; on entendait sonner les rauques syllabes celtiques mêlées au grognement des animaux et au claquement des charrettes, mais pas de confusion, d'éclats, ni rires dans les groupes ni bavardages sur le seuil des cabarets, pas un homme ivre, pas de marchand ambulant, point de boutique de toile peinte pour les femmes, ou de verroterie pour les enfants, rien de joyeux, de heurté, d'animé. Ceux qui veulent vendre attendent résignés et sans bouger le chaland qui vient à eux. Dans la place se promènent des couples de bœufs avec quelque enfant qui les retient par les cornes, ou bien trotte une maigre rosse au milieu de la foule qui s'écarte, sans jurer ni se plaindre. Puis on se regarde un instant, la convention se conclut et l'on s'en retourne chez soi sans s'attarder davantage. En effet le village est éloigné, la lande est grande, le soir arrive, il n'y a personne au logis, la mère est partie dans les tamarins couper des bourrées pour l'hiver, l'enfant est sur la côte à ramasser le varech ou à garder les moutons. Quant au valet de ferme, le plus souvent il n'y en a pas, chaque cultivateur ayant d'ordinaire un petit coin de terrain qu'il égratigne tout seul tant bien que mal et dont il est le maître, l'esclave plutôt ! puisqu'il s'en use vainement dessus. L'homme ne pouvant engraisser la terre, la terre ne pouvant nourrir l'homme, pour- quoi donc ne la quitte-t-il pas ? pourquoi ne se vend-il pas comme le Suisse ? ne s'exile-t-il point comme l'Alsacien ? pourquoi y demeure-t-il avec un amour si opiniâtre ! qui le sait ? le sait-il lui- même ?

Nulle part donc vous ne rencontrez comme chez nous de ces gros fermiers cossus, ventrus, à la face avinée, à la sacoche bourrée d'argent, qui s'en viennent aux foires de campagne, y font grand bruit, y marchandent longuement, se disputent en criant, se tapent dans la main, braillent dans les cafés en jouant aux dominos, s'emplissent de viandes et d'eau-de-vie, boivent jusqu'à trente demi-tasses en un jour, et ne s'en retournent que bien tard dans la nuit, tout en s'endormant sur leur bidette qui trotte lentement le long du chemin jusqu'à ce qu'elle s'arrête d'elle-même à la barrière de la cour, en reconnaissant la bonne écurie où elle a de la litière jusqu'au ventre. Mais le paysan breton repart à jeun, il eût été trop cher de manger dehors ; il va retrouver sa galette de sarrasin et sa jatte de bouillie de maïs cuite depuis huit jours dont il se nourrit toute l'année, à côté des porcs qui rôdent sous la table et de la vache qui rumine là sur son fumier, dans un coin de la même pièce.

D'ailleurs pourquoi serait-il gai ? Qu'a-t-il rapporté du bourg ? S'il a vendu son cheval, il lui faudra maintenant porter les fardeaux et traîner lui-même la charrue, belle avance ! A quoi lui sert le peu d'argent qu'il en a retiré ? est-ce que tout à l'heure ou demain ou la semaine qui s'approche on ne va pas venir le lui demander dans une langue qu'il n'entend pas, au nom de la loi qu'il ignore ? Est-ce la peine d'en gagner ? aussi travaille-t-il peu, mal, d'une façon ennuyée et sans s'inquiéter s'il pourrait mieux faire.

Méfiant, jaloux, ahuri par tout ce qu'il voit sans comprendre, il s'empresse donc bien vite de quitter la ville, le bourg, et de regagner sa chaumière cachée sous des arbres touffus, derrière la haie compacte, et là il se resserre étroitement dans la famille, à son foyer, auprès de son recteur, aux pieds du saint de l'église, et il y concentre son cœur qui, condensé sur lui-même, se double d'énergie. De tout ce qui se passe il ne sait rien, si ce n'est qu'à vingt ans son fils s'en ira se battre, puis qu'il y a une ville qui s'appelle Paris et que le roi de France est Louis-Philippe dont il vous demandera des nouvelles, par inter- prête, en s'informant s'il vit encore, si vous le voyez souvent, et si vous dînez chez lui. Quoi qu'il soit, l'étranger pour eux est toujours quelque chose d'extraordinaire, de vague et de mi-roitant dont ils voudraient bien se rendre compte ; on l'admire, on le contemple, on lui demande l'heure pour voir sa belle montre, on le dévore du regard, d'un regard curieux, envieux, haineux peut-être, car il est riche, lui, bien riche, il habite Paris, la ville lointaine, la ville énorme et retentissante.

Dès que vous arrivez quelque part, les mendiants se ruent sur vous et s'y cramponnent avec l'obstination de la faim. Vous leur donnez, ils restent ; vous leur donnez encore, leur nombre s'accroît, bientôt c'est une foule qui vous assiège. Vous aurez beau vider votre poche jusqu'au dernier liard, ils n'en demeurent pas moins acharnés à vos flancs, occupés à réciter leurs prières, lesquelles sont malheureusement fort longues et heureusement inintelligibles. Si vous stationnez, ils ne bougent ; si vous vous en allez, ils vous suivent ; rien n'y remédie, ni discours, ni pantomime. On dirait un parti pris pour vous mettre en rage, leur ténacité est irritante, implacable. Comme on se prend à regretter alors les bonnes bassesses facétieuses du mendiant italien, faisant la roue devant votre carriole en vous traitant d'excellence, et l'aimable gueuserie insolente du gamin de Paris qui vous demande votre bout de cigare en vous appelant général et qui le ramasse dans la boue en vous riant au nez !

La pauvreté du Midi n'a rien qui attriste, elle se présente à vous pittoresque, colorée, riieuse, insouciant, chauffant ses poux à l'air chaud et dormant sous la treille ; mais celle du Nord, celle qui a froid, celle qui grelotte dans le brouillard et patauge nu-pieds dans la terre grasse, semble toujours humide de pleurs, engourdie, dolente, et méchante comme une bête malade. Ils sont si pauvres ! la viande pour eux est un luxe rare. Un de nos guides nous disait : "C'est mon plus grand bonheur, comme je tape dessus quand j'en attrape !" Pour le pain, on n'en mange pas non plus tous les jours. Notre postillon de Locminé n'en avait point goûté depuis huit mois. Une telle existence n'embellit pas les races ; aussi rencontre-t-on quantité d'estropiés, de manchots, d'aveugles-nés, de bossus, de dartreux, de rachitiques ; ainsi que les chênes dont les chétifs s'étioilent au vent de la mer et dont les robustes n'en poussent que mieux, se durcissent aux gelées, ceux qui ont traversé toute cette misère sans y rien laisser n'en paraissent que plus sains, plus droits et plus solides. Ce sont ceux-là que vous voyez passer devant vous, si austères et si forts, taciturnes sous leurs longs cheveux comme leur pays sous sa sombre verdure.

Dans les villes, quoique la langue persiste, le caractère s'efface, le costume national devient plus rare, refoulé qu'il est dans la campagne par l'envahissement progressif du tailleur et de la couturière, dont la petite boutique du rez-de-chaussée étale à son vitrail quelque belle gravure de mode qui fait envie. L'habitant de la ville voit s'arrêter tous les soirs la diligence au bureau des messageries, il en retire bien quelque nouvelle, soit du postillon qui a causé avec le conducteur, ou du commissionnaire qui porte les paquets ; à la tombée du jour, il converse sur sa porte avec l'huissier, le commis de la mairie ou l'employé de la sous-préfecture, lesquels lisent les journaux et savent ce qui se passe dans le monde. Petit à petit ainsi, il se désenbretonne et arrive à s'écarter du paysan qu'il méprise de plus en plus et qui s'éloigne de lui davantage, à mesure qu'ils se comprennent moins.

Ce qu'il y a encore de plus breton dans les villes, ce sont les pauvres filles qu'on fait venir pour servir comme domestiques. Confinées dans leur service, avec qui communiqueraient-elles pour perdre le caractère natal ? Voyez-les s'arrêter dans la rue avec l'homme qui apporte chaque semaine de la campagne les œufs et le beurre. Que leur dit-il ? Il leur parle de leur village, de leurs parents ; leur frère leur envoie pour cadeau de noces une belle paire de boucles d'argent, il faudra bien les porter ; il y aura bientôt un pardon, il faudra y venir. Elles iront donc et s'y retremperont à tout ce que la patrie a de plus distinctif, le langage et le costume ; aussi quand elles seront de retour chez leurs maîtres, leur cœur restera là-bas, et elles en causeront ensemble en se promenant comme elles font, par bandes de dix ou vingt, sur les places et à l'entrée de la grande route, le dimanche après les vêpres.

Ainsi se conserve au milieu d'une population déjà bâtarde ce petit peuple entêté, qui tournoie dans l'autre sans y perdre ses angles. A Quimper, à table d'hôte, en regardant la servante, fille large d'épaules, de visage âpre et d'une tenue rigide, avec son bonnet blanc, ses bouts de manche et son bavolet carré, qui servait des œufs à la neige à un gros monsieur à lunettes d'or, inspecteur des contributions indirectes, je me disais : « Voilà donc les deux sociétés face à face et le rapport final d'un siècle à l'autre ! Le vieux portrait s'humilie devant la caricature moderne. D'où j'ai tiré cet axiome : le Présent fait cirer ses bottes par le Passé et ne l'en remercie même pas."

Quimper, quoique le centre de la vraie Bretagne, est distinct d'elle. Sa belle promenade d'ormeaux, le long de la rivière qui coule entre les quais et porte navires, la rend fort coquette, et le grand hôtel de la préfecture, recouvrant à lui seul le petit delta de l'ouest, lui donne une tournure toute française et administrative. Vous vous apercevez que vous êtes dans un chef-lieu de département, ce qui vous rappelle aussitôt les divisions par arrondissements, avec les grandes, moyennes et petites vicinalités, les comités d'instruction primaire, les caisses d'épargne, les conseils généraux et autres inventions modernes qui enlèvent toujours aux lieux qui en sont doués quelque peu de couleur locale pour le voyageur naïf qui la rêve. N'en déplaise aux gens qui prononcent ce nom de Quimper-Corentin, comme le nom même du ridicule et de l'encroûtement provincial, c'est un charmant petit endroit et qui en vaut beaucoup d'autres plus respectés. Vous n'y retrouvez pas, il est vrai, les fantaisies de Quimperlé, le luxe de ses herbes, le tapage de ses couleurs, mais je sais peu de choses d'un aspect aussi agréable que cette belle allée qui s'en va indéfiniment au bord de l'eau et sur laquelle l'escarpement presque à pic d'une montagne toute proche déverse l'ombre foncée de sa verdure plantureuse.

On n'est pas longtemps à faire le tour de sem- blables cités ni à les connaître jusque dans leurs replis les plus intimes et on y découvre quelque- fois des coins qui arrêtent et vous mettent le cœur en joie. Les petites villes, en effet, sont comme les petits appartements ; elles paraissent d'abord plus chaudes et plus commodes à vivre. Mais restez sur votre illusion. Les premières ont plus de vents coulis qu'un palais, et dans les secondes il y a plus d'ennui qu'au désert.

En revenant vers l'hôtel par un de ces bons sentiers comme nous les aimons, un de ces sen- tiers qui montent, descendent, tournent et re- viennent, tantôt le long d'un mur, tantôt dans un champ, puis entre des broussailles ou dans le gazon, ayant tour à tour des cailloux, des mar- guerites, des orties, sentiers vagabonds faits pour les pensées flâneuses et les causeries à arabesques ; en revenant donc vers la ville, nous avons entendu sortir de dessous le toit d'ardoises d'un bâtiment carré des gémissements et des bêlements plaintifs. C'était l'abattoir.

Sur le seuil, un grand chien lapait dans une mare de sang et tirait lentement du bout des dents le cordon bleu des intestins d'un bœuf qu'on venait de lui jeter. La porte des cabines était ouverte. Les bouchers besognaient dedans, les bras retroussés. Suspendu, la tête en bas et les pieds passés par les tendons dans un bâton tombant du plafond, un bœuf, soufflé et gonflé comme une outre, avait la peau du ventre fendue en deux lambeaux. On voyait s'écarter doucement avec elle la couche de graisse qui la doublait et successivement apparaître dans l'intérieur, au tranchant du couteau, un tas de choses vertes, rouges et noires, qui avaient des couleurs superbes. Les entrailles fumaient ; la vie s'en échappait dans une bouffée tiède et nauséabonde. Près de là, un veau couché par terre fixait sur la rigole de sang ses gros yeux ronds épouvantés, et tremblait convulsivement malgré les liens qui lui serraient les pattes. Ses flancs battaient, ses narines s'ouvraient. Les autres loges étaient remplies de râles prolongés, de bêlements chevrotants, de béglements rauques. On distinguait la voix de ceux qu'on tuait, celle de ceux qui se mouraient, celle de ceux qui allaient mourir. Il y avait des cris singuliers, des intonations d'une détresse profonde qui semblaient dire des mots qu'on aurait presque pu comprendre. En ce moment, j'ai eu l'idée d'une ville terrible, de quelque ville épouvantable et démesurée, comme serait une Baby-Ione ou une Babel de Cannibales où il y aurait des abattoirs d'hommes ; et j'ai cherché à retrouver quelque chose des agonies humaines, dans ces égorgements qui bramaient et sanglotaient. J'ai songé à des troupeaux d'esclaves amenés là, la corde au cou, et noués à des anneaux, pour nourrir des maîtres qui les mangeaient sur des tables d'ivoire, en s'essuyant les lèvres à des nappes de pourpre. Auraient-ils des poses plus abattues, des regards plus tristes, des prières plus déchirantes ?

Un garçon a pris un maillet de fer, on a poussé devant lui le pauvre veau qu'on venait de délier, il a levé son instrument dont il l'a frappé d'un coup sec sur le crâne entre les yeux. Ça a fait un bruit sourd, la bête est tombée raide morte avec de l'écume aux lèvres et la langue serrée dans les dents ; on l'a prise, on l'a remuée, elle ne bougeait pas ; on l'a hissée à la poulie pour la dépecer.

Au premier coup de couteau elle a frémi dans toute sa chair, puis est redevenue morte. L'était-elle ? Qui le sait ? Qu'en savez-vous, vous philo- sophes et physiologistes ? êtes-vous bien sûrs de ce que c'est que la mort ? Qui vous a dit que pour n'avoir pas de manifestations l'âme n'avait plus de conscience ? et qu'elle ne sentait pas goutte à goutte, atome à atome, la décomposition successive de ce corps qu'elle animait ? Qui vous “*> Inédit, pages 175 à 178. a dit que le cadavre ne souffre pas à chaque pi- qûre de tous les vers qui le rongent jusqu'à ce que ses parties intégrantes étant passées ailleurs y revivent une autre vie ou continuent la même, de sorte qu'il y aurait ainsi une moitié de l'être engagée dans une existence nouvelle, tandis que l'autre demeurerait retenue dans l'existence inté- rieuse, un peu comme le lapin que j'ai vu dévo- rer tout vivant par une chienne de Terre-Neuve et dont la tête était avalée quand les pattes de der- rière lui gigotaient encore ?

En sortant, nous avons revu le dogue qui con- tinuait son festin, il avait presque fini son plat de tripes crues, il se léchait les babines et on venait de lui servir pour dessert le péritoine d'un mou- ton ; il est très gras et a l'air farouche.

Nous avons vu aussi à Quimper la cathé- drale, grande église du xv<sup>e</sup> siècle qui ne nous a pas divertis quoique ses tours carrées aient deux immenses baies vraiment très bien construites, quoique son abside soit penchée à droite ainsi que sur son épaule fa tête du Christ mourant, et quoiqu'il y ait en outre une assez gentille Vierge de Ottin, d'une sculpture plus gracieuse qu'élé- gante et plus mollassse que tendre.

Nous aperçûmes ensuite, dans l'église Saint- Mathieu, des vitraux fort beaux, mais que nous n'eûmes pas le loisir d'examiner à notre aise, car nous fûmes expulsés du chœur par la frénésie du bedeau qui arriva sur nous en nous criant d'une voix exaspérée : “Sortez du sanctuaire ! Voulez- vous bien sortir du sanctuaire ! Mais sortez donc du sanctuaire !”. Pour y rester, il eût fallu se battre ou graisser la patte de cette bête féroce, moyens qui répugnaient également à notre caractère et à notre dignité.

Qu'exigez-vous de plus sur Quimper ? Que voulez-vous savoir encore ? Est-ce d'où lui vient son nom de Quimper ? Quimper veut dire con- fluent, à cause du confluent de l'Odet et de l'Eir (note : aussi Quimperlé, confluent de l'EHée). Pourquoi on y a ajouté Corentin ? C'est à cause de Corentin, son premier évêque “ayant esté homme de grande religion et intégrité de vie, vivant au temps de Gralon, roi de Bretagne ». Faut-il maintenant les dates ? Sachez donc que la première pierre de la cathédrale fut posée le 26 juillet 1424 par l'évêque Bertrand Rosmadec, et la dernière l'an 1501 (j'ignore le jour, quel dom- mage !). De plus, la ville fut prise en 1344 par Charles de Blois, puis assiégée une fois en 1345 par le comte de Montfort, puis deux fois en 1594 avant de se rendre au maréchal d'Aumont. Mais vous n'exigez pas, ô lecteurs, la description des sièges (j'oublie toujours que je n'ai pas de lec- teurs), donc je m'épargnerai également la relation des facétieuses entrées des évêques de Cor- nouailles, qui devaient laisser au prieuré de Loc- maria leurs gants et leur bonnet, et à la porte de la cathédrale leurs bottes et leurs éperonsII) ; ainsi 12 que celle de la vieille coutume du verre de vin que l'on présentait la veille de la Sainte-Cécile à la statue du roi Grallon et qui, bu d'un trait par un des sonneurs de l'église, était rejeté dans la foule où celui qui le rapportait sans fracture au chapitre était récompensé d'un louis d'or. Toutes ces choses en effet étant aussi ennuyeuses à redire qu'elles ont été amusantes à apprendre, les livres vous les donneront si vous en êtes curieux, et non pas nous qui ne prisons pas assez les livres pour les copier, quoiqu'il nous arrive d'en lire et que nous ayons même la prétention d'en faire.

Etant à Quimper, nous sortîmes un jour par un côté de la ville et rentrâmes par l'autre après avoir marché dans la campagne pendant huit heures environ.

Sous le porche de l'hôtel, notre guide nous at- tendait. Il se mit aussitôt à courir devant nous, et nous le suivîmes. C'était un petit bonhomme à cheveux blancs, coiffé d'une casquette de toile, chaussé de souliers percés et vêtu d'une vieille redingote brune trop large qui lui flottait autour de la taille. Il bredouillait en parlant, se cognait les genoux en marchant et roulait sur lui-même ; néanmoins il avançait vite avec une opiniâtreté toute nerveuse, presque fébrile. De temps à autre seulement il arrachait une feuille d'arbre et se la collait contre la bouche pour se rafraîchir. Son métier est de courir les environs, pour aller por- ter les lettres ou faire des commissions. Il va ainsi à Douarnenez, à Quimperlé, à Brest, jusqu'à Rennes qui est à quarante lieues de là (voyage qu'il a exécuté une fois en quatre journées, y compris l'aller et le retour). « Toute mon ambition, disait-il, est de retourner encore une fois dans ma vie à Rennes. » Et cela, sans autre but que d'y retourner, pour y retourner, afin de faire une longue course et pour pouvoir s'en vanter ensuite. Il sait toutes les routes, il connaît les communes avec leurs clochers ; il prend des chemins de traversé à travers champs, ouvre les barrières des cours et, en passant devant les maisons, souhaite le bonjour aux maîtres. A force d'entendre chanter les oiseaux, il s'est appris à imiter leurs cris, et, tout en marchant sous les arbres, il siffle comme eux pour charmer sa solitude.

Nous nous arrê tâmes d'abord à un quart de lieue de la ville, à Locmaria, ancien prieuré, jadis donné à l'abbaye de Fontevrault par Conan III. Le prieuré n'a pas, comme l'abbaye du pauvre Robert d'Arbrisselle, été utilisé d'une ignoble manière. Il est abandonné, mais sans souillures. Son portail gothique ne retentit pas de la voix des gardes-chiourme, et s'il en reste peu de chose, l'esprit, du moins, n'éprouve ni révolte ni dégoût. Il n'y a de curieux comme détail, dans cette petite chapelle d'un vieux roman sévère, qu'un grand bénitier sans pilier, posé sur le sol et dont le granit taillé à pans est devenu presque noir. Large, profond, il représente bien le vrai bénitier catholique, fait pour y plonger tout entier le corps d'un enfant, et non pas ces cuvettes étroites de nos églises dans lesquelles on trempe le bout du doigt. Avec son eau claire rendue plus limpide encore par la couche verdâtre du fond, cette végétation qui a sourdi dans le calme religieux des siècles, ses angles usés, sa lourde masse à couleur de bronze, il ressemble à un de ces rochers creusés d'eux-mêmes dans lesquels on trouve de l'eau de mer.

Quand nous eûmes bien tourné autour, nous redescendîmes vers la rivière que nous traversâmes en bateau et nous nous enfonçâmes dans la campagne.

Elle est déserte et singulièrement vide. Des arbres, des genêts, des ajoncs, des tamarins au bord des fossés, des landes qui s'étendent, et d'hommes, nulle part. Le ciel était pâle ; une pluie fine, mouillant l'air, mettait sur le pays comme un voile uni qui l'enveloppait d'une teinte grise. Nous allions dans des chemins creux qui s'en-gouffraient sous des berceaux de verdure, dont les branches réunies, s'abaissant sur nos têtes, nous permettaient à peine d'y passer debout. La lumière, arrêtée par le feuillage, était verdâtre et faible comme celle d'un soir d'hiver.

Tout au fond, cependant, on voyait jaillir un jour vif qui jouait sur le bord des feuilles et en éclairait les dé- coupures. Puis on se trouvait au haut de quelque pente aride descendant toute plate et unie, sans un brin d'herbe qui tranchât sur l'uniformité de sa couleur jaune. Quelquefois, au contraire, s'éle- vait une longue avenue de hêtres dont les gros troncs luisants avaient de la mousse à leurs pieds. Des traces d'ornières passaient là, comme pour mener à quelque château qu'on s'attendait avoir ; mais l'avenue s'arrêtait tout à coup et la rase cam- pagne s'étalait au bout. Dans l'écartement de deux valions, elle développait sa verte étendue sillon- née en balafres noires par les lignes capricieuses des haies, tachée çà et là par la masse d'un bois, enluminée par des bouquets d'ajoncs, ou blan- chie par quelque champ cultivé au bord des prai- ries qui remontaient lentement vers les collines et se perdaient dans l'horizon. Au-dessus d'elles, bien loin à travers la brume, dans un trou du ciel, apparaissait un méandre bleu, c'était la mer.

Les oiseaux se taisent ou sont absents ; les feuilles sont épaisses, l'herbe étouffe le bruit des pas, et la contrée muette vous regarde comme un triste visage. Elle semble faite exprès pour rece- voir les existences en ruines, les douleurs rési- gnées ; elles pourront, solitairement, y nourrir leurs amertumes à ce lent murmure des arbres et des genêts et sous ce ciel qui pleure. Dans les nuits d'hiver, quand le renard se glisse sur les feuilles sèches, quand les tuiles tombent du toit des co- lombiers, que la lande fouette ses joncs, que les hêtres se courbent et qu'au clair de lune le loup galope sur la neige, assis tout seul près du foyer qui s'éteint, en écoutant le vent hurler dans les longs corridors sonores, c'est là qu'il doit être doux de tirer du fond de son cœur ses désespoirs les plus chéris avec ses amours les plus oubliées. Nous avons vu une mesure en ruines où l'on entrait par un portail gothique ; plus loin se dres- sait un vieux pan de mur troué d'une porte en ogive ; une ronce dépouillée s'y balançait à la brise. Dans la cour, le terrain inégal est couvert de bruyères, de violettes et de cailloux. On distingue vaguement des anciens restes de douves ; on entre quelques pas dans un souterrain comblé ; on se pro- mène là dedans, on regarde et on s'en va. Ce lieu s'appelle le temple des faux Dieux, et était, à ce que l'on suppose, une commanderie de Templiers.

Notre guide est reparti devant nous, nous avons continué à le suivre.

Un clocher est sorti d'entre les arbres ; nous avons traversé un champ en friche, escaladé le haut bord d'un fossé ; deux ou trois maisons ont paru : c'était le village de Plomelin. Un sentier fait la rue ; quelques maisons, séparées entre elles par des cours plantées, composent tout le village. Quel calme ! quel abandon plutôt ! les seuils sont vides, les cours sont désertes.

Où sont les maîtres ? On les dirait tous partis à l'affût, se tapir derrière les genêts pour y guetter le Bleu qui doit passer dans la ravine.

L'église est pauvre et d'une nudité sans pareille. Pas de beaux saints peinturlurés, pas de toiles aux murs, ni, au plafond, de lampe suspendue oscillant au bout de sa longue corde droite. Dans un coin du chœur, par terre, brûle une mèche dans un verre rempli d'huile. Des piliers ronds supportent la voûte de bois dont la couleur bleue est déteinte. Par les fenêtres à vitrail blanc arrive le grand jour des champs verdi par le feuillage des arbres d'alentour qui recouvrent le toit de l'église. La porte ( une petite porte en bois que l'on ferme avec un loquet) était ouverte ; une volée d'oiseaux est entrée, voletant, caquetant, criant, se cognant aux murs ; ils ont tourbillonné sous la voûte, sont allés se jouer autour de l'autel. Deux ou trois se sont abattus sur le bord du bénitier, y ont trempé leur bec, et puis, tous, comme ils étaient venus, sont repartis ensemble. Il n'est pas rare en Bretagne de les voir ainsi dans les églises ; plusieurs y habitent et accrochent leur nid aux pierres de la nef ; on les laisse en paix. Lorsqu'il pleut, ils accourent, mais dès que le soleil reparaît dans les vitraux et que les gouttières s'égouttent, ils regagnent les champs. De sorte que pendant l'orage deux créatures frêles entrent souvent à la fois dans la demeure bénie : l'homme pour y faire sa prière et y abriter ses terreurs, l'oiseau pour y attendre que la pluie soit passée et réchauffer les plumes naissantes de ses petits engourdis.

Un charme singulier transpire de ces pauvres églises. Ce n'est pas leur misère qui émeut, puisqu'alors même qu'il n'y a personne, on dirait qu'elles sont habitées. N'est-ce pas plutôt leur pudeur qui ravit ? Car avec leur clocher bas, leur toit qui se cache sous les arbres, elles semblent se faire petites et s'humilier sous le grand ciel de Dieu. Ce n'est point, en effet, une pensée d'orgueil qui les a bâties, ni la fantaisie pieuse de quelque grand de la terre en agonie. On sent, au contraire, que c'est l'impression simple d'un besoin, le cri naïf d'un appétit, et comme le lit de feuilles sèches du pâtre, la hutte que l'âme s'est faite pour s'y étendre à l'aise à ses heures de fatigue. Plus que celles des villes, ces églises de village ont l'air de tenir au caractère du pays qui les porte et de participer davantage à la vie des familles qui, de père en fils, viennent à la même place y poser les genoux sur la même dalle. Chaque dimanche, chaque jour, en entrant et en sortant, ne revoient-ils pas en outre les tombes de leurs parents, qu'ils ont ainsi près d'eux dans la prière, comme à un foyer plus élargi d'où ils ne sont pas absents tout à fait ? Ces églises ont donc un sens harmonique où, comprise entre le baptistère et le cimetière, s'accomplit la vie de ces hommes. Il n'en est pas ainsi chez nous qui, reléguant l'éternité hors barrière, exilons nos morts dans les faubourgs, pour les loger dans le quartier des équarrisseurs et des fabriques de soude, à côté des magasins de poudrette.

Vers trois heures de l'après-midi, nous arrivâmes près les portes de Quimper, à la chapelle de Kerfeunteun. Il y a, au fond, une belle verrière du xvi<sup>e</sup> siècle, représentant l'arbre généalogique de la Trinité. Jacob en forme la souche et la croix du Christ le sommet, qui est surmonté lui-même du Père éternel qui a la tiare au front. Le clocher carré figure sur chaque face un quadrilatère percé à jour, comme une lanterne, par une longue baie droite. Il ne pose pas immédiatement sur la toiture, mais, à l'aide d'une base amincie dont les quatre côtés se rétrécissent et se touchent presque, formant un angle obtus vers la crête du toit. En Bretagne, presque toutes les églises de village ont de ces clochers-là.

Avant de rentrer dans la ville, nous fîmes un détour pour aller visiter la chapelle de la Mère-Dieu. Comme d'ordinaire on la ferme, notre guide prit en route le gardien qui en a la clef ; il vint avec nous, emmenant par la main sa petite nièce qui tout le long du chemin s'arrêtait pour ramasser des bouquets. Il marchait devant nous dans le sentier. Sa mince taille d'adolescent à cambrure flexible, un peu molle, était serrée dans une veste de drap bleu ciel, et sur son dos s'agitaient les trois rubans de velours de son petit cha-peau noir qui, posé soigneusement sur le derrière de la tête, retenait ses cheveux tordus en chignon.

Au fond d'un vallon, d'un ravin plutôt, l'église de la Mère-Dieu se voile sous le feuillage des hêtres. A cette place, dans le silence de cette grande verdure, à cause sans doute de son petit portail gothique que l'on croirait du xii<sup>e</sup> siècle et qui est du xvi<sup>e</sup> elle a je ne sais quel air qui rappelle ces chapelles discrètes des vieux romans et des vieilles romances, où l'on armait chevalier le page qui partait pour la Terre-Sainte, un matin, au chant de l'alouette, quand les étoiles pâlissaient, et qu'à travers la grille passait la main blanche de la châ-telaine que le baiser de départ trempait aussitôt de mille pleurs d'amour.

Nous sommes entrés. Le jeune homme s'est agenouillé en ôtant son chapeau, et la grosse tor-sade de sa chevelure blonde s'est échappée et s'est dépliée dans une secousse en tombant le long de son dos. Un instant accrochée au drap rude de sa veste, elle a gardé la trace des plis qui la rou-laient tout à l'heure, peu à peu est descendue, s'est écartée, étalée, répandue comme une vraie chevelure de femme. Séparée sur le milieu par une raie, elle coulait à flots égaux sur ses deux épaules et couvrait son cou nu. Toute cette nappe d'un ton doré avait des ondoiements de lumière qui changeaient et fuyaient à chaque mouvement de tête qu'il faisait en priant. A ses côtés, la petite fille, à genoux comme lui, avait laissé tomber son bouquet par terre. Là seulement, et pour la pre-mière fois, j'ai compris la beauté de la chevelure de l'homme et le charme qu'elle peut avoir pour des bras nus qui s'y plongent. Etrange progrès que celui qui consiste à s'écourter partout les superfé-tations grandioses de la nature, si bien que lors-que nous la découvrons dans toute sa vierge plé-nitude, nous nous en étonnons comme d'une mer-veille révélée.

Le lendemain, à midi, les rues de Quimper se tendirent de draps de calicot, les cloches sonnèrent, on sema sur le pavé des roses et des juliennes, et dans les carrefours se dressèrent des espèces d'estrades décorées de colonnes de verdure où s'enroulaient des guirlandes de fleurs en papier peint. C'était le dimanche de je ne sais quelle fête, et la procession allait passer. Sur le devant des portes on voyait les servantes dans leur toilette de campagne, avec des broderies de couleur sur les manches de leur casaquin et la tête prise entre leurs grands bonnets à barbes relevées et leur col-lerette raide qui fait l'effet par derrière d'une fraise à gros tuyaux ; leur jupe brune est plissée à petits plis serrés, droits comme ceux des bragow-brass, et leurs souliers découverts portent sur le cou-de-pied de larges boucles d'argent. Aux fenêtres, la haute société, comme aux premières loges, attendait le spectacle du cortège. Les cloches ont redoublé leur volée, on a entendu des chants, on a battu du tambour, on a tiré des coups de fusil et deux files de gamins ont débouché des deux côtés de la rue. Au milieu circulait un prêtre en surplis qui commandait la manœuvre à l'aide d'un livre en bois qu'il fermait par un coup sec qui résonnait comme celui d'un battoir. Les enfants avaient des pantalons boutonnés par-dessus leur veste, un cierge éteint à la main droite et braillaient comme des ânes. Après eux venaient les petites filles toutes en robes blanches, avec des ceintures bleues, et au milieu d'elles un ecclésiastique quelconque pareillement occupé à aller de rang en rang pour les faire s'avancer, s'arrêter, repartir, chanter et se taire. Enfin venaient les chantes et les chanoines ouvrant tous la bouche, baissant les yeux et marchant au pas, en se prélassant dignement dans leurs belles chasubles d'église. Je me souviens d'une surtout qui était de velours violet brodé d'or ; elle brillait là, seule, unique, splendide, effaçant toutes les autres ; l'homme qu'elle recouvrait jouissait à la porter, il s'y délectait, il ne pouvait s'empêcher de sourire tout en chantant, et de se dandiner des épaules pour faire admirer le pan de derrière où était brodé un saint ciboire surmonté d'un soleil. Si le chapitre, en effet, n'en possède pas une seconde, s'il y a soixante gens en droit de la revêtir et qu'on ne fasse que sept ou huit processions par année, voilà peut-être dix ans qu'il l'attend, qu'il l'espère, qu'il languit, qu'il soupire après, car il faut compter les passe-droits, les bassesses triomphantes des rivaux, les préférences injustes. Il a donc vieilli, il a maigri dans l'anxiété de l'avoir. Aujourd'hui enfin il l'a ; il la porte sur son dos, dans la rue, on la voit, on le voit dessous, elle dessus. Comme elle lui va bien ! Il la flaire, il la hume, il se gonfle dans sa doublure pour l'emplir partout, il y promène ses yeux, il en contemple les broderies, il se repaît des galons ; elle est lourde, il sue, elle l'écrase, tant mieux ! il n'en éprouve que plus de joie, il ne la sent que davantage sur ses épaules ; et il les remue exprès pour se convaincre qu'elle est là, qu'elle tient d'aplomb, qu'il ne l'a pas perdue. Ah ! que ne peut-elle se coller sur lui pour qu'on ne puisse la lui reprendre, car tantôt il va falloir la rendre et quand la remettra-t-il ? jamais peut-être, mon Dieu ; deux jours pareils ne reviennent pas dans la vie. Comme il l'aime ! comme il l'adore, cette chasuble dont la beauté lui remplit l'âme, et avec elle aussi cette bonne religion catholique sans laquelle la chasuble n'existerait pas et en l'honneur de laquelle elle a été faite ! Aussi comme il chante ! avec quel cœur ! avec quelle foi ! avec quel orgueil ! Il convient qu'un homme ainsi revêtu ait une voix démesurée, or la sienne domine tout, elle tonnait avec une plénitude sacerdotale, c'était un beuglement continu couvrant les cris des enfants, le piétinement de la foule et le bourdonnement du serpent dont le souffleur hors d'haleine était pourtant bleu de fatigue. Sous un dais de velours cramoisi s'avança encore une autre chasuble. Dessous, un homme à front déprimé, blond comme un porte-cigares en cuir de Russie* ayant des cils blancs, des sourcils rouges et les cheveux roulés en champignons, un de ces êtres à profil encore plus bas que niais et qui semblent scrofuleux encore plus en dedans qu'en dessus, portait pieusement d'un air confit et boursoufflé le saint Sacrement en or qui tremblait dans ses mains contractées que revêtaient des gants de coton blanc. Autour de lui les enfants de chœur encensaient, les chantres vociféraient ; il marchait sur les fleurs que l'on jetait devant ses pas, et lorsqu'aux reposoirs il élevait sa chose reluisante, tout le monde se mettait à genoux, y compris les soldats, les gardes nationaux et les gendarmes qui escortaient la procession. Quatre rubans de satin tombant du dais étaient tenus par deux bambins habillés en nankin jaune, brodé sur toutes les coutures, et par deux toutes petites filles en robe bleue semée d'étoiles d'argent, les bras nus, garnis de bracelets, avec une couronne sur la tête et deux ailes roses dans le dos.

Suivaient ensuite des bourgeois de la ville qui jouaient du violon, du piston et du basson, puis une douzaine de gendarmes le sabre tiré, puis la garde nationale sur deux files, puis une compagnie de soldats précédée d'un tambour-major qui faisait tournoyer sa canne et remuer son panache.

N'ayant plus rien à voir à Quimper ni dans les environs, nous nous disposâmes pour notre expédition du Finistère dont nous devons parcourir la côte à pied jusqu'à Brest. C'était une course de quatre-vingts lieues. Nous fîmes remettre une pièce à nos souliers et nous partîmes.

Notre première étape fut Concarneau que nous vîmes assez mal, car la pluie tombait à torrents, des ruisseaux jaunes coulaient au pied des maisons et, s'engouffrant au trou des parapets du port, se versaient sur les bancs de vase où étaient couchées sur le flanc des barques vides. L'eau coulait dessus et pénétrait la toile de leurs voiles endormies dans la boue comme un voyageur fatigué. A la prochaine marée cependant elles se relèveront et s'en iront emmenant avec elles le fucus ou la petite coquille qu'on voit accrochée aux planches de la carène et qui la suit partout dans les flots.

La mer était loin, la vue s'étendait sur les sables et se perdait vite dans la morne teinte du ciel barbouillé par les mille rainures de la pluie.

La ville est ceinte de murailles dont à marée haute là vague vient battre la base, les mâchicoulis sont encore intacts comme au temps de la reine Anne, et la ligne des pierres dentelées s'allonge sur les remparts droite et basse, en se découpant dans la brume.

Dans l'intervalle de deux ondées nous passâmes les portes et le pont-Ievis pour aller à une lieue de là voir là pierre branlante de Trégunc. La route, verdoyante, avait des coudes successifs et des plans inégaux ; c'était large et vert. Comme un poulain en liberté le regard galopait dans la campagne et se roulait sur l'herbe fraîche. A mesure que nous avançons, des pierres disséminées sur le sol augmentaient de nombre et de grandeur, et détachaient leurs formes inégales parmi les bouquets d'ajoncs jaunes. Au milieu d'elles se dresse, sur une hauteur de onze pieds, un cône de granit renversé, posé sur une saillie de rocher presque à fleur de terre. Telle est la fameuse pierre branlante de Trégunc que les maris autrefois venaient ébranler pour savoir à quoi s'en tenir sur le compte de la chasteté de leurs épouses. Si la pierre remuait, cela voulait dire : vous l'êtes ! et si elle ne bougeait : revenez demain. Des auteurs assurent l'avoir mise en mouvement, mais pour nous, qui sommes célibataires, elle est restée aussi inébranlable à tous nos coups d'épaule que l'aurait été la grande pyramide d'Egypte.

Deux heures après nous étions de retour à Concarneau. La pluie avait repris de plus belle, notre hôtesse nous faisait pour rester les plus aimables instances. Il y avait certes de quoi retenir des chiens ou charmer des tigres, néanmoins nous nous informâmes de suite d'un véhicule quel- conque qui pût nous mener le soir même coucher à Fouesnant, la patrie des belles femmes. On trouva d'abord la voiture, puis un homme pour nous conduire, puis le cheval et enfin des harnais. Après que tout se fut ajusté l'un dans l'autre à grande peine, nous nous huchâmes dans le tape- cul qui, trop petit déjà pour nous deux, ne pouvait contenir notre conducteur. Il se mit donc à pied et prit par le licou la rosse engourdie qu'il traînait ainsi dans les montées et retenait dans les descentes. Quand il était fatigué, il s'asseyait derrière sur l'essieu et la machine sans s'arrêter continuait son train. Elle allait en zigzags, s'accrochant dans les haies, se cognant aux cailloux, retombant dans les ornières, s'arrêtant aux saignées, et toujours nous bocquesonnant devant les yeux sa capote recourbée qui nous dérobaient le paysage. De temps à autre, en nous penchant, nous saisissions quelque chose, un massif d'arbres, une clairière dans le bois, un bout de chemin qui tournait, une épine en fleurs dans les pommiers, un bout de mer qu'on voyait à travers les branches ; mais bientôt, à cause de la pente qui montait, les brancards se levaient en l'air et nous n'apercevions plus que le ciel sur nos têtes ; ou bien si elle descendait nous plongions en avant sur les jarrets du cheval et ne recevions plus de jour que par l'intervalle de la capote et du garde-crotte qui tendaient à se refermer sur nous et s'entrechoquaient dans les cahots.

A la Forêt nous passâmes sur une digue qui continuait la route dans l'eau et coupait par le milieu une des plus charmantes baies qu'il y ait. Elle s'avance dans les terres entre deux coteaux boisés dont les arbres descendant jusqu'en bas trempent dans les flots le bout de leur feuillage qui retombe en touffes diffuses, avec des courbes molles comme font les saules sur les bords des rivières.

Une église parut » Nous arrê tâmes la carriole et allâmes en faire le tour. Son clocher, découpé comme celui de Kerfunteun, est flanqué de deux clochetons, et sur son petit portail s'élève un pinnacle d'où ressortent des têtes de grenouille et de chien. En face se verdit à la pluie un de ces bons vieux calvaires bretons, ciselés, sculptés, portant fleurons et personnages ; une face représente la Vierge, l'autre Jésus et ses apôtres.

Quant à l'intérieur de l'église, je ne m'en souviens guère, car je crois ne l'avoir pas vu, de même que celle de Fouesnant. Je me rappelle seulement un grand bénitier taillé dans un pilier, et de larges dalles posées transversalement pour clore l'entrée du cimetière, en manière d'échalliers.

Fouesnant, du reste, ce lieu si vanté pour toutes les délices qu'il possède, ne nous offrit qu'une détestable omelette que nous mangeâmes tout de même, un épouvantable lit où nous dormîmes néanmoins, et une pluie incessante qui ne nous empêcha pas de repartir le lendemain, ayant rabattu le bord de nos chapeaux et endossé nos waterproff.

Cette journée-là fut la première de nos vailantes journées du Finistère. Nous fûmes rafraîchis par le vent, chauffés par le soleil, la pluie nous trempa jusqu'au dernier fil, la sueur jusqu'au dernier poil ; nous dînâmes d'artichauts crus et nous nous trompâmes de route. Longtemps, sans que cela nous parût long, nous cheminâmes par la rase campagne, sous les arbres dans des chemins creux, sur la lande à travers les sillons labourés, dans des sentiers, sur la grande route. Quand nous étions las, nous débouclions nos sacs et couchés au pied d'un chêne, sur le revers d'un fossé, tout en fumant et causant, nous regardions les nuages rouler, nous laissions les heures passer.

A Bénodet nous avons traversé la rivière dans un bac. A Combrit nous nous sommes perdus et nous retournions vers Quimper si un cantonnier ne nous en avait avertis.

A cinq heures du soir, nous arrivâmes à Pont-I'Abbé, enduits d'une respectable couche de poussière et de boue qui se répandit de nos vêtements sur le parquet de la chambre de notre auberge, avec une prodigalité si désastreuse, que nous étions presque humiliés du gâchis que nous faisions, rien qu'en nous posant quelque part.

Pont-I'Abbé est une petite ville fort paisible, coupée dans sa longueur par une large rue pavée. Les maigres rentiers qui l'habitent ne doivent pas avoir l'air plus nul, plus modeste et plus bête.

Il y a à voir pour ceux qui partout veulent voir quelque chose, les restes insignifiants du châteaueu et l'église ; une église qui serait passable, d'ailleurs, si elle n'était encroûtée par le plus épais des badigeons qu'aient jamais rêvés les conseils de fabrique. La chapelle de la Vierge était remplie

■ 3- ' de fleurs. Bouquets de jonquilles, juliennes, pen-sées, roses, chèvrefeuilles et jasmins mis dans des vases de porcelaine blanche ou dans des verres bleus, étalaient leurs couleurs sur l'autel et mon-taient entre les grands flambeaux vers le visage de la Vierge, jusque par-dessus sa couronne d'ar-gent, d'où retombait un voile de mousseline à longs plis qui s'accrochait à l'étoile d'or du bam-bino de plâtre suspendu dans ses bras. On sentait l'eau bénite et le parfum des fleurs. C'était un petit coin embaumé, mystérieux, doux, à l'écart dans l'église, retraite cachée, ornée avec amour, toute propice aux exhalaisons du désir mystique et aux longs épanchements des oraisons explorées. Comprimée par le climat, amortie par la mi-sère, l'homme reporte ici toute la sensualité de son cœur, il la dépose aux pieds de Marie, sous le regard de la femme céleste et il y satisfait, en l'excitant, cette inextinguible soif de jouir et d'aimer. Que la pluie tombe par le toit, qu'il n'y ait ni bancs ni chaises dans la nef, partout vous n'en découvrirez pas moins luisante, frottée et coquette, cette chapelle de la Vierge, avec des fleurs fraîches et des cierges allumés. Là, semble se concentrer toute la tendresse religieuse de la Bretagne ; voilà le repli le plus mol de son cœur, c'est là sa faiblesse, sa passion, son trésor. Il n'y a pas de fleurs dans la campagne, mais il y en a dans l'église ; on est pauvre, mais la Vierge est riche ; toujours belle, elle sourit pour tous et les âmes endolories vont se réchauffer sur ses genoux, comme à un foyer qui ne s'éteint pas. On s'étonne de l'acharnement de ce peuple à ses croyances, mais sait-on tout ce qu'elles lui donnent de délectation et de voluptés, tout ce qu'il en retire de plaisir ? L'ascétisme n'est-il pas un épicurisme supérieur, le jeûne une gourmandise raffinée ? La religion comporte en soi des sensations presque charnelles ; la prière a ses débauches, la mortification son délire, et les hommes qui le soir viennent s'agenouiller devant cette statue habillée y éprouvent aussi des battements de cœur et des enivresments vagues, pendant que, dans les rues, les enfants des villes revenant de la classe s'arrêtent rêveurs et troublés à contempler sur sa fenêtre la femme ardente qui leur fait les doux yeux.

Il faut assister à ce qu'on appelle ses fêtes, pour se convaincre du caractère sombre de ce peuple. Il ne danse pas, il tourne ; il ne chante pas,,il siffle. Ce soir même, nous allâmes, dans un village des environs, voir l'inauguration d'une aire à battre. Deux joueurs de biniou, montés sur le mur de la cour, poussaient sans discontinuer le souffle criard de leur instrument, au son du- quel couraient au petit trot, en se suivant à la queue du loup, deux longues files qui revenaient sur elles-mêmes, tournaient, se coupaient et se re- nouaient à des intervalles inégaux. Les pas lourds battaient le sol, sans souci de là mesure, tandis que les notes aiguës de la musique se précipi- taient l'une sur l'autre dans une monotonie gla- pissante. Ceux qui ne voulaient plus danser s'en allaient, sans que la danse en fût troublée, et ils rentraient de suite quand ils avaient repris haleine. Pendant près d'une heure que nous considérâmes cet étrange exercice, la foule ne s'arrêta qu'une fois, les musiciens s'étant interrompus pour boire un verre de cidre ; puis, les longues lignes s'ébran- lèrent de nouveau et se mirent à tourner. A l'en- trée de la cour, sur une table, on vendait des noix ; à côté était un broc d'eau-de-vie, par terre une barrique de cidre ; non loin, se tenait un parti- culier en casquette de cuir et en redingote verte ; près de lui, un homme en veste avec un sabre suspendu par un baudrier blanc : c'était le com- missaire de police de Pont-l'Abbé avec son garde champêtre.

Bientôt, M. le commissaire tira sa montre de sa poche, fit un signe au garde qui alla parler à quel- ques paysans et l'assemblée se dispersa.

Nous nous en revînmes tous quatre de com- pagnie à la ville et nous eûmes dans ce trajet le loisir d'admirer encore ici une de ces combinaisons harmoniques de la Providence qui avait fait ce commissaire de police pour ce garde champêtre et ce garde champêtre pour ce commissaire de police. Ils étaient emboîtés, engrenés l'un dans l'autre. Le même fait leur occasionnait la même réflexion, de la même idée ils tiraient des déduc- tions parallèles. 'Quand le commissaire riait, le garde souriait ; quand H prenait un air grave, l'autre avait un air sombre ;, si la redingote disait : « •il faut faire cela », la ! veste répondait : « .j'y avais songé » ; si elle continuait : « c'est nécessaire », celle-ci ajoutait : "c'est indispensable". Et les rap- ports de rang et d'autorité n'en restaient pas moins, malgré cette adhésion intime, respective- ment distincts, nettement établis. Ainsi, le garde élevait la voix moins haut que le commissaire, était un peu plus petit et marchait derrière. Le commissaire, poli, important, beau parleur, se consultait, ruminait à part, causait tout seul et faisait claquer sa langue ; le garde était doux, attentif, pensif, observait de son côté, poussait des interjections et se grattait le bout du nez. Chemin faisant, il s'informait des nouvelles, lui demandait des avis, sollicitait ses ordres, et le commissaire questionnait, méditait, donnait des commandements.

Nous touchions aux premières maisons de la ville, quand nous entendîmes de l'une d'elles sor- tir des cris aigus. La rue était pleine d'une foule agitée et des gens accouraient vers le commis- saire en lui disant : « Arrivez, arrivez, monsieur, on se bat ! Il y a deux femmes de tuées ! — Par qui ? — On n'en sait rien. — Pourquoi ? — Elles saignent. — Mais comment ? — Avec un râteau. — Où est l'assassin ? — L'une à la tête, l'autre au bras. Entrez, on vous attend, elles sont là.”

Le commissaire entra donc, et nous à sa suite.

C'était un bruit de sanglots, de cris, de paroles, une houle qui se poussait et s'étouffait. On se marchait sur les pieds, on se coudoyait, on jurait, on ne -voyait rien. Le commissaire commença par se mettre en colère. Mais comme il ne parlait pas le breton, ce fut le garde qui se mit en colère pour lui et qui chassa le public de céans, en prenant tout le monde par les épaules et en le poussant à la porte.

Lorsqu'il n'y eut plus dans la pièce qu'une douzaine de personnes environ, nous parvînmes à distinguer dans un coin un lambeau de chair qui pendait à un bras et une masse noire comme une chevelure sur laquelle coulaient des gouttes de sang. C'étaient la vieille femme et la jeune fille blessées dans la bagarre. La vieille, qui était sèche et grande et portait une peau bistrée, plis- sée comme du parchemin, se tenait debout avec son bras gauche dans sa main droite, geignait à peine et n'avait pas l'air de souffrir ; mais la jeune fille pleurait. Assise, écartant les lèvres, baissant la tête, et les mains à plat sur les genoux, elle tremblait convulsivement et sanglotait tout bas. A toutes les questions qu'on leur faisait, elles ne répondaient que par des plaintes, et les témoi- gnages de ceux qui avaient vu donner les coups ne concordant même pas entre eux, il fut impos- sible de connaître ni qui avait battu ni pourquoi on avait battu. Les uns disaient que c'était un mari qui avait surpris sa femme dans une position horizontale ; d'autres, que c'étaient les femmes qui s'étaient disputées et que le maître de la maison avait voulu les assommer pour les faire taire. On ne savait rien de précis, M. le commissaire en était fort perplexe et le garde tout interdit.

Le médecin du pays étant absent, ou ces bonnes gens ne voulant pas s'en servir parce que cela coûtait trop cher, nous eûmes l'aplomb d'offrir "le secours de nos faibles talents" et nous courûmes chercher notre nécessaire de voyage avec un bout de sparadrap, une bande et de la charpie que nous avions, en prévision d'accident, fourrés au fond de notre sac.

C'eût été, ma foi, un beau spectacle pour nos amis, que de nous voir étalant doctoralement sur la table de ce gîte notre bistouri, nos pinces et nos trois paires de ciseaux, dont une à branches de vermeil. Le commissaire admirait notre philanthropie ; les commères nous regardaient en silence, la chandelle jaune coulait dans son chandelier de fer et allongeait sa mèche que le garde mouchait avec ses doigts. La bonne femme fut pansée la première. Le coup avait été consciencieusement donné ; le bras dénudé montrait l'os et un triangle de chair d'environ quatre pouces de longueur retombait en manchette. Nous tâchâmes de remettre le morceau à sa place en l'ajustant exactement sur les bords de la plaie, puis nous serrâmes le tout avec une bande. Il est très possible que cette compression violente ait causé la gangrène et que la patiente en soit morte.

On ne savait au juste ce qu'avait la jeune fille. Le sang coulait dans ses cheveux, sans qu'on pût voir d'où il venait ; il se figeait dessus par plaques huileuses et filait le long de la nuque. Le garde, notre interprète, lui dit d'ôter le bandeau de laine qui la coiffait ; elle le dénoua par un seul mouvement de main, et toute sa chevelure d'un noir mat et sombre se déroula comme une cascade avec les fils sanglants qui la rayaient en rouge. Ecartant délicatement ses beaux cheveux mouillés qui étaient doux, épais, abondants, nous aperçûmes, en effet, sur l'occiput, une bosse grosse comme une noix, percée d'un trou ovale. Nous rasâmes la peau tout à l'entour ; après avoir lavé et étanché la plaie, nous fîmes fondre du suif sur de la charpie et nous l'adaptâmes sur la blessure à l'aide de bandelettes de diachylon. Une compresse mise par-dessus fut retenue par le bandeau, recouvert lui-même par le bonnet.

Sur ces entrefaites, le juge de paix survint. La première chose qu'il fit fut de demander le râteau, et la seule dont il s'inquiéta fut de le regarder et de le contempler sous tous les sens. Il le prenait par le manche, il en comptait les dents, il le brandissait, l'essayait, en faisant sonner le fer et ployer le bois.

— Est-ce bien là, disait-il, l'instrument de l'attentat ? Jérôme, en êtes-vous convaincu ?

— On le dit, monsieur.

— Vous n'y étiez pas, monsieur le commissaire ?

— Non, monsieur le juge de paix.

— Je voudrais savoir si c'est bien avec un râteau que les coups ont été portés, ou si ce n'est pas plutôt avec un instrument contondant. Quel est le malfaiteur ? Ce râteau, d'abord, lui appartenait-il ? ou était-il à un autre ? Est-ce bien avec cela qu'on a blessé ces femmes ? N'est-ce pas plutôt, comme je le répète, avec un instrument contondant ? Veulent-elles porter plainte ? Dans quel sens dois-je faire mon rapport ? Qu'en dites-vous, monsieur le commissaire ?

Les malheureuses ne répondaient rien, si ce n'est qu'elles souffraient toujours ; et quant à requérir la vengeance des lois, on leur laissa la nuit pour y réfléchir. La jeune fille pouvait à peine parler et la vieille avait également les idées fort confuses, vu qu'elfe était ivre, à ce que disaient les voisins ; ce qui nous expliqua l'insensibilité qu'elle avait montrée pendant que nous la soulagions.

Après nous avoir fouillé des yeux, le mieux qu'ils purent, pour savoir qui nous étions, les autorités de Pont-l'Abbé nous souhaitèrent le bon-soir, en nous remerciant "des services que nous avons rendus au pays". Nous remîmes notre nécessaire dans notre poche et le commissaire s'en alla avec son garde, le garde avec son sabre, le juge de paix avec le râteau.

WA peine montés dans nos chambres, nous y reçûmes la visite de deux gendarmes désireux de lire sur nos passeports nos noms, prénoms, domicile et profession, afin de les rapporter bien vite au commissaire et au juge de paix qui les attent*) Inédit, pages 303 à 205. daient sans doute avec une anxiété fort grande. Mais comme nous jouissons du bonheur insigne de n'exercer aucun métier, de n'être décorés d'aucun titre ni revêtus d'aucune qualité, il leur fallut se résigner à n'apprendre que deux noms fort inconnus à Pont-î Abbé, comme ailleurs. Jamais cependant ils ne purent croire que nous fussions des messieurs cheminant à pied pour leur récréation personnelle, cela leur paraissait inouï, absurde ; nous étions des dessinateurs ou des leveurs de plan qui voyageaient par ambition pour faire mieux que les autres et gagner par là la croix d'honneur ; nous étions salariés par le gouvernement pour inspecter les routes et surveiller les allumeurs des phares ; nous avions une mission secrète, un travail clandestin que nous ne voulions pas dire afin de surprendre les gens et de faire notre coup ; il y avait en nous quelque chose d'incompréhensible, de contradictoire et de ténébreux, et nous les effrayions presque, tant nous leur semblions étranges.

Non, vive Dieu ! rien de tout cela ne nous pousse. Nous ne sommes que des contemplateurs humoristiques et des rêveurs littéraires ; nous passons notre vie à regarder le soleil et à lire les maîtres. Si cela n'emplit pas la poche comme de faire du suif, des bottes et des lois, si les gens les comprennent peu, et que les bourgeois en rient de pitié, c'est donc pour nous seuls alors, et tant mieux mille fois, que vous étendez vos horizons, grèves et prairies que labourent nos pieds, et c'est pour nous aussi que vous êtes venus, poètes magnifiques où nous délectons nos âmes.

Et nous nous mîmes au lit en riant de cette perversité grande qui fait de la vie humaine l'appendice de la boutique, de l'étude ou du comptoir, ne la croyant inventée par Dieu que pour emplir des casiers et prendre des numéros.

Puis nous dormîmes d'un bon sommeil malgré nos opérations, et dès l'aurore nous partîmes pour Penmarc'h sans nous informer de l'état de nos malades. VIII

Penmarc'h. — Eglise du commencement du XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle ; original porche de l'entrée principale ; deux portes jumelles en plein cintre ornées ; niche longue, élégante, à couronnement dentelé ; tête de cheval à gauche ; un homme qui se cramponne. — Entrée latérale charmante comme goût, on y sent un fumet du XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle allié à l'élément indigène ; deux portes jumelles du même genre, mais plus gracieuses encore ; à gauche, un médaillon représentant un homme qui embrasse une femme, la femme se défend. — Intérieur plein d'oiseaux qui chantent. A notre seconde visite, ce matin, un oiseau a passé au milieu de la nef en volant. Ogives, médaillons à sculptures robustes, représentant des têtes ou des bonshommes. — Dans le chœur un saint en bois coloré, relevant le bras droit ; manteau découpé, fenêtres divisées en fleurs dans la chapelle derrière l'abside. — Restes d'un ossuaire en pierre dans le cimetière, avec deux petites têtes de mort sculptées dans un angle extérieur.

KÉRITY. — Rochers en vue, marais avec des criques que la marée montante remplissait. — Restes d'une belle église des Templiers, pure, sobre, niches charmantes dans le goût de celles de Penmarc'h. La nef n'a qu'un côté latéral, pas de transept. Autel en pierre. Au fond ogive avec trois divisions dans la fenêtre. — Il reste une tour sur le côté droit du portail, nous sommes montés. Campagne plate, la mer, les moulins qui tournaient, vent. — Conversation avec les marins. — Un vieux nous a dit qu'il n'avait vu dire la messe en mer (un autre nous avait dit le contraire) sur les ruines d'Ys, car ils placent Ys ici. Les gens nous ont prétendu qu'on voyait encore des pierres taillées comme s'il y avait eu une ville. — Homard. — Dans le cimetière de Penmarc'h, fût d'une croix avec des bouts de branches coupées, ce qui est un élément indigène constant et très remarquablement caractéristique.

La Torche. — Crevasse. Grand rocher comme un peulvan, vagues retombant en cascade ; autour elles couraient.

White Norse. — Désert pour aller à Plouvan, immense plaine d'un vert pâle, sables, ondulations du terrain. — Hutte aux canards sauvages où nous nous sommes assis ; des oiseaux noirs au ventre blanc volaient en tournant et criaient sur notre tête ; solitude complète ; la mer à gauche.

— Troupeau noir de moutons sautant par-dessus un enclos. — Nous passons dans des cours où les chiens aboient.

— Bras de mer. — Marais. — M. Bataille a été à Louviers, a été dans l'Inde, à Waterloo, a fait la course, a été douanier et est maintenant retraité : histoire pour un quarçon tu en as une livre. Histoire du..... envoyé dans un boulet ; il cassera la gueule à quelqu'un. Retraite de Russie ; le grenadier auquel il avait refusé le feu mort au coin de son feu ; il lui prend sa culotte. Les poux appelés Napoléons de Pologne.

— L'instituteur primaire nous désillusionne sur la vertu des Bretonnes ; les filles se cotisent pour payer à boire aux garçons afin d'avoir un cavalier pour la danse. — Grogs. — Nous sympathisons avec un cordonnier. — Soupçon de l'hôtesse sur l'immoralité de mon ami.

De Plouvan À Audierne, au bord de la mer en laissant une chapelle à droite. — Route qui serpente suivant les sinuosités de la côte. — Désert, la mer, la mer, le vent. — Le médecin à cheval en houseaux. — Paysans travaillant le varech ; leurs vêtements bruns sur les rochers verts. — À droite, montagnes de sable et de craie ; couleur blanche, la mer bleue verte ; le ciel roulant des nuages, très bleu par places ; le sentier serpentant devant nous au loin suivant l'ondulation des terrains, comme une tramée blanche sur le fond vert pâle de la terre ; sables à traverser ; moulin.

Audierne. — Obligés de faire le tour de la baie. — Eglise : sous un porche latéral un monstre marin, une figure grotesque ; un bateau sur la façade, mais moderne et non pas chiqué comme à Penmarc'h. — Le soir nous nous promenons sur le sable si beau que nous avons regret d'y marcher, en parlant de 7 millions de rentes. La mer verte foncée par l'effet d'une côte verte qui se reflétait dessus ; plus près de nous bleue ; nuages de nacre et de poussière d'or pâle. Du côté plus chargé un nuage noir sur une touffe d'arbres verts s'avancait en s'élargissant.

D'Audierne À Plougoff (samedi 19). — D'abord la grande route qui monte ; arbres à droite. — Un monsieur à cheval et orné de longs cheveux, que nous arrêtons pour savoir notre route, nous conseille d'aller au pardon de Saint-Huguen à Premelin. — Baraque en toile. — En attendant vêpres nous allons nous asseoir au bord de la mer. — Eglise : statues décapitées ; porche latéral tout peint. — Dans la baraque, assis sur une planche posée sur deux pierres, nous causons avec des paysans (le grand qui me donne 45 ans, cheveux gris, frisé ; celui à côté de Max tout noir ; effet bouffant du bragow-brass en le voyant assis devant moi ; ils admirent nos pipes, nos couteaux) et un matelot qui tenait l'établissement. ■ — Nous nous perdons. Village désert, chiens aboyant ; personne ne parle français. — Soleil sur le fumier et dans les chemins effondrés, desséchés. À l'entrée de Plougoff, le médecin, l'hôtel ! — Grandes ondulations arides et augmentant d'aridité en s'approchant de la pointe du Raz. Touffes de joncs marins très courts, le sol est pelé par places. Nous traversons deux villages noirs

‘4 de crasse. — Une croix en pierre. — Moulin. — Enfant manchot de naissance qui nous demande l’aumône, il nous suit ; un douanier lui explique d’être notre guide. Muet, il nous précède. — Ciel bleu, cormorans. — Nous allons par le côté droit. Trou satanique, bouleversements, replis, indescriptible couleur des roches sous-marines. L’homme n’est pas fait pour vivre là, pour supporter la nature à haute dose. Ce n’est pas un rocher, mais une agglomération de rochers ; la terre a passé entre, herbe courte et glissante. La roche devient de plus en plus sèche, la crête aiguë s’abaisse vers la pointe. — Nous revenons par le versant gauche, la pente est moins à pic, et la vigueur du précipice est un peu atténuée par la dégradation des roches qui le garnissent. L’enfant est obligé de mettre son bras pour que je passe dessus. — Revenus nous fumons assis. — A droite, à l’entrée de la Baie des Trépassés, rocher debout, couvert de mouettes, elles voltigent, crient, montent et s’entre-croisent ; l’enfant jette des pierres ; une barque se balance. — Religiosité de notre hôtesse. — Toujours la soupe au lait et les oeufs. — Nuit bivouaquée.

De Plougoff À Pontcroix. — Paysans se rendant au pardon de Saint-Hugin qui guérit et préserve de la rage. — Près de Pontcroix nous retrouvons notre gaillard d’hier. — Gendarmes qui nous demandent nos passeports sur notre mauvaise mine. — Violent déjeuner à Pontcroix. — L’aubergiste officier de santé. — Costumes. — Férocité d’un tailleur qui nous mène à Douarnenez ; son char à bancs et le poulet du père Bataille sont les deux choses les plus dures que j’aie encore subies.

Douarnenez. — Temps gris, nuageux, brouillardé, maisons basses, rues désertes, pays pauvre et triste ; à droite, sur le sable, bout de falaise avec de la verdure et des herbes qui pendaient. — L’île Tristan en face ; grand mur blanc. Du cultivateur qui l’habite ; air morose de l’ensemble qui va à ce vieux Fontepelle. De Douarnenez À Crozon. — Interminable route en carriole, mais dont la longueur est atténuée par un sommeil à peu près continu.

Crozon. — M. de Saint Amour, sa nièce. — M. Grand. — Violence de l’habit du père Renoult allant au dîner de noces rendu par le notaire. — Le gamin tout nu s’habillant dans un couloir. — Le soir, visite au cimetière.

MorgAT. — Le village à droite. — Barques tirées sur le galet comme à Étretat. — Grottes : les petites qu'on voit à pied sec, trois, une avec deux arches, une autre où il y a une espèce d'alcôve basse ; la grande grotte, on y va en bateau. A l'entrée l'eau découle d'en haut, transparence de l'eau, la grotte n'est pas droite, mais fait des courbes ; un petit rocher au milieu. La teinte des rochers est jaune, gris de fer, rouge, etc., et tout cela sans transition suivant les tranches de la pierre. La barque roulait à la godille, on se sentait entraîné vers un royaume nacré, étrange, comme dans un couloir magique ; c'est la magie de la nature. Pla- fond diversement colorié.

LandonADEC. — Lierres sur pans de murs. — Nos fouilles au dolmen. — Anse de Dinant. — Morts dans le sable, os calcinés par iceluy : on les a retrouvés les bras droits le long du corps, la face au ciel, les pieds vers la mer. — La mer, bleu foncé. — Le sable tout blanc et sec sous le soleil. — Campagne large et nue à couleur rousse pâle.

Ce sommaire a été développé par Maxime Du Camp.

14. IX

De Crozon à Landévennec. — Moulins qui servent à nous reconnaître. — Fond de la rade. — Terre découpée en langues de mer qui avancent entre de petites montagnes toutes vertes et toutes boisées, même jusqu'au bas ; ça m'a fait penser à la Grèce. — Vieille abbaye, deux statues, l'une couchée, l'autre debout ; boudoirs d'un nouveau style ; la mer vue par le trou des fenêtres ; au premier plan un champ de pommiers. — Intensité de priapisme fluent. — Passage. — Course solide.

Daoulas. — Le bonnet de nuit. — Jeune enfant nu-pieds venant vendre des fraises et revenant avec l'argent acheter un gros morceau de pain. — Goût horripilant d'un ossuaire dans le cimetière. — M. Genès, mouchard, marchand d'hommes, agent d'affaires, inspecteur de ces demoiselles, concierge du dispensaire ; il se moque des juifs qui font le même commerce que lui, avec leurs grands manteaux et leur chaîne de chrysocale ; n'aime ni le bal, ni l'église, ni le théâtre, mais une vieille bouteille ; il raccroche des hommes sur la route : « le remplaçant est le meilleur soldat parce qu'il est comme un forçat ». Et l'honneur de l'armée dirait le National ? eh ! eh ! eh !

Calvaire de Plougastel. — Amusant ; animaux lourds, chevaux et ânes ; mine d'un homme qui..... le Christ en lui tirant la langue ; air raide de deux hommes qui vont le souffleter. M. Genès prenait la pâque pour une scène de jeu « ils jouent » ; un tambour, un joueur de trompe, un cavalier la figure toute levée en l'air précédant Jésus allant au mont des Oliviers. — Passage, terreur d'une petite femme laide et sale, enceinte ; elle se pressait sur moi. L'homme aime à sentir la femme faible ; la volupté se double de l'orgueil, du sentiment de la force ; et elle avait de la crotte aux yeux ! nous fuyons notre compagnon. — Marche sans fin pour arriver à Brest.

Brest. — Frocart et Oe. — Longue descente pavée. — Passeports. — Hôtel du Grand-Monarque.

Embêtement du port par le soleil. — Combats de chiens, d'ours et d'âne ; nous retrouvons notre ami de Guérande jouant du tambour ; cri d'excitation de son associé ; l'âne en dessous, les ours aux deux coins de l'estrade ; dans l'intérieur, poussière, poteau, groupe d'ours, de chiens et d'homme ; un amateur de la ville. — La vue anti-magnétique ; « Elle est magnétisée », chansonnette africaine. — Le b.....militaire. — La jeune bayadère.

De Brest Au Conquet. — Monter et descendre. — Saint- Mathieu ; alternative des colonnes. — Mise à l'eau de la frégate la Persévérante ; effet de la masse s avançant douce- ment et élégamment en soulevant l'eau.

KerAVEL, sept ruelles. — Obscur, silencieux, une lanterne au bout : quartier des maîtresses des gardes-chiourmes et des forçats. Le derrière donne sur les murs du bagne. — La rue de la Trique ; escalier, les femmes assises sur la porte, lits au fond ; les hommes et les femmes causent de- bout dans la rue ; c'est presque une foule. Beau clair de lune. Ces demoiselles, Babet, Clara, le monsieur qui fumait sa pipe.

Visite à l'hôpital. — Fracture du crâne « je ne souffre pas » et il grimaçait quand on lui touchait. — Propreté niaise. — Jardin botanique ; une flaque d'eau et un cygne. — Ambroise nègre, le roi du bagne ; Ambroise doit aimer le cygne. — Un chat-tigre et un forçat qui se jouait avec lui. — Musée : deux têtes boucanées ; plâtres, Voltaire à côté de ces MM. — Un vieux racorni, vol ; un de la Seine-Inférieure, oreilles plates de chimpanzé, attentat à la pudeur. — Salles des forçats, un nègre vérole, comme un crocodile à cause de ses pustules ; un en lunettes, “la malheureuse passion du jeu”, vol et détournement de fonds. — Dans notre promenade du port, le dentiste. — Dans le baigne : logés à part, chien, place des exécutions devant le grand perron, cachots, porte. On s’apprêtait à ouvrir à deux forçats qui s’étaient échappés le matin. Je voulais leur voir donner la bastonnade ; le garde-chiourme m’a engagé à me priver de ce spectacle qui est hideux ; on les mène immédiatement après à l’hôpital où ils en ont pour quinze jours. Ils revenaient du travail, fouillement d’un chacun. — Marchands : ils nous assaillent de leurs marchandises. — Dans le port, les deux bassins ; vue aride des canons, des bouts de bois ; pas de nature, pas d’arbres, à peine un bouquet par-dessus les maisons ; pas de vague, pas d’animal, rien où le cœur se pose. A l’hôpital pourtant j’ai vu une petite nichée de chats sur le lit d’un malade. Recouvrance. — Rue en pente au milieu des échoppes ouvertes. — Vue de la rade ; un matelot regardait la mer, un homme traînait un petit enfant dans un chariot, des enfants jouaient dans les fossés. — Soleil chaud, ciel bleu, les bâtiments sur la rade : le Borda avec ses deux raies blanches ; l’Astrolabe plus loin. — Traversé le port marchand en bateau. — Éternel boucan des trompettes et des tambours.

Landerneau. — Plat. — Un pont. — La rivière de Landerneau, canalisée droite. — Manoir de Kergoat, habitation d’homme ruiné, M. Fabre, bière, jardin, ifs, jets d’eau, soleil. — Intensité d’un moment effréné au milieu de cette nature.

Joyeuse-Garde. — Rien, qu’une porte avec du lierre, et des mouvements de terrain qui indiquent des douves. — Nous causons d’Isabey, Pradier, etc., et de Shakespeare en revenant dans la forêt par des chemins encore ombrés. — Vue de la rivière, trop droite près Landerneau, mais plus loin c’est une vraie rivière. — Eau dans les prairies du mont, montagnes assez basses, à sommet aigu, couvertes de verdure. — Chien gueulant auquel on avait attaché une casse-rolle à la queue.

La Roche-Maurice. — Nid d’aigle, démantelé, bâti en pierres plates superposées les unes sur les autres. — Au milieu des rochers qui sortent de l’herbe verte, ce qu’on voit, surtout, quand on y est monté en haut, en se tournant du côté de Landerneau ; d’en bas lierres sur les ruines, la verdure qui s’y cramponne a des gradations de teintes, elle devient plus foncée à mesure qu'elle monte, on la distingue par bouffées vertes différentes ; à travers une ouverture, dont les bords sont engraisés de vert lourd, le ciel bleu. — L'église, clocher en réparation dont les pierres couvrent le sol tout à l'entour ; espèce de cour plantée d'arbres rapprochés, de sorte que ça a l'air d'une église en ruine où l'on dit encore la messe.

Landivisiau. — Plat, nul, mais relais de poste au milieu de la grande route ; maisons grises, basses. — Une lieue environ avant d'arriver à Saint-Pol, Tissot : point circonscrit dans l'immensité ; un gendarme s'il avait passé pendant ce temps-là, et au beau moment.

RoscOFF. — Terrains dénudés, plats, légumes, légumes. — Les pays riches sont les pauvres ; les millionnaires s'habillent mal. — Rochers blanchâtres, longs, à fleur d'eau dans la mer bleue, nombreux et comme découpant le fond du tapis azuré. — L'église : beaux bas-reliefs en albâtre du xv* ; groupe de gardes au pied de la croix ; le Christ sortant du tombeau, très grand, très maigre, animé ; un garde casque en tête dormant sur son épée. — Malédiction des chaussures.

Manoir de Kersalion : cour restreinte ; trois chevaux s'y jouant ; tourelle dans la muraille ; porte en plein cintre du XV* siècle surmontée d'un bonhomme coiffé d'un chaperon ; fenêtre dans le toit avec un pinacle d'où sortent de côté deux manières de gargouilles qui ne sont pas des gargouilles, un lion et un bonhomme. — Soleil et vent froid, campagne nue, courant d'eau, moulin, pierres ; chemin tout entouré de ronces de diverses espèces maigres, bruyère, etc., dont les formes se dessinaient sur le sentier blanc ; blés à tête blanche, blonds s'agitant sous le vent ; futaie à droite.

Château de Kerouseri. — Trois tourelles, mâchicoulis, appartements boisés, grande pièce avec des fenêtres raptées, donnant vue sur la mer ; pays plat, la mer au fond ; jardin délabré, pièce de blé entourée de roses ; un Avignonnais pour gardien ; puits à levier.

Kerland. — Entrée, porte couverte de lierre, tour pentagonale ; vieil escabeau en pierre ; grande chambre avec des restes de peinture au plafond sur le plâtre qui s'écaille ; ensemble gris, froid, ennuyeux, sombre ; toutes les pièces pleines d'outils, de bancs, d'ustensiles de campagne, un piège à loup dans l'embrasure d'une fenêtre.

A la fin de ce sommaire, Flaubert avait écrit les quelques notes suivantes :

Brest, mardi 29 juin, 3 h. 1/4 du soir.

Mot d'un troupier qui voyait la mer pour la première fois : "C'est curieux tout de même ! ça donne tout de même un aperçu de ce qui existe !" ( Belle-Isle. )

« L'amour est comme l'opéra ; on s'y ennuie, mais on y retourne. »
Au bazar d'Ozai, 30 avril 1847.

(Blois, i<sup>er</sup> mai.)

Les pigeons de Paphos ne sont souvent que des oies. Il y a beaucoup de gens qui croient avoir les mains belles parce qu'ils les ont propres.

Dans le cimetière d'Arz : Mon Dieu ! n'aviez-vous pas assez d'anges au ciel ?

Lieu chéri du Seigneur où la vertu réside
Aimable solitude où l'Esprit Saint préside,
Trois fois heureux celui qui charmé de tes biens
Rénonce au siècle et rompt ses funestes liens
Aidé par le secours de son Dieu qui le guide
Plus il trouve de croix, plus il est intrépide,
Persuadé qu'il est que l'instant de la mort
Est l'instant fortuné qui le conduit au port.

En route ! le ciel est bleu, le soleil brille, et nous nous sentons dans les pieds des envies de marcher sur l'herbe.

De Crozon à Landévennec, la campagne est découverte, sans arbres ni maisons ; une mousse rousse comme du velours râpé s'étend à perte de vue sur un sol plat. Parfois des champs de blés mûrs s'élèvent au milieu de petits ajoncs rabougris. Les ajoncs ne sont plus en fleurs, les voilà redevenus comme avant le printemps.

Des ornières de charrettes profondes et bordées sur leurs bords d'un bourrelet de boue sèche, se multipliant irrégulièrement les unes près des autres, apparaissent devant vous, se continuent longtemps, font des coudes et se perdent à l'œil. L'herbe pousse par grandes places entre ces sillons effondrés. Le vent siffle sur la lande ; nous avançons ; la brise joyeuse se roule dans l'air, elle sèche de ses bouffées la sueur qui perle sur nos joues et, quand nous faisons halte un instant, nous entendons, malgré le battement de nos artères, son bruit qui coule sur la mousse.

De place en place, pour nous dire la route, surgit un moulin tournant rapidement dans l'air ses grandes ailes blanches. Le bois de leur membrure craque en gémissant ; elles descendent, rasant le sol, et remontent. Debout sur la lucarne tout ouverte, le meunier nous regarde passer.

Nous continuons, nous allons ; en longeant une haie d'ormeaux qui doit cacher un village, dans une cour plantée, nous avons entrevu un homme monté dans un arbre ; au pied, se tenait une femme qui recevait dans son tablier bleu les prunes qu'il lui jetait d'en haut. Je me souviens d'une masse de cheveux noirs tombant à flots sur ses épaules, de deux bras levés en l'air, d'un mouvement de cou renversé et d'un rire sonore qui m'est arrivé à travers le branchage de la haie.

Le sentier que l'on suit devient plus étroit. Tout à coup, la lande disparaît et l'on est sur la crête d'un promontoire qui domine la mer. Se répandant du côté de Brest, elle semble ne pas finir, tandis que, de l'autre, elle avance ses sinuosités dans la terre qu'elle découpe, entre des coteaux escarpés, couverts de bois taillis. Chaque golfe est resserré entre deux montagnes ; chaque montagne a deux golfes à ses flancs, et rien n'est beau comme ces grandes pentes vertes dressées presque d'aplomb sur l'étendue bleue de la mer. Les collines se bombent à leur farte, épatent leur base, se creusent à l'horizon dans un évasement élargi qui regagne les plateaux, et, avec la courbe gracieuse d'un plein cintre moresque, se relie l'une à l'autre, continuant ainsi, en le répétant sur chacune, la couleur de leur verdure et le mouvement de leurs terrains. A leurs pieds, les flots, poussés par le vent du large, pressaient leurs plis. Le soleil, frappant dessus, en faisait briller l'écume sous ses feux, les vagues miroitaient en étoiles d'argent et tout le reste était une immense surface unie dont on ne se rassasiait pas de contempler l'azur.

Sur les vallons on voyait passer les rayons du soleil. Un d'eux, abandonné déjà par lui, estompait plus vaguement la masse de ses bois et, sur un autre, une barre d'ombre large et noire s'avancait.

A mesure que nous descendions le sentier, et qu'ainsi nous nous rapprochions du niveau du rivage, les montagnes en face desquelles nous étions tout à l'heure semblaient devenir plus hautes, les golfes plus profonds ; la mer s'agrandissait. Laissant nos regards courir à l'aventure, nous marchions, sans prendre garde, et les cailloux chassés devant nous déroulaient vite et allaient se perdre dans les bouquets de broussailles, qui couvraient les bords du chemin. (*) Arrivés enfin à Landévennec, nous entrâmes pour déposer nos sacs quelque part dans un cabaret plus que simple, où l'on s'asseyait sur les futailles en guise de bancs. Après y avoir bu un coup de mauvaise eau-de-vie dans un de ces grands gobelets du pays en faïence rayée de bandes roses et bleues comme une culotte de bal masqué, nous allâmes tout de suite voir l'abbaye.

Il n'en reste qu'un portail composé de trois arcades ; celle du milieu plus basse que les deux autres est seule percée. De chaque côté de l'une d'elles, après un contrefort, une longue petite fenêtre cintrée va s'évasant du dehors comme les meurtrières d'une forteresse ; en dedans de l'arcade du milieu, des colonnes courtes supportant des moulures ont des chapiteaux couverts d'entrelacs compliqués.

Quand on a franchi ce pan de muraille, soit par la brèche qui ouvre sur la cour, soit par le portail dont une échelle mise de travers vous barre l'entrée, apparaissent au fond les ruines du chœur et de l'abside découpant leur dentelure blanchâtre sur la couleur bleue du ciel. Elles forment un rond-point flanqué de chapelles latérales, rondes, garnies de contreforts extérieurs, avec des fenêtres à plein cintre la plupart soutenues par des colonnes qui s'engagent à leur base dans des piliers carrés. Le terrain de la cour ondule, fait des bosses et des creux ; c'est un mouve-(*) Inédit, pages 221 à 224. ment heurté de plans inégaux que les ronces et les lierres verdissent de leur verdure inégale.

Dans les chapelles latérales, par le trou des fenêtres, on voit au loin la mer à l'horizon d'une prairie que bossellent en dômes verts les têtes rondes des pommiers et qui s'encadre comme un tableau dans le plein cintre rongé des fenêtres romanes.

Une statue d'abbé est appuyée contre le mur : un gros anneau au médius de la main droite, un menton long, des pommettes saillantes, des yeux sortis, des cheveux légèrement crépelés, et une chape bordée de longues franges, et un écusson qui est d'hermine à trois fasces au chef chargé d'un lambel à trois pièces timbré de la crosse abbatiale. Est-ce là, pourquoi non ? pour- quoi oui ? saint Guenolé, premier abbé du mo- nastère, mort en 448, le même qui conseilla au roi Grallon de quitter la ville d'Ys avant l'en- gloutissement du Seigneur, et qui, lorsque sur la grève le roi fuyait au galop avec la belle Dragut, sa fille, lui cria dans un nuage, comme les flots déjà battaient les jarrets de son cheval, de se dé- barrasser du démon qu'il emportait en croupe ? Grallon la précipita dans les flots, les flots l'en- gloutirent, s'arrêtèrent, et Grallon continua sa course. Pour contempler cette figure plus à notre aise, nous nous étions assis sur une autre statue couchée par terre.

Celle-là représente un évêque, il a la crosse, la chape bordée de roses et d'olives, la bague au pouce et, sous le bras gauche, le bâton pastoral passé. Une manche étroite, fermée d'un gros bouton et sortant elle-même d'une manche très ample serre son bras ; ses mains sont jointes ; deux anges soutiennent l'oreiller où il repose ; son chien, couché à ses pieds, surmonte un écusson qui est de neuf macles posées par trois au lam- bel de trois pièces serties au chef et supporté à dextre par un lion lampassé, à senestre par un lévrier.

Pendant que nous nous occupions à lire ces niaiseries, un veau jaune, marqué d'une tache à la tête, se promenait près de nous. Il chancelait sur ses longues jambes faibles, et les mouches bourdonnaient autour de ses naseaux blancs, hu- mides encore du lait de sa mère. Derrière le por- tail, au bas de la montagne qu'ils recouvrent, les grands hêtres balançaient leurs cimes, le soleil frappait sur les vieux pans de mur, un air chaud passait ; toutes sortes de plants et d'arbrisseaux, des orties, des marguerites, des angéliques, des sureaux, des bruyères et du baume faisaient un mélange de parfums sucrés ; il tombait sur vous quelque chose de tendre, d'énervant, de navrant, d'écœurant ; on se sentait pris de mollesse, tout plein de titillations obtuses et de convoitises fluides. Et comme nous étions là, couchés sur l'herbe, est survenue devant nous une grande jeune fille, blonde et blanche, allant nu-pieds parmi les ronces, et seulement vêtue d'un jupon de drap rouge dont le cordon lui serrait autour de la taille sa chemise de grosse toile jaune ; elle avait à la main un roseau cassé par le haut et se tenait debout à nous regarder sans rien dire.

Elle s'en est allée, puis est revenue ; elle riait quand on lui parlait et vous quittait aussitôt.

Puis nous nous sommes levés, nous avons repris nos bâtons, nous sommes partis. En passant par-dessus le mur, nous en avons fait ébouler des pierres et le ciment s'est égrené sous nos mains. Est-ce que nous détruirions aussi, nous autres ? et ce que n'ont pu abattre ni le temps, ni les hommes, ni le bon goût, ni l'industrie, voilà que l'achève sans le savoir le contemplateur naïf, dans l'exercice même de sa curiosité admirative.

En vingt minutes une barque nous eut passés de l'autre côté de la rade et déposés dans une anfractuosité du rocher, sur de grandes lames de pierre couvertes de goémons où nous glissâmes quelque temps avant de pouvoir gagner la terre. Entrés dans la campagne, notre embarras commença. Il fallait coucher à Daoulas, or nous ne savions pas par où prendre. Les chemins tournaient le long des haies fournies, plus compactes que des murs. Nous montions, nous descendions ; cependant les sentiers s'emplissaient d'ombre et la campagne s'assoupissait déjà dans ce beau silence des nuits d'été.

Ne rencontrant personne enfin qui pût nous dire notre route et deux ou trois paysans à qui nous nous étions adressés ne nous ayant répondu que par des cris inintelligibles, nous tirâmes notre carte, atteignîmes notre compas, et, nous orientant d'après le coucher du soleil, nous résolûmes de piquer sur Daoulas à vol d'oiseau. Donc la vigueur nous revint aux membres et nous nous lançâmes dans les champs, à travers les haies, par-dessus les fossés, abattant, renversant, bousculant, cassant tout, sans souci aucun des barrières restant ouvertes et des récoltes endommagées.

Au haut d'une pente, nous aperçûmes le village de l'Hôpital couché dans une prairie où passait une rivière. Un pont la traverse ; sur ce pont, il y a un moulin qui tourne ; après la prairie, une colline remonte ; nous la gravissions gaillardement quand, sur le talus d'un haut bord, à la lueur d'un rayon du jour, entre les pieds d'une haie vive, nous avons vu une belle salamandre noire et jaune qui s'avancait de ses pattes dentelées et traînait sur la poussière sa longue queue mince remuant aux ondulations de son corsage tacheté. C'était son heure ; elle sortait de sa caverne qui est au fond de quelque gros caillou enfoui sous la mousse et s'en allait faire la chasse aux insectes dans le tronc pourri des vieux chênes.

Un pavé à pointes aiguës sonna sous nos pas, une rue se dressa devant nous ; nous étions à Daoulas. Il faisait encore assez clair pour distinguer à une des maisons une enseigne carrée pendue à sa barre de fer scellée dans la muraille. Sans enseigne, d'ailleurs, nous aurions bien re- connu l'auberge, les maisons ayant ainsi que les hommes leur métier écrit sur la figure. Donc, nous y entrâmes fort affamés et demandant sur- tout qu'on ne nous fît pas languir.

Pendant que nous étions assis sur la porte à at- tendre notre dîner, une petite fille en guenilles est entrée dans l'auberge avec une corbeille de fraises qu'elle portait sur la tête. Elle en est sortie bientôt tenant à la place un gros pain qu'elle main- tenait de ses deux mains. Elle s'enfuyait avec la vivacité d'un chat en poussant des cris aigus. Ses cheveux d'enfant, hérissés, gris de poussière, se levaient dans le vent autour de sa figure maigre et ses petits pieds nus, frappant d'aplomb la terre, disparaissaient, en courant, sous les lambeaux déchiquetés qui lui battaient les genoux.

Après notre repas, qui, outre l'inévitable ome- lette et le veau fatal, se composa en grande partie des fraises de la petite fille, nous montâmes dans nos appartements.

L'escalier tournant, à marches de bois vermou- lues, gémissait et craquait sous nos pas comme l'âme d'une femme sensible sous une désillusion nouvelle. En haut se trouvait une chambre dont la porte, comme celle des granges, se fermait avec un crochet qu'on mettait du dehors. C'est là que nous gîtâmes. Le plâtre des murs, jadis peint en jaune, tombait en écailles ; les poutres du plafond ployaient sous le poids des tuiles de la toiture, et, sur les carreaux de la fenêtre à guil- lotine, un enduit de crasse grisâtre adoucissait la lumière comme à travers des verres dépolis. Les lits, faits de quatre planches de noyer mal jointes, avaient de gros pieds ronds piqués de mites et tout fendus de sécheresse. Sur chacun d'eux étaient une pailleasse et un matelas recouverts d'une couverture verte trouée par des morsures de souris et dont la frange était faite par les fils qui s'effilaient. Un morceau de miroir cassé dans son cadre déteint ; à un clou, un carnier sus- pendu, et, près de là, une vieille cravate de soie dont on reconnaissait le pli des nœuds, indi- quaient que ce lit était habité par quelqu'un, et, sans doute, qu'on y couchait tous les soirs.

Sous l'un des oreillers de coton rouge, une chose hideuse se découvrit ; à savoir un bonnet de même couleur que la couverture des lits, mais dont un glacis gras empêchait de reconnaître la trame, usé, élargi, avachi, huileux, froid au tou- cher. J'ai la conviction que son maître y tient beaucoup et qu'il le trouve plus chaud que tout autre. La vie d'un homme, la sueur d'une existence entière est concrétée là en cette couche de céramique ranci. Combien de nuits n'a-t-il pas fallu pour la former si épaisse ? due de cauchemars se sont agités là-dessous, que de rêves y ont passé ! Et de beaux, peut-être. Pourquoi pas ?

'*> Une délicatesse exagérée nous empêcha de jeter cette ordu- re par la fenêtre et nous nous con- tentâmes de la repousser du pied sous le lit. Que serait-il advenu si nous y eussions trouvé des sa- vates qui devaient aller au bonnet ? Et ensuite

'5- quel beau rapport à écrire pour ceux qui auraient fait notre autopsie.

O confort ! me disais-je en entrant timidement dans mes draps, ô confort idéal du bonheur mo- derne, que tu es loin d'avoir pénétré jusqu'à Daoulas ! comme on y méconnaît tes douceurs ! Voilà cependant des gens qui ignorent tes stores, tes tapis, tes portières, tes étagères, tes calori- fères ! Quel mépris du chic anglais ! quelle incurie dans le service ! quelle malpropreté de linge ! quels tristes coutiaux ! quelle vilaine argenterie ! On ne trouverait pas dans tout le pays une seule pierre ponce ; ils ne se doutent pas même de la manière de faire le thé, et certainement qu'au- cune de ces maisons-là n'a un water- closet conve- nable.

Nous dormîmes quatorze heures de suite et nous ronflions encore le lendemain, tout en visi- tant l'église. On raconte sur sa fondation une belle* légende dans laquelle figurent un dragon avéu soijpfetit, deux saints et un seigneur furieux, mais, je suis..fatigué des légendes et non moins des-églises. Outre que je n'ai pas, d'ailleurs, la bosse archéologique fort développée, n'est-il pas éhrnj<yeuK,,çvenez->en, d'endurer au moins une fois, par jour une- nef, un portail, des bas côtés, des chapiteaux, des ; arcades, des arcatures, des colonnes, des piliers, > des pleins cintres et des Ogiw& ? :A force, d'être prodiguées, les plus ai- mables choses deviennent odieuses. De ma vie je n'oublierai la haine que les Pyrénées m'avaient procurée pour les cascades ; j'en avais tant admiré que je les détestais à outrance. Lorsqu'il fallait se détourner pour en admirer une nouvelle, je me sentais des défaillances d'estomac ; leur bruit, leur mousse, leur mouvement me révoltaient ; je n'aspirais plus qu'après les plaines les plus sèches, j'aurais voulu vivre dans une marnière.

Sous le porche il y a douze apôtres maigres, avec des mines assez naïves, et l'intérieur, quoique roman (mais plus blanchi, hélas ! que la face de Pierrot), n'a rien, que de gros œufs d'autruche suspendus en ex-voto à la statue de la Vierge et qui rappellent ceux que mettent les musulmans dans les mosquées. Si cela arrête une minute et fait sourire en notre esprit la poésie des rapprochements, vous en êtes puni bientôt par la vue d'un ossuaire du goût le plus horripilant qu'il soit possible de souffrir.

Dans la crainte de nous perdre en chemin, et comme nous voulions arriver de bonne heure à Brest, nous nous enquîmes d'un guide.

— Voilà un monsieur qui vous y mènera bien, il y retourne lui-même, nous dit notre hôtesse en nous désignant du doigt un bourgeois accoudé sur la table de la cuisine et qui trinquait avec un maréchal ferrant.

Quand la bouteille fut vidée, le monsieur se leva, prit une prise dans une tabatière en écaille et se tournant vers nous :

— Vous allez à Brest, messieurs ?

— Oui. — Moi aussi. Nous allons donc faire route ensemble, nous pourrions causer, ça nous distraira.

Il était petit et commençait à prendre du ventre ; ses cheveux noirs, coupés ras par derrière, frisaient sur la tempe gauche en une boucle qui s'avancait jusqu'au coin de la paupière, et son cha peau, s'en allant sur l'oreille droite, découvrait un front rétréci qui paraissait plus fuyant encore à cause de sa mâchoire allongée. Malgré ses joues pendantes, sa figure était maigre. Il clignait souvent des yeux et n'arrêtait pas de sourire. Une redingote de lasting, trop courte de taille, couvrait son dos voûté, et de ses manches trop petites sortaient deux grosses mains rouges, mains paresseuses, plus grasses que fortes, et dont la peau semblait humide. Sous un gilet de satin noir à schall, brodé de bouquets vert tendre, s'étalait une chemise de coton fort blanche, durement empesée, sur laquelle filaient les deux rubans blonds d'une chaîne de sûreté en cheveux qui retenait dans un large gousset sa belle montre d'or. Sur sa cravate affaissée, son cou engoncé tournait à l'aise, et son pantalon à grand pont, éraillé aux boutonnieres et bombé aux genoux, s'arrêtait à mi-jambe sur la tige d'une forte botte dont le cuir dur ne ployait pas. Il marchait vite, regardant à terre, baissant la tête et relevant l'épaule droite sous laquelle il serrait un formidable gourdin fait d'un bois des îles garni dans toute sa longueur de piquants aigus.

Et il causait ! il causait ! il parlait toujours, nous narrant les anecdotes de gens inconnus, nous rapportant des dialogues entiers, nous entretenant de ses opinions politiques, de ses goûts en cuisine, de sa santé, de son commerce, de ses relations, du prix des denrées, de sa femme, de son beau-père, de son petit chien, de son poêle qui fume. Il s'appelle monsieur Genès, il est fixé à Brest, il fait pour soixante mille francs d'affaires par an ; il a été successivement armurier, soldat, mouchard, inspecteur des filles, concierge du dispensaire et il est maintenant établi, marié, propriétaire et agent d'affaires, c'est-à-dire marchand d'hommes, comme ils appellent ça en Bretagne.

On présumerait qu'une telle existence a dû détremper ses vases sur celui qui l'a traversée et qu'on va s'amuser à les y ramasser à la cuillère, mais non ! rien n'est plus plat, plus nul, plus incolore et plus insipide que M. Genès. Il est bête comme un juge et aussi assommant que la biographie des hommes utiles. Sans se douter le moins du monde de la saleté de son industrie, il se croit fort honnête homme, car il passe tous les marchés qu'il fait par-devant notaire. Il est chaste dans ses propos et rangé dans sa conduite. Son seul goût est l'argent, sa seule prédilection le vin, et sans doute qu'il doit à l'habitude d'en boire cet air somnolent et débraillé dont la bonhomie superficielle atténue l'astuce de ses petits yeux gris et la dureté de ses lèvres minces.

Il n'a pas de vices, il regarde le jeu comme dangereux, les femmes comme pernicieuses. « On ne sait pas où ça vous mène, tandis qu'avec une vieille bouteille on s'arrête où l'on veut. » C'est un homme d'ordre, actif, malin, prudent et qui a peur des voleurs. Il paraît flatté de la considération qu'on lui montre ; il respecte beaucoup les lois et vénère les gens de justice, notaires, avoués, huissiers ; il porte un couteau-poignard et jamais n'ôte son chapeau.

Chemin faisant, il raccrochait les jeunes gens qu'il rencontrait et leur proposait de se vendre. Le remplaçant est d'ailleurs pour lui le type accompli du soldat parce qu'il ne craint rien, ne tient à rien, donne sa peau pour quelques centaines de francs, en un mot parce que « le remplaçant est comme un forçat », définition qui satisfait peu les défenseurs de l'honneur militaire.

M. Genès n'aime pas le spectacle, c'est une des causes, entre autres, pour lesquelles il est sorti de la police ; cela l'ennuyait fort d'être obligé tous les soirs d'aller au théâtre. Puis, on lui disait aussi : « M. Genès vous avez tort ! un homme comme vous ne doit pas être attaché à la police. » Du reste il ne fréquente pas davantage les églises, il nous a déclaré n'y avoir pas mis les pieds trois fois en sa vie ; il est voltairien, d'ailleurs, et ami du progrès, mais toutefois plus ami du gouvernement encore. Il souhaite la guerre, « ça ferait aller le commerce ».

A Plougastel cependant il s'arrêta comme nous, pour que nous puissions voir le calvaire, petit monument de granit, carré, dont chaque face représente un tableau de la vie de Jésus-Christ, et dont les quatre coins sont occupés par les évangélistes dans leurs attributions. Les personnages, un peu lourds, n'en sont pas moins mouvementés, vivants, amusants : les hommes qui tiennent le Christ le lient de toutes leurs forces, à faire éclater leurs muscles ; celui qui lui grimace au nez en tirant la langue grimace si bien qu'il fait rire ; l'âne qui porte Notre-Seigneur entrant à Jérusalem a une vraie mine d'âne, bonasse et pacifique ; les soldats qui le mènent au calvaire, en soufflant de la trompe et battant du tambour, sont précédés d'un officier chevauchant, la figure en l'air, avec une arrogance sublime ; aux pieds de la croix la Madeleine en pleurs répand sa belle chevelure tressée. Mettez à tous ces personnages les costumes des tableaux de Teniers, les petits chapeaux ronds retroussés, les bons pourpoints servant de grosses bedaines, de grandes manches, des hautes chausses, de larges visages, des yeux ouverts, et vous aurez un ensemble d'une fantaisie solide, quelque chose de très naïf, de très élevé et d'une poésie toute moyen âge, quoique le monument n'ait été construit qu'en 1602 en acquittement d'un vœu fait quatre ans auparavant à propos de je ne sais quelle épidémie qui ravageait la Basse-Bretagne.

Tout cela, du reste, fut complètement perdu pour M. Genès. Il ne se doutait même pas de ce que ça voulait dire ; en regardant la Cène il prit les plats pour des cartes, les coupes pour des dés et il dit, fort ébahi : « ils jouent ». C'est farce.

De Plougastel au bord de la mer on dévale au milieu des bois par une pente rapide d'où l'on découvre une partie de la rade, celle du moins qui s'étend depuis Brest jusqu'à la rivière de Landerneau. A vos côtés se dresse une falaise de rochers blancs, rayée horizontalement par des couches de silex à pic et nue du côté des flots, mais par derrière, sur le plateau, couverte de chênes et de hêtres, surchargée de feuillages, et qui, lorsque vous descendez par le vallon entr'ouvert dans son flanc, est d'une crête tournure.

Ici l'on s'embarque, on s'évite ainsi, comme à Landévennec, de décrire le circuit de l'anse, les découpures inégales de la rade s'avancant dans les terres en mille golfes capricieux dont il faudrait quelquefois toute une journée pour faire le tour.

Avant de se mettre en mer, M. Genès eut soif et nous invita à entrer avec lui dans un cabaret de sa connaissance où, trouvant qu'on ne le servait pas assez vite, il alla chercher lui-même le vin dans le cellier et tira les verres du buffet. Comme nous redoutions fort qu'il ne payât à boire, car la revanche eût été inévitable, nous nous empressâmes de solder, d'avaler et de décamper au plus vite.

M. Genès, au contraire, voulait s'asseoir, s'attabler un peu, se rafraîchir ; il demandait des fraises et s'informait s'il y avait du café ; cependant le batelier nous attendait, la marée était haute, il fallait partir. Les vagues sautaient sur le pavé de la cale où le bateau bondissait en cognant sa quille, leur écume rejaillissait sur les passagers qui s'embarquaient, une casquette tomba à l'eau, et les bottes de M. Genès furent mouillées.

La mer roulait, la brise était forte. Cahotée par les flots et tourmentée par un vent de nord-ouest qui nous poussait au fond de la baie, la lourde chaloupe n'avancait guère. Pendant le temps qu'on ramenait les avirons, elle se levait de l'avant, et pivotait arrêtée sur la pointe des vagues. Elles étaient blanches à leur crête, vertes dans leur courbure, bruissantes, nombreuses et se poussaient l'une sur l'autre avec un délire folâtre. Un brick devant nous qui prenait des bordées passait les voiles pleines, bouffi de vent, arrondissant son ventre et s'en allait doucement, coupant l'eau qui clapotait contre sa carène.

A l'horizon Brest apparaissait comme un point gris. Tout à l'entour, dans un cirque de 20 lieues bâti de rochers blancs, la mer s'étalait. A mes pieds, par terre, au fond de la chaloupe, était une cage d'oiseau qui contenait un merle pris le matin et que l'on apportait à la ville ; il criait de peur en entendant le bruit des flots.

A côté de la cage, par terre aussi, se cachant le visage de ses mains, une jeune femme était assise dans une attitude désespérée ; elle sanglotait, elle priait Dieu, elle suppliait tout le monde de la sauver, elle jurait de ne jamais retourner à Plougastel, elle s'écriait qu'elle allait mourir. C'était une petite femme brune, grasse, sale, mal peignée, mal vêtue, dont les pieds larges, chaussés de bas bleus, s'épataient dans des souliers sans cordons, et qui portait un tablier noir usé sur son ventre rebondi par une grossesse avancée. A mesure que l'on s'écartait du rivage, sa terreur croissait et elle se rapprochait de plus en plus de moi pour s'accrocher à quelqu'un, pour saisir quelque chose. Dans le mouvement d'une vague plus forte elle se jeta à mes pieds et, m'étreignant aux flancs, elle s'enfonça la tête dans mes cuisses sans en vouloir sortir ; ses boucles d'oreilles frottaient mes mains, je sentais ses seins haleter sur mes genoux et tout son corps frissonnant de terreur qui se serrait sur le mien.

J'y prenais plaisir, pourquoi donc ? est-ce parce que nous nous aimons davantage quand nous nous sentons plus forts que les autres ? ou n'était-ce point plutôt parce que la virilité de l'homme se complétant de la faiblesse de la femme, s'en rehaussait de vanité, et y aiguïsait son appétit ? Il y avait ainsi, dans ce simple attouchement, tout le rapport d'un sexe à l'autre et comme la communication de leurs caractères mêmes. Quoi qu'il en soit, cela ne manquait pas de douceur et j'aurais voulu que la traversée fût plus longue.

Et elle avait la crotte aux jeux !

Nous épiions le moment du débarquement pour sauter avant tout le monde afin de planter là M. Genès, dont la société nous était devenue tout à fait intolérable. Au lieu de rester un quart d'heure encore avec lui, nous eussions renoncé à Brest et couché à la belle étoile ; la mesure était comble, nous en étions ahuris, abrutis. Il fut cependant le premier hors du bateau, et comme il y avait sur le rivage un bouchon, il voulut nous y rendre notre politesse et nous offrit tout de suite son éternelle bouteille de vin.

— Merci, il fait trop chaud.

— Alors un peu de bière.

— C'est trop lourd, ça empêche de marcher.

— Un petit verre ?

— Jamais nous n'en prenons.

— D'anisette ?

— Mille grâces, nous sommes pressés.

— Un café ! ah ! un café !

— Non, non, non, bien sûr non, adieu.

Il s'arrêta, hésitant un moment, puis avec un geste sublime : « Eh bien j'en prendrai tout de même, allez toujours ! je vais vous rejoindre ».

De quel train nous filâmes ! ce n'était pas cou- rir, mais voler ! plus légers qu'une plume, la peur du Genès et la joie d'en être délivrés nous traî- naient en avant avec la vitesse d'un wagon em- porté par une double locomotive. A tout instant il nous semblait l'entendre derrière nous et nous n'osions point tourner la tête de peur d'apercevoir son chapeau.

Brest, cependant, n'arrivait pas. Nous avions beau suer, nous hâter, la route s'allongeait tou- jours, la côte montait sans fin. On rencontrait quantité de promeneurs, des marins, des soldats, des enfants aux bras de leurs bonnes, des bour- geois qui prenaient l'air ou allaient dîner à leur maison de campagne dans une petite voiture de fa- mille ; tout annonçait pourtant les approches d'une ville, mais la ville reculait. Enfin n'en pouvant plus, nous sommes entrés dans un champ de blé où nous nous sommes laissés tomber par terre, fourbus, comme des rosses à bout d'haleine. Un nuage qui creva sur nous nous obligea bientôt à reprendre le sac et un quart d'heure après, Brest, grâce au ciel, montra ses toits. Le premier homme que nous vîmes en y entrant, ce fut M. Genès. Il nous avait dépassés, sans doute pendant que nous faisons halte, et il causait avec un gendarme, mais cette fois nous ne le craignons plus, nous étions arrivés, à peu près du moins, car avant d'être aux portes de Brest il faut encore descendre un fau- bourg, longue rue continuant la grande route et que bordent de place en place des boutiques de charcutiers ou de marchands de vin, dont les enseignes patriotiques brillent à côté de grands cabarets délabrés qui ont des salons de réunion de 100 couverts, avec des guirlandes peintes à tous leurs étages.

On s'arrêtait pour nous voir, nous en valions la peine. Poitrine nue et la chemise bouffant à l'air, la cravate autour des reins, le sac à l'épaule, blancs de poussière, hâlés par le soleil, avec nos habits déchirés, nos chaussures usées, rapiécées, nous avions une belle allure vagabonde, insolente et pleine d'orgueil ; le fer de nos souliers sonnait sur le pavé, sur nos dos nos sacs battaient la mesure, nos bâtons retombaient d'accord, et la fumée de nos pipes s'échappant sur le bord de nos cha- peaux se tordait comme un panache.

Messieurs les officiers, ébahis de cette tenue, nous regardaient d'un air stupéfait, quelques ga- mins nous suivaient de loin et on nous arrêta pour nous demander nos passeports.

Il nous fut néanmoins fort agréable, arrivés à l'hôtel, de pouvoir nous rincer à l'eau chaude, de dormir enfin dans un lit propre et de nous asseoir dans un fauteuil. Nous nous plongeâmes dans les délices de la civilisation, nous prîmes un bain et ne mangeâmes point de veau.

Lorsqu'on n'est pas ingénieur, constructeur ou forgeron, Brest ne vous amuse pas considéra- blement. Le port est beau, j'en conviens ; magni- fique, c'est possible ; gigantesque, si vous y tenez. Ça impose, comme on dit, et ça donne l'idée d'une grande nation. Mais toutes ces piles de canons, de boulets, d'ancres, le prolongement indéfini de ces quais qui contiennent une mer sans mouve- ment et sans accident, une mer assujettie qui semble aux galères, et ces grands ateliers droits où grincent les machines, le bruit continu des chaînes des forçats qui passent en rang et travaillent en silence, tout ce mécanisme sombre, impitoyable, forcé, cet entassement de défiances organisées, bien vite vous encombre l'âme d'ennui et lasée la vue. Elle se promène à satiété sur des pavés, sur des obus, sur les rochers dans lesquels le port est entaillé, sur des monceaux de fer, sur des madriers cerclés, sur des bassins à sec renfermant la carcasse nue des vaisseaux et toujours se heurte aux mu- railles grises du bagne, où un homme penché aux fenêtres éprouve le scellement de leurs bar- reaux en les faisant sonner avec un marteau.

Ici la nature est absente, proscrite, comme nulle part ailleurs sur la terre, c'en est la négation, la haine entêtée, et dans le levier de fer qui casse la roche, et dans le sabre du garde-chiourme qui chasse les galériens.

En dehors de l'arsenal et du bagne, ce ne sont encore que casernes, corps de garde, fortifications, fossés, uniformes, baïonnettes, sabres et tambours. Du matin au soir, la musique militaire retentit sous vos fenêtres, les soldats passent dans les rues, re- passent, vont, reviennent, manœuvrent ; toujours le clairon sonne et la troupe marche au pas.

Vous comprenez de suite que la vraie ville est l'arsenal, que l'autre ne vit que par lui, qu'il déborde sur elle. Sous toutes les formes, en tous lieux, à tous les coins, réapparaît l'administration, la discipline, la feuille de papier rayé, le cadre, la règle. On admire beaucoup la symétrie factice et la propreté imbécile. A l'hôpital de la marine, par exemple, les salles sont cirées de telle façon qu'un convalescent, essayant de marcher sur sa jambe remise, doit se casser l'autre en tombant. Mais c'est beau, ça brille, on s'y mire. Entre chaque salle est une cour, mais où le soleil ne vient jamais et dont soigneusement on arrache l'herbe. Les cuisines sont superbes, mais à une telle distance, qu'en hiver tout doit parvenir glacé aux malades. Il s'agit bien d'eux ! les casseroles ne sont-elles pas luisantes ? Nous vîmes un homme qui s'était cassé le crâne en tombant d'une frégate et qui depuis dix-huit heures n'avait pas encore reçu de secours ; mais ses draps étaient très blancs, car la lingerie est fort bien tenue.

A l'hôpital du bagne j'ai été ému comme un enfant en voyant sur le lit d'un forçat une portée de petits chats qui jouaient sur ses genoux. Il leur faisait des boulettes de papier et ils couraient après sur la couverture en se retenant aux bords avec leurs griffes pointues. Puis il les retournait sur le dos, les caressait, les embrassait, les mettait dans sa chemise. Renvoyé au travail, plus d'une fois, sans doute, sur son banc, quand il sera bien triste et bien las, il rêvera à ces heures tranquilles qu'il passait, seul avec eux, à sentir dans ses mains rudes la douceur de leur duvet et leurs petits corps chauds se tapir sur son cœur.

J'aime à croire cependant que le règlement interdit ces récréations et que c'était, sans doute, une charité de la religieuse.

Au reste, pas plus là qu'ailleurs, la règle n'est sans exception, outre que d'abord la distinction des rangs ne s'efface pas, quoi qu'on dise (l'égalité étant un mensonge, même au bagne). Car du bonnet numéroté sort parfois quelque chevelure finement parfumée, comme sur le bord de la chemise rouge se relève souvent un bout de man-

16 chette entourant une main blanche. Il y a de plus des faveurs spéciales pour certaines professions, pour certains hommes. Comment ont-ils pu, malgré la loi et la jalousie de leurs camarades, conquérir cette position excentrique qui en fait presque des galériens amateurs et qu'ils gardent cependant comme un fait acquis, sans que personne la leur dispute ? A l'entrée du chantier où l'on construit des canots, vous trouvez une table de dentiste munie de tous les ustensiles de la profession. Sur la muraille, dans un joli cadre vitré, s'alignent des râteliers entrebâillés auprès desquels l'artiste, debout, vous fait sa petite réclame, quand vous passez. Il reste là, toute la journée, dans son établissement, occupé à polir ses outils et à enfiler ses chapelets de molaïres. Il y peut, loin de tout gardien, causer à l'aise avec les promeneurs, apprendre des nouvelles du monde médical, exercer son industrie comme un homme patenté. A l'heure qu'il est, il doit éthériser. Un peu plus, il aurait des élèves et ferait des cours. Mais l'homme le mieux posé est le curé Lacolonge. Médiateur entre la chiourme et le banc, le pouvoir s'en sert pour agir sur les galériens qui, de leur côté, s'adressent à lui pour obtenir des grâces. Il habite à part, dans une petite chambre fort propre, a un domestique pour le servir, mange de grands saladiers de fraises de Plougastel, prend son café et lit les journaux.

Messieurs les ecclésiastiques d'ailleurs jouissent d'égards tout particuliers ; ils se réunissent, ont entre eux des conférences religieuses, servent la messe, confessent, feraient communier avec plaisir ; c'est un petit séminaire, une aumônerie, il ne manque que le costume pour que l'illusion soit complète.

Si Lacolonge est la tête du bagne, c'est Ambroise qui en est le bras.

Ambroise est un magnifique nègre de près de six pieds de haut et qui eût fait, au xvi<sup>e</sup> siècle, un admirable bravo pour un homme de qualité. Héliogabale devait nourrir chez lui quelque drôle de cette façon, pour s'amuser, en soupant, à le voir étouffer à bras le corps un lion de Numidie, ou assommer à coups de poing les gladiateurs. Il a une peau luisante d'un noir uni, avec un reflet bleu d'acier, une taille mince, vigoureuse comme celle d'un tigre, et des dents si blanches qu'elles en font presque peur.

Roi du bagne de par le droit du muscle, on le redoute, on l'admire ; sa réputation d'hercule lui fait un devoir d'essayer les arrivants, et jusqu'à présent ces épreuves ont toutes tourné à sa gloire. Il ploie des barres de fer sur son genou, lève trois hommes au bout du poing, en renverse huit en écartant les bras, et quotidiennement mange triple portion, car il a un appétit démesuré, des appétits de toute nature, une constitution héroïque. Son mignon est un jeune arabe dont il est jaloux à la fureur et qui lui reste fidèle dans la crainte de mourir.

Nous le vîmes au jardin botanique en train d'ar-

\6. roser les plantes. On le trouve par là, dans sa serre chaude, derrière les aloès et les palmiers nains, occupé à remuer le terreau des couches, ou à nettoyer les châssis. Les jeudis, jour d'entrées publiques, Ambroise y reçoit ses maîtresses derrière les caisses d'oranger, et il en a plusieurs, plus qu'il n'en veut. Il sait, en effet, s'en procurer, soit par ses séductions, soit par sa force ou par son argent dont il porte habituellement quantité sur lui et qu'il jette royalement dès qu'il s'agit de réjouir sa peau noire. Aussi est-il fort couru d'une certaine classe de dames, et peut-être que les gens qui l'ont mis là n'ont jamais été si fort aimés.

Au milieu du jardin, dans un bassin d'eau claire, couvert de plantes sur les bords qu'ombrage un saule pleureur, il y a un cygne. Il s'y promène, d'un coup de patte le traverse en entier, en fait cent fois le tour et ne songe plus à en sortir. Pour passer le temps, il s'amuse à gober les poissons rouges.

Plus loin, le long du mur, on a bâti quelques cages pour recevoir les animaux rares venus d'outre-mer, destinés au Muséum de Paris. Elles étaient vides la plupart. Devant l'une d'elles, dans une étroite cour grillée, un forçat chaussé de bottes fines instruisait un petit chat-tigre et lui apprenait comme à un chien à obéir à la parole. Il n'a donc pas assez de la servitude, celui-là ? Il la déverse sur un autre. Les coups de gourdin dont on le menace, il les donne au chat-tigre qui, un beau jour, sans doute, s'en vengera en sautant par-dessus son grillage et en allant étrangler le cygne.

Un soir que la lune brillait sur les pavés, et que les bons bourgeois de Brest dormaient dans les bras de leurs épouses ou de leurs servantes, nous nous mimes en devoir d'aller nous promener dans les rues dites infâmes. Elles sont nombreuses. La troupe de ligne, la marine, l'artillerie ont chacune la leur, sans compter le bain qui, à lui seul, a tout un quartier de la ville. Sept ruelles parallèles, aboutissant derrière ses murs, composent ce qu'on appelle Kervel qui n'est rempli que par les maîtresses des gardes-chiourme et des forçats. Ce sont de vieilles maisons de bois tassées l'une sur l'autre, ayant toutes leurs portes fermées, leurs fenêtres bien closes, leurs auvents bouchés. On n'y entend rien, on n'y voit personne ; pas une lumière aux lucarnes ; au fond de chaque ruelle, seulement un réverbère que le vent balance, fait osciller sur le pavé ses longs rayons jaunes. Le reste n'en est que plus noir. Au clair de lune, ces maisons muettes, à toits inégaux, projetaient des silhouettes étranges.

Quands'ouvrent-elles ? A des heures inconnues, au moment le plus silencieux des nuits les plus sombres. Alors y entre le garde-chiourme qui s'esquive de son poste, ou le forçat qui s'échappe de son ban, souvent tous deux de compagnie, s'aidant, se protégeant ; puis, quand le jour re- vient, le forçat escalade le mur, le garde-chiourme détourne la tête et personne n'a rien vu. Dans le quartier des matelots, au contraire, tout se montre et s'étale. Il flambe, il grouille. Les joyeuses maisons vous jettent, quand vous passez, leur bourdonnement et leur lumière. On crie, on danse, on se dispute, on s'amuse. Dans de grandes salles basses du rez-de-chaussée, des femmes en camisole de nuit sont assises sur des bancs, le long de la muraille blanchie où un quinquet est accroché ; d'autres, sur le seuil des portes, vous appellent, et leurs têtes animées se détachent sur le fond du bouge éclairé où retentit le choc des verres avec les grosses caresses des hommes du peuple. Vous entendez sonner les baisers sur des épaules charnues, et rire de plaisir, au bras de quelque matelot bruni qui la tient sur ses genoux, la bonne fille rousse dont la gorge débraillée s'en va de sa chemise, comme sa chevelure de son bonnet. Ceux qui sont dehors viennent regarder à travers les carreaux ou causent doucement avec quelque égrillarde à moitié nue qui se penche sur leur visage. Les groupes stationnent ; ils attendent. Cela se fait sans façon et comme l'envie vous y pousse. En voyageurs consciencieux et qui veulent étudier les choses de près, nous entrâmes... Mais ça se fait et ça ne se dit pas ! Mais c'est inconvenant ! Voici un livre dégoûtant ! Comment ? Aller chez les filles et l'écrire encore ! Où en sommes-nous ? Quelle révoltante littérature ! L'im- pudence ne va pas plus loin. C'est d'un cynisme, d'une immoralité ! Comment ne pas rougir...

Nous entrâmes dans l'un de ces établissements que la Providence a placés dans les villes comme de fétides mais utiles égouts, ainsi que disent les économistes. Il n'était ni des derniers, encore moins des premiers.

Dans un salon tendu de papier rouge, trois ou quatre demoiselles étaient assises autour d'une table ronde, et un amateur en casquette, qui fumait sa pipe sur le sofa, nous salua poliment quand nous entrâmes. Elles avaient des tenues modestes et des robes parisiennes.

Les meubles d'acajou étaient couverts d'utrecht rouge, le pavé ciré et les murs ornés des batailles de l'Empire. O vertu, tu es belle, car le vice est bien bête !

Ayant près de moi une femme dont les mains auraient suffi pour abattre le satyriasis le plus robuste et ne sachant donc que faire, nous payâmes à boire à la compagnie.

Or j'allumai un cigare, m'étendis dans un coin et là, fort triste et la mort dans l'âme, pendant que la voix éraillée des femelles glapissait et que les petits verres se vidaient, je me disais :

— Où est-elle ? Où est-elle ? Est-ce qu'elle est morte au monde, et les hommes ne la reverront-ils plus ?

Elle était belle, jadis, au bord des promontoires, montant le péristyle des Temples, quand sur ses pieds roses traînait la frange d'or de sa tunique blanche, ou lorsque, assise sur des coussins persiques, elle devisait avec les sages en tournant dans ses doigts son collier de camées. Elle était belle, debout, nue sur le seuil de sa cella dans sa rue de Suburre, sous la torche de résine qui pétillait dans la nuit, quand elle chantait lentement sa complainte campanienne et qu'on entendait sur le Tibre de longs refrains d'orgie.

Elle était belle aussi dans sa vieille maison de la Cité, derrière son vitrage de plomb, entre les étudiants tapageurs et les moines débauchés, quand, sans peur des sergents, on frappait fort sur les tables de chêne les grands pots d'étain, et que les lits vermoulus se cassaient sous le poids des corps.

Elle était belle, accoudée sur un tapis vert et guignant l'or des provinciaux, avec ses hauts talons, sa taille de guêpe, sa perruque à frimas dont la poudre odorante lui tombait sur les épaules, avec une rose de côté, avec une mouche sur la joue.

Elle était belle encore parmi les peaux de bique des cosaques et les uniformes anglais, se poussant dans la foule des hommes et faisant luire sa poitrine sur la marche des maisons de jeu, sous l'étal des orfèvres, à la lueur des cafés, entre la faim et l'argent.

Que pleurez-vous ? Est-ce la monarchie ? sont-ce les croyances, est-ce la noblesse ou le prêtre ? Moi, je regrette la fille de joie.

...Sur le boulevard, un soir encore, je l'ai vue passer, aux feux du gaz, alerte, muette, lançant ses yeux, et glissant sur le trottoir sa semelle traînante. J'ai vu sa figure pâle aux coins des rues et la pluie tomber sur les fleurs de sa chevelure, quand sa voix douce appelait les hommes et que sa chair grelottait sur le bord du satin noir.

Ce fut son dernier jour ; le lendemain elle ne reparut plus.

Ne craignez point qu'elle revienne, car elle est morte maintenant, bien morte ! Sa robe est haute, elle a des mœurs, elle s'effarouche des mots grossiers et met à la Caisse d'épargne les sous qu'elle gagne.

La rue balayée de sa présence a perdu la seule poésie qui lui restât encore ; on a filtré le ruisseau, tamisé l'ordure.

Voilà ce que je me disais sur le sofa de ces dames tout en mâchant mon cigare éteint. Je n'y fis pas autre chose, et en nous en retournant nous déplorions dans nos âmes le type perdu dont la plate caricature nous avait glacés d'ennui.

Autrefois, lorsqu'on se promenait, on avait chance aussi de rencontrer des ours, des bateleurs, des tambours de basque, des singes habillés de rouge, dansant sur le dos d'un dromadaire, mais tout cela est également parti, est également chassé, proscrit sans retour ; la guillotine est hors barrière et fonctionne en cachette, les forçats vont en voiture fermée et les processions sont défendues !

Dans quelque temps, les saltimbanques aussi auront disparu, pour faire place aux séances magnétiques et aux banquets réformistes, et la danseuse de corde bondissant dans l'air, avec sa robe pailletée et son grand balancier, sera aussi loin de nous que la bayadère du Gange.

De tout ce beau monde coloré, bruissant comme la fantaisie même, si mélancolique et si sonore, si amer et si folâtre, plein de pathétique intime et d'ironies éclatantes, où la misère était chaude, où la grâce était triste, dernier cri d'un âge perdu, race lointaine qu'on disait venue de l'autre bout de la terre, et qui nous apportait dans le bruit de ses grelots comme la vague souvenance et l'écho mourant des joies idolâtrées, quelque fourgon qui s'en va sur la grande route, ayant des toiles roulées sous son toit et des chiens crottés sous sa caisse, un homme en veste jaune escamo- tant la muscade dans des gobelets de fer-blanc, les pauvres marionnettes des Champs-Élysées et les joueurs de guitare des cabarets hors barrière, voilà tout ce qui en reste.

Il est vrai qu'il nous est survenu en revanche beaucoup de facéties d'un comique plus relevé. Mais le nouveau grotesque vaut-il l'ancien ?

Est-ce que vous préférez Tom-Pouce ou le musée de Versailles ?

Sur une estrade de bois qui faisait le balcon d'une tente carrée de toile grise, un homme en blouse jouait du tambour ; derrière lui se dressait une large pancarte peinte représentant un mou- ton, une vache, des dames, des messieurs et des militaires. C'étaient les deux, jeunes phénomènes de Guérande, porteurs d'un bras, quatre épaules. Leur même montreur ou éditeur criait à se lancer les poumons par la bouche et annonçait, outre ces deux belles choses, des combats d'animaux féroces qui allaient commencer à l'heure même. Sous l'estrade on voyait un âne ; trois ours roupil- laient à côté, et des aboiements de chiens, partant de l'intérieur de la baraque, se mêlaient au bruit sourd du tambour, aux cris saccadés du proprié- taire des jeunes phénomènes et à ceux d'un autre drôle, non pas trapu, carré, jovial et gaillard comme lui, mais grand et maigre, de figure si- nistre et vêtu d'une plaude en lambeaux : c'est son associé ; ils se sont rencontrés en route et ont uni leurs commerces. L'un a apporté les ours, l'âne et les chiens ; l'autre les deux phénomènes et un chapeau de feutre gris qui sert dans les re- présentations.

Le théâtre, à découvert sous le ciel, a pour mu- raille la toile grise qui frissonne au vent et s'en irait sans les pieux qui la retiennent. Une balus- trade contenant les spectateurs règne le long des côtés de l'arène où, dans un coin à part, grigno- tant une botte de foin déliée, nous reconnaissons en effet les deux jeunes phénomènes recouverts de leur housse magnifique. Au milieu est fiché en terre un long poteau et, de place en place, à d'autres morceaux de bois plus petits, des chiens sont atta- chés avec des ficelles, s'y démènent et tirent dessus en aboyant. Le tambour bat toujours, on crie sur l'estrade, les ours grognent, la foule arrive.

On commença par amener un pauvre ours aux trois quarts paralytique et qui semblait considéra- blement ennuyé. Muselé, il avait de plus autour du cou un collier d'où pendait une chaîne de fer, un cordon passé dans les narines pour le faire docilement manœuvrer, et sur la tête une sorte de capuchon de cuir qui lui protégeait les oreilles. On l'attacha au mât du milieu ; alors ce fut un redoublement d'aboiements aigus, enroués, fu- rieux. Les chiens se dressaient, se hérissaient, grattaient la terre, la croupe en haut, la gueule basse, les pattes écartées et, dans un angle, vis- à-vis l'un de l'autre, les deux maîtres hurlaient pour les mieux exciter. On lâcha d'abord trois dogues ; ils se ruèrent sur l'ours qui commença à tourner autour du poteau et les chiens couraient après, se bousculant, gueulant, tantôt renversés, à demi écrasés sous ses pattes, puis se relevant aussitôt et bondissant se suspendre à sa tête qu'il secouait en vain sans pouvoir se débarrasser de cette couronne de corps endiables qui s'y tor- daient et le mordaient. L'œil fixé sur eux, les deux maîtres guettaient le moment précis où l'ours allait être étranglé ; alors ils se précipitaient dessus, les en arrachaient, les tiraient par le cou, et pour leur faire lâcher prise leur mordaient la queue. Ils geignaient de douleur, mais ne cédaient pas. L'ours se débattait sous les chiens, les chiens mordaient l'ours, les hommes mordaient les chiens. Un jeune bouledogue, entre autres, se distinguait par son acharnement ; cramponné par les crocs à l'échine de l'ours, on avait beau lui mâcher la queue, la lui plier en double, lui presser les testicules, lui déchirer les oreilles, il ne lâchait point, et l'on fut obligé d'aller chercher un louchet pour lui desserrer les dents de force. Quand tout était séparé, chacun se reposait, l'ours se couchait, les chiens haletaient, la langue pendante ; les hommes, en sueur, se retiraient d'entre les dents les brins de poil qui y étaient restés, et la poussière soulevée par la mêlée s'éparpillait dans l'air et retombait à l'entour sur les têtes du public.

On amena successivement deux autres ours dont l'un imitait le jardinier, allait à la chasse, valsait, mettait un chapeau, saluait la compagnie et faisait le mort. Après lui vint le tour de l'âne. Il se défendit bien ; ses ruades lançaient au loin les chiens comme des ballons ; serrant la queue, baissant les oreilles, allongeant le museau, il courait vite et tâchait toujours de les ramener sous ses pieds de devant, pendant qu'ils tournaient autour de lui et lui sautaient sous la mâchoire. On le retira néanmoins fort essoufflé, grelottant de peur et couvert de gouttes de sang qui coulaient le long de ses jambes rendues galeuses par les cicatrices de ses blessures, et mouillaient avec la sueur la corne usée de ses sabots.

Mais le plus beau fut le combat général des chiens entre eux ; tous y étaient, grands, petits, chiens-loups, bouledogues, les noirs, les blancs, les tachetés et les roux. Un bon quart d'heure se passa préalablement à les animer l'un contre l'autre. Les maîtres, les tenant dans leurs jambes, leur tournaient la tête vers leurs adversaires et la leur hocquesonnaient avec violence. L'homme maigre surtout travaillait de tout cœur ; il tirait de sa poitrine, par une secousse brutale, un jet de voix rauque, éraillée, féroce, qui inspirait la colère à toute la bande irritée. Aussi sérieux qu'un chef d'orchestre à son pupitre, il absorbait en lui cette harmonie discordante, la dirigeait, la renforçait ; mais quand les dogues étaient déchaînés, et qu'ils s'entredéchiraient tous en hurlant, l'enthousiasme le prenait, il se délectait, ne se reconnaissait plus, il aboyait, applaudissait, se tordait, battait du pied, faisait le geste d'un chien qui attaque, se lançait le corps en avant comme eux, secouait la tête comme eux ; il aurait voulu mordre aussi, qu'on le mordît, être chien, avoir une gueule pour se rouler là dedans, au milieu de la poussière, des cris et du sang ; pour sentir les crocs dans les peaux velues, dans de la chair chaude, pour nager en plein dans ce tourbillon, pour s'y débattre de tout son cœur.

Il y eut un moment critique, quand tous les chiens l'un sur l'autre, tas grouillant de pattes, de reins, de queues et d'oreilles, qui oscillait dans l'arène sans se désunir, allèrent donner contre la balustrade, la cassèrent et menacèrent d'endommager dans leur coin les deux jeunes phénomènes. Leur maître pâlit, fit un bond, et l'associé accourut. C'est là qu'on mordit bien vite les queues, qu'on donna des coups de poing, des coups de pied, qu'on se dépêchait, qu'on allait. Les chiens empoignés n'importe par où, tirés du groupe et jetés par-dessus l'épaule, passaient dans l'air comme des bottes de foin qu'on engrange. Ce fut un éclair ; mais j'ai vu l'instant où les deux jeunes phénomènes allaient être ravalés à l'état de biftecks, et j'ai tremblé pour le bras qu'ils portent sur le dos.

Emus de cette algarade, sans doute, ils firent des façons pour se laisser voir. La vache reculait, le mouton donnait des coups de cornes ; enfin, on releva leurs housses vertes à franges jaunes ; leur appendice fut exhibé, et ainsi se termina la représentation.

(*Ce genre de littérature (aussi littéraire que beaucoup d'autres, après tout) est fort goûté à Brest. La seconde fois que nous y retournâmes, un bourgeois de la ville avait amené son chien pour combattre, et un artilleur se disposait à lutter contre les trois ours. Malheureusement il passa par là un sergent qui le fit rentrer à la caserne, le public fut indigné et nous aussi.

Que voir ensuite à Brest et qu'y a-t-il ? Des maisons fort bêtes, un théâtre où l'on ne joue pas (et si l'on jouait !), des églises déplorables, une place d'armes carrée, puis une promenade, fort belle il est vrai, ayant vue sur la mer et plantée de grands arbres, où se réunit le soir la bonne société de l'endroit. De l'autre côté du port se trouve l'ancien quartier de Recouvrance. On

La campagne qui entoure Brest n'a pas la sauvergie silencieuse des environs de Crozon et de Lan-devennec, mais les arbres sont plus nombreux, plus verts, presque noirs. Jusqu'au Conquet, la route, comme nageant dans la verdure, monte et descend, tourne au flanc des collines, coupe des prairies ; on file entre de grands genêts.

Ne vous arrêtez pas à Lockrist pour voir le tombeau de Michel Nobletz, car l'église est détestable, le tombeau stupide et Michel Nobletz ressemble à saint Vincent de Paul qui n'était pas un bel homme. Le Conquet lui-même, grand bourg paisible dont les habitants semblent partis, ne vaudrait pas la peine de s'être dérangé pour le voir s'il n'y avait non loin l'abbaye démantelée de Saint-Mathieu. A découvert sous le ciel, la nef déserte reçoit la pluie et à la place des dalles, entre les colonnes où s'enroulent aux chapiteaux des torses historiés, une herbe épaisse a poussé, les murailles nues ont une couleur de suie et de bronze, dont les tons tranchants se fondent l'un dans l'autre et qui capricieusement s'allongent sur la pierre comme les lambeaux inégaux d'une draperie déchirée. A d'autres places, de fines tramées d'herbes descendant de toute la hauteur de l'égïse semblent couler comme de grandes larmes.

Le vent de la mer, dont les vagues battent la base de l'édifice, entre par l'ogive des fenêtres sans vitrail où les courlis perchent sur le bord.

Elle n'a qu'un bas côté, et de l'autre de ses flancs, deux contre-nefs plus basses ; les piliers carrés et les colonnes rondes s'alternent, la maîtresse voûte s'appuyait sur des faisceaux de colonnettes. Près du phare qu'on a bâti là, dans une cour fermée d'une claire-voie, il y a des choux, du chanvre et des poireaux.

Au phare de Brest. — Ici se termine l'ancien monde ; voilà son point le plus avancé, « sa limite extrême ». Derrière vous est toute l'Europe, toute l'Asie ; devant vous c'est la mer et toute la mer. Si grands qu'à nos yeux soient les espaces, ne sont-ils pas bornés toujours, dès que nous leur savons une limite ? Ne voyez-vous pas de nos plages, par delà la Manche, les trottoirs de Brighton, et, des bastides de Provence, n'embrassez-vous pas la Méditerranée entière, comme un

'7 immense bassin d'azur dans une conque de rochers que cisèlent sur ses bords les promontoires couverts de marbres qui s'éboulent, les sables jaunes, les palmiers qui pendent, les sables, les golfes qui s'évasent ? Mais ici plus rien n'arrête. Rapide comme le vent, la pensée peut courir, et s'étalant, divaguant, se perdant, elle ne rencontre comme eux que des flots ; puis, au fond, il est vrai, tout au fond, là-bas, dans l'horizon des rêves, la vague Amérique, peut-être des îles sans nom, quelque pays à fruits rouges, à colibris et à sauvages, ou le crépuscule muet des pôles, avec le jet d'eau des baleines qui soufflent, ou les grandes villes éclairées en verres de couleur, le Japon aux toits de porcelaine, la Chine avec les escaliers à jour, dans des pagodes à clochettes d'or.

C'est ainsi que l'esprit, pour rétrécir cet infini dont il se lasse sans cesse, le peuple et l'anime. On ne songe pas au désert sans les caravanes, à l'Océan sans les vaisseaux, au sein de la terre sans les trésors qu'on lui suppose.

Nous nous en revînmes au Conquet par la falaise. Les vagues bondissaient à sa base, accourant du large ; elles se heurtaient contre, et couvraient ensuite de leurs nappes oscillantes les grands blocs immobiles. Une demi-heure après, emportés dans notre char à bancs par deux petits chevaux presque sauvages, nous regagnions Brest, d'où le surlendemain nous partîmes avec beaucoup de plaisir.

En s'écartant du littoral et en remontant vers la Manche, la contrée change d'aspect, elle devient moins rude, moins celtique, les dolmens se font plus rares, la lande diminue à mesure que les blés s'étendent, et peu à peu l'on entre ainsi dans ce fertile et plat pays de Léon, qui est, comme l'a si aimablement dit M. Pitre-Chevalier, "l'Attique de la Bretagne".

Landerneau est un pays où il y a une promenade d'ormes au bord de la rivière et où nous vîmes courir dans les rues un chien effrayé qui tramait à sa queue une casserole attachée.

Pour aller au château de la Joyeuse-Garde, il faut d'abord suivre la rive de l'Elorn, et ensuite marcher longtemps dans un bois par un chemin creux où personne ne passe. Quelquefois le taillis s'éclaircit, alors à travers les branches, la prairie paraît ou bien la voile de quelque navire qui remonte la rivière. Notre guide marchait devant nous, loin, écarté. Seuls ensemble, nous foulions ce bon sol des bois où les bouquets violets des bruyères poussent dans le gazon tendre, parmi les feuilles tombées. On sentait les fraises, la framboise et la violette ; sur le tronc des arbres, les longues fougères étendaient leurs palmes grêles. Il faisait lourd ; la mousse était tiède. Caché sous la feuillée, le coucou poussait son cri prolongé ; dans les clairières, des moucheron bourdonnaient en tournoyant leurs ailes.

Tranquilles d'âme et balancés par la marche, épanchant à l'aise nos fantaisies causeuses qui s'en allaient comme des fleuves par de larges embouchures, nous devisions des sons, des mots, des couleurs ; nous parlions des martres, de leurs œuvres, des joies de l'idée ; nous songions à des tournures de style, à des coins de tableau, à des airs de tête, à des façons de draperie ; nous nous redonnions quelques grands vers énormes, beauté incon nue pour les autres qui nous délectait sans fin, et nous en répétions le rythme, nous en creusions les mots, le cadencant si fort qu'il en était chanté. Puis, c'étaient les lointains paysages qui se déroulaient, quelque splendide figure qui venait, des saisissements d'amour pour un clair de lune d'Asie se mirant sur des coupes, des attendrissements d'admiration à propos d'un mot, ou la dégustation naïve de quelque phrase en relief trouvée dans un vieux livre.

Et couchés dans la cour de Joyeuse-Garde, près du souterrain comblé, sous le plein cintre de son arcade unique que revêtent les lierres, nous causions de Shakespeare et nous nous demandions s'il y avait des habitants dans les étoiles.

Puis nous partîmes, n'ayant guère donné qu'un coup d'œil à la demeure ruinée du bon Lancelot, celui qu'une fée enleva à sa mère et qu'elle nourrit au fond d'un lac dans un palais de pierreries. Les nains enchanteurs ont disparu, le pont-Ievis s'est envolé et le lézard se traîne où se promenait jadis la belle Geneviève songeant à son amant parti en Trébizonde combattre les géants.

Nous revînmes dans la forêt par les mêmes sentiers ; les ombres s'allongeaient, les broussailles et les fleurs ne se distinguaient plus, et les montagnes basses d'en face grandissaient leurs sommets bleuâtres dans le ciel qui blanchissait. La rivière, contenue jusqu'à une demi-lieue en deçà de la ville dans des rives factices, s'en va ensuite comme elle veut et déborde librement dans la prairie qu'elle traverse ; sa longue courbure s'étalait au loin, et les flaques d'eau que colorait le soleil couchant avaient l'air de grands plats d'or oubliés sur l'herbe.

Jusqu'à la Roche-Maurice, l'Elorn serpente à côté de la route qui contourne la base des collines rocheuses dont les mamelons inégaux s'avancent dans la vallée. Nous la parcourions au petit trot dans un cabriolet paisible qu'un enfant conduisait, assis dans le brancard. Son chapeau, sans cordons, s'envolait au vent, et dans les stations qu'il fallait faire pour descendre le ramasser, nous avions tout le loisir d'admirer le paysage.

Le château de la Roche-Maurice était un vrai château de burgrave, un nid de vautour au sommet d'un mont. On y monte par une pente presque à pic, le long de laquelle, de place en place, des blocs de maçonnerie éboulés servent de marches. Tout en haut, par un pan de mur fait de quartiers plats posés l'un sur l'autre et où tiennent encore de larges arcs de fenêtres, on voit la campagne : des bois, des champs, la rivière qui coule vers la mer, le ruban blanc de la route qui s'allonge, les montagnes dentelant leurs crêtes inégales, et la grande prairie qui les sépare en se répandant au milieu.

Un fragment d'escalier mène encore à une tour démantelée. Ça et là les pierres sortent d'entre les herbes, et la roche se montre entre les pierres. Il semble, parfois, qu'elle a d'elle-même des formes artificielles, et que la ruine, au contraire, plus elle s'écroule, revêt des apparences naturelles et rentre dans la nature.

D'en bas, sur un grand morceau de muraille, monte un lierre ; mince à sa racine, il va s'élargissant en pyramide renversée et, à mesure qu'il s'élève, assombrit sa couleur verte qui est claire à la base et noire au sommet. A travers une ouverture dont les bords se cachaient sous le feuillage, le bleu du ciel passait.

C'était dans ces parages que vivait le fameux dragon tué jadis par le chevalier Derrien qui s'en revenait de la Terre Sainte. Il se mit à l'attaquer dès qu'il eut, il est vrai, retiré de l'eau l'infortuné Elorn qui, après avoir livré successivement ses esclaves, ses vassaux, ses serviteurs (il ne lui restait plus que sa femme et son fils), venait de se jeter lui-même du haut de sa tour, la tête en bas, dans la rivière ; mais le monstre, mortellement blessé et lié par l'écharpe de son vainqueur, alla bientôt, sur son ordre, se noyer dans la mer, à Poulbeun-zualu', ainsi que l'avait été, sur le commandement de saint Pol de Léon, le crocodile de l'île de

W Par contraction de Poulbeuzanneval : marais où fut noyée la bête. ( Note du manuscrit de Gustave Flaubert. ) Batz, lié par l'étole du saint breton, comme le fut plus tard la gargouille de Rouen par celle de saint Romain.

Qu'ils étaient beaux vraiment ces vieux dragons horribles, endentés jusqu'au fond de la gueule, vomissant des flammes, couverts d'écaillés, avec une queue de serpent, des ailes de chauve-souris, des griffes de lion, un corps de cheval, une tête de coq, et retirant au basilic ! Et le chevalier aussi qui les combattait était un rude sire ! Son cheval, d'abord, se cabrait et avait peur, sa lance se brisait en morceaux contre les écailles de la bête, et la fumée de ses naseaux l'aveuglait. Il mettait enfin pied à terre, et après tout un grand jour, l'atteignait sous le ventre d'un coup d'épée, laquelle restait enfoncée jusqu'à la garde. Un sang noir sortait à gros bouillons, puis le peuple reconduisait triomphalement le chevalier qui devenait ensuite roi du pays, et épousait une belle dame.

Mais eux, d'où venaient-ils ? Qui les a faits ? Était-ce le confus souvenir des monstres d'avant le déluge ? Est-ce sur la carcasse des ichtyosaures et des ptéropodes qu'ils furent rêvés jadis, et que l'épouvante des hommes a entendu dans les grands roseaux marcher le bruit de leurs pieds, et leur voix mugir quand le vent s'engouffrait dans les cavernes ? Ne sommes-nous pas d'ailleurs dans le pays des chevaliers de la Table ronde, la contrée des fées, la patrie de Merlin, le berceau mythologique des épopées disparues. Sans doute qu'elles révélaient ces vieux mondes devenus fantastiques, qu'elles nous disaient quelque chose des villes englouties, Ys, Herbadilla, lieux splendides et féroces, pleins des amours des reines enchanteresses, et qu'ont doublement effacés à tout jamais la mer qui a passé dessus avec la religion qui en a maudit la mémoire.

Il y aurait là beaucoup à dire. Sur quoi, en effet, n'y-a-t-il pas à dire ? Si ce n'est sur Landivisiau toutefois, l'homme le plus prolix étant forcé d'être concis quand la matière lui manque.

Je remarque que les bons pays sont généralement les plus laids, ils ressemblent aux femmes vertueuses ; on les estime, mais on passe outre pour en trouver d'autres. Voici, certes, le coin le plus fertile de la Bretagne ; les paysans semblent moins pauvres, les champs mieux cultivés, les colzas magnifiques, les routes bien entretenues, et c'est ennuyeux à périr.

Des choux, des navets, beaucoup de betteraves et démesurément de pommes de terre, tous, régulièrement enclos dans des fossés, couvrent la campagne, depuis Saint-Pol-de-Léon jusqu'à Roscoff. On en expédie à Brest, à Rennes, jusqu'au Havre ; c'est l'industrie du pays ; il s'en fait un commerce considérable. Mais qu'est-ce que cela me fait à moi ? croyez-vous que ça m'amuse ?

A Roscoff on voit la mer, elle découvre devant les maisons sa grève vaseuse, se courbe ensuite dans un golfe étroit, et au large est toute tachetée d'îlots noirs, bombés comme des dos de tortue. La campagne des environs de Saint-Pol est d'une tristesse froide. La teinte morne des terres lentement onduleuses se fond sans transition dans la pâleur du ciel, et la courte perspective n'a pas de grandes lignes dans ses proportions ni de changement de couleur sur ses bords. Ça et là, en allant dans les champs, vous rencontrez, derrière un mur de pierres grises, quelque ferme silencieuse, manoir abandonné, où les martres ne viennent pas. Dans la cour, sur le fumier, les pourceaux dorment, les poules grignotent l'avoine, entre les dalles disjointes, sous le plein cintre de l'entrée dont l'écusson ciselé est rongé par le grand air. Dans les pièces vides qui servent de grenier, le plâtre des plafonds s'en va avec des restes de peintures ternies par la toile des araignées, que l'on voit courir sur les lambourdes. Le réséda sauvage a poussé sur la porte de Kersalion où se dresse encore, près de la tourelle, une fenêtre à pinacle flanquée d'un lion et d'un hercule sortant d'un mur comme des gargouilles. A Kerjean, dans le grand escalier tournant, j'ai heurté un piège à loup. Des socs de charrue, des fers de bêche rouilles, et des graines sèches dans des calebasses, gisent au hasard sur le parquet des chambres, ou encombre les grands sièges de pierre dans l'embrasement des fenêtres.

Kerouséré a conservé ses trois tourelles à mâchicoulis, et l'on reconnaît encore dans la cour le large sillon des douves qui, montant petit à petit, en gagne le niveau, ainsi que sur l'onde, le sillage d'une barque qui s'efface en s'étalant. De la plate-forme de l'une des tours (les autres ont des toits pointus) on découvre la mer au bout d'un champ, entre deux collines basses couvertes par des bois. Les fenêtres du premier étage, à moitié bouchées pour que la pluie n'entre pas, plongent sur un jardin clos de grands murs. Le chardon couvre le gazon, et dans les plates-bandes on a semé du blé qu'entourent des bordures de rosiers.

Entre un champ, où les têtes mûres des épis se courbaient ensemble, et un rideau d'ormeaux plantés sur le haut bord d'un fossé, un sentier mince s'allongeait parmi les broussailles. Les coquelicots éclataient dans les blés ; de la berge du haut bord, des fleurs et des ronces s'échappaient ; des orties, des églantiers, des tiges garnies de dards, des grosses feuilles à peau luisante, des mûres noires, des digitales pourprées, unissant leurs couleurs, enchevêtrant leurs branches, montraient leurs feuillages divers, lançaient leurs rameaux inégaux, et sur la poudre grise croisaient comme un filet toutes leurs ombres.

Quand on a traversé une prairie, où tourne, embarrassée dans les joncs, la roue d'un vieux moulin dont il faut longer la muraille en marchant sur de grosses pierres mises dans l'eau, pour servir de pont, on se retrouve bientôt sur la grande route de Saint-Pol, au fond de laquelle se dresse, tailladée sur tous ses angles, la flèche du clocher de Kreizker. Fine, élancée et s'appuyant sur une tour surmontée d'une balustrade, de loin elle fait le meilleur effet du monde, mais plus on en approche, plus elle se rapetisse et s'enlaidit, et l'on ne trouve enfin qu'une église comme toutes les églises, ayant même un porche vide d'où les statues sont parties. La cathédrale aussi est d'un gothique lourd, empâté d'ornements, chamarré de broderies ; mais il y a à Saint-Pol quelque chose de pire encore, c'est la table d'hôte de son auberge.

Elle était servie cependant par une avenante donzelle qui, avec ses boucles d'oreille sur un cou blanc, son bonnet à barbes retroussées comme les soubrettes de Molière, et ses vifs yeux bleus surtout, vous aurait bien donné envie de lui de- mander autre chose que des assiettes. Mais les convives ! Quels convives ! Tous habitués ! Le haut bout était tenu par un être revêtu d'une veste de velours et d'un gilet de cachemire. Il aimait à passer sa serviette dans les bouteilles entamées, pour les reconnaître. C'est lui qui sert la soupe. A sa gauche mangeait, le chapeau sur la tête, une espèce de monsieur en redingote gris clair ornée aux parements et au collet d'une laine noire fri- sottée en manière de fourrure, et qui est profes- seur de musique au collège de la ville. Mais la musique le fatigue, il en a assez, il désire trou- ver une place, n'importe laquelle, de huit cents à douze cents francs, pas davantage. Il tient peu à l'argent, plus à la considération ; c'est une position seulement qu'il désire. Comme il arrivait toujours le repas commencé, il se faisait remonter les plats, les renvoyait, puis éternuait fort, crachait loin, se dandinait sur sa chaise, chantonnait tout bas, se couchait sur la table et faisait claquer son cure- dents.

Toute la société le respecte, la servante l'admire parler et en est, je suis sûr, amoureuse. La bonne opinion qu'il a de lui-même sort de son sourire, de ses paroles, de son silence, de ses gestes, de sa coiffure et ruisselle comme une sueur sur toute sa sale personne.

En face de nous, un petit homme grisonnant, frisé, grassouillet et courtaud, à pattes rouges, à lèvres épaisses et salivantes, et dont la voix gla- pissait, tout en mâchant sa nourriture nous regar- dait d'une telle façon, que nous nous retenions beaucoup pour ne pas lui jeter les carafes par la tête. Quant au reste, il faisait galerie et contribuait à l'ensemble.

Un soir, l'entretien roula sur une dame des environs qui, ayant jadis décampé du domicile, s'était enfuie en Amérique avec son amant, et qui, la semaine précédente, traversant Saint-Pol pour entrer dans son pays, s'était arrêtée à l'auberge. On s'étonnait de cette audace et l'on accompa- gnait son nom de toutes sortes d'épithètes. On repassait sa vie entière, on riait de mépris, on l'in- juriait quoique absente, on s'animait tout rouge, on aurait voulu la tenir là "pour lui dire un peu son fait, pour voir ce qu'elle aurait répondu". Décla- mations contre le luxue et scandales vertueux, haine de la toilette et maximes morales, mots à double entente et haussements d'épaules, tout fut employé à l'envi pour accabler cette femme qui, à en juger au contraire par l'acharnement de ces rustres, devait être de manière élégante, de nature relevée, avoir des nerfs délicats et, sans doute, quelque jolie figure. Malgré nous le cœur nous battait de colère, et si nous eussions fait à Saint-Pol un dîner de plus, infailliblement il nous serait arrivé quelque aventure. X

Morlaix. — Canal, galerie en bois sous les maisons, perspective de maisons dans des rues étroites, toits, devanture, poutres, couleur noire, vêtements suspendus au rez-de-chaussée. — C'était le jour de marché ; singulière étoffe de vestes d'hommes, fond jaunâtre avec des traînées brunes, inégales, comme des taches de chocolat ; une autre espèce servant de pantalon, fond blanc avec des traînées bleues et café. — Moutard tirant le fusil avec une queue de billard. — Manufacture de tabacs ; les tas ressemblent à des tas de varechs ; chevelure du tabac* à priser ; machines stupides ; casiers du tabac à priser. On y deviendrait fou, tous les hommes qui y travaillent sont pâles.

Tout le pays d'ici paraît plus riche, aussi les costumes deviennent plus laids, les têtes ont moins de vigueur ; plus d'expression vigoureuse et intense comme à Quimperlé ou même à Quimper. (Morlaix, 4 juillet, 10 heures du matin.)

Huelgoat. — Sur une hauteur, dans un fond, entre des coteaux tout boisés, parmi des roches semblables à celles que l'on voit dans la forêt de Fontainebleau ; étang à droite en arrivant. — Une conversation que nous avons eue sur l'amour et sur le sens du mot « curiosité » ayant remué beaucoup de lie au fond du tonneau.....et puis' le soleil qui sèche la vase et fait sortir du fond les insectes qui y étaient cachés ! — Petit canal, promenade au bord. La berge du canal, escarpée, était couverte de ronces ; la digite pourprée y mirait ses fleurs dans l'eau, bois charmant, arbres menus et longs, pentes, jours sous les troncs ; l'eau qui faisait des coudes. — Trou de Re-ahès, profond d'environ 25 pieds, lieu assez sinistre en effet, longue satisfaction de cette nature calme et retraitée. Huelgoat est le trou où l'on vient vivre quand on est triste, et le chagrin s'y changerait en mélancolie. — Ce matin, la mine ; pas moyen de la voir ! La boue d'où on retire l'argent. Nous avons, la veille au soir et le matin même, démesurément parlé d'argent ! — A l'auberge de la Tour d'argent, gravures de la Tour de Nesle.

De Huelgoat à Cabhaix, à monter et à descendre sans cesse ; la route passe pendant 300 pas sous de grands arbres. Paysage grand, avec des lignes de terrain les unes sur les autres, noires et bleu foncé ; grande campagne. Avant d'arriver à Huelgoat, au contraire, il y a des aspects tout secs, une montagne dentelée aiguë à la crête ; la lande est sèche, couleur de vieille mousse séchée, ça fait penser à l'Espagne. Au haut de chaque montée, aujourd'hui, on découvrait un paysage nouveau, qui se rétrécissait et perdait ses seconds plans quand nous avions descendu la hauteur.

Carhaix. — Désert, triste, le plâtre s'en va des maisons, les bois s'en vont en poudre. L'hôtel de ville avec une sainte serait un vilain cabaret de la rue Mouffetard. — Dans une rue, une maison d'ardoises et de bois rouge, vigoureuse comme ton à cause de la mousse rousse et verte qui s'est accrochée sur les murs d'ardoises. — Statue de la Tour d'Auvergne de Marochetti : belle tête, jambes lourdes, sottie mine du fusil passé sur un bonnet à poil ; les bas-reliefs sont assez animés, mais lourds. Tout ça c'est de la sculpture lymphatique. — Cimetière : les boîtes contenant des têtes comme à Quiberon reparaissent « ci-gît le chef de..... » ; à Saint-Pol du reste il y en avait déjà quelques-unes ; une seule convenable, on ne pouvait voir de qui, tout entourée de chèvrefeuille ; tombes de trois notaires et une boîte contenant la tête d'un autre notaire. L'usage est de peindre des paysages funèbres sur le bois des croix, une pyramide, un mausolée, une colonne, un tombeau dans une campagne. Il y a une belle croix noire avec des boules d'or à ses trois bouts qui, au point d'intersection des bras, montre un tombeau chic : Sainte- Hélène, ombragé par un saule pleureur d'un pleurard échevelé ; la campagne est désolée ; au fond, des montagnes comme des vagues ; au second plan, des herbes alignées et au-dessus des nuages roses. » C'est du reste de règle, partout les nuages sont roses, la différence ne consiste que dans le plus ou moins vif de la couleur. Le brave homme est là avec son épouse "Priez pour leur repos" ; ils doivent ronfler fort et pourrir gras pour ne pas se réveiller là-dessous. Pauvre vieux notaire, va ! — Le cimetière est devant l'église : porte en bois sculpté ; le saint, dans l'église, est encore avec sa tête ! Immense bénitier, Saint Michel affreux, une vierge très tétonnière ; une autre grande couronne, jolie vraie figure de gravure de mode ; une statuette en bois, Madeleine esquimaude ; des cheveux énormes, chauds et bouffés, lui couvrent tout le corps jusqu'aux pieds comme un vêtement fait en poil d'animal ; c'est d'une vigousse et d'une bestialité inouïes, la femme a là-dessous la tiédeur animale des étables.

Affreuse bagnole de Carhaix à Guingamp. — Notre conducteur ; la femme veuve amie du conducteur ; noix et pain qu'ils mangeaient ensemble.....

Guingamp. — Il y avait eu un pardon : les saints sous le porche de l'église étaient tout couronnés de fleurs ; flambeaux, herbes et gazons, lierres ; leur tête noircie avait une animation bizarre. Au fond, la Vierge au visage hâlé, toute chamarrée d'une robe de satin blanc qui s'étale ; sur la place, des boutiques ; au fond, deux baraques de saltimbanques, l'une où l'on faisait des tours de force et d'équi-

18 tation, où l'on représentait les supplices de la persécution de 150, et l'autre qui était de danseurs de corde ; sur le devant, à gauche, les musiciens en militaires, figures toutes passives et obligées, et un paillasse en habit bleu à revers rouge qui jouait du tambour ; à droite, rangés, les acteurs : une femme de 40 ans, maigre, la mère ; une de 30, deux ou trois enfants et cambrée, debout, posée, la jambe en avant, en spencer de velours avec une robe blanche à paillette » d'or, une jeune fille de 14. ans, Mariette, cheveux noirs en deux tresses par derrière, front bas, sourcils noirs relevés, œil vigoureux, dardant ; grand avenir de femme moderne ; P... le père, médaille à la poitrine, redingote par-dessus son maillot, calotte sur la tête ; italien de Venise, il parlait, jouait du piston, du violon et faisait des tours de force : danses de corde, sauts sur des chevaux, exercices avec des anneaux. Cachucha, Mariette est revenue habillée en espagnole ; polka nationale, pantomime, Pierrot Mariette en homme : pantalon blanc, grand chapeau noir, petite veste, moustaches.

Saint-Brieuc. — Rien. — Tour de Cesson, crâne morceau, un monticule, dominant la mer ; on voit encore des fragments d'escaliers et des restes de fenêtres. — Descente presque à pic sur de l'herbe glissante, passage, sables, godfiches, route sur des coquilles au bord de la mer ; il était marée basse. — Nous sommes remontés. — Les blés venaient jusqu'au bord de la falaise.

Pleven. — Cris affreux d'un moutard dans un cabaret où nous avons été prendre de la bière. — Dans le cimetière, vieux tombeau d'un guerrier bardé et cuirassé ; la chevelure frisée a l'air sur le front d'un bouquet de roses et retombe aussi en deux boucles sur les épaules ; à ses pieds, le chien dont la tête est cassée. — Herbes hautes dans ce cimetière, on la fauchait, l'homme repassait sa faux et nous regardait. — Mine de notre guide.

Lamballe. — Eglise sur la hauteur ; éteinte par une ignoble peinture noire qui cache mille bons détails ; deux tombeaux curieux. — Haras ; effet de l'homme à côté des animaux ; rôle tout passif de la jument qui ne dit mot. « Plus une jument est en chaleur et moins elle bouge », nous disait le vieux palefrenier, c'est le contraire chez nous. Mais si l'homme est moins beau que le cheval, en revanche l'ensemble humain est supérieur ; la femme est plus colorée comme mouvement que la cavale. Mais quel outil ! champion. En le retirant, et lentement, avec un mouvement plein de mélancolie, l'étalon s'en barbouille les jambes. Cris presque féroces dans l'écurie en sentant les juments. Vestes rouges des garçons, l'agent comptable, les paysans, nous autres, c'était un tableau tout fait. Mais où n'y a-t-il pas de tableaux tout faits ? il s'agit de les voir.

Dinan. — Eglise Saint-Sauveur, portail, triple plein cintre ; les deux arcades de côté ont sur chaque angle du fond une colonne torsée ; dans chacune de ces arcades, deux statues mutilées méconnaissables, debout, avec de grands animaux, lions ou chiens sur lesquels leurs pieds s'appuient ; le couronnement d'une de ces statues (côté droit) représente un agneau portant une croix. — Chapiteaux des colonnes représentant divers sujets : une femme tourmentée par un crapaud et par un diable, le crapaud en bas lui monte le long des cuisses et lui mord le sein ; une cigogne buvant dans un vase ; un homme assis ayant au cou une chaîne d'où pend un boulet qui lui tombe entre les cuisses ; dévoré par deux diables qui ont des têtes de taureaux. — Au bas du pinacle, lion ailé et bœuf ailé. — Pinacle lourd, percé d'une énorme fenêtre ogivale d'un vilain effet. — Sur un chapiteau, un vieux bonhomme à longue barbe portant un bâton au bout duquel est suspendue une boule, un pot ? ; consultant une chimère. — Bénitier en granit de plus de 3 pieds de diamètre, deux poissons sculptés à l'in-térieur ; sur l'extérieur, deux hommes et deux femmes : deux le tiennent sur le ventre et deux autres à la renverse ; toutes les têtes sont parties, on distingue les sexes aux pieds ; les vêtements des femmes descendent jusqu'en

.8. bas, tandis qu'on voit les jambes des hommes ; peu d'eau dans le bénitier. — Un seul bas côté et d'un bon gothique. Le côté droit de la nef (le bas côté de la nef manque) est garni de fenêtres romanes à deux colonnes couronnées de volutes plates. On a percé ce côté-là d'une petite chapelle ogivale. — Nef d'une pureté remarquable, les colonnettes qui terminent la retombée des ogives de la voûte, au lieu à partir de la galerie de se continuer rondes se continuent carrées. — Plaque de marbre de Duguesclin appelée Du- gucaquin. — Dans une des chapelles latérales on a scellé dans le mur un petit tableau en pierre sculptée représentant un homme debout, grand (saint Christophe ?), barbu, chevelu, avec une robe et de longues manches, une ceinture large, judaïque, marchant sur les flots, flanqué de chaque côté de petits arbres (théologiques) sur des rochers ; en bas deux enfants montés l'un sur un lion, l'autre sur un animal à croupe de cheval et à tête de chien, mais de chien qui a des allures de crocodile dans la dentition.

— Sur un chapiteau de colonne romane, deux chameaux s'abouchent ; celui qui lui fait pendant (c'étaient deux colonnes à l'entrée), serpents et dragons enroulés.

Tours de la prison, mâchicoulis avec des trèfles et des carrés longs qui en terminent la base. — Vue toute boisée du haut de la tour. — Restes de remparts. — Rues en pente, maisons en bois à toits aigus, perspective fuyante.

— Hôtel de ville ; collection : cheveux de Napoléon, gibberne de La Tour d'Auvergne, clef de Louis XVI, cabinet de M. le Maire. — Abus de Duguesclin : statue, portrait grand et petit, nom du bateau à vapeur, d'une place, d'un café. — Portrait de Broussais en costume de l'Institut.

Corseul. — Bénitier pareil à celui de l'église Saint-Sauveur, mais plus petit. — La tour du haut. — Le cheval. — Revêtements de pierres alignées à la romaine ; construction à cône, mais l'intérieur de la maçonnerie ne me paraît pas romain.

Lehon. — Vieux château, monticule énorme à pente très rapide, toute couverte de hêtres ; à peine si on voit quelques fragments de maçonnerie saillissant de dessous l'herbe et les broussailles. — Chapelle des Beaumanoir ; grande fenêtre du fond par laquelle on voit une côte toute boisée ; caveau funéraire noir ; colonnette si verdie qu'elle ressemble à de beau bronze antique. Par une fenêtre géminée aiguë, à moitié brisée, jour vert, brutal, d'un livide flamboyant à cause des arbres et des feuilles, surtout à gauche, la lumière venait du coin droit. — Le cloître, sans toit, colonnes carrées ; au haut desquelles court de la vigne, une vache jaune ruminait sur l'herbe. — Réfectoire rempli de métiers ; fenêtres avec des châssis en plomb ; construction particulière dans le mur pour la chaire qui servait à faire la lecture pendant les repas. — Petites filles impudiques et impudentes au bas du château, « si vous ne savez pas que c'est pour avoir du pain ».

Au musée, quelques tombeaux des Beaumanoir ; mais comme les choses hors du lieu pour lequel elles ont été faites manquent d'effet ! Cheveux de Napoléon, giberne de La Tour d'Auvergne, clef de Louis XVI, portraits de Broussais et de Duguesclin en pied ; en haut déjà, dans une des pièces de l'hôtel de ville, il y a un petit portrait de Duguesclin, il y a la place de Duguesclin sur laquelle on voit la statue de Duguesclin, il y a un café Duguesclin, l'hôtel Duguesclin. Les villes où sont nés de grands hommes n'y voient pas, elles en font un abus déplorable, ou les laissent complètement dans l'oubli. — Effet du paysage du haut des remparts détruits, comme à la Roche-Bernard, par un pont que l'on construit. — La Rance si vantée n'est belle qu'à l'embouchure, qu'à la mer où s'élargissant tout à coup, on aperçoit et Saint-Servan et tous les rochers qui entourent Saint-Malo. Sur ses bords, petits rochers, mais l'ensemble n'est ni doux ni âpre ; sans caractère original.

Ce sommaire a été développé par Maxime Du Camp. XI

Saint-Malo. — Tout entouré de remparts, rues étroites, resserrées ; maisons hautes noires, on voit chez le voisin ; vie triste, violente et colorée ; caractère singulièrement énergique de tout cela. — La mer est d'une beauté inouïe. — Hôtel de France : au second étage, en dehors, est écrit : Ici est né Chateaubriand. — Ilot du Grand-Bey ; une seule pierre et croix de granit ; le monument est composé de trois morceaux. A droite, Saint-Malo et la maison où il est né ; à gauche, des îles ; en face, la mer. Herbe rare ; plus haut, casemate démantelée qui a l'air d'une mesure en ruines ; en bas, des rochers dans l'eau et le bruit des vagues qui s'y entrecroisent et s'y replient. La première fois que nous y (urnes, c'était le soir, le ciel était rose.

Saint-ServAn. — Quatre tours. — Fabrique de pipes, calme tout particulier de cet établissement. — Dans un cabaret, homme indigné contre les entrepreneurs des travaux. — Navigation pour revenir à Saint-Servan avec deux mate-lots : le père avait doublé le cap Horn, le fils le cap de Bonne-Espérance. — Bordées jusqu'à Dinard. — M. Bou-don, conversation sur Harel et Georges. Les bourgeois comprennent décidément peu la vie honnête ; suivre son instinct semble un crime dans l'état civilisé ; même lorsque l'instinct est généreux on en est puni par les lois souvent ; mais toujours par le mépris de ses concitoyens, et puis par la misère ; alors on rit de vous et on vous blâme et si vous êtes connu cela alimente la conversation des tables d'hôte ! — Lunettes bleues pour voir, plus dans sa couleur, le soleil se coucher. — “Mal du pays !” O Yvetot la Générale ; la Quiquengrogne : deux fières tours pareilles, intactes, dont le ventre s'évase un peu en fer à cheval ; du haut de la Générale on frémit en songeant à l'ascension de La Blissais et de ses compagnons. — Dans l'église de Saint-Malo, nulle du reste, un tableau, dédié à Notre-Dame des Victoires, représente, au fond dans les nuages, la bataille de Lépante et toute la chrétienté à genoux sur le premier plan.

CancAle. — Baie de Cancale, grande plage vaseuse. — Le village aligne sur le bord de la mer toutes les barques à sec dans des postures différentes ; filets qui sèchent. — Dans l'auberge où nous sommes descendus, chez une pauvre femme qui avait perdu tous ses enfants, un homme ivre est entré en chantant et en demandant à boire. « Vous savez que mon cœur est trop dans le deuil, on ne chante pas ici, allez-vous-en. » — Superbes images : La Demande en mariage, Le Mariage, Le Coucher de la mariée, Le Lever de la mariée. “Qu'il me tarde que tu partages ma demeure et ma couche — je te possède — viens — veux-tu connaître des fêtes plus aimables que celle où nos convives assistent pour nous plaire — l'hymen va te l'apprendre », etc. Le lever de la mariée : le mystère de Vénus est accompli ; provisions sur la table de nuit, pâté et bouteille de vin ; le jeune homme, en belle robe de chambre, confie sa joie à son père ; la fillette, en déshabillé, témoigne sa satisfaction à sa mère qui l'engage à la pureté, à la chasteté « qui font le bonheur d'une famille pendant des siècles entiers". Effet des bottes très pointues du marié, ses pantoufles démesurément pointues.

Rocher de Cancale. — Deux rochers ; on passe dans la crevasse du premier à marée haute ; peuplé de lapins. — On voit le Mont Saint-Michel au milieu de la mer en bleu, dans la brume pénétrée de soleil, et les côtes de la Normandie qui encerclent l'horizon. — M<sup>o</sup> Maillart, erreur d'analyse ; c'était son magasin qui lui donnait ça ; nous croyons que c'était vice, c'était spéculation ; ses bagues, ce n'était pas pour se parer et pour plaire, c'était pour faire de sa personne une étagère portative.

Dol. — Belle cathédrale ; haute métropole de Bretagne ; encore sur le chœur la crosse d'évêque ; gynécée trilobé.

Pontorson. — Promenade triste au bord du Couesnon. — Prairies ; pays nourri et vigoureux, tout fourni d'arbres rapprochés.

Mont Saint-Michel. — Chemin tout poussiéreux jusqu'à la grève. — Voitures qui transportent de la terre en quantité telle que ça a l'air d'une émigration barbare ; chariots blancs sur la grève blanche. — Le sol devient bourbeux, rigoles, effet de la voiture. — Deux curés. — Le Mont Saint-Michel debout, haut ; tours et remparts, murs à pic ; les contreforts de l'église alignés donnent une pente où poussent quelques arbustes ; portes, surtout la seconde ; escaliers. — Le couvent : prison, escalier droit ; garde-chiourme ignoble ; dédale d'escaliers et de couloirs ; on entend le bruit des métiers, même d'en bas, ce qui dans un tel lieu choque démesurément. — Église, chœur haut, d'une pureté de gothique remarquable ; elle a été brûlée ; on la divise par des rideaux et la nef sert de réfectoire. — Arcade romane crâne, l'entrée donne sur une plate-forme en vue de la mer : c'est là que se promènent les malades, toujours le système silencieux. La vue de la mer à un prisonnier est une ironie, l'infini de l'espace à l'homme confiné dans un point circonscrit. — Cloître en ogives, bonnet d'évêque ; c'est là que les prisonniers exécutent leur promenade que nous avons contemplée à Fontevault. Homo bomini lupus, c'est là le cas de le dire. Hobbes avait deviné les gentillesse pénitenciaires modernes ; on est épouvanté quand on pense qu'on peut un jour être condamné au système cellulaire. — Le soir, sur une des tours, conversation avec un vieux marin qui a navigué dans toutes les mers, en Cochinchine, au Japon, etc. ; la mer était haute, des enfants se baignaient.

A Tombelaine on jouit en plein de la vue du Mont Saint-Michel. — La femme qui nous y conduisait, cuisses d'homme. « Dieu dira : la pauvre bougresse a assez mangé de pain sec il faut lui donner un peu de viande. » — Ca- nons énormes à la porte du pays, herbe dans les meur- trières des courtines. — Petite fille muette.

PoNTORSON. — Dans notre chambre, belles images où des MM. et des dames « en sablant le Champagne jettent des défis à ces Dieux qui font le bonheur de la vie » (c'est Bacchus et l'Amour). — M. Adolphe, gros maître de poste injuriant toutes les voitures qui ne se rangeaient pas et même celles qui se rangeaient.

De Dol À CoMBOURG. — Vieux bonhomme silencieux qui nous conduit en tilbury ; route herbue, nourrie, petites montées.

CoMBOURG. — Ecrasé par le château ; quatre tours réunies par des courtines, le tout couvert d'un toit, de sorte que les baies supérieures ont un peu l'air (aux courtines sur- tout) des sabords d'un bâtiment ; pas de jardin, pas de parc ; on entre par une grande cour de ferme ; perron d'en- viron trente marches, tout droit, le perron de René ; grands marronniers à gauche qui montent jusqu'au haut du château. — Imbécile qui nous menait là en bas bleus et fumant sa pipe. — Petite porte, cour étroite enfouie entre les murailles ; a l'air de la cour intérieure d'une prison. — Au second, à gauche, cette petite fenêtre carrée sous le toit est celle de la chambre de Chateaubriand enfant. Le proprié- taire actuel "qui déteste Victor Hugo et son oncle, à l'excep- tion du Génie du Christianisme, a fait effacer sur la porte de cette pièce des vers qu'on y avait mis". C'est une petite porte en bois avec des rainures et des carrés ; la pièce est petite, basse, donnant sur le couchant, mais la vue est bouchée par la courtine d'en face. — Grande salle au rez-de-chaussée, dite salle des Chevaliers, lambrissée, peinte en blanc ; énorme épaisseur des murs ; vue sur le lac et sur le bois dont le terrain remonte doucement en ondulant. — Escaliers sombres en pierre, petits, tournants ; tout verts sur leurs parois, à cause du jour qui arrive par les meurtrières. — Des oiseaux volaient ; chaleur qui rendait tout cela plus triste : le soleil sur des ruines, c'est du vin qu'on met sur les lèvres d'un cadavre ; ils ont volé dans le grand salon au plafond peint et dont la peinture tombe en écailles ; cheminée grande à écusson brisé. — Sur les tours, trous des mâchicoulis. — On s'en va triste. — La route de Rennes a coupé le lac qui baignait jadis les pieds du château ; le lac se rétrécit, s'atterrit ; nénufars, grenouilles. — Nous lisons René en face, le soir dans une vieille édition du Gén. du Christ. 1808, à gravures stupides, donnée par M<sup>me</sup> de Marigny à M. Corvesier. La nuit je me réveille ; éclairs de chaleur ; ma silhouette sur le mur blanc en plâtre d'une maison en face.

Hédé. — Enceinte dont nous faisons le tour, dessus. — Tour ruinée. — Des Anglais en voiture ne descendent pas pour voir ça, et il y avait pourtant une vue grande, belle, riche, une vue immense de verdure et d'arbres.

Rennes. — Rien, rien que le phoque ; ses narines ont l'air de deux coupures sur son museau ; baquet vert avec des tentures peintes en dedans ; quinquet d'en haut ; orgue de Barbarie. Quand le phoque sera parti de Rennes il n'y aura plus rien à y voir.

Saint-Malo, bâti sur la mer et clos de remparts, semble, lorsqu'on arrive, une couronne de pierres posée sur les flots dont les mâchicoulis sont les fleurons. Les vagues battent contre les murs ou, quand il est marée basse, déferlent à leur pied sur le sable. De petits rochers couverts de varechs surgissent de la grève à ras du sol, comme des taches noires sur cette surface blonde. Les plus grands, dressés en rang à pic et tout unis, supportent de leurs sommets inégaux la base des fortifications, en prolongeant ainsi la couleur grise et en augmentant la hauteur.

Au-dessus de cette ligne uniforme de remparts, que ça et là bombent des tours et que perce ailleurs l'ogive aiguë des portes, on voit les toits des maisons serrés l'un près de l'autre, avec leurs tuiles et leurs ardoises, leurs petites lucarnes ouvertes, leurs girouettes découpées qui tournent, et leurs cheminées de poterie rouge dont les fumignons bleuâtres se perdent dans l'air.

Tout à l'entour sur la mer s'élèvent d'autres îlots sans arbres ni gazon sur lesquels on distingue de loin quelques pans de mur percés de meurtrières tombant en ruines et dont chaque tempête enlève de grands morceaux.

En face de la ville, rattaché à la terre ferme par une longue jetée qui sépare le port de la pleine mer, de l'autre côté du bassin, s'étend le quartier de Saint-Servan, vide, spacieux, presque désert et couché tout à son aise dans une grande prairie vaseuse. A l'entrée se dressent les quatre tours du château de Solidor reliées entre elles par des courtines, et noires du haut en bas. Cela seul nous récompensa d'avoir fait ce long circuit sur la grève, en plein soleil de juillet, au milieu de chantiers, parmi les marmites de goudron qui bouillaient et les feux de copeaux dont on flambait la carcasse des navires.

Le tour de la ville par les remparts est une des plus belles promenades qu'il y ait. Personne n'y vient. On s'asseyait dans l'embrasement des canons, les pieds sur l'abîme. On a devant soi l'embouchure de la Rance, se dégorgeant comme un vallon entre deux vertes collines, et puis les côtes, les rochers, et partout la mer. Derrière vous se promène la sentinelle dont le pas régulier marche sur les dalles sonores.

Un soir nous y restâmes longtemps. La nuit était douce, une belle nuit d'été, sans lune, mais scintillant des feux du ciel, embaumée de brise marine. La ville dormait ; les lumières, l'une après l'autre, disparaissaient des fenêtres, les phares éloignés brillaient en taches rouges dans l'ombre qui sur nos têtes était bleue et piquée en mille endroits par les étoiles vacillantes et rayonnantes. On ne voyait pas la mer, on l'entendait, on la sentait, et les vagues se fouettant contre les remparts nous envoyaient des gouttes de leur écume par le large trou des mâchicoulis.

A une place, entre les maisons de la ville et la muraille, dans un fossé sans herbe, des piles de boulets sont alignées.

De là vous pouvez voir écrit sur le second étage d'une maison : "Ici est né Chateaubriand."

Plus loin, la muraille s'arrête contre le ventre d'une grosse tour : c'est la Quinquengrogne ; ainsi que sa sœur, la Générale, elle est large et haute, ventrue, formidable, renflée au milieu comme une hyperbole, et tient bon toujours. Intactes encore et comme presque neuves, sans doute qu'elles vaudraient mieux, si elles égrenaient dans la mer les pierres de leurs créneaux, et si par leur tête frissonnaient au vent les sombres feuillages amis des ruines. Les monuments, en effet, comme les hommes et comme les passions, ne grandissent-ils pas par le souvenir ? ne se complètent-ils pas par la mort ?

La cour déserte, où les tilleuls chétifs ardoissent leur ombre sur la terre, était silencieuse comme celle d'un couvent. La femme du concierge alla chercher les clefs chez le commandant ; elle revint en compagnie d'une belle petite fille qui venait s'amuser à voir les étrangers. Elle avait les bras nus et tenait un gros bouquet. Ses cheveux noirs frisés d'eux-mêmes dépassaient de sa capote mignonne, et la dentelle de son pantalon flottait sur ses petits souliers de peau de chèvre rattachés autour de ses chevilles par des cordons noirs. Elle allait devant nous dans l'escalier en courant et en appelant.

On monte longtemps, car la tour est haute. Le jour vif des meurtrières passe comme une flèche à travers le mur. Par leur fente, quand vous mettez la tête, vous voyez la mer s'enfoncer de plus en plus et la couleur crue du ciel qui grandit tous les jours, si bien que vous avez peur de vous y perdre. Les navires paraissent des chaloupes et leurs mâts, des badines. Les aigles doivent nous croire gros comme des fourmis.

Nous voient-ils seulement ? Savent-ils que nous avons des villes, des arcs de triomphe, des clochers ?

Arrivés sur la plate-forme, quoique le créneau vous vienne jusqu'à la poitrine, on ne peut se défendre de cette émotion qui vous prend sur tous les sommets élevés : malaise voluptueux, mêlé de crainte et de plaisir, d'orgueil et d'effroi, lutte de l'esprit qui jouit et des nerfs qui souffrent. On est heureux singulièrement ; on voudrait partir, se jeter, voler, se répandre dans l'air, être soutenu par les vents, et les genoux tremblent, et l'on n'ose approcher du bord.

Des hommes ont pourtant grimpé là, une nuit, avec une corde, mais jadis, dans ce prodigieux xvi<sup>e</sup> siècle, époque de convictions féroces et de frénétiques amours. Comme l'instrument humain y a vibré de toutes ses cordes ! comme l'homme y a été large, rempli, fertile ! Ne peut-on pas dire de cet âge le mot de Fénelon : "Spectacle fait à souhait pour le plaisir des yeux ? » car, sans parler des premiers plans, croyances qui craquent sur leur base comme des montagnes qui s'écroulent, mondes nouveaux qu'on découvre, mondes perdus qu'on exhume, et Michel-Ange sous son dôme, et Rabelais qui rit, et Shakespeare qui regarde, et Montaigne qui rêve, où trouver ailleurs plus de développement dans les passions, plus de violences dans les courages, plus d'apreté dans les volontés, une expansion plus complète enfin de la liberté se débattant et tournant sous toutes les fatalités natives ? Aussi avec quel relief l'épique se détache de l'histoire, et comme il y rentre cependant d'une merveilleuse façon pour en faire briller la couleur et en approfondir les horizons ! Des figures passent devant vous, vivantes en trois lignes ; on ne les rencontre qu'une fois ; mais longtemps on les rêve et on s'efforce à les compléter pour les mieux saisir. N'en étaient-ce pas de belles, entre autres, et de terribles, que celles de ces vieux soudards dont la race disparut à peu près vers 1598, à la prise de Vervins, tels que Lamouche, Heurtaud de Saint-Offrange, La Tremblaye qui s'en revenait portant au poing la tête de ses ennemis, ou ce La Fontenelle dont on a parlé ; hommes de fer dont les cœurs ne ployaient pas plus que les épées et qui, attirant à eux mille énergies divergentes qu'ils dirigeaient de la leur, réveillaient les villes en entrant au galop, la nuit, dans leurs murs, équipaient des corsaires, brûlaient la campagne, et avec qui l'on capitulait comme avec des rois ! Qui a songé à peindre ces violents gouverneurs de province, taillant à même la foule, violant les femmes et raflant l'or, comme d'Épernon, tyran atroce en Provence et mignon parfumé au Louvre, comme Montluc, étranglant les huguenots avec ses mains, ou comme Baligni, ce roi de Cambrai, qui lisait Machiavel pour copier le Valentinois, et dont la femme allait sur la brèche, à cheval, casque en tête et cuirassée. Un des hommes les plus oubliés de ce temps-là, un de ceux du moins que la plupart des historiens se contentent de nommer, c'est le duc de Mercœur, l'intrépide ennemi de Henri IV, qui lui résista plus longtemps que Mayenne, plus longtemps que la Ligue et que Philippe II. Désarmé à la fin, c'est-à-dire gagné, apaisé (à de telles conditions qu'on tint secrets vingt-trois articles du traité) et ne sachant alors plus que faire, il s'en alla servir en Hongrie, combattit les Turcs, en attaqua un jour toute une armée avec cinq mille hommes, puis, vaincu encore par là et s'en revenant en France, mourut de la fièvre à Nuremberg, dans son lit, à l'âge de quarante-quatre ans.

Saint-Malo vient de me le mettre en mémoire. Il s'y heurta toujours et ne put jamais l'avoir pour sujet ni pour allié. Ils entendaient en effet faire la guerre pour leur propre compte, le commerce par leurs propres forces, et quoique ligueurs au fond, repoussaient le duc tout en ne voulant pas du Béarnais.

Quand le sieur de Fontaines, gouverneur de la ville, leur eut appris la mort de Henri III, ils refusèrent de reconnaître le roi de Navarre. On prit les armes, on fit des barricades. Fontaines se renferma dans le château, et chacun resta sur la défensive. Peu à peu ils empiétèrent. D'abord ils exigèrent de Fontaines qu'il déclarât vouloir les conserver dans leurs franchises. Fontaines céda, espérant gagner du temps. L'année suivante (1589) ils choisirent quatre généraux indépendants du ■9 gouverneur. L'année d'après (1590) ils obtinrent de tendre des chaînes, Fontaines accorda encore. Le roi était à Laval, il l'attendait. Le moment allait venir qu'il se vengerait d'un seul coup de toutes les humiliations qu'il avait reçues, de toutes les concessions qu'il avait faites. Mais il se hâta trop et se découvrit. Quand les Malouins vinrent à lui rappeler ses promesses, il leur répondit que si le roi se présentait il lui ouvrirait les portes. Dès lors on prit un parti.

Le château avait quatre tours. C'est par la plus haute (la Générale), celle en qui Fontaines se fiait le plus, qu'ils tentèrent l'escalade. Ces audaces alors n'étaient pas rares, témoin l'ascension de la falaise de Fécamp par Bois-Rosé et l'attaque du château de Blein par Goebriant.

On se concerta, on se réunit plusieurs soirs de suite chez un certain Frotet, sieur de la Landelle ; on s'aboucha avec un canonnier écossais de la place, et par une nuit de brouillard tous partirent en rfmres, se rendirent sous les murs de la ville, se laissèrent couler en dehors avec des cordages et s'approchèrent du pied de la Générale.

Là ils attendirent. Un frôlement brusque se fit sur la muraille ; un peloton de fil tomba, ils y attachèrent vite leur échelle de corde qui fut hissée le long de la tour et liée par en haut, par le canonnier, à l'extrémité d'une coulevrine braquée dans l'embrasure d'un créneau.

Michel Frotet monta le premier, puis Charles Anselin, La Blissais et les autres. La nuit était sombre ; le vent soufflait ; ils grimpaient lentement, le poignard dans les dents, tâtonnant du pied les échelons et avançant les mains. Tout à coup (ils étaient au milieu déjà), ils se sentent descendre, la corde se dénoue. Pas un cri, ils restèrent immobiles. C'était le poids de tous ces corps qui avait fait faire la bascule à la coulevrine ; elle s'arrêta sur l'appui de l'embrasure, puis ils se remirent en marche et arrivèrent tous à la file sur la plate-forme de la tour.

Les sentinelles engourdies n'eurent pas le temps de donner l'alarme. La garnison dormait ou jouait aux dés sur les tambours. La terreur la prit, elle se réfugia dans le donjon. Les conjurés l'y poursuivirent ; on se battit dans les escaliers, dans les couloirs, dans les chambres ; on s'écrasait sous les portes, on tuait, on égorgeait. Les habitants de la ville arrivèrent en renfort, d'autres dressèrent des échelles contre la Quiquengrogne, entrèrent sans résistance et commencèrent le pillage. La Péraudière, lieutenant du château, apercevant La Blissais, lui dit : « Voilà, Monsieur, une misérable nuit ». Mais La Blissais lui fit comprendre qu'il n'était pas temps de discourir. On n'avait pas encore vu le comte de Fontaines. On alla à sa chambre, on le trouva mort sur le seuil, percé d'un coup d'arquebuse que lui avait tiré un des habitants, au moment qu'il sortait faisant porter un flambeau devant lui. "Au heu de courir au danger, dit l'auteur de la re-

19. lation (1), il s'était habillé lentement et comme pour aller aux noces, sans qu'aucune aiguillette manquât d'être attachée".

Cette surprise de Saint-Malo qui fit tant de mal au roi n'aida en rien le duc de Mercœur. Il désirait fort que les Malouins acceptassent un gouverneur de sa main, son fils, par exemple, un enfant, c'est-à-dire lui-même, mais ils s'obstinèrent à ne vouloir personne. Il leur envoya des troupes pour les protéger, ils les refusèrent, et les troupes furent contraintes de loger hors la ville.

Ils n'en devenaient pas cependant plus royalistes pour cela ; car quelque temps après ayant arrêté le marquis de La Moussaie et le vicomte de Dénouai, il en coûta pour sortir douze mille écus au marquis et deux mille au vicomte.

Puis craignant que Pont-Briant n'interrompit le commerce avec Dinan et les autres villes de la Ligue, ils s'en emparent.

Supposant que leur évêque, seigneur temporel de la ville, pourrait bien les dépouiller de la liberté qu'ils venaient d'acquérir, ils le mettent en prison et ne le relâchent qu'au bout d'un an.

On sait enfin à quelles conditions ils acceptèrent Henri IV : ils devaient se garder eux-mêmes, ne

M Josselin Frotet, sieur de La Landelle, chez qui les conjurés se donnèrent rendez-vous avant de tenter l'escalade. Voyez dans la coll. des Bénédictins, dom Tallandier, t. II, de l'Histoire civ. et ecclés. de Bretagne, p. 386 et sq. (Note du manuscrit de Gustave Flaubert. ) pas recevoir de garnison, être exempts d'impôts pendant six ans, etc.

Placé entre la Bretagne et la Normandie, ce petit peuple semble avoir à la fois : de la première, la ténacité, la résistance granitique ; de la seconde, la fougue, l'élan. Marins ou écrivains, voyageurs de tous océans, ce qui les distingue surtout c'est l'audace ; violentes natures d'homme, poétiques à force d'être brutales, souvent étroites aussi à force d'être obstinées. Il y a cette ressemblance entre ces deux fils de Saint-Malo, Lamenais et Broussais, qu'ils furent toujours également extrêmes dans leurs systèmes, et qu'ils ont, avec la même conviction acharnée, employé la seconde partie de leur vie à combattre ce qu'ils avaient soutenu dans la première. Dans l'intérieur de la ville vous passez par de petites rues tortueuses, entre des maisons hautes, le long de sales boutiques de voiliers ou de marchands de morue. Point de voiture, aucun luxe ; c'est noir et puant comme la cale d'un vaisseau. Ça sent Terre-Neuve et la viande salée, l'odeur rance des longs voyages.

«Le guet et ronde s'y fait chaque nuit avec de gros chiens d'Angleterre, dits dogues, lesquels on met au soir hors la ville, avec un martre qui les mène, et ne fait lors bon s'y trouver à l'entour. Mais, venant le matin, on les ramène en certain lieu de la ville où ils déposent toute leur fureur qui, de nuit, est étrangement grande<sup>11</sup> ».

(1) D'Argentré, Hist. de Bretagne, p. 62. (Note du manuscrit de Gustave Flaubert.) A part la disparition de cette police quadrupède qui dévora jadis M. du Mollet, et dont voilà l'existence constatée par un texte contemporain, l'extérieur des choses a peu changé, sans doute, et même les gens civilisés qui habitent Saint-Malo prétendent qu'on y est fort arriéré.

Le seul tableau que nous ayons remarqué dans l'église est une grande toile représentant la bataille de Lépante et dédiée à Notre-Dame des Victoires. Elle plane, en haut, dans les nuages. Au premier plan, toute la chrétienté est à genoux, parlements, princesses et rois, couronnes en tête. Au fond, les deux armées s'entrechoquent. Les Turcs sont précipités dans les flots, et les chrétiens lèvent les bras au ciel.

L'église est laide, sèche, sans ornements, presque protestante d'aspect. J'ai remarqué peu d'ex-voto, chose étrange ici en face du péril. Il n'y a ni fleurs ni cierges dans les chapelles, pas de sacré-cœur saignant, de vierge chamarrée, rien enfin de ce qui indignait si fort M. Miehelet.

En face des remparts, à cent pas de la ville, l'flot du Grand-Bey se lève au milieu des flots. Là se trouve la tombe de Chateaubriand ; ce point blanc taillé dans le rocher est la place qu'il a destinée à son cadavre.

Nous y allâmes un soir, à marée basse. Le soleil se couchait. L'eau coulait encore sur le sable. Au pied de l'île, les varechs dégouttelants s'épan- daient comme des chevelures de femmes antiques le long d'un grand tombeau. L'île est déserte ; une herbe rare y pousse où se mêlent de petites touffes de fleurs violettes et de grandes orties. Il y a sur le sommet une case- mate délabrée avec une cour dont les vieux murs s'écroulent. En dessous de ce débris, à mi-côte, on a coupé à même la pente un espace de quelque dix pieds carrés au milieu duquel s'élève une dalle de granit surmontée d'une croix latine. Le tom- beau est fait de trois morceaux, un pour le socle, un pour la dalle, un pour la croix.

Il dormira là-dessous, la tête tournée vers la mer ; dans ce sépulcre bâti sur un écueil, son immortalité sera comme fut sa vie, déserte des autres et tout entourée d'orages. Les vagues avec les siècles murmureront longtemps autour de ce grand souvenir ; dans les tempêtes elles bondiront jusqu'à ses pieds, ou les matins d'été, quand les voiles blanches se déploient et que l'hirondelle arrive d'au delà des mers, longues et douces, elles lui apporteront la volupté mélancolique des hori- zons et la caresse des larges brises. Et les jours ainsi s'écoulant, pendant que les flots de la grève natale iront se balançant toujours entre son ber- ceau et son tombeau, le cœur de René devenu froid, lentement, s'éparpillera dans le néant, au rythme sans fin de cette musique éternelle.

Nous avons tourné autour du tombeau, nous l'avons touché de nos mains, nous l'avons regardé comme s'il eût contenu son hôte, nous nous sommes assis par terre à ses côtés.

Le ciel était rose, la mer tranquille et la brise endormie. Pas une ride ne plissait la surface im- mobile de l'Océan sur lequel le soleil à son cou- cher versait sa couleur d'or. Bleuâtre vers les côtes seulement, et comme s'y évaporant dans la brume, partout ailleurs la mer était rouge et plus en- flammée encore au fond de l'horizon, où s'éten- dait dans toute la longueur de la vue une grande ligne de pourpre. Le soleil n'avait plus ses rayons ; ils étaient tombés de sa face et noyant leur lumière dans l'eau semblaient flotter sur elle. Il descendait en tirant à lui du ciel la teinte rose qu'il y avait mise, et à mesure qu'ils dégradaient ensemble, le bleu pâle de l'ombre s'avavançait et se répandait sur toute la voûte. Bientôt il toucha les flots, rognait dessus son disque rond, s'y enfonça jusqu'au milieu. On le vit un instant coupé en deux moitiés par la ligne de l'horizon, l'une dessus, sans bouger, l'autre en dessous qui tremblait et s'allongeait, puis il disparut complètement ; et quand, à la place où il avait sombré, son reflet n'ondula plus, il sembla qu'une tristesse tout à coup était survenue sur la mer.

La grève parut noire. Un carreau d'une des maisons de la ville, qui tout à l'heure brillait comme du feu, s'éteignit. Le silence redoubla ; on entendait des bruits pourtant : la lame heurtait les rochers et retombait avec lourdeur ; des mou- ches à longues pattes bourdonnaient à nos oreilles, disparaissant dans le tourbillonnement de leur vol diaphane, et la voix confuse des enfants qui se baignaient au pied des remparts arrivait jusqu'à nous avec des rires et des éclats.

Nous les voyions de loin qui s'essayaient à nager, entraient dans les flots, couraient sur le rivage.

Nous descendîmes l'flot, traversâmes la grève à pied. La marée venait et montait vite ; les rigoles se remplissaient ; dans le creux des rochers la mousse frémissait, ou, soulevée du bord des lames, elle s'envolait par flocons et sautillait en s'enfuyant.

Les jeunes garçons nus sortaient du bain ; ils allaient s'habiller sur le galet où ils avaient laissé leurs vêtements et, de leurs pieds qui n'osaient, s'avançaient sur les cailloux. Lorsque voulant passer leur chemise le linge se collait sur leurs épaules mouillées, on voyait le torse blanc qui serpentait d'impatience, tandis que la tête et les bras restant voilés, les manches voltigeaient au vent et claquaient comme des banderoles.

Près de nous passa un homme dont la chevelure trempée tombait droite autour de son cou. Son corps lavé brillait. Des gouttes perlaient aux boucles frisées de sa barbe noire, et il secouait ses cheveux pour en faire tomber l'eau. Sa poitrine large où un sillon velu lui courait sur son thorax, entre des muscles pleins carrément taillés, haletait encore de la fatigue de la nage et communiquait un mouvement calme à son ventre plat dont le contour vers les flancs était lisse comme l'ivoire. Ses cuisses nerveuses, à plans successifs, jouaient sur un genou mince qui, d'une façon ferme et moelleuse, déployait une fine jambe robuste terminée par un pied cambré à talon court et dont les doigts s'écartaient. Il marchait doucement sur le sable.

Oh ! que la forme humaine est belle quand elle apparaît dans sa liberté native, telle qu'elle fut créée au premier jour du monde ! Où la trouver, masquée qu'elle est maintenant et condamnée pour toujours à ne plus apparaître au soleil ? Ce grand mot de nature que l'humanité tour à tour a répété avec idolâtrie ou épouvante, que les philosophes sondaient, que les poètes chantaient, comme il se perd ! comme il s'oublie ! Loin des tréteaux où l'on crie et de la foule où l'on se pousse, s'il y a encore çà et là sur la terre des cœurs avides que tourmente sans relâche le malaise de la beauté, qui toujours sentent en eux ce désespérant besoin de dire ce qui ne se peut dire et de faire ce qui se rêve, c'est là, c'est là pour tant, comme à la patrie de l'idéal, qu'il leur faut courir et qu'il faut vivre. Mais comment ? par quel chemin ? L'homme a coupé les forêts, il bat les mers, et sur ses villes le ciel fait les nuages avec la fumée de ses foyers. La gloire, sa mission, disent d'autres, n'est-elle pas d'aller toujours ainsi, attaquant l'œuvre de Dieu, gagnant sur elle ? Il la nie, il la brise, il l'écrase, et jusqu'en lui, jusque dans ce corps dont il rougit et qu'il cache comme le crime.

L'homme étant ainsi devenu ce qu'il y a de plus rare et de plus difficile à connaître (je ne parle pas de son cœur, ô moralistes !), il en est résulté que l'artiste ignore la forme qu'il a et les qualités qui la font belle. Quel est le poète d'aujourd'hui, parmi les plus savants, qui sache ce que c'est que la femme ? Où en aurait-il jamais vu, le pauvre diable ? Qu'en a-t-il pu apprendre dans les salons, à travers le corset ou la crinoline empesée, ou dans son lit même, s'il y a songé, pendant les entr'actes du plaisir ?

La plastique cependant, mieux que toutes les rhétoriques du monde, enseigne à celui qui la contemple la gradation des proportions, la fusion des plans, l'harmonie enfin ! Les races antiques, par le seul fait de leur existence, ont ainsi détrempe sur les œuvres des maîtres, la pureté de leur sang avec la noblesse de leurs attitudes. J'entends confusément dans Juvénal des rôles de gladiateurs ; Tacite a des tournures qui ressemblent à des draperies de Iaticlave, et certains vers d'Horace ont des reins d'esclave grecque avec des balancements de hanche, et des brèves et des longues qui sonnent comme des crotales.

Mais pourquoi s'inquiéter de ces niaiseries ? N'allons pas chercher si loin, contentons-nous de ce qui se fabrique. Ce qu'on demande aujourd'hui, n'est-ce pas plutôt tout le contraire du nu, du simple et du vrai ? Fortune et succès à ceux qui savent revêtir et habiller les choses ! Le tailleur est le roi du siècle, la feuille de vigne en est le symbole ; lois, arts, politique, caleçon partout ! Libertés menteuses, meubles plaqués, peinture à la détrempe, le public aime ça. Donnez-lui-en, fourrez-lui-en, gorgez cet imbécile !

Il se ruera sur la gravure et laissera le tableau, chantera la romance et dormira à Beethoven, saura tout Béranger par cœur et pas un vers d'Hugo.

C'est plaisir de le voir à sa table comme il s'empiffre des plus lourdes marchandises et se grise des plus frelatées. Les mets communs lui vont vite, et demain, encore du Scribe, du Vernet, de l'Eugène Sue, quelque chose de digestion facile et qui ne tienne pas de place au ventre pour qu'on en puisse manger davantage.

L'homme des champs particulièrement se délacte dans le mauvais avec une ténacité édifiante. Son mauvais à lui est plus sincèrement sot, plus sauvagement bête ; il y met moins de finesse que le citadin qui au moins change de modes s'il ne change pas de goût. A combien de milliers d'exemplaires se vendent annuellement dans les campagnes l'Amour conjugal et Faublas ! sans compter l'Europe et l'Asie, égrillardes demoiselles aux regards gluants qui décorent toutes les chaumières.

Mais il faut avoir vu les belles images de l'au-berge de Cancale pour savoir comment le laid, le niais et le vulgaire peuvent prendre forme sur du papier.

Imaginez dans une salle basse cinq cadres de bois noir accrochés aux murs, et dans ces cadres, du rouge, du bleu, du jaune, une mosaïque de “*” Inédit, pages 300 à 310. grosses couleurs qui tranche comme une tache bigarrée sur la blancheur du mur de plâtre.

On s'approche du premier cadre et on lit au-dessous : La Demande en mariage. C'est un salon richement meublé, tapis vert, papier rouge, beaux cordons de sonnette des deux côtés de la cheminée qui est enrichie d'une pendule représentant le Temps avec sa faux. Un jeune homme, — Quel jeune homme ! l'idéal du jeune homme : habit bleu à boutons luisants, cravate rose tirée droit entre les deux revers à schall d'un gilet de velours, et piquée d'une épingle en diamant, pantalon gris d'un collant très mythologique, jolies cuisses, petite bouche, charmante chevelure, souriant et l'air timide, — est présenté par son père à une dame assise dans une bergère et à une jeune personne plantée sur un tabouret. La mère enarnachée de dentelles a l'air un peu malade, un peu souffrant et sourit avec ce charmant sourire de la vieillesse indulgente contemplant l'amour ; le père du futur est un homme tout à fait bien, croix d'honneur, cravate blanche, air cossu, beaucoup de paquet. Quant au père de la jeune personne, c'est un vieux, tout ce qu'il y a de plus caduc et de plus vénérable, considérablement de cheveux blancs, bonne redingote jaune d'œuf à collet très haut, bombé comme “*e gouttière. Tous sourient à la fois, l'émotion, l'amour, les amours paternelles, maternelles, filiales, la joie, l'espérance, la satisfaction bien douce et le trouble inconnu se partagent, déchirent, agitent et charment les cœurs. Le second cadre représente Le Mariage. Nous sommes à l'église, le prêtre, l'autel, la fiancée en blanc, l'anneau qu'on se passe au doigt ; la mère pleure, le père du jeune homme dans un coin est attendri, mais sourit ; toutes les femmes ont des chapeaux à plumes ; le marié en noir, frisé dur comme du fer, pantalon encore bien plus collant, bottes très pointues : c'est un chérubin.

Troisième tableau, Le Bal. Réunion du grand monde, luxe somptueux ; deux lustres, brillants quadrilles, perspective de pieds chaussés d'escarpins très pointus dont la file se prolonge indéfiniment, chaînes de montres partout, pluie d'écharpes et de turbans, éblouissement complet. Cependant le marié tire à part sa compagne et lui dit d'une voix enflammée : « Mon amie, qu'il me tarde que tu partages ma demeure et ma couche, je te propose, viens ! veux-tu connaître des fêtes plus aimables que celle où nos conviés assistent pour nous plaire ? l'hymen va te l'apprendre... », etc.

Quatrième tableau, Le Coucher de la mariée. On la déshabille, le lit est là tout ouvert, avec la table de nuit, le bougeoir et les allumettes chimiques. La mère glisse à l'oreille de sa fille « des mots mystérieux sur les nouveaux devoirs qu'elle a à remplir » ; par la porte entrebâillée on voit le marié « brûlant d'amour » qui veut à toute force entrer, mais les demoiselles d'honneur le repoussent et « font pour un moment obstacle à ses vœux », tout dévoré qu'il est « de la plus légitime, de la plus pure, de la plus touchante des impatiences ». Cinquième tableau, Le Lever de la mariée. « Le mystère de Vénus est accompli, le sein de l'épouse a reçu le germe créateur qui dans neuf mois doit combler les époux d'un bonheur nouveau » ; le lit est défait ; sur le marbre de la table de nuit on voit les restes d'un pâté et une bouteille de vin entamée ; en dessous, dans l'intérieur, on aperçoit le pot de chambre, et une bonne jette du linge sale dans une armoire ; les parents arrivés dès l'aurore se précipitent dans les bras de leurs enfants ; les traits de la mariée sont abattus, ses bandeaux tout dénoués et sa chemise de nuit entr'ouverte. L'explication la déclare d'ailleurs « un peu lasse peut-être des nouveaux assauts de l'hymen, mais heureuse et le cœur plein d'une félicité superflue ». Le marié radieux, en robe de chambre azur à revers rouges avec une cordelière d'or, et des pantoufles de velours violet extra-pointues, confie à son père qui sourit encore « les charmes de la nuit passée », et la mariée confie à sa mère “l’ivresse qu’elle a ressentie” ; celle-ci l’engage “à cette pureté, à cette chasteté qui sont la base des États et qui font le bonheur d’une famille pendant les siècles entiers”.

Nous allâmes prendre l’air sur le quai où luisait un beau soleil ; la grève découverte était toute grise à cause de la vase qui la recouvrait et, sur sa couche lisse, glacée comme une crème, les barques vides, échouées dans toutes les postures du monde, avaient leurs filets suspendus qui séchaient au haut des mâts. Sur le bois des canots le gou- dron suintait en gouttelettes noires. Dans la brume pénétrée de soleil, seul au milieu de la mer, se levait le Mont Saint-Michel, dôme bleu- âtre aux sommets découpés ; à droite, les côtes de Normandie continuant, de leur ligne mamelon- neuse, la coupe immense de la baie, allaient gra- duellement s’abaissant et confondaient à l’horizon le vague de leurs contours dans la blancheur des nuées légères.

Nous glissions sur la vase tiède où nos pieds nus enfonçaient jusqu’à la cheville ; de place en place, dans des flaques d’eau encloses de carrés de galets, quelques huîtres dormaient dans leurs vertes coquilles comme des gens qui font la sieste, les jalousies fermées.

Pour aller au rocher de Cancale nous mon- tâmes en chaloupe, on hissa la voile qui s’étendit dans toute sa hauteur et nous couvrit de son ombre, elle se mirait sur l’eau, nous allions dou- cement, sans bruit, lentement.

Le rocher a deux pics inégaux, ou plutôt ce sont deux rochers séparés par une crevasse dans laquelle on passe à marée haute ; il est fait de blocs accumulés ; il y pousse des tamarins, du ser- polet et des bruyères. Des lapins qui l’habitent dé- busquent effrayés quand vous jetez des cailloux dans les broussailles. Quand nous l’eûmes gravi jusqu’en haut, que nous nous fûmes assis à plu- sieurs places et promenés partout, nous rega- gnâmes la chaloupe qui nous déposa un quart d’heure après sur le galet au pied de la falaise. Elle s’interrompt par un angle et découvre brusquement le village de Cancale aligné sur un quai de pierres sèches. Là, couché par terre à plat dos sur le sable, le chapeau sur les yeux, les bras étendus en croix, je suis resté une grande heure et demie à chauffer ma guenille au soleil et à faire le lézard. On se sent le corps inerte, en- gourdi, inanimé, inhérent presque à la terre sur laquelle il se vautre, tandis que l’âme, au con- traire, partie bien loin, voltige dans les espaces comme une plume égarée.

Lorsque j'ai relevé la tête, la grève avait disparu, la marée presque subitement était venue la recouvrir, et les barques tout à l'heure immobiles se relevaient maintenant et se remettaient à flot. Sous le roulis des lames longues qui, arrivant l'une par-dessus l'autre comme des inondations successives, accouraient de toute leur vitesse sur cette plage unie où largement elles se développaient sans en finir, les canots pleins de monde se croisaient, se vidaient, revenaient au quai. On allait partir pour la pêche, on crochait les gouvernails, on frappait les tolets, on hissait les voiles ; on voyait les embarcations prendre leur bordée afin de gagner le pied du vent, et s'éloignant les unes des autres chacune choisir sa route et s'enfuir vers le large.

Pendant qu'on attelait nos chevaux pour nous ramener à Saint-Malo, nous jugeâmes convenable de prendre des huîtres et de jeter un dernier coup d'œil aux images. L'hôtesse était une pauvre femme vêtue de noir qui avait perdu son mari la semaine dernière et sa fille il y avait trois jours. Dans un fauteuil dépaillé, au coin de la fenêtre, elle reste sans bouger ni se soucier des pratiques, à regarder par les carreaux la mer où n'apparaît plus la barque de son mari et ce quai vide où jouent maintenant les enfants des autres. Celle-là doit peu rire des fameuses gravures, mais c'est la servante, j'imagine, qui doit s'y plaire et s'en nourrir. Il est probable qu'elle convoite d'abord la bijouterie qui s'y trouve et qu'elle rêve là-dessus à des bonheurs de reine, à quelque existence sensuelle et cossue, toute chatoyante de la couleur des cachemires et sucrée comme du sirop, avec un bel amant bien habillé et des pâmoisons amoureuses dans de la toile de Hollande. Un matelot ivre est entré dans l'auberge en chantant et en demandant à boire ; comme on ne lui répondait pas, il a donné un grand coup de poing sur la table, ce qui a fait claquer les piles d'assiettes. La bonne femme en noir s'est détournée et lui a demandé :

— Qu'est-ce que vous voulez ?

Il a répondu, en continuant sa chanson, qu'il avait besoin de boire ; elle l'a interrompu par un geste de main, et lui a dit :

— Vous savez que mon cœur est trop dans le deuil, on ne chante pas ici, allez-vous-en.

Et elle lui répétait avec une expression suppliant de dégoût et de prière :

— Ah ! je vous en prie ! allez-vous-en, allez- vous-en ! Il s'est interrompu, a promené sur les murs son regard idiot, puis est sorti en se cognant à la porte où il s'est remis aussitôt à gueuler à pleine poitrine.

Nous avons retrouvé à Saint-Malo, dans la cour de notre hôtel, Mme Maillart, assise comme d'ordinaire dans son hangar vitré et, de ses doigts gonflés de bagues, ecossant des haricots verts sur un tablier de cuisine mis par-dessus son peignoir jaune.

Quand nous la vîmes la première fois, un matin en arrivant (elle était debout et faisait tourner ses clefs sur son index), avec ses yeux noirs admirablement doux et beaux et relevés vers les tempes sous un sourcil long, avec sa taille mince fortement garnie par derrière de tous les mensonges de l'industrie, avec ses boutons d'émeraude sur sa chemisette de batiste, des boucles d'oreilles battant son cou maigre, un collier sonnait sur ses clavicules et sa montre à breloques, son lorgnon d'or, ses broches et ses camées, avec sa robe jaune, ouverte, si lâche au corps, si parlante, et la pomade qu'il y avait sur ses bandeaux, et le sourire qui rendait presque jolie sa bouche aux dents gâtées, nous en conçûmes, il faut l'avouer, un préjugé défavorable pour ses mœurs, mais bien favorable pour son hôtel. Les arbustes verts dans la cour, des bouquets de fleurs que l'on arrangeait dans des vases de porcelaine, la capucine épanouie qui grimpait autour des fenêtres et le galon d'argent des rideaux de nos lits, jusqu'à des poissons rouges nageant dans leur bocal, tout cela avait je ne sais quel bon air féminin, espagnol, andalous, odaliscal et rafraîchissant qui faisait plaisir à retrouver après toutes les landes de TArmorique.

Sotte présomption ! erreur des jugements ! Mme Maillart est la meilleure mère de famille du monde et la plus tendre épouse du département, y compris les îles de la côte ; elle a quatorze enfants qu'elle élève dans le travail et dans les bons principes ; sa fille aînée fait les desserts et son second fils est parti à Jersey apprendre l'anglais afin de pouvoir un jour servir d'interprète dans la maison.

Elle a adjoint à son établissement une boutique de curiosités où elle se livre vis-à-vis de l'étranger à une réclame des plus tenaces pour qu'il lui prenne ses assiettes du Japon, son point d'Angleterre, ses colibris empaillés ou ses gros Faënza qu'elle veut faire passer naïvement pour des Pa- lissy. Elle vous montre aussi dans un bas d'armoire une demi-douzaine de bouquins dépareillés parmi lesquels il y a le second tome de Dom Morice, qu'elle garde pour quelqu'un de ses fils s'il s'en trouve un plus tard qui veuille étudier l'histoire, « car c'est une belle science et c'est joli pour un homme de la savoir ».

De temps à autre elle vous quitte au bruit d'une sonnette qui communique de l'hôtel dans son magasin, mais elle y revient bientôt ; elle y passe sa vie, vend, achète, revend, arrange, essuie, tri- pote ; son mari n'y connaît rien, c'est un butor sous le rapport des arts.

Ce magasin seul fut cause de la fausseté de notre diagnostic, elle en porte en effet les plus belles pièces sur elle, afin de les avoir toutes prêtes à offrir aux amateurs : aujourd'hui un bra- celet, ce soir une collerette, demain une aumô- nière. Ce que l'on prendrait ainsi pour vice n'est que spéculation fort honnête, elle orne son corps non pour le mieux vendre, mais pour en faire une étagère.

Il fallut se quitter pourtant. Or un matin, après des adieux fort aimables, nous partîmes de Saint- Malo pour aller coucher le soir à Pontorson.

La cathédrale de Dol, qui se trouve sur la route, est une église de bon style, à qui son gynécée trilobé donne une grâce charmante sans orne- ments, mais riche d'elle-même par ses hautes pro- portions. Elle rappelle bien, dans sa sévère ogive, l'orgueil métropolitain de ses évêques dont les descendants laissent encore debout dans le chœur leur crosse recourbée, dorée du haut en bas.

Arrivés de bonne heure à Pontorson et y bâil- lant dès aussitôt, nous allâmes, pour employer le temps à quelque chose, traîner notre ennui le long d'une promenade de peupliers, au bord d'une petite rivière qui coule parmi les touffes d'arbustes et les roseaux grêles des marécages. La vue s'arrête à un coude de la rive, ou flotte, in- certaine et sans rien qui l'amuse, sur une plate prairie régulièrement coupée par de longues lignes d'arbres. Comme on avait la veille pêché un saumon, trois ou quatre particuliers du lieu, posés sur les bords des eaux bourbeuses, y plon- geaient et en retiraient un grand filet carré, s'at- tendant à toute minute à en sentir se déchirer les mailles sous la capture rêvée.

Quand nous eûmes assisté suffisamment long- temps à toutes leurs alternatives d'espérance et d'insuccès, nous reprîmes le chemin de l'auberge pour nous en aller dîner.

La route de Pontorson au Mont Saint-Michel est tirante à cause des sables. Notre chaise de poste (car nous allons aussi en chaise de poste) était dérangée à tous moments par quantité de charrettes remplies d'une terre grise que l'on prend dans ces parages et que l'on exporte je ne sais où pour servir d'engrais. Elles augmentent à mesure qu'on approche de la mer et défilent ainsi pendant plusieurs lieues, jusqu'à ce que l'on découvre enfin les grèves abandonnées d'où elles viennent. Sur cette étendue blanche où les tas de terre élevés en cônes ressemblaient à des cabanes, tous ces chariots dont la longue file ondulante fuyait dans la perspective nous rappelaient quelque émigration des barbares qui se met en branle et quitte ses plaines.

L'horizon vide se prolonge, s'étale et finit par fondre ses terrains crayeux dans la couleur jaune de la plage. Le sol devient plus ferme, une odeur salée vous arrive, on dirait un désert dont la mer s'est retirée. Des langues de sable, longues, aplaties l'une sur l'autre, se continuant indéfiniment par des plans indistincts, se rient comme une onde sous de grandes lignes courbes, arabesques géantes que le vent s'amuse à dessiner sur leur surface. Les flots sont loin, si reculés qu'on ne les voit plus, qu'on n'entend pas leur bruit, mais je ne sais quel vague murmure, insaisissable, aérien, comme la voix même de la solitude qui n'est peut-être que l'étourdissement de ce silence.

En face, devant nous, un grand rocher de forme ronde, la base garnie de murailles crénelées, le sommet couronné d'une église, se dresse, enfonçant ses tours dans le sable et levant ses clochetons dans l'air. D'énormes contreforts qui retiennent les flancs de l'édifice s'appuient sur une pente abrupte d'où déroulent des quartiers de rocs et des bouquets de verdure sauvage. A mi-côte, étagées comme elles peuvent, quelques maisons, dépassant la ceinture blanche de la muraille et dominées par la masse brune de l'église, clapotent leurs couleurs vives entre ces deux grandes teintes unies.

La chaise de poste allait devant nous, nous la suivions de loin, d'après le sillon de ses roues qui creusaient des ornières ; elle s'enfonçait dans l'éloignement, et sa capote que l'on apercevait seule, s'enfuyant, avait l'air d'un gros crabe qui se traînait sur la grève.

Cà et là, des courants d'eau passaient ; il fallait remonter plus loin. Ou bien c'étaient des places de vase qui se présentaient à l'improviste encastrant dans le sable leurs méandres inégaux.

A nos côtés cheminaient deux curés qui venaient aussi voir le Mont Saint-Michel. Comme ils avaient peur de salir leurs robes neuves, ils les relevaient autour d'eux pour enjamber les ruisseaux et sautaient en s'appuyant sur leurs bâtons. Leurs boucles d'argent étaient grises de la boue que le soleil y séchait à mesure, et leurs souliers trempés bâillaient en flaquant à tous leurs pas.

Le mont cependant grandissait. D'un même coup d'œil nous en saisissons l'ensemble et nous voyions, à les pouvoir compter, les tuiles des toits, les tas d'orties dans les rochers et, tout en haut, les lames vertes de la persienne d'une petite fenêtre qui donne sur le jardin du gouverneur.

La première porte, étroite et faite en ogive, s'ouvre sur une sorte de chaussée de galets descendant à la mer ; sur l'écu rongé de la seconde, des lignes onduleuses taillées dans la pierre semblent figurer des flots, par terre, des deux côtés, sont étendus des canons énormes faits de barres de fer reliées avec des cercles pareils. L'un d'eux a gardé dans sa gueule son boulet de granit ; pris sur les Anglais, en 1423, par Louis d'Estouville, depuis quatre siècles ils sont là.

Cinq ou six maisons se regardant en face composent toute la rue ; leur alignement s'arrête et elles continuent par les raidillons et les escaliers qui mènent au château, se succédant au hasard, juchées, jetées l'une par-dessus l'autre. Pour y aller, on monte d'abord sur la courtine dont la muraille cache aux logis d'en bas la vue de la mer. La terre paraît sous les dalles fendues ; l'herbe verdoie entre les créneaux, et dans les effondrements du sol s'étalent des flaques d'urine qui rongent les pierres grises. Le rempart contourne l'île et s'élève par des paliers successifs. Quand on a dépassé l'échauguette qui fait angle entre les deux tours, un petit escalier droit se présente ; de marche en marche, en grim pant, s'abaissent graduellement les toits des maisons dont les cheminées délabrées fument à cent pieds sous vous. Vous voyez à la lucarne des greniers le linge suspendu sécher au bout d'une perche avec des haillons rouges recousus, ou se cuire au soleil, entre le toit d'une maison et le rez-de-chaussée d'une autre, quelque petit jardin grand comme une table où les poireaux languissant de soif couchent leurs feuilles sur la terre grise ; mais l'autre face du rocher, celle qui regarde la pleine mer, est nue, déserte, si escarpée que les arbustes qui y ont poussé ont du mal à s'y tenir et, tout penchés sur l'abîme, semblent prêts à y tomber.

Bien haut, planant à l'aise, quand vous êtes ainsi à jouir d'autant d'étendue que s'en peuvent repaître des yeux humains, que vous regardez la mer, l'horizon des côtes développant son immense courbe bleuâtre, ou, dressée sur sa pente perpendiculaire, la muraille de la Merveille, avec ses trente-six contreforts géants, et qu'un rire d'admiration vous crispe la bouche, tout à coup, vous entendez dans l'air claquer le bruit sec des métiers. On fait de la toile. La navette va, bat, heurte ses coups brusques ; tous s'y mettent, c'est un vacarme.

Entre deux fines tourelles représentant deux pièces de canon sur leur culasse, la porte d'entrée du château s'ouvre par une voûte longue où un escalier de granit s'engouffre. Le milieu en reste toujours dans l'ombre, éclairé qu'il est à peine par deux demi-jours, l'un qui arrive d'en bas, l'autre qui tombe d'en haut par l'intervalle de la herse ; c'est comme un souterrain qui descendrait vers vous.

Le corps de garde est, en entrant, au haut du grand escalier. Le bruit des crosses de fusil retentissait sous les voûtes avec la voix des sergents qui faisaient l'appel. On battait du tambour.

Cependant un garde-chiourme nous a rapporté nos passeports que M. le gouverneur avait désiré voir ; il nous a fait signe de le suivre, il a ouvert des portes, poussé des verrous, nous a conduits à travers un labyrinthe de couloirs, de voûtes, d'escaliers. On s'y perd, une seule visite ne suffisant pas pour comprendre le plan compliqué de toutes ces constructions réunies où, forteresse, église, abbaye, prisons, cachots, tout se trouve, depuis le roman du xie siècle jusqu'au gothique flamboyant du xvie. Nous ne pûmes voir que par un carreau, et nous haussant sur la pointe des pieds, la salle des Chevaliers qui, servant maintenant d'atelier de tissage, est par ce motif interdite aux gens. Nous y distinguâmes seulement quatre rangs de colonnes à chapiteaux ornés de trèfles et supportant une voûte sur laquelle filent des nervures saillantes. A deux cents pieds au-dessus du niveau de la mer, le cloître est bâti sur cette salle des Chevaliers. Il se compose d'une galerie quadrangulaire formée par une triple rangée de colonnettes en granit, en tuf, en marbre granitelle ou en stuc fait avec des coquillages broyés. L'acanthe, le chardon, le lierre et le chêne s'enroulent à leurs chapiteaux ; entre chaque ogive bonnet d'évêque une rosace en trèfle se découpe dans la lumière ; on en a fait le préau des prisonniers.

La casquette du garde-chiourme passe le long de ces murs où l'on voyait rêver jadis le crâne tonsuré des vieux bénédictins travailleurs, et le sabot du détenu bruit sur ces dalles que frôlaient les robes des moines soulevées par les grosses sandales de cuir qui se ployaient sous leurs pieds nus.

L'église a un chœur gothique et une nef romane, les deux architectures étant là comme pour lutter de grandeur et d'élégance. Dans le chœur l'ogive des fenêtres est haute, pointue, élancée comme une aspiration d'amour ; dans la nef, les arcades l'une sur l'autre ouvrent rondement leurs demi-cercles superposés, et sur la muraille montent des colonnes rondes qui grimpent droites comme des troncs de palmier. Elles appuient leurs pieds sur des piliers carrés, couronnent leurs chapiteaux de feuilles d'acanthé, et continuent au delà par de puissantes nervures qui se courbent sous la voûte, s'y croisent et la soutiennent. Il était midi. Par la porte ouverte le grand jour entrant faisait ruisseler ses effluves sur les pans sombres de l'édifice.

La nef séparée du chœur par un grand rideau de toile verte est garnie de tables et de bancs, car on l'a utilisée en réfectoire.

Quand on dit la messe, on tire le rideau, et les condamnés assistent à l'office divin sans déranger leurs coudes de la place où ils mangent : cela est ingénieux.

Pour agrandir de douze mètres la plate-forme qui se trouve au couchant de l'église, on a tout bonnement raccourci l'église ; mais comme il fallait une entrée quelconque, un architecte a imaginé de fermer la nef par une façade de style grec ; puis, éprouvant peut-être des remords ou voulant, ce qui est plus croyable, raffiner son œuvre, il y a rajouté après coup des colonnes à chapiteaux "assez bien imités du xi<sup>e</sup> siècle", dit la notice. Taisons-nous, courbons la tête. Chacun des arts a sa lèpre particulière, son ignominie mortelle qui lui ronge le visage. La peinture a le portrait de famille, la musique a la romance, la littérature a la critique et l'architecture a l'architecture.

Les prisonniers marchaient sur la plate-forme, tous en rang, l'un derrière l'autre, les bras croisés, ne parlant pas, dans ce bel ordre enfin que nous avons contemplé à Fontevault. C'étaient les malades de l'infirmerie auxquels on faisait prendre l'air et qu'on distrairait ainsi pour les guérir. L'un d'eux relevant les pieds plus haut que les autres et se tenant les mains à la veste du compagnon qui était devant lui, suivait la file en trébuchant. Il était aveugle. Pauvre misérable ! Dieu l'empêche de voir et les hommes lui défendent de parler ! Il avait l'air doux cependant, et sa figure aux yeux fermés souriait sous les chauds rayons du soleil.

(*> Après avoir donné la pièce à notre garde-chiourme, qui nous fit en signe de remerciement une grimace de chat-tigre, nous redescendîmes les escaliers, et cinq minutes après nous étions de retour dans l'intérieur du village où des femmes, assises devant les portes, faisaient des filets sur leurs genoux.

Quand on va à Tombelaine, qui est un rocher à une demi-lieue du Mont Saint-Michel et comme lui placé tout au milieu de la mer, on prend un guide pour éviter les courants. Même aux endroits non dangereux si l'on s'arrête on se sent enfoncer dans le sable qui se met à bouillonner et à monter sur vous ; en dix minutes on en aurait jusqu'au ventre, en une demi-heure jusqu'aux épaules.

Lorsqu'on traverse les courants, l'eau rapide coule entre vos jambes avec la force d'un torrent ; le vertige viendrait si on restait à la regarder. De tous côtés, partout, ce n'est que du sable, des étendues monotones qui se succèdent et s'en-(*' Inédit, pages 317 à 319. fuient ; mais lorsqu'on détourne la tête, le Mont paraît si près qu'il a l'air de vous poursuivre, vous le voyez tout entier avec ses maisons en bas, ses arbustes accrochés sur ses pentes et son église tout en haut.

Tombelaine est un petit îlot de granit aplati sur les flots, à ras du sol. Dans l'herbe, on distingue encore des restes de fondations et sur toute la longueur du rocher deux traces parallèles comme des ornières de voiture. C'est là que Montgomery avait fait transporter le pillage des églises catholiques, il y battait monnaie, les beaux écus d'or tout neufs ont sauté sur ces pierres où les cormorans fatigués viennent poser leurs pieds roses, dans les orages. Jusqu'à la Révolution, dans une petite chapelle dont il ne reste rien, une lampe perpétuelle brûlait.

Tombelaine ! d'où vient ce nom ? est-ce celui de la jeune fille qui, n'ayant pu suivre son amant parti à la conquête avec le roi Guillaume, resta longtemps à l'attendre sur ce rocher, y mourut enfin de douleur et y fut enterrée, ou celui de la mère du roi Hoël qui, ravie à ses parents par un seigneur espagnol, y aurait été transportée, violée et assassinée. Vague histoire de femme et d'amour qui flotte sur cet écueil !

Le soir, pendant que nous dînions, une procession d'enfants conduits par le curé a passé en chantant sous nos fenêtres. Ils tenaient tous des cierges à la main et, marchant deux à deux, ils ont monté l'escalier qui conduit de la rue sur les remparts. On voyait s'élever les robes blanches des petites filles avec les lumières des flambeaux et on entendait les voix s'éloigner.

A la nuit tombante, nous avons été sur les tours voir se coucher le soleil ; nous y avons causé avec un vieux marin qui, appuyé sur le parapet, fumait comme nous la pipe en faisant la digestion. Il avait fait de longs voyages, été en Cochinchine et dans les Indes, visité le Japon et la mer Blanche ; il nous parlait de ces pays qu'il avait vus, pendant que la marée montante battait le pied des tours, que les étoiles s'allumaient et que de temps à autre la voix éloignée des sentinelles qui criaient : Garde à vous ! allait se répétant dans l'ombre.

Le lendemain, quand la grève se fut découverte encore, nous partîmes du Mont par un ardent soleil qui chauffait les cuirs de la voiture. Nous avançons au pas ; les colliers craquaient, les roues enfonçaient dans le sable. Au bout de la grève, quand le gazon a paru, j'ai appliqué mon œil à la petite lucarne qui est au fond des voitures et j'ai dit adieu au Mont Saint-Michel.

Pour aller à Combourg il fallait revenir à Dol ; ce fut le gros maître de poste de Pontorson qui nous y mena lui-même. Assis sur le tablier de son tape-cul (nous avions quitté notre équipage), les deux pieds posés sur le brancard, en chemise et la pipe aux lèvres, il poussait au grand trot ses deux pommelés et faisait claquer son petpignan ; du plus loin qu'il apercevait des voitures il leur criait de se garer, injuriant celles qui ne se rangeaient pas, injuriant celles qui se rangeaient, les premières pour tout de bon, les secondes pour rire, vociférant, sacrant, furieux et facétieux, des pote de la grande route comme si elle eût été sa propriété particulière.

De Doï à Combourg nous eûmes au contraire pour conduire notre tilbury un pauvre bonhomme qui tenait à peine ses guides et roupillait accablé par la chaleur. Quant à nous, nous causâmes si peu que nous ne pensâmes à rien regarder.

Une lettre du vicomte de Vesin devait nous ouvrir l'entrée du château. Aussi à peine arrivés nous allâmes chez M. Corvesier qui en est le régisseur.

On nous fit attendre dans une grande cuisine où une demoiselle en noir, fort marquée de petite vérole et portant des lunettes d'écaillé sur de gros yeux myopes, égrenait des groseilles dans une terrine. La marmite aux confitures était sur le feu et on écrasait du sucre avec des bouteilles.

f

Evidemment nous dérangions. Au bout de quelques minutes, on descendit nous dire que M. Corvesier, malade et grelottant de la fièvre dans son lit, était bien désolé de ne pouvoir nous rendre service, mais qu'il nous présentait ses respects. Cependant, son commis, qui venait de rentrer de course et faisait la collation dans la cuisine en buvant un verre de cidre et en mangeant une tartine de beurre, s'offrit à sa place à nous montrer le château. Il déposa sa serviette, se suça les dents, alluma sa pipe, prit un paquet de clefs accroché à un clou et se mit à marcher devant nous dans le village.

Après avoir longé un grand mur, on entre par une vieille porte ronde dans une cour de ferme silencieuse. Le silex sort ses pointes sur la terre battue où se montre une herbe rare salie par les fumiers qu'on traîne. Il n'y avait personne ; les écuries étaient vides. Dans les hangars, les poules, huchées sur le timon des charrettes, dormaient la tête sous l'aile. Au pied des bâtiments, la poussière de la paille tombée des granges assourdissait le bruit des pas.

Quatre grosses tours, rejointes par des courtines, laissent voir sous leur toit pointu les trous de leurs créneaux qui ressemblent aux sabords d'un navire ; et les meurtrières dans les tours, ainsi que sur le corps du château de petites fenêtres irrégulièrement percées font des baies noires inégales sur la couleur grise des pierres. Un large porroï d'une trentaine de marches monte tout droit au premier étage, devenu le rez-de-chaussée des appartements de l'intérieur depuis qu'on en a comblé les douves.

Le « violier jaune » n'y croissait pas, mais les lentisques et les orties, avec la mousse verdâtre et les lichens. A gauche, à côté de la tourelle, un bouquet de marronniers a gagné jusqu'à son toit et l'abrite de son feuillage.

Quand la clef eut tourné dans la serrure et que la porte, poussée à coups de pieds, eut longtemps grincé sur le pavé collant, nous entrâmes dans un

21 couloir sombre qu'encombraient des planches et des échelles avec des cercles de futailles et des brouettes. *

Ce passage vous mène à une petite cour comprise entre les pans intérieurs du château et resserrée par l'épaisseur des murs. Le jour n'arrive que d'en haut, comme dans un préau de prison. Dans les angles, des gouttes humides coulaient le long des pierres.

Une autre porte fut ouverte. C'était une vaste salle dégarnie, sonore ; le dallage est brisé en mille endroits ; on a peint le vieux lambris.

Par les grandes fenêtres, la teinte verte des bois d'en face jetait un reflet livide sur la muraille blanchie. Tout à leur pied, le lac est répandu, étalé sur l'herbe parmi les joncs ; sous les fenêtres, les troènes, les acacias et les lilas, poussés pêle-mêle dans l'ancien parterre, couvrent de leur tail-lis sauvage le talus qui descend jusqu'à la grande route ; elle passe sur la berge du lac et continue ensuite par la forêt.

Rien ne résonnait dans la salle déserte où jadis, à cette heure, s'asseyait sur le bord de ces fenêtres l'enfant qui fut René. Le commis fumait sa pipe et crachait par terre. Son chien, qu'il avait amené, se promenait en furetant les souris, et les ongles de ses pattes sonnaient sur le pavé.

Nous avons monté les escaliers tournants. Le pied trébuche, on tâtonne des mains. Sur les marches usées, la mousse est venue. Souvent un rayon lumineux, passant par la fente des murs et frappant dessus d'aplomb, en fait briller quelque petit brin vert qui, de loin, dans l'ombre, scintille comme une étoile. Nous avons erré partout : dans les longs couloirs, sur les tours, sur la courtine étroite dont les trous des mâchicoulis béants tirent l'œil en bas vers l'abîme.

Donnant sur la cour intérieure, au second étage, est une petite pièce basse dont la porte de chêne, ornée de rainures moulées, s'ouvre par un loquet de fer. Les poutrelles du plafond, que l'on touche avec la main, sont vermoulues de vieillesse ; les lattes paraissent sous le plâtre de la muraille qui a de grandes taches sales ; les carreaux de la fenêtre sont obscurcis par la toile des araignées et leurs châssis encroûtés sous la poussière. C'était là sa chambre. Elle a vue vers l'ouest, du côté des soleils couchants .

Nous continuâmes ; nous allions toujours ; quand nous passions près d'une brèche, d'une meurtrière ou d'une fenêtre, nous nous réchauffions à l'air chaud qui venait du dehors, et cette transition subite rendait tous ces délabrements encore plus tristes et plus froids. Dans les chambres, les parquets pourris s'effondrent, le jour descend par les cheminées, le long de la plaque noircie où les pluies ont fait de longues traînées vertes. Le plafond du salon laisse tomber ses fleurons d'or, et l'écusson qui en surmonte le chambranle est cassé en morceaux. Comme nous étions là, une volée d'oiseaux est entrée tout à coup, a tourbillonné avec des cris et s'est enfuie par le trou de la cheminée.

Le soir, nous avons été sur le bord du lac, de l'autre côté dans la prairie. La terre le gagne, il s'y perd de plus en plus, il disparaîtra bientôt, et les blés pousseront où tremblent maintenant les nénufars. La nuit tombait. Le château, flanqué de ses quatre tourelles, encadré dans sa verdure et dominant le village qu'il écrase, étendait sa grande masse sombre. Le soleil couchant, qui passait devant sans l'atteindre, le faisait paraître noir, et ses rayons, effleurant la surface du lac, allaient se perdre dans la brume, sur la cime violette des bois immobiles.

Assis sur l'herbe, au pied d'un chêne, nous lisions René. Nous étions devant ce lac où il contemplait l'hirondelle agile sur le roseau mobile, à l'ombre de ces bois où il poursuivait l'arc-en-ciel sur les collines pluvieuses ; nous écoutions ce frémissement de feuilles, ce bruit de l'eau sous la brise qui avaient mêlé leur murmure à la mélodie explorée des ennuis de sa jeunesse. A mesure que l'ombre tombait sur les pages du livre, l'amertume des phrases gagnait nos cœurs, et nous nous fondions avec délices dans ce je ne sais quoi de large, de mélancolique et de doux.

Près de nous, une charrette a passé en claquant dans les ornières son essieu sonore. On sentait l'odeur des foin coupés. On entendait le bruit des grenouilles qui coassaient dans le marécage. Nous rentrâmes.

Le ciel était lourd ; toute la nuit il y eut de l'orage. A la lueur des éclairs, la façade de plâtre d'une maison voisine s'illuminait et flambait comme embrasée. Haletant, lassé de me retourner sur mes matelas, je me suis levé, j'ai allumé ma chandelle, j'ai ouvert la fenêtre et j'ai regardé la nuit.

Elle était noire, silencieuse comme le sommeil. Mon flambeau qui brûlait dessinait monstrueusement sur le mur d'en face ma silhouette agrandie. De temps à autre, un éclair muet survenant tout à coup m'éblouissait les yeux.

J'ai pensé à cet homme qui a commencé là et qui a rempli un demi-siècle du tapage de sa douleur.

Je le voyais d'abord dans ces rues paisibles, vagabondant avec les enfants du village, quand il allait dénicher les hirondelles dans le clocher de l'église ou la fauvette dans les bois. Je me le figurais dans sa petite chambre, triste et le coude sur sa table, regardant la pluie courir sur les carreaux et, au delà de la courtine, les nuées qui passaient pendant que ses rêves s'envolaient ; je me figurais les longs après-midi rêveurs qu'il y avait eus ; je songeais aux amères solitudes de l'adolescence, avec leurs vertiges, leurs nausées et leurs bouffées d'amour qui rendent les cœurs malades. N'est-ce pas ici que fut couvée notre douleur à nous autres, le golgotha même où le génie qui nous a nourris a sué son angoisse ?

Rien ne dira les gestations de l'idée ni les trépidations que font subir à ceux qui les portent les grandes œuvres futures ; mais on s'éprend à voir les lieux où nous savons qu'elles ont été conçues, vécues, comme s'ils avaient gardé quelque chose de l'idéal inconnu qui vibra jadis.

O sa chambre ! sa chambre ! sa pauvre petite chambre d'enfant ! C'est là que tourbillonnaient, l'appelaient des fantômes confus qui tourmentaient ses heures en lui demandant à naître : Atala secouant au vent des Florides les magnolias de sa chevelure ; Velléda, au clair de lune, courant sur la bruyère ; Cy modocée voilant son sein nu sous la griffe des léopards, et la blanche Amélie, et le pâle René !

Un jour, cependant, il la quitte, il s'en arrache, il dit adieu et pour n'y plus revenir au vieux foyer féodal. Le voilà perdu dans Paris et se mêlant aux hommes ; puis, l'inquiétude le prend, il part.

Penché à la proue de son navire, je le vois cherchant un monde nouveau, en pleurant la patrie qu'il abandonne. Il arrive ; il écoute le bruit des cataractes et la chanson des Natchez ; il regarde couler l'eau des grands fleuves paresseux et contempler sur leurs bords briller l'écaillé des serpents avec les yeux des femmes sauvages. Il abandonne son âme aux langueurs de la savane ; de l'un à l'autre, ils s'épanchent leurs mélancolies natives et il épuise le désert comme il avait tari l'amour. Il revient, il parle, et on se tient suspendu à l'enchantement de ce style magnifique, avec sa cambrure royale et sa phrase ondulante, empanachée, dra-pée, orageuse comme le vent des forêts vierges, colorée comme le cou des colibris, tendre comme les rayons de la lune à travers le trèfle des cha-pelles.

Il part encore ; il va, remuant de ses pieds la poussière antique ; il s'asseoit aux Thermopyles et crie : Léonidas ! Léonidas ! court autour du tom-beau d'Achille, cherche Lacédémone, égrène dans ses mains les caroubiers de Carthage, et, comme le pâtre engourdi qui lève la tête au bruit des ca-ravanes, tous ces grands paysages se réveillent quand il passe dans leurs solitudes.

Tour à tour rappelé, proscrit, comblé d'hon-neurs, il dînera ensuite à la table des rois, lui qui s'était évanoui de faim dans les rues ; il sera ambassadeur, ministre, essayera de retenir dans ses mains la monarchie qui s'écroule et, au milieu des ruines de ses croyances, assistera enfin à sa propre gloire, comme s'il était déjà compté parmi les morts.

Né sur le déclin d'une société et à l'aurore d'une autre, il est venu pour en être la transition et comme pour en résumer en lui les espérances et les souvenirs. Il a été l'embaumeur du catholi-cisme et l'acclamateur de la liberté. Homme des vieilles traditions et des vieilles illusions, en poli-tique il fut constitutionnel et en littérature révo-lutionnaire. Religieux d'instinct et d'éducation, c'est lui qui, avant tous les autres, avant Bjron, a poussé le cri le plus sauvage de l'orgueil, exprimé son plus épouvantable désespoir.

Artiste, il eut cela de commun avec ceux du xvme siècle qu'il fut comme eux toujours gêné dans des poétiques étroites, mais qui, débordées à tout instant par l'étendue de son génie, en ont malgré lui craqué dans toute leur circonférence. Comme homme, il a partagé la misère de ceux du xixe siècle ; il a eu leurs préoccupations turbulentes, leurs gravités futiles. Non content d'être grand, il a voulu paraître grandiose, et il s'est trouvé pourtant que cette manie vaniteuse n'a pas effacé sa vraie grandeur. Il n'est point certes de la race des contemplateurs qui ne sont pas descendus dans la vie, maîtres au front serein qui n'ont eu ni siècle, ni patrie, ni famille même. Mais lui, on ne le peut séparer des passions de son temps ; elles l'avaient fait et il en a fait plusieurs. L'avenir peut-être ne lui tiendra pas compte de ses entêtements héroïques et ce seront, sans doute, les épisodes de ses livres qui en immortaliseront les titres avec le nom des causes qu'ils défendaient.

Ainsi, tout seul, devisant en moi-même, je restais accoudé, savourant la nuit douce et me trempant avec plaisir dans l'air froid du matin qui rafraîchissait mes paupières. Petit à petit, le jour venait ; la chandelle allongeait sa mèche noire dans sa flamme pâissante. Le pignon des halles a paru au loin, un coq a chanté ; l'orage avait fui ; quelques gouttes d'eau cependant tombées sur la poussière de la rue y faisaient de grosses taches rondes. Comme je m'assoupissais de fatigue, je me suis recouché et j'ai dormi.

Nous nous en allâmes fort tristes de Combourg ; et puis la fin de notre voyage approchait. Bientôt allait finir cette fantaisie vagabonde que nous menions depuis trois mois avec tant de douceur. Le retour aussi, comme le départ, a ses tristesses anticipées qui vous envoient par avance la fade exhalaison de la vie qu'on traîne.

(*> La tête sur la poitrine, ne parlant pas et regardant sans trop la voir la route vide qui s'allongeait, nous humions l'odeur des feuilles vertes, dandinés au mouvement du cheval qui trottait dans les brancards. Aux montées quand il soufflait, on entendait de dessous le feuillage quelque petit oiseau qui gazouillait. Nous nous arrê tâmes au village de Hédé pour voir les ruines du château, notre guide pour boire un verre de vin blanc, notre cheval pour prendre un picotin d'avoine : à chacun sa pitance.

Il ne reste du château que son enceinte rasée qui sort encore à quelque sept pieds du sol et qui forme comme un grand cirque dont on fait le tour en marchant sur les murs. De là, le paysage se déroulant semble une gigantesque nappe de ver-(*' Inédit, pages 329 à 332. dure rayée par les blanches lignes droites des routes, posée tout à plat dans les prairies, ou onduleuse ailleurs sous le mouvement des collines qui la bombent. Le soleil brillait, les arbres verdoyaient, l'air était bleu ; près de là un ruisseau qui descendait de la colline sautillait de cascades en cascades sur les cailloux.

Un bruit de voiture a passé sur la route ; elle était cachée par les arbres, et nous entendions seulement le glissement rauque de son sabot qui écri- sait la poussière. Au bas de la côte elle s'est ar- rêtée ; j'ai pris mon lorgnon : c'était une vraie berline de voyage, ayant siège par derrière, femme de chambre à un bout, chasseur à l'autre, avec quatre chevaux, deux postillons, couverte de vaches, de boîtes, de cartons, et de parapluies accrochés en dehors dans leur étui de cuir ciré. Les stores de soie jaune étaient baissés, je n'ai dis- tingué personne. Qu'y avait-il là dedans ? pour- quoi voyageaient-ils, ceux-là, s'ils passaient si vite à côté des ruines sans y mettre un peu les pieds, à côté des beaux ombrages sans lever la tête vers eux, et tout près de cette eau courante sans s'asseoir une minute pour en écouter la chanson ?

Le chasseur, quand il eut remis le sabot, re- monta derrière ; les deux postillons claquèrent leur fouet, la voiture partit, elle s'éloignait et se rapetissait à mesure qu'elle filait sur le long ruban de la route. Quelque temps le bruit des galops retentit encore, puis s'affaiblit, s'éteignit. Et nous, nous repartîmes de notre côté. Il était 2 heures environ quand nous arrivâmes à Rennes ; le déjeuner de la table d'hôte était consommé et on nous fit attendre pour les côtelettes.

En nous promenant le soir sur le bord de la Vilaine, du côté des ponts, nous avons vu une sorte de long fourgon où l'on entrait par un esca- lier à double rampe et qui avait, le long de sa caisse, de petites fenêtres carrées à rideaux de coton rouge. La lumière de l'intérieur passant à travers, empourrait les têtes de la foule qui se tenait alentour ; sur le seuil de la voiture, une femme encore jeune, maigre, salement mise, et le front rétréci par des tresses noires relevées sur les oreilles, tenant une baguette à la main et, glapis- sant dans son accent provençal, racontait l'hor- rible combat qui avait eu lieu sur les côtes de Bar- barie entre un marin intrépide et un phoque furieux : on était, cependant parvenu à s'emparer du phoque, on l'avait dompté, éduqué ; il était là, on pouvait le voir.

Nous entrâmes et prîmes rang autour d'un grand baquet obiong dont le dedans peint en gris était relevé par des bandes grenat simulant une tenture. Au-dessus du baquet, un quinquet muni d'un abat-jour en tôle renvoyait sa lumière sur l'eau jaunâtre dans laquelle quelque chose de noir et de long gisait sans bouger. La femme s'en est approchée, l'a frappé d'un petit coup de baguette ; il a sorti sa tête humide, ses narines ressemblant à deux coupures symétriques se dilataient et se contractaient avec bruit, et il vous regardait tristement de ses deux gros yeux noirs ; il a voulu faire un mouvement, mais sa queue s'est heurtée contre les planches ; il s'est tourné sur le dos et nous a montré son ventre blanc, gras encore des viscosités de la mer ; il s'est levé tout droit, a appuyé ses nageoires sur le bord de la cuve, a donné un coup de son museau contre la joue de sa maîtresse, puis il est retombé au fond, en poussant un grand soufflement.

Il n'a plus ces bons flots où il vivait à son aise, ni les larges grèves où il s'étendait au soleil sur les goémons verts !

Comme il avait bien travaillé, on l'a gratifié de deux ou trois anguilles qu'il avalait lentement en les mangeant par le milieu, et les deux bouts lui sortant de la bouche faisaient de chaque côté de son museau comme deux longues moustaches blanches.

Un orgue de Barbarie qui était dans un coin s'est mis aussitôt à tourner une polka, le quinquet filait, sur l'escalier la femme appelait la foule, la représentation était terminée.

Voilà ce que nous vîmes à Rennes. Quand le phoque n'y sera plus, qu'y aura-t-il à y voir ?

FIN XII

De Rennes à Vitré. — Diligence. — Jeune fille très légère qui filait de Rennes ; encore une faute de diagnostic. — ■ Plaisanteries aimables sur les lanciers, la lance, le piston.

VITRÉ. — Doves devant l'hôtel Sévigné, grande maison blanche où nous sommes descendus. — Vieux château : deux tours à toit aigu ; à gauche, un bouquet d'arbres et tourelle carrée ; dans l'intérieur, puits très large. — Intérieur des maisons reçoit le jour d'en haut ; escaliers en bois, tournant carrément, comme à Morlaix, comme à Rennes. — Une rare émotion ; tours le long ou plutôt dans la ville. — Jolie route pour aller aux Rochers, à travers les bois : il n'y a pas de rochers aux Rochers. A — Maison en angle : rotonde de la chapelle, cuisine honnête. — Salon au rez-de-chaussée. — Le portrait de M<sup>TM</sup> de Sévigné n'est pas l'original de Mignard à coup sûr ; plusieurs autres portraits de l'époque sont détériorés. — Chambre de M<sup>TM</sup>* de S. : lit doré en damas rouge ; cabinet, bourdaloue en porcelaine peinte, fauteuil bas en tapisserie blanche et verte ; table de toilette, ustensiles en laque rouge, boîtes rondes, grosse brosse en crin blanc. — Pluie, lac, sous les arbres, sous la cahute des sabotiers, odeur des bois. —

Table d'hôte : M. Menars, M. Marin, M. de Couesnon.

De Vitré À Fougères. — Normandie. — Notre conducteur nous parle du marquis de Letumière, père des propriétaires actuels des Rochers, qui le menaçait de son pistolet pour aller au galop et qui aimait à se faire verser dans sa voiture en tôle ; il se déguisait avec ses amis en charbonnier.

Vitré. — Chaire extérieure comme à Guérande.

Fougères. — Aspect solide des tours, tes remparts sont couverts de verdure. — La partie seule des fortifications qui descendait dans la vallée subsiste. — Jolie porte avec deux tours ; un grand acacia, chute d'eau ; les tours sont en fer à cheval comme à Saint-Malo. — Grande vue de l'esplanade sous l'église. — Forêt. — Fabrique de verre.

A Vire, À Mort-Ain même les bonnets de coton commencent. — Nuit en diligence, jour gris se lève, plaques d'argent dans le ciel bleu mat, puis lignes d'or que déchirent les clochers de Caen. — Promenade dans les prairies ; hippodrome pour les courses. — Saint-Etienne : superbe roman ; le cintre des premières galeries est très large, jolis chapiteaux des colonnes de la nef, comme des ventres ; dans le chœur : archivolt, ornementation d'un bâton passé dans des anneaux ; un homme (dans un des bas côtés, à droite vers le milieu) qui se pollue (?). — Saint-Jean : gothique, bas, lourd, lustres de cristal dans le chœur donnent de l'animation à l'église ; elle tombe à gauche, surtout l'entrée, la maison voisine la soutient. — Église Saint-Pierre : vilaine voûte à cause de l'entrecroisement exagéré des nervures, surtout à l'abside où courent dessus des arabesques ; le mélange des formes carrées Renaissance des culs-de-lampe avec les formes ogivales choque.

H n'est rien de pire que la statue de Louis XIV sur la place Royale, tout nu, avec un casque et une épée. — Effet superbe de « palais de l'université », faculté de droit, de médecine, des lettres, etc. — Rien au musée d'histoire naturelle. On ne peut pas s'empêcher, en voyant des collections de province, de regretter tout l'argent inutile que ça a coûté. — Buste de Dumont d'Urville ; toujours le grand homme local ! parce qu'il était du pays de Condé-sur-Noireau. Musée de Caen. — Le marquis d'Argenson mort en 1721 : grande perruque noire, rabat, yeux et sourcils noirs forts, nez un peu busqué, narines fortes, bouche discrète, menton fourchu, regard ironique, mais plus malin que railleur ; toute la gravité reste dans le bas du visage.

La seconde révélation de sainte Catherine (Albert Durer), mais me paraît plus jeune, plus coloré : la Vierge et la Sainte, grands cheveux épars, roux, ondes et tombant menu au bout sur leurs tailles ; deux autres femmes au premier plan, rousses ; id. celle de droite, assise, grande robe rouge étalée à lourds plis ; celle de gauche, robe verdâtre, assise, corsage jaune, manteau rouge à collet d'hermine ; dans le fond, paysage, maison, un vieux serviteur en chaperon qui apporte des fruits.

Portrait de Mme de Parabère entourée d'une guirlande de fleurs : un nègre en bas en manche jaune ; Mme de Parabère, cheveux noirs, frisés naturellement sur le front, dénoués, répandus sur les épaules, le visage dégagé, figure ronde, petite bouche, petit nez, air jovial et polisson, yeux bleus, sourcils blonds ; le portrait est par Coypel, la guirlande par Fontenay.

Beau portrait de magistrat de Tournières : en perruque, cheveux d'une fausse couleur blonde, animé, laid, fin, maigre, yeux rouges, chairs molles de vieillard ; cet homme-là devait être en droit ce que Boileau était en littérature ; l'animation de l'étroite pupille à coin blanc (celui où la lumière tombe) éclatante dans son œil bleu.

Parti de Caen après le dîner à 6 heures en tilbury. — Longue promenade au bord de l'eau sous des arbres, très triste à cause du jour vert ; à travers la campagne peuplée ; village. Je sentais que j'approchais de Trouville ; sans connaître les lieux, je les retrouvais et jam redibant multa prae- terita. — Passage du bac ; le petit cheval blanc un peu ombrageux avait peur.

Dives. — Le vétérinaire ivre. — Nous emplissons nos gourdes et nous partons. La lune brillait, au loin, au fond de la mer, le phare du Havre ; nous montons la côte de Houlgate et nous nous perdons ; traversée dans un champ, broussailles, mauvais terrains. La lune nous éclairait et nous perdait, les rigoles qu'on ne voyait pas mouillaient le terrain où nous enfoncions ; enfin, après beaucoup de peines et d'efforts, nous parvenons à la grève. — Marée basse, sable brun rouge. La lune, toute basse sur les montagnes derrière nous, prolongeait notre ombre à nos côtés ; elle brillait. Phosphorescence dans les flaques d'eau ; les étincelles filaient des deux côtés de notre soulier quand nous marchions dedans. Nous étions plus silencieux que la nuit et plus sombres qu'elle, car elle était sereine et douce. J'ai eu un instant un épouvamment de la nature, je sentais trop qu'elle m'envahissait ; à peine de temps à autre échangeions-nous un "Eh bien, vieux" qui retombait de suite. Quelquefois des ombres grandissaient et des douaniers s'approchaient de nous avec cet air particulier qu'on a quand on s'aborde la nuit. Nous leur demandions si nous étions loin de Trouville. — Barque dans laquelle il y avait des filets. Max était harassé et a songé à la bonne partie de novembre que cette barque-là m'a remise en mémoire. Il y avait cinq ans à même époque, par une nuit chaude aussi, j'allais à pied pour gagner Trouville tout seul. Le jour venait, et j'y allais maintenant ; mais je ne devais pas cette fois y trouver une famille et en remporter une affection ; je devais n'y trouver que des souvenirs et n'en remporter pour le pays lui-même qu'une sorte de haine mouillée.

Lumières du quai. — Lieutenant de douane qui faisait son inspection avec son petit chien qui rôdait. — Marais. Nous roulons dans les joncs, nous arrivons enfin à la lumière du poteau qui reculait toujours. Max reste pendant que je vais réveiller le passager qui se réveille et consent à grande peine à nous passer ; j'ai du mal à me reconnaître sur le quai. J'entre et le père et la mère David ne me reconnaissent pas, il faut me nommer. Est-ce qu'on se reconnaît ? Se reconnaît-on soi-même ! Nous buvons une bouteille de vin, nous mangeons un morceau de fromage de P L. — Cuisine ! fauteuil. — Entre un monsieur en redingote grise et en bottes à l'écuyère.

Le lendemain, politesses de L., promenade à cheval à Bonneville et à Saint-Arnaud : à Bonneville on détruit la vieille maison et on en fait une neuve, autrefois j'y fis une bonne promenade avec Alfred. — Dames auxquelles Max cueille des bouquets. — A Saint-Arnaud, équipages au coin d'une haie. On y a bâti beaucoup de maisons, fait une route ; dans la chapelle, on a découvert un caveau où il y a beaucoup d'ossements et on a réparé le chœur ! Dans l'église, les mêmes arbres, les mêmes piliers quand j'y venais dessiner avec le père Dumée ; ça, au moins, n'a pas changé. En revenant sur la route je reconnais le curé de Touques "Vous autres, jeunes de Paris, dans vos soupers fins ». En face le parc aux huîtres, char à banc de maître à siège élevé, conduit par quelque vieux général en chapeau de paille, décoré ; mouvement de côté du fouet. — Tout est changé, tout, tout ; j'ai du mal à me retrouver et mon souvenir est effarouché par les mutations de cette même nature à laquelle il se cramponnait. La terre même nous fuit de dessous les pieds ; il n'y a pas que les cœurs qui changent, le sol aussi, les maisons aussi, les pavés aussi. O mon pauvre petit cottage et mes deux autres maisons, comme on vous a éteints, surtout une, la plus chère. Dans la salle à manger, je revois les tables différentes, c'est maintenant un papier qui représente la Fiancée d'Abydos. Drôle de chose, il me semble qu'autrefois, dans le coin du fond à gauche, le soleil couchant donnait ses rayons rouges ; mon souvenir est bien fidèle pourtant. Est-ce que le soleil aussi aurait changé ? Non, c'était alors réverbération des sables à marée basse, dont la couleur éclairait les carreaux. — Course au chalet. — Notre ami Ulric. Voilà un homme qui, après avoir fait....., en est revenu au bourgeois le plus convenable ; le bourgeois est donc la fin de tout !

CRIQUEBŒUF, nous n'entrons pas ; Villerville que nous traversons seulement. Nous faisons descendre nos chevaux par le chemin des douaniers. — Dîner chez M. Guetier ; promenade le soir (avec eux ! ) sur la grève ; le lendemain, déjeuner où l'on boit parce qu'il faut boire, et offert parce qu'il avait fallu l'offrir. Mais que c'est triste et bête tout cela ! Comme c'est peu selon le cœur ! Et cette pluie qui tombait et qui a duré toute la journée, comme elle était harmonique, elle, avec le fond de nous !

Honfleur. — Pluie sur les bassins. — Dîner ; je me surpasse dans la composition d'une sauce anglaise. Je retrouve la mine de tous les domestiques que j'avais oubliée, comme le lendemain matin celle de deux canotiers du canot. Reconnaître quelqu'un dont on avait perdu complètement l'idée, c'est retrouver toujours quelque chose de soi-même ; on se dit : tiens, c'est vrai, j'ai eu ça autrefois,... je l'avais perdu, je le regagne. Ah ! Ah !

Dans le canot, curé avec son papier ciré sur son cha peau, froid, malaise ; en vain je tâche de me réchauffer à la chaudière. L'agent comptable de la "Normandie" m'était également sorti de la mémoire ! encore un qui revient ! — La joueuse de harpe et la joueuse de guitare : laideur violente et empoignante de la première ; tout ce que j'ai discerné dans leurs chansons, c'est amour, bonheur, etc. Deux religieuses, près de là, s'en sont allées, sans doute de peur d'être troublées, de se sentir venir à l'esprit des images libidineuses. Ah ! les pauvres filles, ça m'en faisait peu venir, à moi. — Déjeuner. — C'est bizarre, mais je ne me suis pas ennuyé sur notre vapeur.

Entre Caudebec et Duclair ( ? ), je reconnais un endroit, une anfractuosit  sur la rive gauche, entre deux mamelons bois s, et je me souviens que, une fois que j'y passai,   un voyage de P ques, en 1841, avec Caroline, ma m re et M<sup>re</sup> Jame, nous  tions l  sur le bastingage de gauche cau- sant avec la femme du restaurant et trois jeunes gens qui ont p ri au chemin de fer de Meudon. Il faisait froid et  tait vers 6 heures du soir, au mois d'avril il n'y avait presque personne   bord, c' tait un des premiers voyages de la saison.

J'ai repens    un voyage en bateau   vapeur des Andelys   Rouen avec Alfred : nous  tions sales, las et tristes de m me, mais alors sans cause ; les voix gr les des deux femmes, le son boiseux de la guitare, le son m tallique de la harpe s'en allaient,  cras s par le bruit des roues, par celui de l'eau fendue par la proue ; le mouvement de la vapeur saccadait tout cela.

La Bouille. — Le soir, Max arrange mon troph e, et le lendemain, adieu.

 crit   Caumont, 28 juillet, mercredi soir, 9 heures et demie   11 heures. — Il y a un an ; j' tais   Paris : feu d'artifice des f tes de juillet, vu des hauteurs ; je faisais du sentiment, j'en ressens maintenant, il y a harmonie dans cet anniversaire.

PYRENEES.

BORDEAUX.

Il y a des gens qui la veille de leur départ ont tout préparé dans leur poche : encrier rempli, érudition placardée, émotions indiquées d'avance. Heureuses et puériles natures qui se jouent avec elles-mêmes et se chatouillent pour se faire rire, comme dit Rabelais. Il en est d'autres, au contraire, qui se refusent à tout ce qui leur vient du dehors, se rembrunissent, tirent la visière de leur casquette et de leur esprit pour ne rien voir. Je crois qu'il est difficile de garder, ici comme ailleurs, le juste milieu exquis préconisé par la sagesse, point géométrique et idéal placé au centre de l'espace, de l'infini de la bêtise humaine. Je vais tâcher néanmoins d'y atteindre et de me donner de l'esprit, du bon sens et du goût ; bien plus, je n'aurai aucune prétention littéraire et je ne tâcherai pas de faire du style ; si cela arrive, que ce soit à mon insu comme une métaphore qu'on emploie faute de savoir s'exprimer par le sens littéral. Je m'abstiendrai donc de toute déclamation et je ne me permettrai que six fois par page le mot pittoresque et une douzaine de fois celui d'admirable. Les voyageurs disent le premier à tous les tas de cailloux et le second à toutes les bornes, il me sera bien permis de le stéréotyper à toutes mes phrases, qui, pour vous rassurer, sont d'ailleurs fort longues.

Ceci est un préambule que je me suis permis et qu'on aurait pu intituler le marchepied, pour indiquer les émotions que j'avais en montant en voiture, ce qui veut dire que je n'en avais aucune. Je m'assassinerais si je croyais que j'eusse la pensée de faire ici quelque chose d'un peu sérieux : je veux tout bonnement, avec ma plume, jeter sur le papier un peu de la poussière de mes habits ; je veux que mes phrases sentent le cuir de mes souliers de voyage et qu'elles n'aient ni dessus de pieds, ni bretelles, ni pommade qui ruisselle en grasses périodes, ni cosmétique qui les tienne raides en expressions ardues, mais que tout soit simple, franc et bon, libre et dégagé comme la tournure des femmes d'ici, avec les poings sur les hanches et l'œil gaillard, le nez fin s'il est possible et avant tout point de corset, mais que la taille soit bien faite. Cet engagement pris, me voilà lié moi-même et je suis forcé d'avoir le style d'un honnête homme.

La campagne de Paris est triste, l'œil va loin sans rencontrer de verdure ; de grandes roues qui tirent les pierres des carrières, un maigre cheval flanqué d'un petit âne tirant des tombereaux de fumier, du pavé, le cliquetis des glaces et cet indéfinissable vide d'esprit qui vous prend aux moments du départ, voilà tout ce que j'ai vu, voilà tout ce que j'ai senti. Certes, je ne demandais pas mieux que de me fouiller l'esprit pour penser au xvie siècle en passant par Longjumeau, et de là par une association d'idées me laisser couler dans Brantôme et en plein Médicis, mais je n'en avais pas le cœur, de même qu'à Montléry, la tour ne m'a point rappelé de souvenirs. Expression des plus charmantes surtout comme il en arrive dans la bouche de ceux qui ne savent rien et qui l'adoptent par passion historique.

Quand je me suis réveillé le lendemain matin, la campagne avait changé ; il y avait de grands champs de vignes, éclairés du soleil levant, et c'était l'air frais du matin, à 5 heures, dans le mois d'août. Insensiblement le terrain s'abaisse et par une pente douce vous mène aux bords de la Loire que vous longez sur une chaussée de 17 lieues, depuis Blois jusqu'à Tours. Honnête pays, paysages bourgeois, nature comme on l'entend dans la poésie descriptive ; c'est là la Loire, mince filet d'eau au milieu d'un grand lit plein de sable, avec des bateaux qui se traînent à la remorque la voile haute, étroite et à moitié enflée par le vent sans vigueur. D'un autre côté, et sous un certain point de vue de symbolisme littéraire, ce pays m'a semblé représenter une face de la littérature française. A mesure que vous avancez, la vallée se déploie, les arbres de l'autre bord se mirent tranquillement dans l'eau, les coteaux boisés disparaissent les uns après les autres ; on aimerait ici à mettre pied à terre, à s'étendre sur l'herbe, à écouter le bruit de cette pauvre eau paisible, que je n'appelle pas onde ; ce n'est ni grand, ni beau, ni bien vert, mais c'est, si vous voulez, un refrain de Charles d'Orléans, pas plus, où la naïveté seule a une certaine tendresse qui n'est pas même du sentiment, tant c'est faible et calme, mais tranquille est doux.

Il ne faut rien moins que la vue de Blois pour faire penser à quelque chose de plus vigoureux et vous remettre en mémoire la cour d'Henri III. Hélas ! je n'ai point vu le château où Henri se vengea de sa peur, ni ce lit, comme dit Chateaubriand, où tant d'ignominies firent mourir tant de gloire ; la rapidité de ma course m'a à peine laissé la vue des murs extérieurs.

Si j'avais été un beau gentilhomme tourangeau comme ceux à qui je pensais alors, marchant dans son xvie siècle, les mains dans les poches et le large chapeau sur les oreilles, ou s'acheminant sur sa mule aux États de Blois, je n'aurais pas manqué de relire mon Rabelais à l'ombre de ces vignes où il dormit ; car il a vécu là. Ces sentiers sur le sable, dans les roseaux, il y a fait sieste un certain jour peut-être qu'il était soûlas ; son rire a retenti le long des peupliers qui bordent la rivière ; cette voix de Gargantua a rebondi sur ces coteaux, s'en est allée le long de ce courant calme et doux se perdre dans l'Océan plein de clameurs que toutes les autres dérisions ont grossi avec elle ; le géant a marché dans ces larges plaines, sous ce soleil doux ; il lui fallait chaque jour le lait de 3,600 vaches qu'il buvait à large pipée. Toute la contrée est faite à sa taille : plaines larges, arbres frais, eau calme, grand lit qui s'emplit parfois, avenue sans fin qui tourne au fastidieux par sa longueur.

Du reste rien d'original, rien de coloré, une platitude toute française jusqu'à Tours. Je me rappelle seulement trois petites filles qui m'ont demandé l'aumône à Montbazou, le premier relais en sortant de cette ville ; l'aînée surtout, qui avait dix ans à peine, m'a donné la première idée du Midi : pieds nus, elle courait dans la poussière en suivant la portière ; sa voix, qui répétait en crescendo la charité ! la charité ! la charité, avait quelque chose de nasillard et de glapissant ; des cheveux noirs et collés de sueur, un teint de bistre, des dents blanches qui se sont montrées à moi dans un éclat de rire enfantin quand la voiture est partie au galop. Charmante peinture de farce enfantine et de grâce naïve, perdue au milieu de la grande route et que m'a valu l'appât prolongé d'une petite pièce de deux sous.

A Poitiers, le Midi commence : larges bonnets, moins gracieux toutefois que ceux de Montbazou, quelque chose de sévère, autant que j'ai pu en juger par un mauvais dîner et me rappelant que le Poitou est la patrie des... Je garde un souvenir plus gracieux d'Angoulême et de la colline où elle est bâtie. On commence à rencontrer des attelages de bœufs qui m'ont fait penser au tableau de Léopold Robert. Les postillons ont le béret rouge des Basques et le pantalon à galons, les chevaux sont plus petits, plus efflanqués ; les toits deviennent plats ; les tuiles rouges et bosselées qui les couvrent, les murs blancs des maisons dont le faîte n'est pas souvent plus haut que les vignes, tout cela c'est bien du Midi. Partout cheveux noirs et barbes fortes, costumes bigarrés comme dans un bal masqué, des paysans battant le blé devant leur grange. Quand vous passez dans ces petits villages blancs comme la campagne où ils sont assis et comme le soleil qui les éclaire, que vous tournez aux angles de mur uni, percé de petites fenêtres, on se croirait, j'imagine, en Espagne.

Vous n'êtes plus assailli, comme dans le Poitou, de femmes qui exploitent la soif ou la pitié du voyageur, seulement la poussière tourbillonne et le soleil darde ; point de bruit ni de chants dans la campagne. Pour rendre la ressemblance plus parfaite, le rapport plus juste, à Savignac j'ai eu une véritable apparition moresque : pendant que nous relayons, un contrevent vert s'est ouvert, une main est d'abord aperçue (pour qu'on ne m'accuse pas trop d'exploration féminine, je déclare que c'est sur la découverte de mon grave et savant compagnon M. Cloquet), une main, puis un profil, puis deux, deux têtes noires avec un sourcil superbe à peine entrevues ! Dérision ! une plaque jaune me fait conjecturer que c'étaient les deux filles du notaire.

Ce qu'on appelle ordinairement un bel homme est une chose assez bête ; jusqu'à présent, j'ai peur que Bordeaux ne soit une belle ville. Grandes rues, places ouvertes, beaucoup de mouchoirs sur des têtes brunes, telle est la phrase synthétique dans laquelle je la résume avant d'en savoir davantage. Il me faut pour que je l'aime quelque chose de plus que son pont, que les pantalons blancs de ses commerçants, que ses rues alignées et son port qui est le type du port. Il n'y fait, selon moi, ni assez chaud ni assez froid ; il n'y a rien d'incisif et d'accentué : c'est un Rouen méridional, avec une Garonne aux eaux bourbeuses. Je comptais donc me jeter à l'eau et me laisser entraîner par le courant, m'étendre dans le duvet moelleux du fleuve, couche suave dont les draps limpides vous baisent la peau. Imaginez un espace fermé où l'eau reste stagnante comme dans un bocal, comparaison peu flatteuse pour ceux qui y vivent même momentanément, des grilles en bois qui empêchent l'air de circuler et même de vider l'eau, une atmosphère de cigare éteint, de la boue et des oies qui y pataugeaient, telle était l'école de natation. J'hésitai à y souiller mes membres, mon héroïsme m'y fit plonger jusqu'au coude, car un plancher bourgeois remplace le lit du fleuve, de sorte qu'il n'y a pas même la possibilité de se mouiller la tête sans crainte de tomber sur le plancher. Allez-vous donc ici vous reposer dans l'herbe, effleurer du bout du nez les pointes dardées des roseaux, remuer les cailloux au fond du lit, monter à califourchon sur les câbles étendus et suivre la barque grillée où l'on entend des voix ? Vous voulez de la fraîcheur, du silence, de l'ombrage, de l'eau claire et caressante, et vous avez la puanteur des ruisseaux, le cri des tavernes, la chaleur grasse qui suinte des murs ; car l'onde ici est empoisonnée, le cours arrêté, tant ils sont habiles à souiller ce qui purifie, à salir ce qui lave !

J'ai pourtant vu aujourd'hui, en plein soleil, une nacelle couverte d'une tente carrée, sous laquelle on doit bien dormir et d'où cette pauvre Garonne doit apparaître belle aux clairs de lune quand la ville s'est tue et que les hommes laissent parler les joncs dans le courant. J'y rêverais volontiers de l'Inde et du Gange, avec les cadavres qu'il charrie comme des feuilles et que le soir les vautours viennent becqueter avec de grands cris. J'aurais tout autant aimé passer ainsi ma soirée que d'aller comme j'ai fait tout à l'heure dîner en ville, chez un brave homme dans toute la force du terme, à sa maison de campagne qui est dans un faubourg, pour boire d'excellent vin, j'en conviens, dont la digestion a été gâtée par des romances au piano et deux cigarettes au Maryland, musique d'épiciers, tabac de clerc de notaire, le tout fadasse et doux comme du jus de nojau. Je crois qu'il a été question d'un air italien de Rossini chanté en français. Pauvre Rossini ! plus disséqué que mes cadavres du Gange, et par des becs féminins encore, ce qui est pis. Le salon et la salle à manger étaient ornés d'insectes et d'oiseaux adaptés verticalement à la muraille dans des boîtes garnies de vitres. J'ai promis de la graine de melon à mon cordial amphytrion. Le dîner après tout a été aimable, et je me suis un peu réconcilié avec ma voisine qui, au premier abord, m'a eu tout l'air d'une bécasse qui a peur de se mouiller les pieds dans de l'eau claire ; et voici pourquoi. J'étais débarqué d'omnibus par une chaleur confortable, ficelé et tiré dans mes dessous de pieds, avec une cravate de satin toute neuve, le lorgnon au bouton du gilet et des gants de la plus scrupuleuse blancheur dont mon bras avait l'air de sortir tant la main y était enchevêtrée. Après les salutations d'introduction on fit un tour de jardin ; le bon ton le plus exquis régnait dans mes manières, je laissais marcher seule dans les allées une jeune dame, la fille de la maison, dans la crainte de faire l'empressé. Me trouvant simplement près d'elle, je lui offris enfin mon bras qu'elle refusa, ce que je trouvais de fort mauvais goût ; car aussitôt je fis un retour sur moi-même où je ne me flattai pas médiocrement, et je repassai dans un éclair tous mes avantages physiques et intellectuels, avec une telle lucidité que j'en rougis presque d'humilité. Au reste, on enfonçait dans les allées du jardin comme dans des landes, et ce que j'y trouvais de plus beau, c'est le chant des cri-cris le soir, après dîner, qui valait mieux que les maigres accords du piano asthmatique.

Puisque j'en suis au jardin, j'ai vu aussi hier le cimetière de Bordeaux, grand jardin planté d'érables, où les tombes sont, je crois, plus bêtes que les vivants trépassés qu'elles renferment ; les pauvres habitent au milieu et ont l'avantage de ne point porter de nom et de regrets peints sur bois ou gravés sur pierre.

La vanité ici a eu recours à la bêtise qui l'a bien secondée. Des pyramides de granit sont entassées sur des épiciers, des sarcophages de marbre sur des armateurs ; au jour du jugement ceux qui ont le plus de pierre sur eux ne seront peut-être pas les plus prompts à monter au ciel, chargés qu'ils seront du poids de leur orgueil. Le concierge avait l'air piteux et rapace, sa mâchoire a souri comme une tombe qui s'ouvre quand il nous a vus entrer. Les cyprès étaient poudreux, déjà des feuilles jaunes étaient dans l'herbe, rien que la platitude du lieu était triste.

Un voyageur est tenu de dire tout ce qu'il a vu, son grand talent est de raconter dans l'ordre chronologique : déjeuner au café et au lait, monté en fiacre, station au cours de la borne, musée, bibliothèque, cabinet d'histoire naturelle, le tout assaisonné d'émotions et de réflexions sur les ruines ; je m'y conformerai donc autant qu'il sera possible.

J'étais curieux de voir le musée d'antiques pour expliquer à mes compagnons deux bas-reliefs dont j'avais lu la description le matin, mais je ne les ai point retrouvés et M. Cloquet, par intuition, m'en a nommé un que je ne reconnais pas.

Mauvais sort de savant. A la bibliothèque j'ai touché le manuscrit de Montaigne avec autant de vénération qu'une relique, car il y a aussi des reliques profanes. Les additions qui sont en marge sont nombreuses, surchargées, mais nettes et sans rature, écrites comme le reste de veine primesautière ; c'est plus souvent une extension qu'une correction de la pensée ou du mot, ce qui arrive pourtant quelquefois par scrupule d'artiste et pour rendre son idée avec toutes ses nuances.

J'ai feuilleté ce livre avec plus de religion historique, si cela peut se dire, que je suis entré avec recueillement dans la cathédrale de Bordeaux, église qui veut faire la gothique, mais qui trahit le sol païen où elle est bâtie, alliance de deux architectures, amalgame de deux idées qui ne produit rien de beau. Le jubé est orné de sculptures mignardes et bien ouvragées qui seraient mieux à quelque rendez-vous de chasse de François Ier, à quelque boudoir de pierre au milieu des bois, pour y renfermer à l'heure de midi la maîtresse du roi ; des arceaux romans s'étendent tout le long de l'église, et les ogives supérieures forment la voûte, ogives rondes encore, quoi qu'elles fassent, qui n'ont pas eu la force de s'élever au ciel dans un élan d'amour et qui sont retombées presque en plein cintre, accablées et fatiguées. On a remplacé les anciens vitraux par des neufs, de sorte que le soleil entre malgré les rideaux qu'on a tendus, fait mille jeux de lumière rians sur les dalles, ce qui emporte l'esprit loin du lieu saint dans les champs, sous les vignes. J'ai pensé alors à nos bonnes églises du Nord où il fait toujours sombre et toujours froid, où les peintures des vitraux ne laissent pénétrer que des rayons mystiques qui se reflètent sévèrement, pleins de mélancolie, sur les dalles grises. Si vous montez aux clochers, vous voyez toute la plaine de Bordeaux, blanche et illuminée ; le ciel est bleu et les tours octogones se détachent sur ce fond limpide ; la terre et le ciel se confondent à l'horizon dans leur blancheur, et l'esprit charmé et fatigué retombe de toute la hauteur des tours sur ce sol qui attédie les âmes.

J'ai voulu grimper aux échelles et aller jusqu'au haut, mais j'ai senti le vertige venir ; des jours partis d'en bas me montaient entre les rayons des échelles et les fentes des charpentes, je suis redescendu avec plaisir tout content d'avoir à temps fui la peur. L'orgue, qu'on recommandait pendant que nous visitions l'église, bourdonnait comme une grosse mouche.

C'est dans la tour Saint-Michel que se trouve le fameux caveau corroyeur, qui a la propriété de tanner les hommes ; ingénieux caveau qui n'a pas été aux écoles d'arts et métiers et qui fait de peaux de chrétiens des peaux d'ânes, car j'atteste qu'elles sont toutes dures, brunes, coriaces et retentissantes. Je suis désespéré de ne pas avoir eu d'idées fantastiques au milieu de ces vénérables momies ; je ne suis pas assez sensible non plus pour que cela m'ait fait horreur ; j'avoue que je me suis assez diverti à contempler les grimaces de tous ces cadavres de diverses grandeurs, dont les uns ont l'air de pleurer, les autres de sourire, tous d'être éveillés et de vous regarder comme vous les regardez. Qui sait ? ce sont peut-être eux qui vivent et qui s'amuse à nous voir venir les voir. Ils se tenaient en rond autour d'un caveau circulaire, dont le sol est monté à moitié des arceaux, car ces morts-là sont debout sur 17 pieds d'autres morts, et ceux-ci sur d'autres sans doute, et nous, face à face avec les premiers. On vient, on les examine à la lanterne, le gardien leur fait sonner la poitrine pour faire voir qu'elle est dure ; on passe au suivant et, quand la revue est passée, on remonte l'escalier. C'est là leur métier, à ces morts ; on les a retirés de dessous terre, et on les a alignés en cercle ; l'un a 100 ans, l'autre 80, etc., un troisième 76, tous aussi âgés les uns que les autres pourtant ! Quand on vous a raconté leur genre de mort et que vous avez donné vos dix sous, tout est dit et vous faites place à d'autres. J'envie ici le sort de ces braves morts tannés qu'on va voir nus (car la mort n'a pas de pudeur) ; il y a une négresse qui a encore un air d'odalisque, un portefaix, joli garçon de plus de 6 pieds, superbe à voir, et un comte du pays tué en duel. Je ne demande pas à être plus célèbre, car il y a bien des gens vertueux, des poètes et des membres de l'Institut qui ne sont pas aussi curieux à voir que ces cuirs racornis, et qui n'auront jamais le renom de cette poussière obscure.

Le christianisme n'est point sérieux à Bordeaux. L'église est entourée d'un ancien cimetière où entre autres dorment les Girondins ( Vergniaud, et sur l'affirmation d'un ancien camarade de Julien, M. Mabitte, médecin de Bordeaux) converti maintenant en promenade. Ici c'est pire qu'à Saint-Michel, les vivants ne marchent plus seulement sur les morts, ils y font l'amour et on nomme ce lieu l'allée d'Amour, antithèse à la Shakespeare, où se trouvent opposés tout ce que la vie a de beau, tout ce que la mort a de hideux. A côté, sous ces arbres dont l'ombrage est si doux dans le Midi, l'église n'a guère de valeur ; l'amour nargue le ciel et se pose sur les tombeaux.

Sainte-Croix, vieux temple païen, église à demi romane, d'un beau roman du reste ; les phallus sont multipliés dans les murs. La petite église Saint-Pierre est badigeonnée, ouverte au soleil et rit dans ses peintures de théâtre. Non loin, dans la rue de la Bahuterie, je viens de voir une petite façade de maison qui vaut bien à elle tous les monuments de Bordeaux pour les nombreuses conjectures qu'on peut en faire sortir : le panneau principal est occupé par une figure humaine à trois faciès, quatre yeux servent aux trois figures, emblème de la Trinité ; à droite et à gauche, sont des chevaux ailés, plus bas un griffon ; dans une autre cour une tête d'homme couverte d'un turban. Un caractère asiatique persan ressort de cette énigme de pierre, attribuée par mon cicérone à l'invention d'un membre du parlement, alchimiste autrefois célèbre. Symbolisme curieux qui se rattacherait peut-être aux dogmes orientaux du moyen âge. Est-ce qu'Arriman serait venu si loin jusque dans l'anglaise Gascogne ? Un homme du peuple disait près de là que c'était l'hôpital des pauvres. Que conclure de tout ceci ? Rien que du vague.

Comme il faut essentiellement s'instruire en voyage, je me suis laissé mener à la manufacture de porcelaine de M. Johnston, dans laquelle nous avons été pilotés par un petit homme rempli de suffisance, d'ailleurs extrêmement poli pour nous. Pendant deux heures nous avons marché au milieu des cruches, tasses, pots, plats et assiettes de différentes grandeurs et je m'ennuyais si bien que je n'étais point dans la mienne. Je sens au rebours des autres, est-ce ma faute ? Mais je n'aime point à voir travailler et suer la pauvre humanité ; j'aime autant la voir dormir. Voilà un sentiment qu'un philanthrope ne comprendrait guère, j'imagine, mais ce n'est jamais sans être froissé que je vois piteusement entassés des enfants et des jeunes filles sous des vitres et dans une atmosphère lourde, tandis qu'à côté, derrière la muraille, s'étend la campagne, l'herbe verte, la forêt ombreuse, le lac si frais, le champ de vignes tout doré. On nous vante le bonheur matériel du monde moderne et la douceur de l'enchâssement social, et, reportant sur le passé un immense regard de pitié, nous faisons les capables et les forts, nous nous rengorgeons dans notre linge frais et dans nos maisons bien fermées, qui sont plus vides, hélas, que les caravansérails délabrés de l'Orient, abandonnés qu'ils sont à tous les vents qui dessèchent, où nous habitons seuls, sans dieux et sans fées, sans passé et sans avenir, sans orgueil de nos ancêtres, sans espoir religieux dans notre postérité, sans gloires ni armoiries sur nos portes, ni sans christ au chevet.

Quand nous entrons dans les ateliers, on levait la tête pour voir les étrangers, quelques-uns la détournait avec mépris vers M. Alexandre, les autres continuaient silencieusement ; on n'entendait que le bruit de la meule qui tournait et celui de l'argile clapotée dans l'eau. Est-ce que cela n'est pas triste que de voir ce travail morne et sérieux, cette machine composée d'hommes aller sans bruit, tant d'intelligences travailler sous le même niveau ? Il y a de beaux enfants du Midi, aux jeux noirs, au sourcil arqué, au teint cuivré et qui se courbent et qui pétrissent la terre glaise. Autant valaient des coups de lance et même la famine dans les camps ; mais de l'air au moins, du soleil, de l'action et des coups d'épée en rase campagne, quelque chose qui anoblisse et qui grandisse ! Je sais bien qu'il y a quelque chose d'étroit à tout considérer ainsi sous un petit point de vue sentimental et étriqué, que c'est fausser l'histoire et nier le mouvement que de lapider le présent par le passé, les modernes par les anciens ; j'en demande pardon et je trouve cela assez bête, mais que voulez-vous ? C'est l'image d'un garçon de 14 ans environ, dont les cheveux ras, la tête osseuse et le regard singulièrement triste et élevé, mis en parallèle avec le bambin puant de vanité, faisant le maître et les tutoyant tous ; pauvre enfant qui est peut-être né de la plus pure argile, poète destiné à contenir l'ambrosie des suaves pensées, vase d'élection dont on souille la forme et qu'on fait commun, usuel, utile, propre à faire boire les pourceaux. Rien n'y manque pour l'abrutissement, pas même une école. Vous croyez que le soir, quand le bras est fatigué, l'oreille assourdie, ils peuvent s'étendre sur l'herbe, regarder la lune, courir les champs par bandes joyeuses pour manger le raisin mûr, aimer sous les arbres ? Fi donc ! et la morale ? Les mains lavées, ils montent un étage, du mortier matériel ils passent au gâchis spirituel ; on leur montre à lire, à écrire ; on leur enseigne l'histoire, la géographie, les quatre règles ; aux plus avancés on lit le Journal des Connaissances utiles ; dans les chaudes soirées d'été ils écoutent (le maître à la lueur des quinquets qui fument, ils tournent le dos au ciel bleu resplendissant d'étoiles pour regarder le tableau rayé des chiffres, pour écouter la théorie des quatre règles, au lieu de chanter les chansons que leurs pères, dans leur jeunesse, ont chantées à leurs mères, le soir, assis sur le banc devant leur maison.

J'ai hâte d'en finir avec Bordeaux et j'aime mieux le Médoc où je me suis promené dans une bonne vieille voiture à la Louis XIV, comme les présidents devaient en avoir il y a deux cents ans, conduits par le silencieux Cadiche et par deux gros chevaux bretons, au milieu du sable, entre les vignes dont chaque grappe vaut de l'or, religieux pèlerinage où nous avons fait de nombreuses stations. Hélas ! le vin alourdit dans ces chaudes contrées, il n'enivre pas, mais vous enfle et bouffit, vous fait gonfler la veine, et vous endort ; si bien qu'ayant peu bu j'étais horriblement fatigué et que je fis, dès lors, un serment d'ivrogne que je n'ai pas encore violé, car il y a de cela trois jours. J'approuve fort néanmoins la manière dont nous avons dîné à Léoville, qui a consisté à se repaître d'excellent vin, en l'absence des propriétaires ; délicieuse façon de dîner chez les gens et que tous ceux qui vous invitent chez eux devraient avoir. Je me rappellerai donc longtemps M. Bartou, que je n'ai pas vu, et ses excellents procédés.

De Bordeaux à Bayonne vous passez dans un pays qui est dit les Landes, quoiqu'il soit, sans contredit, bien supérieur au Poitou et à la Guyenne. Vous allez au milieu de pins clairsemés ; çà et là une maison, des attelages de bœufs qui traînent un petit chariot dans lequel est assise une femme couverte d'un large chapeau de paille. A Dax, le bois s'épaissit, et jusqu'à Bayonne la route est charmante. On retrouve plus de fraîcheur et d'herbe ; les petites collines boisées qui se succèdent les unes aux autres annoncent enfin qu'on va voir les montagnes et on les voit enfin se déployer dans le ciel à grandes masses blanches, qui tout à coup saillaient à l'horizon. Je ne sais quel espoir vous prend alors, l'ennui des plaines blanches du Midi vous quitte, il vous semble que le vent de la montagne va souffler jusqu'à vous, et quand vous entrez dans Bayonne, l'enchantement commence.

Le soleil se couchait quand nous entrâmes dans le quartier des Juifs, hautes maisons, rues serrées, plus d'alignements au moins ! pour être surpris et plus charmé encore quand vous passez l'Adour. Voilà des eaux azurées, et la chute du crépuscule leur donnait une teinte sombre, et néanmoins les barques, les arbres du rivage s'y miraient en tremblant. La voiture roulait au pas sur le pont de bateaux, et une jeune Espagnole, la cruche de grès passée au bras comme les statues antiques, s'avancait vers nous. C'était là un de ces tendres spectacles qui font sourire d'aise et qu'on hume par tous les pores. Jusqu'à présent j'adore Bayonne et voudrais y vivre ; à l'heure qu'il est je suis assis sur ma malle, à écrire ; la fenêtre est ouverte et j'entends chanter dans la cour de l'hôtel.

L'Adour est un beau fleuve qu'il faut voir comme je l'ai vu, quand le soleil couchant assombrit ses flots azurés, que son courant, calme le soir, glisse le long des rives couvertes d'herbes. Aux allées marines où je me promenais hier après la pluie, l'air était doux, on entendait à deux lieues de là le bruit sourd de la mer sur les roches ; à gauche il y a une prairie verte où paissaient les bœufs.

On vous parle beaucoup de Biarritz à Bayonne. Les voitures qui vous y conduisent sont remplies de gens du pays. Allègre et gaillarde population descendue de la montagne, leur patois est vif et accentué, compris d'eux seuls, et servant de langue commune aux deux frontières espagnole et française. On y va pour s'y baigner, pour y danser. Bravets est un nom qui fait sourire ici chaque habitant, on m'en avait conté mille choses charmantes que je me promettais de voir et que je n'ai pas vues.

Ce joli pays m'a été gâté, non par son aspect physique qui est des plus beaux, mais par son costume, si je puis dire, et gâté par un événement où j'ai trempé ; le mot n'est pas métaphorique.

Nous étions descendus sur la grève à peu près déserte pour lors ; l'heure des bains et des baigneuses surtout était passée, première contrariété pour moi qui comptais voir beaucoup de naïades. Une vieille petite femme, dont les cheveux blancs encadraient un visage ridé, recueilli sous une capote de toile cirée, s'avancait à la mer pour y ramollir sa vieille peau ; une vaste blouse jaune qui l'enveloppait et qui flottait sur ses membres la faisait ressembler à un caniche qui sortirait d'un bol de café au lait. C'est là la seule baigneuse que j'aie vue à Biarritz, quelle chance !

Comme je marchais le long de l'écume des flots, j'ai vu tout à coup sortir de l'eau un baigneur qui appelait du secours pour deux hommes qui se noyaient au large. Je ne sais où étaient les garde-côtes ; il y avait au loin quelques amateurs qui restaient fort impassibles, on ne se dérangeait guère. A l'instant j'entendis des cris aigus, et une grande femme vêtue de noir, qu'à sa douleur expansive je crus être la mère de ceux qui se noyaient, accourait vers moi avec de grandes lamentations. Quand elle vit que j'ôtai vivement mon habit, elle augmenta ses éclats, me déboutonna mes bottines, m'exhortant à sauver ces malheureux, me comblant de bénédictions et d'encouragements. Je me mis à l'eau assez vivement, mais avec autant de sang-froid que j'en ai quand je nage tous les jours, et si bien que, continuant à nager toujours devant moi dans la direction que l'on m'avait indiquée, j'avais fini tout à coup par oublier que je faisais un acte de dévouement ; je n'étais ennuyé seulement que de mon pantalon et de mes bas que j'avais gardés et qui m'embarrassaient dans mes mouvements. A environ cinquante brasses je rencontrai un homme évanoui que deux autres tramaient à terre avec beaucoup de peine. Je me disposais à retourner avec eux et à aider ces braves gens.

— Il en reste encore un second, me dit un d'eux.

— Allons le chercher, lui dis-je.

Et nous continuâmes à nager côte à côte assez vigoureusement, d'abord droit devant nous, puis parallèlement au rivage ; mais ne plongeant aucun des deux, que pouvions-nous faire ? Un orage s'annonçait par des éclairs, et les vagues (qu'il ne faut pas dire fortes, car je mentirais) nous empêchaient de voir tout ce qui pouvait saillir sur les flots autour de nous.

— C'est fini, me dit un compagnon, il est noyé !

Nous fîmes alors volte-face, et regagnâmes le rivage. Le trajet me parut plus long que pour aller, et les dernières vagues pleines de mousse nous poussaient vivement sur le sable. Je croyais l'autre homme sauvé, mais tous les soins furent inutiles, il mourut au bout de quelques minutes. Pendant qu'on entourait le noyé, je m'étais réfugié dans une cabane, privé de ma chemise et de mon habit, grelottant et tout trempé d'eau salée. Je finis par les retrouver au bout d'un quart d'heure, ils avaient été déposés dans une baraque où se trouvaient plusieurs pauvres femmes du pays, se lamentant et poussant des cris. Elles me croyaient un de leurs compagnons et leur douleur s'en augmentant, peut-être un peu par politesse, elles répétaient toutes : « ah mon Dieu ! mon Dieu ! la pauvre mère qui les a nourris ! » et c'étaient des exclamations et des battements de mains nouveaux. La grande dame anglaise qui m'avait pris mes hardes m'étourdissait de son caquet et voulait que je fisse une plainte contre les garde-côtes qui ne s'étaient pas trouvés à leur poste ; ce qui me dégoûta assez de sa douleur. On me prêta un pantalon de paysan que je gardai toute la journée, où je m'exerçai à aller nu-pieds. Quand je sortis de la cahute on m'entoura pendant cinq minutes ; je fus oublié au bout de dix, comme je le méritais.

Le soir, quand la pluie fut passée, nous allâmes tous au phare, que je ne pus visiter, ayant oublié mon passeport, ce qui me contraria médiocrement, car je n'avais guère envie d'y monter. Le reste de la société s'en retourna à pied directement à Bayonne et moi je revins à Biarritz pour reprendre mon pantalon qui devait être sec et que je repassai aussi mouillé que lorsque je l'avais quitté le matin. Ce fut là ce qu'il y eut pour moi de plus tragique dans l'aventure.

Du phare à Biarritz le terrain descend sensiblement, et après avoir marché sur des rochers escarpés on se trouve sur le rivage. Je marchais le long des flots comme il m'était si souvent arrivé à Trouville, à la même saison et à la même heure ; le soleil aussi se couchait sans doute là-bas sur les flots, mais ici la mer était bleue et douce, le vent était tiède et l'orage s'en allait.

Je me récitais tout haut des vers, comme cela m'arrive quand je suis tout seul dans la campagne ; la cadence me fait marcher et m'accompagne dans la route comme si je chantais. Je pensais à mille choses, à mes amis, à l'art, à moi-même, au passé et à l'avenir, à tout et à rien, regardant les flots et enfonçant dans le sable.

J'ai été hier en Espagne, j'ai vu l'Espagne, j'en suis fier et j'en suis heureux, je voudrais y vivre. J'aimerais bien à être muletier (car j'ai vu un muletier), à me coucher sur mes mules et à entendre leurs clochettes dans les gorges des montagnes ; ma chanson moresque fuirait répétée par les échos. A Behobie je voyais l'Espagne sur l'autre rive et mon cœur en battait de plaisir, c'est une bêtise. La Bidassoa nous a conduits jusqu'à Fontarabie, ayant la France à droite, l'Espagne à gauche. L'île des Faisans ne vaut pas la peine d'être nommée, placée comme une petite touffe d'herbes dans un fleuve, entre de hautes montagnes des deux côtés. Nous avons débarqué sur la terre d'Espagne et, après avoir suivi une chaussée entourée de maïs, nous nous trouvâmes devant la porte principale qui tombe dans les fossés. Il en sortait au même instant une grande fille, pieds nus, vêtue de rouge et les tresses sur les épaules ; elle ne détourna pas la tête et continua sa route. Fontarabie est une ville toute en ruines. L'on n'entend aucun bruit dans les rues, les herbes poussent sur les murs calcinés, point de fenêtres aux maisons. La principale rue est droite et raide, entourée de hautes maisons noires garnies toutes de balcons pourris où sont étendus des haillons rouges qui sèchent au soleil ; nous l'avons gravie lentement, regardant de tous côtés et regardés encore plus. C'est l'Espagne telle qu'on l'a revue souvent : à travers un pan de mur gris, derrière un tas de ruines couvert d'herbes, dans les crevasses du terrain bouleversé, un rayon de soleil sort tout à coup et vous inonde de lumière, comme vous voyez passer devant vous et marchant vivement le long des rues désertes quelque admirable jeune fille, éternelle résurrection des beautés de la nature, qui surgit, quoi que les hommes fassent, au milieu des débris et reparaît plus belle derrière les tombeaux.

L'église de Fontarabie est sombre et haute, il n'y a plus ce jour insultant des temples du Midi ; les dorures répandues à profusion ont néanmoins quelque chose de bronzé qui est grave. Point d'ornements à l'extérieur, des grands murs droits comme à Saint-Jean-de-Luz qui ressemble aussi à l'Espagne. Nous y étions entrés le même jour, le matin ; on y disait une messe des morts ; il y avait peu de monde, quelques femmes toutes entourées de voiles et à une grande distance les unes des autres se tenaient au milieu de l'église, agenouillées séparément sur des tapis noirs et la tête baissée.

En me promenant dans Fontarabie, je m'ouvrais tout entier aux impressions qui survenaient, je m'y excitaient et je les savourais avec une sensualité gloutonne ; je me plongeais dans mon imagination de toutes mes forces, je me faisais des images et des illusions et je prenais tout mon plaisir à m'y perdre et à m'y enfoncer plus avant. J'entendis, partant d'une maison dont je rasais le mur, une chanson espagnole sur un rythme lent et triste. C'était sans doute une vieille femme, la voix chevrotait et semblait regretter quelque chose d'évanoui. Je ne voyais rien, la rue était déserte, sur nos têtes le ciel était bleu et radieux, nous nous taisions tous. Que voulait-elle dire, cette chanson espagnole chantée par la vieille voix ? Était-ce deuil des morts, retour sur les ans de jeunesse, souvenirs du bon temps qui n'est plus, des chants de guerre sur ces ruines ou des chants d'amour que fredonnait la vieille femme inconnue ? Elle se tut, et une voix fraîche partit à côté, entonnant un boléro allègre, chaud de notes perlées, chanson de l'alouette qui secoue le matin ses ailes humides sur la haie d'épines ; mais elle ne dura guère, cette voix se tut vite, et le boléro avait été moins long que la complainte. Et nous continuâmes à marcher dans les pierres des rues. On trouve çà et là des puits comblés au milieu des rues, des créneaux dans chaque pan de mur ; on ne sait où on va ; la ville a l'air d'errer aussi et de penser des choses douloureuses.

Un pêcheur vêtu de rouge, de haute stature, le profil osseux et découpé, faisait sécher une voile rapiécée sur un tertre de gazon, entre des hardes sales et cent fois recousues. Quand il nous vit, il nous appela et nous fit descendre dans un trou creux maçonné, plein de meurtrières, et d'où les Carlistes se cachaient pour mitrailler les avantpostes christinos. Car les Carlistes ont tenu bon, ils sont tombés un à un, comme le moyen âge aussi est tombé pierre à pierre ; mais il a fallu les arracher, et bien des ongles ont sauté ; chaque maison, chaque porte, chaque poutre est criblée de balles, l'église a reçu des boulets, les obus ennemis ont été jusqu'à Behobie et y ont tué des hommes. Carlos est venu jusqu'aux bords de la Bidassoa, on montre la porte où il est entré la nuit pour visiter les siens et ranimer les courages.

A côté de la ville est un village moins misérable qu'elle, la Madalena. Il n'y a rien à y voir que des huttes de pêcheurs et sa belle plage qui descend mollement jusqu'à la mer. Devant l'église, il y a une petite fontaine dont les pierres sont disjointes, l'eau tombe goutte à goutte ; une petite fille et une vieille femme rousse attendaient, toutes deux assises sur le bord, que leur cruche fût remplie. L'église est basse, fraîche et sombre ; il y fait presque nuit, nous nous y sommes reposés sur de vieux bancs en chêne, la lampe de l'autel remuait agitée par le vent qui venait de la porte. Je n'oublierai pas le cortège d'enfants qui m'a entouré sur le rivage, alléché par l'espoir des aumônes ; les plus jeunes étaient les plus hardis, les aînés se tenaient au second rang, ordre qu'ils n'ont pas observé quand ma pluie de sous espagnols est tombée sur eux. Ils étaient tous en guenilles, tous timides et beaux, tous attendant l'argent en silence et ils se sont rués dessus quand il est venu. La marée n'était pas encore assez haute pour nous conduire facilement à Irun, ce qui fait que nous avons remonté lentement et péniblement la rivière.

J'ai quitté Fontarabie avec tout le regret d'une chose aimée ; je lui garde une reconnaissance, tout le temps que j'y ai été, il m'a semblé errer dans une ville antique.

J'aime aussi Irun, où nous avons abordé, en remontant la Bidassoa, le soir vers les 5 heures. La première personne que nous y avons vue est une jeune fille qui voulait venir avec nous en France, et la première chose, c'est l'église dont le curé nous a fait les honneurs avec une grâce toute castillane. Elle porte un caractère du xvi<sup>e</sup> siècle qui sent son Philippe II, dorures sombres à force d'être vieilles, une richesse triste ; les sculptures en bois qui ornent le maître-autel représentant la Passion sont toutes dorées avec une grande profusion, surtout dans les étoffes. Je me rappelle maintenant un morceau de sculpture en bois figurant les limbes et qui se trouve sur le côté gauche : parmi les damnés j'ai remarqué deux têtes tonsurées qui se cachent au spectateur et ne lui montrent que le signe de leur mission oubliée. Evidemment il n'y a eu ici aucune intention personnelle et la leçon est claire, sans être scandaleuse. Il m'eût fallu plus de temps pour étudier les deux églises de Fontarabie et d'Irun. Et, d'ailleurs, que résulte-t-il d'une étude si partielle sinon quelques jalons à conjectures ? Je voudrais savoir, par exemple, si Satan est souvent représenté avec des seins de femme, comme je l'ai vu à Fontarabie, ce que je n'ai point remarqué dans les églises du Nord. On fit un baptême, l'orgue joua un air fanfaron et résonnant, on eût plutôt dit une contredanse exécutée par des trompettes.

Nous avons dîné à Irun, nous avons donc fait un repas en Espagne et fy ai bu du cidre, du vrai cidre, comme en Normandie. La salle était tendue de papier frais et ornée d'une gravure de 25 sols représentant l'Europe en chapeau à plumes. La fille qui nous servait à table était maigre, fanée et vieille ; elle a du être jolie à en juger par son beau regard et par l'expression de gracieuse tristesse qui lui donne quelque chose de doux et de fier comme l'Espagne son pays. Le soir enfin nous avons quitté notre hôtesse avec des poignées de main, après lui avoir acheté des cigarettes, nous être souhaité bonne santé et lui avoir promis notre retour. Ah ! c'est un beau pays que l'Espagne ! On l'aime en mettant le pied sur son seuil et on lui tourne le dos avec tristesse, car je la regrettais comme si je l'avais connue, en m'en retournant, le soir, à Behobie, à pied, et le ciel grondait d'orage le long de la rivière ; chemin faisant nous rencontrions des paysans qui rentraient chez eux, et tous nous saluaient en nous souhaitant buenas noches. La pluie venue, nous nous sommes mis à l'abri dans une étable où s'étaient réfugiées comme nous une mère et sa fille, qui se signaient à chaque éclair ; nous avons repris notre route ; l'abbé, qui lisait son bréviaire, n'a pu continuer, l'eau mouillait son livre, et moi je pensais à Fontarabie, à son soleil et à ses ruines.

J'étais triste quand j'ai quitté Bayonne et je l'étais encore en quittant Pau ; je pensais à l'Espagne, à ce seul après-midi où j'y fus, ce qui fait que Pau m'a semblé ennuyeux. On m'a assuré le contraire et on a rejeté sa mine rechignée sur le mauvais temps qu'il faisait ; on m'a dit que les jolies femmes ne se montraient qu'au soleil, et il pleuvait fort, la journée que j'y suis resté. Le haras m'a tout autant intéressé que le château d'Henri IV, car j'ai encore mal au cœur du berceau du bon roi. Son petit-fils Louis XVIII l'a fait surmonter d'un casque doré et de drapeaux blancs, de trophées et de fleurs de lis, et tout cela pour une écaille de tortue et deux fourchettes qui dorment dedans à la place du cher monarque. Cela veut-il dire qu'Henri IV ait été un pique-assiette ? Aujourd'hui on répare le château, on recrépit les ruines, on remet du ciment dans les pierres grises, on se joue avec l'histoire. Qu'est-ce que tout cela signifie ? Par amour pour l'art on finira par s'habiller en ligueur quand on sera dans un château du xvi<sup>e</sup> siècle, et par vivre dans un bal masqué perpétuel. Bref, je suis assommé des châteaux qui rappellent des souvenirs, et des souvenirs comme ceux d'Henri IV, qui est bien l'homme le plus matériel et le plus antipoétique du monde. Si nous rebattons si bien les vieux habits pour les mettre sur nos dos, c'est faute peut-être d'en avoir de neufs.

L'homme n'est pas content d'avoir le présent et l'avenir, il veut le passé, le passé des autres, et détruit même jusqu'aux ruines. S'il pouvait il vivrait à la fois dans trois siècles et se regarderait dans douze miroirs. Laissez donc un peu couper la faux du temps, ne grattez pas la verdure des vieilles pierres, point de badigeon aux tombeaux et n'ôtez pas les vers de dessus les cadavres pour les embaumer ensuite et vivre avec eux.

Au delà de Pau, le paysage devient triste, sans être encore grandiose. Il n'y a plus rien ici de la vivacité et de l'hilarité bayonnaises ; à Lourdes, à Argeïès, à Pierrefitte, aux eaux voisines et aux eaux chaudes, les vêtements sont bruns ; comme les troupeaux, les hommes sont laids et petits, beaucoup de goftres chez les femmes ; plus de saillies ni d'éclats, on est triste, l'hiver a été rude, il fait froid, le vent souffle de la montagne, le gave gronde et emporte à chacun un morceau de son champ ; on est éloigné des grandes villes et le transport est cher, et pourtant l'herbe est haute, la culture va jusqu'au haut des montagnes et s'attache aux pans escarpés des rochers. La nature est riche et l'homme est pauvre, d'où cela vient-il ? Si on n'avait devant soi les pics des Pyrénées, on trouverait superbes ces montagnes d'avant-poste, ces paysages si pleins de fraîcheur, ces vallées qui ont l'air d'une corbeille de marbre tapissée d'herbes. J'ai été à pied de Assat aux Eaux-Chaudes, le long du gave qui roulait au fond sous des touffes d'arbres. La route serpente le long d'un côté, suspendue aux rochers, comme un grand lézard blanc qui en suivrait tous les contours ; je marchais vite, écoutant le bruit de l'eau et regardant les sommets de la montagne.

Tous les établissements thermaux se ressemblent : une buvette, des baignoires et l'éternel salon pour les bals que l'on retrouve à toutes les eaux du monde. La fréquentation des étrangers donne un air plus éveillé aux habitants des eaux qu'à ceux des vallées inférieures, dont le caractère extérieur est plus grave.

A Saint-Savin, qui domine la vallée d'Argelès par exemple, l'église était remplie d'hommes ; les femmes vêtues complètement de noir avaient l'air de statues. L'église est haute, nue ; les fenêtres sont petites et très élevées ; sa simplicité contraste avec les églises du pays (et notamment celles de Lourdes), qui sont toutes chargées d'ornements dans le goût des églises espagnoles, comme celle de Bétarram.

Nous avons été au bout de la terrasse du prieuré pour regarder le panorama de quatre vallées qui s'embranchent. De gros nuages flottaient sur les pics de montagnes et l'air était lourd, et cependant la brise montait jusqu'à nous. Au loin on entendait vaguement le bruit du gave dans la vallée ; l'église résonnait de cantiques et des oiseaux chantaient dans les arbres. A l'entrée du prieuré, il y a des bas-reliefs romans, arrachés au cloître détruit, dont on a formé une sorte de haie ; les feuilles de vignes qui montent le long des fûts de pierre battaient sur les feuilles d'acanthé et sur les oiseaux sculptés dans les chapiteaux écornés ; l'enfant qui nous conduisait et le domestique de la maison, étonnés, nous regardaient. Je garderai bon souvenir de Cauterets et de la cordialité de M. Baron, qui nous a menés au lac de Gaube et au Pont d'Espagne. On y va à cheval, ou plutôt on y grimpe sur des rochers éboulés dans le sentier, on gravit en quelques instants à des hauteurs immenses, s'étonnant de la vigueur de son cheval, dont le pied ne glisse pas sur le granit ni sur le marbre et dont le poil, après une journée de fatigue, est aussi sec et aussi dur que les pierres auxquelles il se cramponne. Ce qu'on appelle le Pont d'Espagne est un pont jeté sur le torrent, que l'on traverse environ une heure après la cascade de Cerisey. Alors on entre dans une forêt de sapins, et bientôt vous marchez sur une grande prairie au bout de laquelle se trouve le lac. Sa teinte vert de gris le fait confondre un instant avec l'herbe que vous foulez ; il est uni et calme ; son eau est si calme qu'on dirait une grande glace verte ; au fond se dresse le Vignemale, dont les sommets sont couverts de neige, de sorte que le lac se trouve encaissé dans les montagnes, si ce n'est du côté où vous êtes. Certes, si on y allait seul et qu'on y restât la nuit pour voir la lune se mirer dans ses eaux vertes avec la silhouette des pics neigeux qui le dominent, écoutant le vent casser les troncs de sapins pourris, certes, cela serait plus beau et plus grand ; mais on y va comme on va partout, en partie de plaisir, ce qui fait qu'on n'a pas le loisir d'y rêver ni l'impudeur de se permettre des élans poétiques désordonnés. On arrive à midi, dévoré d'une faim atroce, et l'on s'y empiffre d'excellentes truites saumonées, ce qui ôte à l'imagination toute sa vaporité et l'empêche de s'élever vers les hautes régions, sur les neiges, pour y planer avec les aigles. Si vous ouvrez l'album que vous présente le maître de la cabane où vous mangez, vous n'y verrez que deux genres d'exclamations : les unes sur la beauté du lac de Gaube, les autres sur la bonté de ses truites ; les secondes sont infiniment plus remarquables sous le rapport littéraire que les premières, ce qui veut dire qu'il n'y a que des sots ou des ventrus qui aient pris la plume pour y signer leur nom et leurs idées.

Les plus curieuses réflexions :

“Je me suis chargé d'excellentes truites au lac de Gaube.” (Dantan jeune.)

“Malgré tous mes efforts la truite n'a pu entrer.” (Villemain.) En regard, un portrait du fin critique.

“Pour entonner une truite “O truites du lac de Gaube, que n’êtes-vous des cerises ?” (M. de RÉMUSAT. )

“Quelle bosse je me suis foutue.” (Cousin.)

Sur le haut d’une page, on lit :

“Mme Thiers. — N’est-ce pas, bijou chéri, qu’il serait bien doux de mourir ensemble, à côté de ces neiges éternelles, au clair de lune et dans les eaux azurées du lac ?

“M. Thiers. — Ma petite chatte, ne parlons pas politique.”

Un jour Chateaubriand se trouvait au lac de Gaube avec quelques amis, tous mangeant assis sur ce même banc où nous avons déjeuné. On s’extasiait sur la beauté du lac : “J’y vivrais bien toujours”, disait Chateaubriand. — “Ah ! vous vous ennuierez ici à mourir”, reprit une dame de la société. — “Qu’est-ce que cela, répartit le poète en riant, je m’ennuie toujours !” (Rapporté par M. Caron.)

J’ai la prétention de n’être exclusivement ni l’un ni l’autre (c’est pour cela que je n’ai rien écrit sur l’album ni pour les truites ni pour le lac, gardant mes impressions pour moi seul) et moins ridicule donc que tous les poètes qui sont venus au lac de Gaube. Je n’en dirai rien, ni du Marcado non plus, forêt couverte de sapins noirs et où les branches pourries sont tombées en travers de la route. Je fais comme nos chevaux, je saute par là-dessus, ayant bien plus peur qu’eux de m’y casser le cou.

Jusqu’à présent ce que j’ai vu de plus beau, c’est Gavarnie. On part de Luz le matin et on n’y revient que le soir au jour tombant ; la course est longue et dangereuse, on marche peut-être pendant trois lieues au bord d’un précipice de 500 pieds, sans éprouver le moindre sentiment d’inquiétude, confiance qu’il est difficile d’expliquer et que tout le monde éprouve malgré soi. Quand vous avez passé l’échelle et le pic de Bergun, la montagne s’écarte du gave pour un instant, vous étale une prairie qui embaumait de foin coupé ; elle se resserre bientôt et déploie toutes ses splendeurs tragiques au Chaos. Ainsi nomme-t-on un lieu plein de rochers entassés les uns sur les autres, comme un champ de bataille d’un combat de montagnes où ces cadavres immenses seraient restés, écroulés sans doute un jour d’avalanche ; je ne me rappelle plus quand, mais tout l’effroi de leur chute reste encore dans leur nom de Chaos, dans toute la contrée ; le gave passe à travers et se cabre contre eux sans les ébranler. Tout s’oublie vite quand on arrive dans le cirque de Gavarnie. C'est une enceinte de deux lieues de diamètre, enfermée dans un cercle de montagnes dont tous les sommets sont couverts de neige et du fond de laquelle tombe une cascade. A gauche, la brèche de Roland et la carrière de marbre, et le sol sur lequel on s'avance, et qui de loin semblait uni, monte par une pente si raide qu'il faut s'aider des mains et des genoux pour arriver au pied de la cascade ; la terre glisse sous vos pas, les roches roulent et s'en vont dans le gave, la cascade mugit et vous inonde de sa poussière d'eau.

Le temps était pur, et les masses grises des montagnes du Marboré, bordées de neige, se détachaient dans le bleu du ciel et au-dessus d'elles roulaient quelques petits nuages blancs dont le soleil illuminait les contours. On reste ravi, et l'esprit flotte dans l'air, monte le long des rochers, s'en allant vers le ciel avec la vapeur des cascades.

C'est en côtoyant le pied de la montagne que l'on arrive au pont de neige. A l'entrée, nous trouvâmes enseveli un aigle que sans doute l'avalanche aura pris dans son vol et entraîné avec elle, tombeau de neige qui s'est dressé pour lui dans les hautes régions et qui l'a emporté comme un immense lacet blanc.

On s'avance sous une longue voûte qui suit le cours du gave, dont les parois de neige durcie sont en pointe de diamants. On dirait de l'albâtre oriental humide de rosée ; l'eau découle du plafond sur nos habits ; le gave roule des pierres, et au milieu des ténèbres la blancheur des murs de neige nous éclaire, et l'on marche courbé, se traînant sur les pierres de marbre dans cette demeure des fées. Quand vous revenez au jour, vous revoyez le cirque, ses roches, ses petits sapins et dans le bas son herbe roussie du soleil.

Je suis revenu à Luz au pas et en rêvant de Gavarnie ; j'avais encore le bruit de sa cascade dans l'oreille et je marchais sous le pont de neige. J'ai été accosté franchement par un homme qui m'a demandé du tabac et nous avons causé côte à côte jusqu'à Saint-Sauveur, où nous nous sommes quittés. N'était grand, veste blanche, bas bleus et espadrilles aux pieds, le chapeau noir espagnol et le foulard roulé en bandeau sur la tête ; il montait un maigre petit cheval blanc et s'appuyait sur son long bâton comme s'il s'en fût aidé pour marcher. Je l'avais d'abord tenu pour espagnol à son accent, mais il m'a dit être français et faire le commerce des mules ; il a servi dans la guerre de Belgique, il a été sergent, on lui a même proposé d'être tambour-major, mais il n'a pas voulu ; car il déteste l'habit de soldat et la discipline, il aime mieux l'Espagne que la France : "C'est là que la vie est bonne, s'écriait-il ! tout le monde y mange de la viande, le pain y coûte un sou, deux liards la livre, le vin y est meilleur, tout le monde est poli et on n'a pas besoin de crier pour se faire servir dans les auberges. — Oui, Monsieur, me disait-il en me regardant avec son œil à moitié fermé, celui qui y fait de la dépense pour un sou est regardé comme celui qui en fait pour six francs." Comme je lui demandais si les femmes étaient jolies : "Ce n'est pas tant qu'elles sont jolies comme elles sont bonnes ; rien qu'à les entendre parler, continuait-il, il y a une grâce, une certaine chose chez elles enfin, qui vous porte à penser à des affaires de femmes quand on ne le voudrait pas." Mais il revenait toujours sur le bon marché des vivres et ne tarissait pas sur l'éloge du pain qui est meilleur, du vin, de la viande, de tout en général et sur la magnifique beauté du cher pays qu'il habite.

BAGNÈRES-DE-LUCHON.

15 septembre, temps de pluie.

Aujourd'hui je devais aller au port de Venasque et revenir par le port de la Picade, aller en Espagne encore une fois ! Le projet est avorté et je suis à écrire assis sur un canapé d'auberge, en paletot et le chapeau sur la tête. Je ne sais ni que faire, ni que lire, ni qu'écrire. Il faut passer ainsi toute une journée, et qui promet d'être ennuyeuse. A peine s'il est 7 heures du matin, et le jour est si triste qu'on dirait du crépuscule ; il fait froid et humide. Restant confiné dans ma chambre, il ne me reste qu'un parti, c'est d'écrire. Mais quoi écrire ? il n'y a rien de si fatigant que de faire une perpétuelle description de son voyage, et d'annoter les plus minces impressions que l'on ressent ; à force de tout rendre et de tout exprimer, il ne reste plus rien en vous ; chaque sentiment qu'on traduit s'affaiblit dans notre cœur, et dédoublant ainsi chaque image, les couleurs primitives s'en altèrent sur la toile qui les a reçues.

Et puis, à quoi bon tout dire ? n'est-il pas doux au contraire de conserver dans le recoin du cœur des choses inconnues, des souvenirs que nul autre ne peut s'imaginer et que vous évoquez les jours sombres comme aujourd'hui, dont la réapparition vous illumine de joie et vous charmera comme dans un rêve ? Quand je décrirais aujourd'hui la vallée de Campan et Bagnères-de-Bigorre, quand j'aurais parlé de la culture, des exploitations, des chemins et des voitures, des grottes et des cascades, des ânes et des femmes, après ? après ?... est-ce que j'aurai satisfait un désir, exprimé une idée, écrit un mot de vrai ? je me serai ennuyé et ce sera tout. Je suis toujours sur le point de dire avec le poète :

A quoi bon toutes ces peines, Secouez le gland des chênes, Buvez l'eau des fontaines, Aimez et rendormez-vous.

Je suis avant tout homme de loisir et de caprice, il me faut mes heures, j'ai des calmes plats et des tempêtes. Je serais resté volontiers quinze jours à Fontarabie, et je n'aurais vu ni Pau, ni les eaux thermales, ni la fabrique de marbre à Bagnères-de-Bigorre, qui ne vaut pas l'ongle d'une statue cassée, ni bien d'autres belles choses qui sont dans le guide du voyageur. Est-ce ma faute si ce qu'on appelle Yintéressant m'ennuie et si le très curieux m'embête ? Hier, par exemple, en allant au lac d'Oo, quand mes compagnons maugréaient contre le mauvais temps, je me recréais de la pluie qui tombait dans les sapins et du brouillard qui faisait comme une mer de blancheur sur la cime des montagnes. Nous marchions dedans comme dans une onde vaporeuse, les pierres roulaient sous les pieds des chevaux, et bientôt le lac nous est apparu calme et azuré comme une portion du ciel ; la cascade s'y mirait au fond, les nuages qui s'élevaient du lac, chassés par le vent, nous laissaient voir de temps en temps les sommets d'où elle tombe.

En venant ici de Bagnères-de-Bigorre, nous avons couché à Saint-Bertrand-de-Comminges, vieille petite ville aux rues raides et pierreuses, presque déserte, silencieuse et ouverte au soleil. De la vieille ville romaine il ne reste rien, et de l'église romane peu de chose, tant l'attention se porte ailleurs tout entière. La façade est nue ; grande tour carrée avec du ciment neuf entre les vieilles pierres, couverte d'un chapeau de planches construit récemment pour couvrir les cloches qui se rouillent sans doute. Le portail est petit et de vieux goût roman, et les chapiteaux de ses colonnes supportent des grotesques : gnomes montés sur des hippogriffes, usés par le temps, uniformes d'eux-mêmes et qui semblent rire dans leur horreur du mystère qui les entoure. A l'intérieur, murs simples et nus ; point d'abside ; les fenêtres, hautes et étroites, et sur les côtés des arcades jumelles et pointant en pure ogive diminuent de hauteur à mesure qu'elles s'inclinent vers le fond, comme si l'élan diminuait. Mais ce qui est maintenant toute l'église et ce qui la constitue réellement, c'est un immense jubé en buis qui renferme à lui seul le chœur et la nef, le prêtre et les fidèles. Ses pans hauts obscurcissent le jour qui tombe des fenêtres romanes ; son maître-autel, plein de fioritures de bois peint, cache la relique du saint qui est relégué derrière, comme dans la coulisse ; sur les parois latérales, à chaque médaillon une tête de chevalier ou de matrone, souvenir antique que le libre caprice du sculpteur a jeté à profusion, plaçant l'art au milieu de la foi, le remplissant et s'en faisant un prétexte. N'est-ce pas l'antiquité dans le roman, le xvie siècle dans le xie, la Renaissance dans le moyen âge ? Partout le bois est sculpté, fouillé, tressé, tant le talent est flexible, tant l'imagination se joue et rit dans les mignardes inventions ; aux culs-de-lampe ce sont des amours suspendus et versant des corbeilles de fleurs sur des seins de femmes qui palpitent, et des ventres de tritons qui rebondissent et dont, plus bas, la queue de poisson s'enlace et se roule sur la colonne. Çà et là c'est une tête de mort, plus loin une face de cheval, de lion, n'importe quoi pourvu que ce soit quelque chose ; ici un pédagogue qui fesse un écolier pour faire rire quand on passe à côté ; la luxure en femme avec le pied fourchu, et la feuille de chou, un singe qui a mis le capuchon d'un moine, des bateleurs qui s'exercent, et mille choses encore sans gravité et sans pensée ; partout de la complaisance dans les formes, de l'esprit, de l'art et rien autre chose ; pas une tête inspirée qui prie, pas une main tendue vers le ciel, ce n'est pas une église, c'est plutôt un boudoir. Dans un temple, toutes ces miséricordes ouvragées où l'on s'asseyait comme dans un fauteuil, et où les belles dames du xvi<sup>e</sup> siècle laissaient retomber leurs doigts effilés se prélassant sur les détails païens, ces volutes, ces feuilles d'acanthé, ces têtes de mort même, qu'est-ce que tout cela veut dire ? Les prophètes, Jes docteurs et les sybilles qui se suivent méthodiquement dans chaque cadre de bois, sur les parois intérieures, où vont-ils ? et pourquoi faire ? On leur tourne le dos, et la tête levée vers le ciel rencontre involontairement les petits plafonds fleuris où l'œil caresse des formes amoureuses. La Renaissance est là entière avec son enthousiasme scientifique et sa prodigalité de formes, et sa décence exquise dans les nudités où elle s'étudie, dans la corruption.

Qu'il y a loin de là au pieux cynisme du moyen âge ! C'est beau, joli, charmant ; on admire de la tête et non du cœur, enthousiasme frelaté qui s'en va vite ; c'est un musée, un beau morceau d'art qui fait penser à l'histoire, un livre en bois où l'on lit une page du xvie siècle, pas autre chose.

Si vous voulez du grand et du beau, il faut sortir de l'église et gagner la montagne, vous élever des vallées et monter vers la région des neiges. C'est une belle vie que celle de chasser l'isard ou l'ours, de vivre dans le pays des aigles, d'être haut comme eux et de leur faire la guerre.

Quand on va au port de Venasque on traverse d'abord une grande forêt de frênes et de hêtres qui couvrent deux montagnes qui se regardent face à face. Les ravins ont enlevé des arbres, et font sur le côté opposé à celui où vous marchez comme des chemins qui serpentent en tombant à travers les bois. C'était le matin, et les lueurs du soleil levant dessinaient les ombres des branches sur la mousse et sur les feuilles jonchées par terre ; il avait plu, le chemin était boueux ; la lune blanche remontait dans le ciel. Avant de gravir Je plus rude, on s'arrête à l'hospice, grande maison nue au dehors comme au dedans, où nous n'avons vu que les enfants du gardien qui se taisaient en nous regardant. La cuisine est haute et voûtée pour soutenir le poids des avalanches ; des meurtrières dans les murs remplacent les fenêtres, et quand on ferme les auvents il fait nuit. La fumée sortait en nuages du foyer, et le vent qui venait du dehors passait sur les murs noirs et l'agitait autour de nous sans l'entraîner en se retirant. Des chênes dégrossis, placés devant le feu, servent de bancs, et bien des belles voyageuses qui venaient là s'y asseoir au mois d'août, en compagnie, gantées, heureuses d'être dans les montagnes et de pouvoir le dire, ne pensent guère que quelques mois plus tard, sur ces mêmes bancs, dans les nuits d'hiver, viennent s'asseoir aussi, armés et sombres, les contrebandiers et les chasseurs d'ours. On ferme les ouvertures avec du foin et de la paille, la résine éclaire la voûte, et l'arbre brûle dans cet âtre sombre autour duquel sont réunis quelquefois jusqu'à cinquante hommes, montagnards égarés, chasseurs, contrebandiers, proscrits. Tous se rangent en cercle pour se chauffer ; les uns guettent les bruits de pas sur la neige, les autres laissent venir le jour et fument sous le manteau de la cheminée. Je crois qu'on y cause peu, et que le vent qui rugit dans la montagne et qui siffle dans les jointures de la porte y fait taire les hommes ; on écoute, on se regarde, et quoique les murs soient solides on a je ne sais quel respect qui vous rend silencieux.

A partir de l'hospice la route monte en zigzag et devient de plus en plus scabreuse, ardue et aride. On tourne à chaque instant pour faciliter la montée, et si on regarde derrière soi on s'étonne de la hauteur où l'on est parvenu. L'air est pur, le vent souffle et le vent vous étourdit ; les chevaux montent vite, donnant de furieux coups d'épaule, baissant la tête comme pour mordre la route et s'y hissent.

A votre gauche vous apercevez successivement quatre lacs enchâssés dans des rochers, calmes comme s'ils étaient gelés ; point de plantes, pas de mousse, rien ; les teintes sont plus vertes et plus livides sur les bords et toute la surface est plutôt noire que bleue. Rien n'est triste comme la couleur de ces eaux qui ont l'air cadavéreuses et violacées et qui sont plus immobiles et plus nues que les rochers qui les entourent. De temps en temps on croit être arrivé au haut de la montagne, mais tout à coup elle fait un détour, semble s'allonger, comme courir devant vous à mesure que vous montez sur elle ; vous vous arrêtez pourtant, croyant que la montagne vous barre le passage et vous empêche d'aller plus avant, que tout est fini, et qu'il n'y a plus qu'à se retourner pour voir la France, mais voilà que subitement, et comme si la montagne se déchirait, la Maladetta surgit devant vous. A gauche toutes les montagnes de l'Auvergne, à droite la Catalogne, l'Espagne là devant vous, et l'esprit peut courir jusqu'à Séville, jusqu'à Tolède, dans l'Alhambra, jusqu'à Cordoue, jusqu'à Cadix, escaladant les montagnes et volant avec les aigles qui planent sur nos têtes, ainsi que d'une plage de l'Océan l'œil plonge dans l'horizon, suit le sillage des navires et voit de là, dans la lointaine Amérique, les bananiers en fleurs, et les hamacs suspendus aux platanes des forêts vierges.

A voir tous les pics hérissés qui s'abaissent et montent inégalement, les uns apparaissant derrière les autres, tous se pressant, serrés et portés au ciel dans des efforts immenses, on dirait les vagues colossales d'un océan de neige qui se serait immobilisé tout à coup.

En longeant la montagne le sentier se rétrécit, et les schistes calcaires sur lesquels on marche ressemblent à des lames de couteaux qui vous offriraient leur tranchant.

Quand on est arrivé à la hauteur de la Pigue, on est retourné vers la France que l'on aperçoit dans les nuages, et dont les plaines se dressent au loin comme des immenses tableaux suspendus, vous offrant des massifs d'arbres, des vallées qui ondulent, des plaines qui s'étendent à l'infini, spectacle d'aigles que vous contemplez du haut d'un amphithéâtre de 1,500 toises.

Dans les gorges des montagnes placées sous nous, des nuages blancs se formaient et montaient dans le ciel ; le vent de la terre les faisait monter vers nous, et quand ils nous ont entourés, le soleil qui les traversait comme à travers un tamis blanc fit à chacun de nous une auréole qui couronnait notre ombre et marchait à nos côtés.

TOULOUSE.

Il est commode de n'avoir qu'une demi-science, tout est clair et s'explique ; une érudition plus avancée me gênerait et j'en sais juste assez pour pouvoir dire des sottises de la meilleure foi du monde. Je vois clair comme le jour dans les recoins les plus obscurs, tout s'explique et s'encadre dans mon système ; j'assigne les dates et les caractères avec sang-froid et une assurance miraculeuse. Je retrouve complaisamment ce que j'ai flairé et je fais de la philosophie de l'art, sans en savoir l'alphabet. Ce que je pourrais dire ici de Saint-Sernin serait le pendant de Saint-Bertrand de Comminges, ratatouille de styles qui figurerait bien en face de l'autre, flanqué de cornichons et de réflexions esthétiques. Je vais donc, comme un vrai savant, indiquer ici un aperçu ingénieux qui va se trouver là à propos de rien, comme il m'est pointé hier soir dans l'esprit en me couchant.

Ecrit sur le canal du Midi pour passer le temps :

Il ne s'agirait rien moins que de savoir pourquoi, en avançant dans l'exvi<sup>e</sup> siècle et dans l'exvn<sup>e</sup>, on trouve en architecture précisément l'inverse de ce qui arrive dans l'histoire de la poésie et de la prose ; pourquoi la pierre se dégrade tandis que la parole devient au contraire éminemment plus nette et plus accentuée. A mesure, par exemple, que Rabelais se filtre et se clarifie dans Montaigne, que Régnier succède à Ronsard et qu'il n'est pas jusqu'à Scarron qui ne se souvienne de Francion, le style de Louis XIII succède hélas à celui d'Henri II, les fenêtres des maisons se rétrécissent et le mur blanc gagne sur les sculptures qu'on y avait dessinées. Non pas que je veuille dire que bien des figures et des niches curieusement taillées n'aient sauté aussi dans le style, abattues à grands coups de marteau, cassées en bloc pour faire de la prose, mais ici il y a renaissance, là il y a mort.

Quand on lit Rabelais et qu'on s'y aventure, on finit par perdre le fil et par avancer dans un dédale dont vous ne savez bientôt ni les issues ni les entrées ; ce sont des arabesques à n'en plus finir, des poussées de rire qui étourdissent, des fusées de folle gaieté qui retombent en gerbes, illuminant et obscurcissant à la fois à la manière des grands feux ; rien de général ne se saisit, on pressent et on prévoit bien quelque chose, mais quant à un sens clair, à une idée nette, c'est ce qu'il n'y faut point chercher. Dans Montaigne tout est libre, facile ; on y nage en pleine intelligence humaine, chaque flot de pensée emplit et colore la longue phrase causeuse qui finit tantôt par un saut tantôt par un arrêt. La pensée de la Renaissance, d'abord vague et confuse, pleine de rire et de joie géante dans Rabelais, est devenue plus humaine, dégagée d'idéal et de fantastique ; elle a quitté le roman et est devenue philosophie. Ce que je voudrais nettement exprimer, c'est la marche ascendante du style, le muscle dans la phrase qui devient chaque jour plus dessiné et plus raide. Ainsi passez de Retz à Pascal, de Corneille à Molière, l'idée se précise et la phrase se resserre, s'éclaire ; elle laisse rayonner en elle l'idée qu'elle contient comme une lampe dans un globe de cristal, mais la lumière est si pure et si éclatante qu'on ne voit pas ce qui la couvre. C'est là, si je ne me trompe, l'essence de la prose française du xvn<sup>e</sup> siècle : le dégagement de la forme pour rendre la pensée, la métaphysique dans l'art, et, pour employer un mot qui sent trop l'école, la substance en tant qu'être. Je doute que l'architecture ait fait quelque chose de semblable. Elle se dépouille bien, en effet, comme le style, de tous les contours qui entravaient sa marche, et comme dans le style aussi elle a passé un rabot qui fait sauter mille choses gracieuses de la Renaissance ou du moyen âge qui disparaissent pour toujours avec les derniers vestiges de grâce naïve ; la bonne pensée gauloise, échauffée au souvenir latin, ne s'en ira pas moins ; l'arabesque meurt avec Rabelais, la Renaissance, quelque belle qu'elle ait été, n'a vécu qu'un jour. Ce qui a été pour la pierre tout un jour de vie est une aurore, une ère nouvelle pour les lettres. C'est que la pierre n'exprime ni la philosophie ni la critique ; elle ne fait ni le roman, ni le conte, ni le drame ; elle est l'hymne. Il ne lui est plus resté après

Luther, après la satire Ménippée, qu'à s'aligner dans les quais, à paver les routes, à bâtir des palais, et Louis XIV qui voulait s'en faire des temples pour y vivre n'a pu lui donner la vie ; le sang en était parti avec la foi, c'était chose usée, outil cassé dont l'ouvrier était mort. Tout ce que la pierre n'avait pas dit, la prose se chargea de le dire et elle le dit bien. Maintenant que nous croyons tout expirant, que trois siècles de littérature ont raffiné sur chaque nuance du cœur de l'homme, usant toutes les formes, parlant tous les mots, faisant vingt langues dans un siècle et renfermant dans une immense synthèse Pascal contre Montaigne, Voltaire contre Bossuet, Lafontaine et Marot, Chateaubriand et Rousseau, le doute et -la foi, l'art et la poésie, la monarchie et la démocratie, tous les cris les plus doux et les plus forts, à cette heure, dis-je, où les poètes se rencontrent inquiets et où chacun demande à l'autre s'il a retrouvé la Muse envolée, quelle sera la lyre sur laquelle les hommes chanteront ? reprendront-ils le ciseau pour bâtir la Babel de leurs idées ? dans quelle eau de Jouvence se retrempera leur plume ? C'est ce que je me disais dans Sairit-Sernin à Toulouse, me promenant sous sa belle nef romane ; catacombe de pierre où sont ensevelies de vieilles idées, nous n'avons pour elle qu'une vénération de curiosité et nous faisons craquer nos bottes vernies sur les dalles où dorment les saints. Eh ! pourquoi pas ? Que nous font les saints, à nous autres ? Nous étudions l'histoire du christianisme comme celle de l'islamisme et nous nous ennuyons de l'un et de l'autre. Nous sentons bien qu'il nous faut quelque chose que nous ne savons pas, mais ce n'est rien de ce qu'on nous offre. J'étais fatigué de l'église, quelque beau que soit son roman, j'étais assommé d'église et je le suis encore ; le curé nous dit qu'il y avait des reliques, je l'ai cru en homme bien élevé, et un mouvement de joie inconcevable m'a fait bondir le cœur quand il m'a dit que le vélin des missels avait fait des cartouches. Je rencontrais là au moins quelque chose de notre vie, de ma vie, de la colère brutale ; une passion au moins que nous comprenons, qu'un rien peut rallumer, tandis que pour la foi la niche même en est cassée en pièces dans notre cœur.

Qu'avais-je besoin d'aller à Saint-Sernin pour voir des arceaux romans dans le goût moresque, un vieux christ en bois doré qui m'a fait penser à Don Quichotte et qu'un autre jour j'aurais trouvé superbe ? Mais j'avais mal dormi et j'avais froid, et puis il y a des choses qu'on ne sent bien qu'en certains jours ; il faut être en humeur et en veine de manger. C'est comme le canal du Midi sur lequel j'écris maintenant : traîné par des chevaux, notre bateau glisse entre des rangées d'arbres qui mirent leurs têtes rondes dans l'eau, l'eau fait semblant de murmurer à la proue, nous nous arrêtons de temps en temps à des écluses, la manivelle crie et la corde se tend. Il y a des gens qui trouvent cela superbe et qui se pâment en sensation pittoresque, cela m'ennuie comme la poésie descriptive. Quand on a dépassé certaines classes d'idées et d'émotions, on ne regarde guère ce qui est au-dessous de vous ; il en est de même pour tout, pour les croyances, pour les amours ; nous ne nous reverrons jamais qu'en imagination dans notre temps passé, et nous ne l'aurons que par souvenir. Quelquefois, il est vrai, on détourne la tête pour voir en arrière, mais les jambes vous portent toujours en avant, le cœur humain pas plus que l'histoire ne recule jamais, et comme sous les pieds du cheval d'Attila l'herbe ne repousse pas où il a marché et brouté.

D'ailleurs c'est toujours la même chose, une église du Midi ! Le dehors est roman, le plus souvent le portail est de la Renaissance ; à l'intérieur, du rechampissage et du badigeon.

Ainsi qu'à Saint-Bertrand de Comminges, le chœur de Saint-Sernin à Toulouse est de bois sculpté, bien inférieur à celui-ci tant par l'exécution que par le dessin ; les culs-de-lampe du dais continu qui couronne les miséricordes tombent moins bas, sont plus raides et plus carrés ; les miséricordes elles-mêmes ne signifient rien, elles sont sculptées plus lourdement et leur rangée est terminée aux quatre coins par de gros Amours qui ont le ventre tendu comme des hydropiques. Au fond, en face de la chaire de l'évêque et collée au mur, se dresse une grande Naïade les cheveux en arrière et présentant l'abdomen dans un mouvement de croupe à la Bacchante, incartade drolatique mise en face de Monseigneur pour le délecter un peu pendant l'office. Car j'imagine que l'homme qui s'asseyait dans cette chaire-là, au milieu de ces femmes nues, de ces Amours bouffis et de ces guirlandes sur lesquelles ils dansent, devait lire Marot plus que saint Augustin et faire ses petites heures d'Horace, à la mode des prélats du xvie siècle qui avaient peur de gâter leur latinité en lisant l'évangile. Entre chaque miséricorde il y a alternativement, sur la partie la plus saillante, une jeune femme et une vieille : les premières sont belles, de face pure, et vous regardent avec une sécurité impudente ; les secondes sont maigres et furieuses et tiennent le milieu entre la sorcière et la harpie.

L'église Saint-Etienne se compose de deux parties, deux nefs ajustées ensemble, avec un angle à gauche comme deux bâtons l'un au bout de l'autre et mal attachés ; la première est romane, la seconde est gothique. Le chœur est de la Restauration, de même qu'à Castelnaudary. L'église Saint-Michel a un portail gothique, masqué par une porte moderne, et son autre façade a été bouchée avec du plâtre. Saint-Jean vous offre une enveloppe carlovingienne et un intérieur plein de mauvaises peintures d'auberge. On entre là pensant y rencontrer le moyen âge et on trouve la Restauration.

Ce matin, quand nous sommes allés à SaintFéréol, j'ai regardé du haut du parapet le grand bassin ; l'eau était basse et le vent tirait sur les cailloux çà et là, comme une loque, une méchante vague. Vous auriez fermé les jeux et vous auriez reconnu que ce n'était pas le bruit d'un lac, mais une vague artificielle tant sa voix était phtisique et grêle. A cette minute je suis encaissé entre deux écluses ; quand le trop-plein arrive, l'eau coule bêtement et fait le long des pierres comme le bruit d'un homme qui pisse dans un pot de chambre. Voilà le soleil qui se couche, et les joncs du bord se mirent dans l'eau et dessinent en avant et en arrière une longue bande d'ombre. Les joncs ici sont taillés au cordeau et égalisés, on les y plante (planter des joncs !) et on en fait une sorte de palissade d'herbe droite pour empêcher d'endommager les propriétés. Comme je ne suis pas propriétaire, j'aimerais autant voir sous l'eau un champ d'herbes inclinées irrégulièrement, en petits clochers verts qu'agiterait maintenant le vent et qui se ploieraient sous le poids des sauterelles qui s'y mirent avec elles.

MARSEILLE.

C'est à Toulouse qu'on s'aperçoit vraiment que l'on a quitté la montagne et qu'on entre en plein Midi. On se gorge de fruits rouges, de figes à la chair grasse. Le Languedoc est un pays de sôulas, de vie douce et facile ; à Carcassonne, à Narbonne, sur toute la ligne de Toulouse à Marseille, ce sont de grandes prairies couvertes de raisins qui jonchent la terre. Çà et là des masses grises d'oliviers, comme des pompons de soie ; au fond, les montagnes de l'Hérault. L'air est chaud, et le vent du Sud fait sourire de bien-être. Les gens sont doux et polis. Pays ouvert et qui reçoit grassement l'étranger, le Languedoc n'offre point de saillies bien tranchées ni dans les types, ni dans le costume, ni dans l'idiome. Tout le Midi en effet y a passé et y a laissé quelque chose : Romains, Goths, Francs du Nord aussi, dans la guerre des Albigeois, Espagnols à leur tour, tous y sont venus et y ont chassé sans doute tout élément national et primitif ; la nationalité s'est retirée plus haute et plus sombre dans les montagnes, ou plus acariâtre et violente dans la Provence. Quoique je n'aie rien retrouvé du Midi du moyen âge (à l'exception peut-être de quelques sculptures albigeoises à en juger par leur ressemblance avec les monuments persans à cause de la reproduction du cheval ailé et d'autres symboles ultracaucaïques que n'a point employés le Nord), la différence n'en reste pas moins sensible entre les deux provinces. En arrivant à Nîmes, par exemple, qui est pourtant encore du Languedoc, tout est changé, et la population y est criarde et avide ; elle ressemble un peu, je crois, à ce que devait être le bas peuple à Rome, les affranchis, les barbiers, les souteneurs, tous les valets de Plaute. Cela tient sans doute à ce que je les ai vus à l'ombre des arènes et dans un pays tout romain.

Le lendemain matin de mon arrivée à Carcassonne, j'ai été sur la grande place. C'est là une vraie place du Midi, où il fait bon dormir à l'ombre pour faire la sieste. Elle est plantée de platanes qui y jettent de l'ombre, et la grande fontaine au milieu, ornée de Naïades tenant entre leurs cuisses des dauphins, répand tout alentour cette suave fraîcheur des eaux que les pores hument si bien. On y tenait le marché : dans des corbeilles de jonc étaient dressées des pyramides de fruits, raisins, figes, poires ; le ciel était bleu, tout souriait, je sortais de table, j'étais heureux.

En face de la ville moderne il y a la vieille, dont les pans de murs s'étendent en grandes lignes grises de l'autre côté du fleuve, comme une rue romaine. On y monte par une rampe qui suit la colline ; on passe les tours d'entrée et l'on se trouve dans les rues. Elles sont droites et petites, pleines de tas de fumier, resserrées entre de vieilles maisons la plupart abandonnées ; de temps en temps un petit jardin avec une vigne et un olivier s'élève entre des toits plats. Sur une place il y a un grand puits roman dont le dedans est tout tapissé d'herbes ; personne n'y puise plus de l'eau, les plantes poussent au fond dans la source à moitié comblée. La ville est entourée d'un réseau de murs, romains par la base, gothiques par la tête ; on les répare, on les soutient du moins. Les portes aux mâchicoulis sont encore debout, mais je n'y ai trouvé ni soldat romain, ni archer latin, disparus également sous l'herbe des fossés. Si on regarde du côté de la campagne, tout est radieux et illuminé de soleil et flambe de vie. La vieille ville est là, assise sur la colline, et regarde les champs étendus à ses pieds depuis longtemps, comme un vieux terme dans un jardin.

L'église est gothique d'extérieur, romane à l'intérieur. Quand nous y sommes entrés, on moulait une vieille sculpture illisible où l'on ne voyait que confusément des cavaliers, une tour, un assaut. Qu'est maintenant devenu le déblaiement de la chapelle latérale ?

Dans la cathédrale de la ville neuve, chapelle très remarquable par deux statues, l'une de saint Benoist et l'autre de saint Jean.

C'était vendanges tout le long de la route jusqu'à Nîmes, aussi avons-nous vu des charrettes couvertes de baquets rougis ; partout on cueillait la vigne dans les champs.

Il était environ midi quand nous entrâmes à Narbonne. Le soleil dorait toute la campagne et la cathédrale se détachait sur l'azur du ciel, je n'avais pas l'idée de ce que c'était qu'un horizon.

Pendant deux jours, c'est bien mieux, j'ai vécu en pleine antiquité, à Nîmes et à Arles.

Rien ne se rattache au Pont du Gard que le vague souvenir qu'évoquent ces grands débris de grandeur romaine ; il ne coule plus rien dans l'aqueduc comblé en partie dans son long tuyau de pierre par les stalactites que les cours des eaux ont formées et qui font comme une double enceinte intérieure. Trois rangs d'arcades superposés les uns sur les autres supportent la rivière aérienne dans le lit de laquelle on se promène maintenant à pied sec. En bas et tout petit, coule le Gard qui ne passait alors que sous deux arches, tant le pont est grand et s'étend sur la campagne ; une partie s'est cachée et enfouie, des deux côtés du fleuve, dans les deux coteaux où l'édifice est appuyé, de sorte que ça fait comme un grand corps de pierre dont la tête et les pieds sont enfoncés dans le sable. En regardant d'en bas la hauteur du jet de ces voûtes, si fortes et si élégantes à la fois, il m'est venu à l'idée qu'on n'avait pas élevé de monument à l'ingénieur qui les avait élevées comme on l'a fait à M. Lebas pour le Luxor, et que les hommes qui ont fait tout cela ne sortaient pas de l'École polytechnique !

Le soleil était presque couché quand nous fûmes de retour à Nîmes ; la grande ombre des arènes se projetait tout alentour ; le vent de la nuit s'élevant faisait battre au haut des arcades les figuiers sauvages poussés sous les assises des mâts du vélarium. C'était à cette heure-là que souvent le spectacle devait finir, quand il s'était bien prolongé et que lions et gladiateurs s'étaient longuement tués. Le gardien vint nous ouvrir la grille de fer et nous entrâmes seuls sous les galeries abandonnées où se. croisèrent et allèrent tant de pas dont les pieds sont ailleurs.

L'arène était vide et on eût dit qu'on venait de la quitter, car les gradins sont là tout autour et dressés en amphithéâtre pour que tout le monde puisse voir. Voici la loge de l'Empereur, voici celle des chevaliers un peu plus bas, les vestales étaient en face ; voici les trois portes par où s'élançaient à la fois les gladiateurs et les bêtes fauves, si bien que si les morts revenaient, ils retrouveraient intactes leurs places laissées vides depuis deux mille ans, et pourraient s'y rasseoir encore, car personne ne la leur a prise, et le cirque a l'air d'attendre les vieux hôtes évanouis. Qui dira tout ce que savent ces pierres nues, tout ce qu'elles ont entendu, les jours qu'elles étaient neuves et quand la terre ne leur était pas montée jusqu'au cou ? cris féroces, trépignements d'impatience, tout ce qui s'est dit, sur ce seul coin de pierre, de triste, de gai, d'atroce et de folâtre, tous ceux qui ont ri, tous ceux qui sont venus, qui s'y sont assis et qui se sont levés ; il fut un temps où tout cela était retentissant de voix sonores, du bas jusqu'en haut, ce n'étaient que Iaticlaves bordés de rouge, manteaux de pourpre, sur l'épaule des sénateurs ; le vélarium flottait et le safran mouillait le sable, avant que la rosée de -sang n'en ait fait une boue. Que disait-on en attendant la venue de César ou du préteur, quand sous ses pieds dans les caveaux qui sont là rugissaient les panthères et que tout le monde se penchait en avant pour voir de quel air elles allaient sortir ? Qu'y disait Dave à Formion, Libertinus à Posthumus ? Quelle histoire racontait Hippias au consul ? de quel air riaient les sénateurs quand la place des chevaliers se trouvait prise ? Et là-haut, suspendus au plus haut, pourquoi les affranchis crient-ils si fort que tout le monde se tourne vers eux ? Et à cette heure-là, au crépuscule, quand tout était fini, que l'empereur se levait de sa loge, quand la vapeur grasse du théâtre montait au ciel toute chaude de sang et d'haleines, le soleil se couchait comme aujourd'hui dans son ciel bleu, le bruit s'écoulait peu à peu ; on venait enlever les morts, la courtisane remontait dans sa litière pour aller aux thermes avant souper, et Gito courait bien vite chez le barbier se faire nettoyer les ongles et épiler les joues, car la nuit va venir et on l'aime tant !

Ce qu'on appelle la Fontaine à Nîmes est un grand jardin plein d'ombrage et de murmures. Il n'y avait pas tant d'eau du temps qu'on se baignait sous les colonnes de marbre qui se trouvent suspendre une grande allée de jardin dans laquelle vous marchez. Au milieu il y a une île avec des Amours et des Naïades du temps de Louis XIV qui a fait, construire le canal qui conduit l'eau jusqu'à la ville. Au fond du jardin et à côté de la fontaine, à gauche, est le temple de Diane dont la voûte est écroulée ; on marche sur les frises et les corniches, les acanthes de marbre sont couvertes de mousse, les statues sont brisées et on n'en voit que des tronçons, morceaux de draperies qui semblent déchirés et qui se tiennent debout seuls comme des loques de marbre ; on se demande où est le reste.

Du haut de la tour Magne on voit toute la plaine de Nîmes, ses maisonnettes éparses dans la campagne, à mi-côte, toutes entourées de jardins d'oliviers et de vignes, et chacune assise à son aise dans la verdure grise de ses touffes d'oliviers. De longues rues qui descendent vers la ville, encaissées dans deux couloirs de murs faits avec de la poussière et des cailloux, ressemblent à des lignes de craie serpentant sur un tapis vert.

Je n'ai pas eu le temps de voir complètement la Maison Carrée.

A Arles également j'aurais voulu rester plus longtemps et y savourer longuement toutes les délicatesses sans nombre du cloître Saint-Trophime, qu'il faut avoir vu pour aimer et pour désirer encore Arles. Souvenir romain, un souvenir triste et grave, surtout sur le soir. Son amphithéâtre n'est pas, comme celui de Nîmes, presque intact et retrouvé tout entier comme une statue déterrée, il est enfoui jusqu'au milieu dans la terre et les loges supérieures sont démantelées ; on dirait que les gradins qui s'écroulent veulent descendre dans l'arène. Malgré les tours de Charles Martel on ne pense guère aux Francs, et malgré la chaumière laissée comme spécimen de toutes celles qui emplissaient naguère le cirque, on ne pense guère non plus au moyen âge.

Ces monuments romains sont comme un squelette dont les os çà et là passent à travers la terre ; aux ondulations du gazon on devine la forme du mort. Le théâtre est encore enfoui sous les maisons voisines et il n'y a qu'un coin qui se montre ; sur une plate-forme qui faisait face aux bancs de pierre et que j'ai jugée la scène, deux colonnes de marbre blanc sont encore debout, hautes toutes deux, décorées d'une collerette de feuilles d'acanthé, tandis que toutes les autres sont étendues, mutilées, à leurs pieds. C'est par là qu'on a joué Plaute et Térence et que les Mascarilles du monde latin ont fait rire le peuple ; l'ombre de la comédie latine palpite encore là. Au coin de la rue une fille sur sa porte attendait l'aventure (carnem bomini tenentem), mais les bougies du lupanar qui devaient brûler jour et nuit étaient éteintes, tant toute splendeur se perd ; pauvre ruine d'amour, à côté de la ruine de l'art et qui vivait dans son ombre. Les Arlésiennes sont jolies. On en voit peu, on m'a dit qu'on n'en voyait plus. On ne voit donc plus rien maintenant ! C'est là ce qu'on appelle le type gréco-romain ; leur taille est forte et svelte à la fois comme un fût de marbre, leur profil exquis est entouré d'une large bande de velours rouge qui leur passe sur le haut de la tête, se rattache sous leur cou et rehausse ainsi la couleur noire de leurs cheveux et fait nuance avec l'éclat de leur peau, toute chauffée de reflets de soleil.

C'est le lendemain, en me réveillant, que j'ai aperçu la Méditerranée, toute couverte encore des vapeurs du matin qui montaient pompées par le soleil ; ses eaux azurées étaient étendues entre les parois grises des rochers de la baie avec un calme et une solennité antique. Toute la côte qui descend jusqu'au rivage est couverte de bastides éparses dans la campagne, leurs volets étaient fermés et le jour les surprenait tout endormies entre les oliviers et les figuiers qui les entourent.

J'aime bien la Méditerranée, elle a quelque chose de grave et de tendre qui fait penser à la Grèce, quelque chose d'immense et de voluptueux qui fait penser à l'Orient. A la baie aux Oursins, où j'ai été pour voir pêcher le thon, je me serais cru volontiers sur un rivage d'Asie Mineure. Il faisait si beau soleil, toute la nature en fête vous entraînait si bien dans la peau et dans le cœur ! C'est la fille du patron Scard qui nous a reçus ; elle nous a fait monter dans sa maison, des filets étaient étendus par terre, et le jour qui entraînait par la fenêtre faisait éclater de blancheur la peinture à la colle qui décorait la muraille. Mlle Scard n'est pas jolie, mais elle avait des mouvements de tête et de taille les plus gracieux du monde ; tout en causant, elle se tenait sur sa chaise d'une façon mignarde et naïve. J'ai pensé aux belles demoiselles de ville qui se lissent, qui se sanglent, qui jeûnent et qui, après tout, ne valent pas en esprit et en beauté le sans-façon cordial de la fille du bord de la mer. Elle est venue avec nous dans la barque et elle a causé tout le temps avec nous comme une bonne créature. Ses jeux sont du même azur que la mer. Pas un souffle d'air ne ridait les flots, et nous avançons à la rame doucement et tout en suivant la direction du filet ; l'eau est si transparente que je m'amusais à regarder la madrague qui filait sous notre barque et les petits poissons se jouer dans les mailles avec toutes les couleurs chatoyantes que leur donnait le soleil qui, passant à travers les flots, les colorait de mille nuances d'azur, d'or et d'émeraude ; ils frétilaient, passaient et revenaient avec mille petits mouvements les plus gentils du monde. A mesure qu'on s'avance, le filet se resserre et s'étrangle de plus en plus vers les trois barques placées au large, qui forment comme un cul-de-sac où doit se rendre tout le poisson pris dans le filet antérieur. Les nattes de jonc accrochées aux barques, plongées dans l'eau et sur les bords se relevant en coquille, avaient l'air du berceau d'une Naïade. Un dimanche soir j'ai vu le peuple se réjouir. Ce qui chagrine le plus les gens vertueux c'est de voir le peuple s'amuser. Il y a de quoi les chagriner fort à Marseille, car il s'y amuse tout à son aise, et boit le plaisir par tous les pores, sous toutes les formes, tant qu'il peut. J'en suis rentré le soir tout édifié et plein d'estime pour ces bonnes gens qui dînent sans causer politique et qui s'enivrent sans philosophie. La rue de la Darse était pleine de marins de toutes les nations, juifs, arméniens, grecs, tous en costume national, encombrant les cabarets, riant avec des filles, renversant des pots de vin, chantant, dansant, faisant l'amour à leur aise. Aux portes des guinguettes, c'était une foule mouvante, chaude et gaie, qui se dressait sur la pointe des pieds pour voir ceux qui étaient attablés, qui jouaient et qui fumaient. Nous nous y sommes mêlés et à travers les vitres obscurcies nous avons vu, tout au fond d'une grande pièce, la représentation d'un mystère provençal. Sur une estrade au fond se tenaient quatre à cinq personnages richement vêtus ; il y avait le roi avec sa couronne, la reine, le paysan à qui on avait enlevé sa fille et qui se disputait avec le ravisseur pendant que la mère désolée et s'arrachant les cheveux chantait une espèce de complainte avec des exclamations nombreuses, comme dans les tragédies d'Eschyle. Le dialogue était vif et animé, improvisé sans doute, plein de saillies à coup sûr à en juger par les éclats de rire et les applaudissements qui survenaient de temps à autre dans l'auditoire. Tous ces braves gens écoutaient et goûtaient l'air avec respect et recueillement d'une manière à réjouir un poète s'il fût passé là. J'ai remarqué que les tables étaient presque toutes vides ou à peu près, on se pressait pour entrer, et la foule s'introduisait flot à flot comme elle pouvait, mais sans troubler le spectacle. Des joueurs de mandoline ou des chanteurs étaient aussi dans la rue, il y avait des cercles autour d'eux. On n'entendait aucun chant d'ivrogne ; les tavernes du rez-de-chaussée, toutes ouvertes, fermaient la vue de ce qui se passait au dedans par un grand rideau blanc qui tombait depuis le haut jusqu'en bas ; lorsque quelqu'un allait ou venait, on l'entr'ouvrait, on voyait assis, sur des tabourets séparés, trois ou quatre hommes du peuple, les bras nus, tenant des femmes sur leurs genoux.

A Toulon, j'ai revu, au coin d'une rue, encore un de ces drames, mais cette fois en français ; la scène était plus simple : un nain fort laid causait avec une grande fille assez jolie et exerçait sa verve sur les riches et les gens d'esprit, ce qui faisait rire les pauvres et les sots. Pour un homme intelligent qui saurait le provençal ou qui voudrait l'apprendre, ce serait une chose à étudier que ces derniers restes du théâtre roman, où l'on retrouverait peut-être tout à la fois des romanceros espagnols, des canzone des troubadours, des atellanes latines et de la farce italienne du temps de Scaramouche, quand Molière y prit son Médecin barbouillé.

Marseille est une jolie ville, bâtie de grandes maisons qui ont l'air de palais. Le soleil, le grand air du Midi entrent librement dans ses longues rues ; on y sent je ne sais quoi d'oriental, on y marche à l'aise, on respire content, la peau se dilate et hume le soleil comme un grand bain de lumière. Marseille est maintenant ce que devait être la Perse dans l'antiquité, Alexandrie au moyen âge : un capharnaüm, une babel de toutes les nations, où l'on voit des cheveux blonds, ras, de grandes barbes noires, la peau blanche rayée de veines bleues, le teint olivâtre de l'Asie, des yeux bleus, des regards noirs, tous les costumes, la veste, le manteau, le drap, la toile, la collerette rabattue des Anglais, le turban et les larges pantalons des Turcs. Vous entendez parler cent langues inconnues, le slave, le sanscrit, le persan, le scythe, l'égyptien, tous les idiomes, ceux qu'on parle au pays des neiges, ceux qu'on soupire dans les terres du Sud. Combien sont venus là sur ce quai où il fait maintenant si beau, et qui sont retournés auprès de leur cheminée de charbon de terre, ou dans leurs huttes au bord des grands fleuves, sous les palmiers de cent coudées, ou dans leur maison de jonc au bord du Gange ? Nous avons pris une de ces petites barques couvertes de tentes carrées, avec des franges blanches et rouges, et nous nous sommes fait descendre de l'autre côté du port où il y a des marchands, des voiliers, des vendeurs de toute espèce. Nous sommes entrés dans une de ces boutiques pour y acheter des pipes turques, des sandales, des cannes d'agave, toutes ces babioles étalées sous des vitres, venues de Smyrne, d'Alexandrie, de Constantinople, qui exhalent pour l'homme à l'imagination complaisante tous les parfums d'Orient, les images de la vie du sérail, les caravanes cheminant au désert, les grandes cités ensevelies dans le sable, les clairs de lune sur le Bosphore. J'y suis resté longtemps ; il y avait toutes sortes d'oiseaux venus de pays divers, enfermés dans des cages devant la boutique, qui battaient leurs ailes au soleil. Pauvres bêtes, qui regrettaient leur pays, leur nid resté vide à 2,000 lieues d'ici dans de grands arbres, bien hauts. Si j'ai maudit les bains de Bordeaux, je bénis ceux de Marseille. Quand j'y fus, c'était le soir, au soleil couchant ; il y avait peu de monde, j'avais toute la mer pour moi. Le grand calme qu'il faisait est des plus agréables pour nager, et le flot vous berce tout doucement avec un grand charme. Quelquefois j'écartais les quatre membres et je restais suspendu sur l'eau sans rien faire, regardant le fond de la mer tout tapissé de varechs, d'herbes vertes qui se remuent lentement, suivant le roulis qui les agite lentement comme une brise. Le soleil n'avait plus de rayons, et son grand disque rouge s'enfonçait sous l'horizon des flots, leur donnant des teintes roses et rouge pourpre ; quand il s'est couché, tout est devenu noir, et le vent du soir a fait faire du bruit aux flots en les poussant un peu sur les rochers qui se trouvaient sur le rivage.

J'ai eu le même spectacle le lendemain en allant dîner au Prado. Nous nous sommes promenés en barque dans une petite rivière qui se jette là ; des touffes d'arbres retombent au milieu, mes rames s'engageaient dans les feuilles restées sur le courant... qui ne coule pas, exercice qui m'a préparé à recevoir l'excellent dîner que nous avons fait chez Courty, grâce aux ordres et à la bourse de M. Cauvierre.

A Toulon, il va sans dire que j'ai visité un vaisseau de ligne. C'est certainement beau, grand, inspirant. J'ai vu des marins qui mangeaient dans de la porcelaine, j'ai assisté au salut du pavillon, etc., j'ai pu, comme tous les badauds, être étonné de voir des tapis et des fauteuils élastiques dans la chambre du capitaine ; mais en vue de marine j'aime mieux celle d'un petit port de mer comme Lansac, comme Trouville, où toutes les barques sont noires, usées, retapées, où tout sent le goudron, où la poulie rouillée crie au haut du mât, où les marteaux résonnent sur les vieilles carcasses qu'on calfeutre. De même, les fortifications de Toulon peuvent être une belle chose pour les troupiers, mais je n'aime point l'art militaire dans ce qu'il a de boutonné, de propre ; les remparts ne me plaisent qu'à moitié détruits. Il y a plus de poésie dans la casaque trouée d'un vieux troupier que sur l'uniforme le plus doré d'un général ; les drapeaux ne sont beaux que lorsqu'ils sont à moitié déchirés et noirs de poudre. Les canons du Marengo étaient tous en bon état et cirés comme des bottes ; est-ce qu'un canon n'est pas plus beau à voir avec quelques longues taches de sang qui coule et la gueule encore fumante ? A bord, au contraire, tout était propre, ciré, frotté, fait pour plaire aux dames quand elles viennent. Ces messieurs sont d'une politesse exquise et ont fait exécuter je ne sais quelle manœuvre pour nous faire honneur quand nous avons remis le pied sur notre embarcation. Nous revenions de Saint-Mandrier, que nous avons visité, guidés par un de ses médecins, M. Raynaud fils ; on m'y a fait admirer une église toute neuve bâtie par les forçats, j'ai admiré le coup de génie qui a fait construire un temple à Dieu par la main des assassins et des voleurs. Il est vrai que ça n'a rien coûté, mais il est vrai aussi qu'il est impossible, sinon absurde, d'y dire la messe : la forme ronde de cette bâtisse a contraint à placer l'autel sur un des points de la circonférence, de sorte qu'il est impossible que les fidèles puissent voir le prêtre. Je crois, au reste, que les fidèles qui viennent là y sont peu sensibles ; s'ils trempent les mains dans le bénitier placé à l'entrée, ce n'est uniquement que pour se les laver. Il faut voir la citerne de l'hôpital dont l'écho répète tous les sons avec un vacarme épouvantable ; on y tire des coups de fusil, on y joue du cornet à piston, on crie, on chante, on miaule, on fait toutes sortes de bruits absurdes pour avoir le plaisir de se les entendre répéter plus nombreux et plus forts.

La rade de Toulon est belle à voir, surtout quand, sorti des gorges d'OHioules, on la voit qui s'étend tout au loin dans son rayon de trois lieues de circuit, avec les mâts de tous ses vaisseaux, ses bricks, ses frégates, toutes ces voiles blanches qu'on hisse et qu'on abaisse. A droite, on a le fort Napoléon, au fond le fort Pharon. C'est par ce dernier que les républicains ont d'abord tenté le siège de la ville, qu'ils n'auraient jamais pu prendre sans le conseil de Bonaparte, qui affirma que tant que l'on ne serait pas maître de la rade, tous les efforts seraient inutiles, et qu'une fois la rade prise Toulon n'offrirait plus aucune défense. L'attaque commença donc sur le point appelé le petit Gibraltar, qui domine toute la mer et la ville elle-même qu'elle protège de ce côté. Tous les détails du siège sont d'ailleurs curieusement relatés dans l'Histoire de la Révolution française dans le département du Var, par M. Lauvergne, un de mes amis, que j'ai fait en voyage, un homme à moitié poète et à moitié médecin, offrant un bon mélange de sentiments et d'idées ; il m'a dit de ses vers, un soir que nous sommes revenus au bord de la rade jusqu'à Toulon ; nous avons déjeuné à une bastide voisine, dans un grand jardin plein d'ombre, où il y avait de hautes cannes de Provence, des avenues fraîches ; on a joué à la balançoire, on a fumé des cigarettes de Havane. Passé une journée à ne rien faire ; c'est toujours une de bonne, une journée tranquille, douce, où l'on a vécu avec des amis, sous un beau ciel, l'estomac plein, le cœur heureux ; elle s'est terminée par un beau crépuscule sur les flots, par une promenade pleine de causerie divaguante, de ces causeries où l'on mêle de tout, et qui tiennent à la fois de la rêverie solitaire au fond des bois et de l'intimité babillarde du coin du feu.

Le lendemain matin nous nous sommes embarqués pour la Corse.

CORSE.

Quand nous sommes partis de Toulon, la mer était belle et promettait d'être bienveillante aux estomacs faibles, aussi me suis-je embarqué avec la sécurité d'un homme sûr de digérer son déjeuner. Jusqu'au bout de la rade en effet le perfide élément est resté bon enfant, et le léger tangage imprimé à notre bateau nous remuait avec une certaine langueur mêlée de charme. Je sentais mollement le sommeil venir et je m'abandonnais au bercement de la naïade tout en regardant derrière nous le sillage de la quille qui s'élargissait et se perdait sur la grande surface bleue. A la hauteur des fies d'Hyères, la brise ne nous avait pas encore pris, et cependant de larges vagues déferlaient avec vigueur sur les flancs du bateau, sa carcasse en craquait (et la mienne aussi) ; une grande ligne noire était marquée à l'horizon et les ondes, à mesure que nous avançons, prenaient une teinte plus sombre, analogue tout à fait à celle d'un jeune médecin qui se promenait de long en large et dont les joues ressemblaient à du varech tant il était vert d'angoisse. Jusque-là j'étais resté couché sur le dos, dans la position la plus horizontale possible, et regardant le ciel où j'enviais d'être, car il me semblait ne remuer guère, et je pensais le plus que je pouvais afin que les enfantements de l'esprit fassent taire les cris de la chair. Secoué dans le dos par Jes -coups réguliers du piston, en long par le tangage, de côté par le roulis, je n'entendais que le bruit régulier des roues et celui de l'eau repoussée par elles et qui retombait en pluie des deux côtés du bateau ; je ne voyais que le bout du mât,,et mon œil fixe et stupide placé dessus en suivait tous les mouvements cadencés sans pouvoir s'en détacher, comme je ne pouvais me détacher non plus de mon banc de douleurs. La pluie survint, il fallut rentrer, se lever pour aller s'étendre dans sa. cabine où je devais rester pendant seize heures comme un crachat sur un plancher, fixe et tout gluant.

Le passager se composait de trois ecclésiastiques, d'un ingénieur des ponts et chaussées, d'un jeune médecin corse et d'un receveur des finances et de sa jeune femme qui a eu une agonie de vingt-quatre heures. La nuit vint, on alluma la lampe suspendue aux écoutes et que le roulis fit remuer et danser toute la nuit ; on dressa la table pour les survivants, après nous avoir fait l'ironique demande de nous y asseoir. Les trois curés et M. Cloquet seuls se mirent à manger. Cela avait quelque chose de triste, et je commençai à m'apitoyer sur mon sort ; humilié déjà de ma position, je l'étais encore plus de voir trois curés boire et manger comme des laïques. J'aurais pris tant de plaisir à me voir à leur place et eux à la mienne ! Les rôles me semblaient intervertis, d'autant plus "rue l'un d'eux voyageait pour sa santé — c'était bief plutôt à lui d'être malade — ; le second s'occupait de botanique — et qu'est-ce qu'un botaniste a à faire sur les flots ? — le troisième avait l'air d'un gros paysan décrassé, indigne de regarder la mer et de rêver, tandis que moi j'aurais eu si bonne grâce à table ! La nuit venue je l'aurais passée à contempler les étoiles, le vent dans les cheveux, la tempête dans le cœur. Le bonheur est toujours réservé à des imbéciles qui ne savent pas en jouir.

Je m'endormis enfin, et mon sommeil dura à peu près quatre heures. Il était minuit quand je me réveillai, j'entendais les trois prêtres ronfler, les autres voyageurs se taisaient ou soupiraient, un grand bruit d'eaux qui venaient et se retiraient se faisait sur les parois du navire, la mer était rude et la mâture craquait ; une faible lueur de lune qui se reflétait sur les flots venait d'en face et disparaissait de temps en temps, et celle de la lampe jetait sur les cabines des ondulations qui passaient et repassaient avec le mouvement du roulis. Alors je me mis à me rappeler Panurge en pareille occurrence, lorsque "la mer remuait du bas abysme" et que tristement assis au pied du grand mât il envoyait le sort dès pourceaux ; je m'amusai à continuer le parallèle, tâchant de me faire rire sur le compte de Panurge afin de ne pas trop m'attrister sur moi-même. L'immobilité à laquelle j'étais condamné me fatiguait horriblement et le matelas de crin m'entraînait dans les côtes ; au moindre mouvement que je tâchais de faire la nausée me prenait aussitôt, il fallait bien se résigner, la douleur me rendormait.

Nous longions alors les côtes de la Corse, et le temps, de plus en plus rude, me réveilla avec des angoisses épouvantables et une sueur d'agonisant. Je comparais les cabines à autant de bières superposées les unes au-dessus des autres ; c'était en effet une traversée d'enfer, et la barque de Caron n'a jamais contenu de gens qui aient eu le cœur plus malade. D'autres fois j'essayais de m'étourdir, de me tourner en ridicule, de m'amuser à mes dépens ; je me dédoublais et je me figurais être à terre, en plein jour, assis sur l'herbe, fumant à l'ombre et pensant à un autre moi couché sur le dos et vomissant dans une cuvette de fer-blanc ; ou bien je me transportais à Rouen, dans mon lit : l'hiver, je me réveillais à cette heure-là, j'allumais mon feu, et je me mettais à ma table. Alors je me rappelais tout et je pressurais ma mémoire pour qu'elle me rendît tous les détails de ma vie de là-bas, je revoyais ma cheminée, ma pendule, mon lit, mon tapis, le papier taché, le pavé blanchi à certaines places ; je m'approchais de la fenêtre et je regardais les barres du jour qui saillaient entre les branches de l'acacia ; tout le monde dort tranquille au-dessous de moi, le feu pétille et mon flambeau fait un cercle blanc au plafond. Ou bien c'était à Déville, l'été ; j'entrais dans le bosquet, j'ouvrais la barrière, j'entendais le bruit du loquet en fer qui retentissait sur le bois. Une vague plus forte me réveillait de tout cela et me rendait à ma situation présente, à ma cuvette aux trois quarts remplie.

D'autres fois je prenais des distractions stupides, comme de regarder toujours le même coin de la chambre, ou de faire couler quelques gouttes de citron sur ma lèvre inférieure que je m'amusais ensuite à souffler sur ma moustache, toutes les misères de la philosophie pour adoucir les maux. Le moment le plus récréatif pour moi a été celui où le roulis devenant plus fort a renversé la table et les chaises qui ont roulé avec un fracas épouvantable et ont éveillé tous les malades hurlant : le vieux curé, qui avait les pieds embarrassés dans les rideaux, a manqué d'être écrasé, et le financier, qui sortait du cabinet, est tombé sur le dos de M. Cloquet de la manière la plus immorale du monde. J'ai ri très haut, d'abord parce que j'en avais envie, et, en second lieu, pour faire un peu plus de bruit et me divertir. Le mouvement que je m'étais donné occasionna encore une purgation, qui fut bien la plus cruelle, et de nouvelles douleurs qui ne me quittèrent réellement qu'à Ajaccio sur le terrain des vaches. Quelques heures après être débarqué, le sol remuait encore et je voyais tous les meubles s'incliner et se redresser.

Nous avons eu un avant-goût de l'hospitalité corse dans le cordial et franc accueil du préfet, qui nous a fait quitter notre hôtel et nous a pris chez lui comme des amis déjà connus. M. Jourdan est un homme encore jeune, plein d'énergie et de vivacité. Ancien carbonaro, un des chefs de l'association, sa jeunesse a été agitée par les passions politiques et sa tête a été mise à prix. Il administre la Corse depuis dix ans, ne rencontrant plus maintenant d'opposition que dans ! quelques membres du conseil général qu'il mène assez rudement. Sa maison est pleine de ce bon ton qui part du cœur ; ses filles, qui ne sont pas jolies, sont charmantes. M. Jourdan connaît son département mieux qu'aucun Corse et il nous a donné sur ce beau pays d'excellents renseignements. Je me rappelle un certain soir qu'il a déblatéré contre l'archéologie et je l'ai contredit ; un autre jour il a parlé avec feu des études historiques et particulièrement de la philosophie de l'histoire ; je l'ai laissé dire, me demandant en moi-même ce que les gens qui ont passé leur vie à l'étudier entendaient aujourd'hui par ce mot-là, et s'ils le comprenaient bien eux-mêmes. Ce que les plus fervents y voient de plus clair, c'est que c'est une science dans l'horizon, et les autres sceptiques pensent que ce sont deux mots bien lourds à entasser l'un sur l'autre, et que la philosophie est assez obscure sans y adjoindre l'histoire, et que l'histoire en elle-même est assez pitoyable sans l'atteler à la philosophie. Nous sommes partis d'Ajaccio pour Vico le 7 octobre, à 6 heures du matin. Le fils de M. Jourdan nous a accompagnés jusqu'à une lieue hors la ville. Nous avons quitté la vue d'Ajaccio et nous nous sommes enfoncés dans la montagne. La route en suit toutes les ondulations et fait souvent des coudeff sur les flancs du maquis, de sorte que la vue change sans cesse et que le même tableau montre graduellement toutes ses parties et se déploie avec toutes ses couleurs, ses nuances de ton et tous les caprices de son terrain accidenté. Après avoir passé deux vallées, nous arrivâmes sur une hauteur d'où nous aperçûmes la vallée de Cinarca, couverte de petits monticules blancs qui se détachaient dans la verdure du maquis. Au bas s'étendent les trois golfes de Chopra, de Liatnone et de Sagone ; dans l'horizon et au bout du promontoire, la petite colonie de Cargèse. Toute la route était déserte, et l'œil ne découvrait pas un seul pan de mur. Tantôt à l'ombre et tantôt au soleil, suivant que la silhouette des montagnes que nous longions s'avancait ou se retirait, nous allions au petit trot, baissant la tête, éblouis que nous étions par la lumière qui inondait l'air et donnait aux contours des rochers quelque chose de si vaporeux et de si ardent à* la fois qu'il était impossible à l'œil de les saisir nettement. Nous sommes descendus à travers les broussailles et les granits éboulés, tramant nos chevaux par la bride jusqu'à une cabane de planches où nous avons déjeuné sous une treille de fougères sèches, en vue de la mer. Une pauvre femme s'y tenait couchée et poussait des gémissements aigus que lui arrachait la douleur d'un abcès au bras ; les autres habitants n'étaient guère plus rians ; un jeune garçon tout jaune de la fièvre nous regardait manger avec de grands yeux noirs hébétés. Nos chevaux broutaient dans le maquis, toute la nature rayonnait de soleil, la mer au fond scintillait sur le sable et ressemblait avec ses trois golfes à un tapis de velours bleu découpé en trois festons. Nous sommes repartis au bout d'une heure et nous avons marché longtemps dans des sentiers couverts qui serpentent dans le maquis et descendent jusqu'au rivage. Au revers d'un coteau nous avons vu sortir du bois et allant en sens inverse un jeune Corse, à pied, accompagné d'une femme montée sur un petit cheval noir. Elle se tenait à califourchon, accoudée sur une botte de maïs que portait sa monture ; un grand chapeau de paille, plat, lui couvrait la tête, et ses jupes relevées en arrière par la croupe du cheval laissaient voir ses pieds nus. Ils se sont arrêtés pour nous laisser passer, nous ont salués gravement. C'était alors en plein midi, et nous longions le bord de la mer que le chemin suit jusqu'à l'ancienne ville de Sagom. Elle était calme, le soleil, donnant dessus, éclairait son azur qui paraissait plus limpide encore ; ses rayons faisaient tout autour des rochers à fleur comme des couronnes de diamant qui les auraient entourés ; elles brillaient plus vives et plus scintillantes que les étoiles. La mer a un parfum plus suave que les roses, nous le humions avec délices ; nous aspirions en nous le soleil, la brise marine, la vue de l'horizon, l'odeur des myrtes, car il est des jours heureux où l'âme aussi est ouverte au soleil comme la campagne et, comme elle, embaume de fleurs cachées que la suprême beauté y fait éclore. On se pénètre de rayons, d'air pur, de pensées suaves et intraduisibles ; tout en vous palpite de joie et bat des ailes avec les éléments, on s'y attache, on respire avec eux, l'essence de la nature animée semble passée en vous dans un hymen exquis, vous souriez au bruit du vent qui fait remuer la cime des arbres, au murmure du flot sur la grève ; vous courez sur les mers avec la brise, quelque chose d'éthéré, de grand, de tendre plane dans la lumière même du soleil et se perd dans une immensité radieuse comme les vapeurs rosées du matin qui remontent vers le ciel.

Nous avons quitté la mer au port de Sagone, vieille ville dont on ne voit même pas les ruines, pour continuer notre route vers Vico, où nous sommes enfin arrivés le soir après dix heures de cheval. Nous avons logé chez un cousin de M. Multedo, grand homme blond et doux, parlant peu et se contentant de répéter souvent le même geste de main. Il s'est vaillamment battu contre les Anglais lorsque ceux-ci ont voulu faire une descente à Sagone ; il se sent tout prêt à recommencer. Il y a en effet dans la Corse une haine profonde pour l'Angleterre et un grand désir de le prouver. Sur la route que nous avons faite pour aller à Vico, des paysans nous arrêtaient.

— Va-t-on se battre, demandaient-ils ?

— C'est possible.

— Tant mieux.

— Et contre qui ?

— Contre les Anglais.

A ce mot ils bondissaient de joie et nous montraient en ricanant un poignard ou un pistolet, car un Corse ne voyage jamais sans être armé, soit par prudence ou par habitude. On porte le poignard soit attaché dans le pantalon, mis dans la poche de la veste, ou glissé dans la manche ; jamais on ne s'en sépare, pas même à la ville, pas même à table. Dans un grand dîner à la préfecture et où se trouvait réuni presque tout le conseil général, on m'a assuré que pas un des convives n'était sans son stylet. Le cocher qui nous a conduits à Bogogna tenait un grand pistolet chargé sous le coussin de sa voiture. Tous les bergers de la Corse manquent plutôt de chemise blanche que de lame affilée.

A Vico on commence à connaître ce que c'est qu'un village de la Corse. Situé sur un monticule, dans une grande vallée, il est dominé de tous les côtés par des montagnes qui l'entourent en entonnoir. Le système montagneux de la Corse à proprement parler, n'est point un système ; imaginez une orange coupée par le milieu, c'est là la Corse. Au fond de chaque vallée, de temps en temps un village, et pour aller au hameau voisin il faut une demi-journée de marche et passer quelquefois trois ou quatre montagnes. La campagne est partout déserte ; où elle n'est pas couverte de maquis, ce sont des plaines, mais on n'y rencontre pas plus d'habitations, car le paysan cultive encore son champ comme l'Arabe : au printemps il descend pour l'ensemencer, à l'automne il revient pour faire la moisson ; hors de là il se tient chez lui sans sortir deux fois par an de son rocher où il vit sans rien faire, paresseux, sobre et chaste. Vico est la patrie du fameux Théodore dont le nom retentit encore dans toute la Corse avec un éclat héroïque ; il a tenu douze ans le maquis, et n'a été tué qu'en trahison. C'était un simple paysan du pays, que tous aimaient et que tous aiment encore. Ce bandit-là était un noble cœur, un héros. H venait d'être pris par la conscription et il restait chez lui attendant qu'on l'appelât ; le brigadier du lieu, son compère, lui avait promis de l'avertir à temps, quand un matin la force armée tombe chez lui et l'arrache de sa cabane au nom du roi. C'était le compère qui dirigeait sa petite compagnie et quf, pour se faire bien voir sans doute, voulut le mener rondement et prouver son zèle pour l'État en faisant le lâche et le traître. Dans la crainte qu'il ne lui échappât il lui mit les menottes aux mains en lui disant : "Compère, tu ne m'échapperas pas", et tout le monde vous dira encore que les poignets de Théodore en étaient écorchés. Il l'amena ainsi à Ajaccio où il fut jugé et condamné aux galères. Mais après la justice des juges, ce fut le tour de celle du bandit. H s'échappa donc le soir même et alla coucher au maquis ; le dimanche suivant, au sortir de la messe, il se trouva sur la place, tout le monde l'entourait et le brigadier aussi, à qui Théodore cria du plus loin et tout en le mirant : "Compère, tu ne m'échapperas pas". Il ne lui échappa pas non plus, et tomba percé d'une balle au cœur, première vengeance. Le bandit regagna le maquis d'où il ne descendait plus que pour continuer ses meurtres sur la famille de son ennemi et sur les gendarmes, dont il tua bien une quarantaine. Le coup de fusil parti il disparaissait le soir et retournait dans un autre canton. Il vécut ainsi douze hivers et douze étés, et toujours généreux, réparant les torts, défendant ceux qui s'adressaient à lui, délicat à l'extrême sur le point d'honneur, menant joyeuse vie, recherché des femmes pour son bon cœur et sa belle mine, aimé de trois maîtresses à la fois. L'une d'elles, qui était enceinte lorsqu'il fut tué, chanta sur le corps de son amant une ballata que mon guide m'a redite. Elle commence par ces mots : "Si je n'étais pas chargée de ton fils et qui doit naître pour te venger, je t'irais rejoindre, ô mon Théodore !"

Son frère était également bandit, mais il n'en avait ni la générosité ni les belles formes. Ayant mis plusieurs jours à contribution un curé des environs, il fut tué à la fin par celui-ci qui, harassé de ses exactions, sut l'attirer chez lui, et sauta dessus avec des hommes mis en embuscade. La sœur du bandit, attirée par le bruit de tous ces hommes qui se roulaient les uns sur les autres, entra aussitôt dans le presbytère. Le cadavre était là, elle se rua dessus, elle s'agenouilla sur le corps de son frère, et agenouillée, chantant une ballata avec d'épouvantables cris, elle suçà longtemps le sang qui coulait de ses blessures.

Il ne faut point juger les mœurs de la Corse avec nos petites idées européennes. Ici un bandit est ordinairement le plus honnête homme du pays et il rencontre dans l'estime et la sympathie populaire tout ce que son exil lui a fait quitter de sécurité sociale. Un homme tue son voisin en plein jour sur la place publique, il gagne le maquis et disparaît pour toujours. Hors un membre de sa famille, qui correspond avec lui, personne ne sait plus ce qu'il est devenu. Ils vivent ainsi dix ans, quinze ans, quelquefois vingt ans. Quand ils ont fini leur contumace ils rentrent chez eux comme des ressuscités, ils reprennent leur ancienne façon de vivre, sans que rien de honteux ne soit attaché à leur nom. Il est impossible de voyager en Corse sans avoir affaire avec d'anciens bandits, qu'on rencontre dans le monde, comme on dirait en France. Ils vous racontent eux-mêmes leur histoire en riant, et ils s'en glorifient tous plutôt qu'ils n'en rougissent ; c'est toujours à cause du point d'honneur, et surtout quand une femme s'y trouve mêlée, que se déclarent ces inimitiés profondes qui s'étendent jusqu'aux arrière-petits-fils et durent quelquefois plusieurs siècles, plus vivaces et tout aussi longues que les haines nationales.

Quelquefois ils font des serments à la manière des barbares, qui les lient jusqu'au jour où la vengeance sera accomplie. On m'a parlé d'un jeune Corse dont le frère avait été tué à coups de poignard ; il alla dans le maquis à l'endroit où on venait de déposer le corps, il se barbouilla de sang le visage et les mains, jurant devant ses amis qu'il ne les laverait que le jour où le dernier de la famille ennemie serait tué. Il tint sa parole et les extermina tous jusqu'aux cousins et aux neveux.

J'ai vu aujourd'hui, à Isolaccio, chez le capitaine Lauseler où je suis logé, un brave médecin des armées de la République dont le fils s'est enfui en Toscane et qui lui-même a été obligé de quitter le village où il habitait. Sa fille s'était laissé séduire ; le père de l'enfant néanmoins reconnaissait son fils, mais il refusait de lui donner son nom en se mariant avec la pauvre fille. Il joignit même l'ironie à l'outrage en assurant qu'il allait bientôt faire un autre mariage et en ridiculisant en place publique la famille de sa maîtresse, si bien qu'un jour le fils de la maison a vengé l'honneur de son nom, comme un Corse se venge, en plein soleil et en face de tous. Pour lui, il s'est enfui sur la terre d'Italie, mais son père et ses parents, redoutant la vendetta, ont émigré dans le Fiuaorbo. ‘

A Ajaccîo j'avais vu également un jeurie docteur qui a quitté Sartene, son pays, trois cousins à lui et son frère ayant déjà été les victimes du même homme et lui menacé d'en être ‘ la cinquième ; aussi marchait-il armé jusqu'aux dents dans les rues de la ville où nous nous promenions avec lui.

On retrouve en Corse beaucoup de choses antiques : caractère, couleur, profils de têtes. On pense aux vieux bergers du Latium en voyant ces hommes vêtus de grosses étoffes rousses ; ils ont la tête pâle, l'œil ardent et couleur de suie, quelque chose d'inactif dans le regard, de solennel dans tous les mouvements ; vous les rencontrez conduisant des troupeaux de moutons qui broutent les jeunes pousses des maquis, l'herbe qui pousse dans les fentes du granit des hautes montagnes ; ils vivent avec eux, seuls dans les campagnes, et le soir quand on voyage, on voit tout à coup leurs bêtes sortir d'entre les broussailles, çà et là sous les arbres, et mangeant les ronces. Eparpillés au hasard, ils font entendre le bruit de leurs clochettes qui remuent à chacun de leurs pas dans les broussailles . A quelque distance se tient leur berger, petit homme noir et trapu, véritable pâtre antique, appuyé tristement sur son long bâton. A ses pieds dort un chien fauve. La nuit venue, ils se réunissent tous ensemble et allument de grands feux que du fond des vallées on voit briller sur la montagne. Toutes les côtes chaque soir sont ainsi couronnées de ces taches lumineuses qui s'étendent dans tout l'horizon. J'ai vu dans toutes les forêts que j'ai traversées de grands pins calcinés encore debout, qu'ils allument sans les abattre pour passer la nuit autour de ces bûches de cent pieds. Ils reçoivent le baudet qui vient tranquillement se réchauffer à leur feu et ils attendent ainsi le jour tout en dormant ou en chantant. J'ai été surtout frappé de la physionomie antique du Corse dans un jeune homme qui nous a accompagnés le lendemain jusqu'à Guagno. Il était monté sur un petit cheval qui s'emportait à chaque instant sous lui ; son bonnet rouge'brun retombait en avant comme un bonnet de la liberté. Une seule ligne seulement, interrompue par un sourcil noir faisant angle droit, s'étendait depuis le haut du front jusqu'au bout du nez ; bouche mince et fine, barbe noire et frisée comme dans les camées de César ; menton carré : un profil de médaille romaine.

J'ai eu une transition brusque en fait de physionomie, en voyant à la sucrerie de bois de M. Dupuis la face grasse, réjouie et fleurie d'un beau Normand rebondi, qui est venu exprès de Rouen au fond de la Corse, pour être l'économe de l'établissement. M. François, quand nous l'avons vu, était vêtu d'une veste de tricot gris, un sale bonnet de coton lui couvrait les oreilles, et il s'appuyait en se dandinant sur une canne de jonc, convalescent encore de la fièvre intermittente qui a pincé tous mes compatriotes transplantés. Le vin, qui est ici à très bon marché, tout autant que les miasmes végétaux en ont été la cause, "néanmoins, me disait M. François, nous avons toujours mangé nos 250 livres de viande par semaine". Ce petit homme, égrillard et gaillard, au ventre arrondi et aux couleurs rosées, regrettant du fond de la Corse les bals masqués de Rouen, et les restaurants de sa ville, la première du monde, m'assurait-il, pour la bonne chère, vu à côté de ces hommes du Midi, pâles, sobres, taciturnes, le cœur plein d'orgueil, d'élangs purs, de passions ardentes, me semblait comme un vaudeville à côté d'une tragédie antique. Son grand œil bleu malicieux était réjoui de voir quelqu'un de son pays et en me disant adieu il m'a serré la main avec tendresse. Pauvre homme qui s'expatrie sans doute par dévouement pour lui-même et qui, sa bourse remplie, s'en ira bien vite se bouiotter en carnaval, au théâtre, des Arts, et manger la poule de Pavilly chez Jacquinet !

En revenant à Vico, le jour baissait et toutes les montagnes prenaient des teintes vineuses et vaporeuses. Au crépuscule, le paysage agrandissait toutes ses lignes et ses perspectives, et des rayons de soleil couchant passaient en grandes lignes droites lumineuses entre les gorges des montagnes ; tout le ciel était rouge feu, comme incendié par le soleil.

A notre gauche s'élevaient les sept pics de la Sposa avec la tête qui la couronne. Ces sept pics sont autant de cavaliers, et cette tête est la tête d'une femme. Au delà de ces monts, à droite de Vico, dans la forêt, il y a un village ; c'était le village de cette femme. On venait de la marier, mais son époux après les noces était retourné chez lui, et sa femme qui devait l'y suivre était restée seule chez sa mère dans son lit de fille. Sa mère la gardait toujours, et quand elle demandait à partir, elle lui répondait : demain. En vain chaque matin, quand le rossignol chantait dans le maquis, que les feux des bergers s'éteignaient sur les montagnes, les sept cavaliers, les amis de l'époux, arrivaient avec leurs chevaux tout sellés et bridés ; ce n'était pas encore aujourd'hui. Elle attendit donc un jour, deux jours, trois jours, jusqu'à quatre, et la voilà qui part heureuse, chantant sur son cheval, la couronne de myrte blanc sur la tête. Son mari l'attend sans- doute impatient, regardant la route où rien n'apparaît ; il soupire, tout malade d'amour. Déjà les raisins et les olives sont dans la corbeille, la lampe brûle au plafond, le lit est ouvert et attend les heureux. La fille galope sur son cheval, elle et ses cavaliers sont entrâmes avec une vitesse de démon. Sa mère pourtant est restée toute en pleurs sur le seuil de sa porte et elle lui crie : adieu, adieu, mais pour réponse elle n'entend toujours que le roulement du galop qui s'éloigne de plus en plus. Elle la vit encore une fois quand elle fut arrivée au haut de la montagne et qu'elle allait descendre.

Encore une fois elle fit signe de la main, mais l'autre regardait en avant. Elle regardait le cœur tout palpitant, là-bas au fond de la vallée, un toit qui fumait à l'horizon ; elle enviait le torrent qui courait devant elle, les oiseaux qui volaient à tire d'aile vers la demeure de l'époux chéri. L'infâme, dit-on, ne regarda pas sa mère, ne détourna pas la tête, ne fit pas un signe de main ; avec fureur la voilà qui enfonce l'éperon dans le ventre de son cheval pour descendre la montagne plus vite encore qu'elle ne l'avait montée, mais sa bête ne veut pas avancer ; un cavalier qu'elle appelle pour l'aider ne peut descendre de sa sejle, ni le second non plus, ni aucun des sept cavaliers ne peut faire un mouvement ; ils se sentent tous entrer dans le granit, comme dans la vase ; ils poussent des cris de désespoir auxquels répond la voix de la mère irritée qui leur envoie une malédiction éternelle.

Un paysan, monté sur un petit cheval maigre et chassant devant lui d'autres bêtes chargées d'outres, marchait devant nous depuis quelque temps ; il se détournait pour nous examiner et pour écouter ce que nous disions. Sa maigre et vieille figure était animée tout à la fois de ruse et de bonhomie gracieuse, mélange singulier d'expression que j'avais déjà observé sur quelques visages corses et surtout sur celui du bandit Bastianesi que j'avais vu quelques jours auparavant à l'hôpital d'Ajaccio. Son grand œil noir et sombre nous dévorait et épiait les moindres gestes de nos lèvres. Quand il a pu se rapprocher de M. Multedo, il lui a demandé qui nous étions, où nous allions, et tout ce que nous avions dit depuis qu'il marchait près de nous. Avec nos habitudes de politesse française, une telle curiosité eût été récompensée d'un refus net et formel d'y satisfaire. Rien n'est défiant, soupçonneux comme un Corse. Du plus loin qu'il vous voit, il fixe sur vous un regard de faucon, vous aborde avec précaution, et vous scrute tout entier de la tête aux pieds. Si votre air lui plait, si vous le traitez d'égal à égal, franchement, loyalement, il sera tout à vous dès la première heure, il se battra pour vous défendre, mentira auprès des juges, et le tout sans arrière-pensée d'intérêt, mais à charge de revanche. M. Multedo lui a donc dit qu'il nous l'avait montré comme étant l'oncle de Théodore et qu'il venait de nous raconter l'histoire de ses neveux : "Il n'y a rien de déshonorant, a-t-il dit, vous avez bien fait". Puis il s'est retourné vers nous et a tâché de lier conversation en italien, nous faisant bonne mine et nous traitant en amis jusqu'au moment où il a pris un chemin de traverse dans le maquis. Nous sommes repartis pour Ajaccio le lendemain matin quand la lune nous éclairait encore ; le neveu de M. Multedo nous a fait la conduite jusqu'à Sagone, ainsi que le médecin du pays qui, tout en chevauchant près de nous, nous conte des histoires corses. Après avoir dit adieu à ces braves gens, nous avons repris le bord de la mer. C'était la même route, dans les mêmes maquis pleins d'arbousiers rouges et de myrtes en fleurs, le même azur sur les flots calmes que le soleil faisait resplendir. Çà et là nous voyions sur les eaux de grands cercles s'étendre et diminuer peu à peu, c'étaient des dauphins qui se jouaient, comme des chevaux dans une prairie et sortaient de leur retraite marine pour voir le soleil du matin.

A Calcatoggio, nous avons déjeuné sous le même lit de fougères sèches, en vue des trois golfes à qui j'ai dit un tendre et dernier adieu.

Il y a à Ajaccio une maison que les hommes qui naîtront viendront voir en pèlerinage ; on sera heureux d'en toucher les pierres, on en gravira dans dix siècles les marches en ruines, et on recueillera dans des cassolettes le bois pourri des tilleuls qui fleurissent encore devant la porte, et, émus de sa grande ombre, comme si nous voyions la maison d'Alexandre, on se dira : c'est pourtant là que l'Empereur est né !

Elle se trouve sur la place Laetitia et au coin de la rue Saint-Charles. A l'extérieur elle est peinte en blanc, toutes ses fenêtres ont des volets noirs ; la porte est basse et s'ouvre sur un escalier en marbre noir de même couleur, et dont la rampe en fer date de la même époque. La main de l'Empereur s'est appuyée dessus, à cette place où vous mettez la vôtre. Les chambres sont généralement belles, riches, ornées de rouge la plupart, et décorées dans le goût de la république ; le salon est grand, un canapé à droite en entrant, des glaces, un lustre en verre. La chambre où il est né donne sur une terrasse ; les volets qui étaient fermés quand nous y entrâmes, nous laissaient à peine voir le plancher, et de grandes barres de jour se dessinaient en blanc sur le parquet ciré, et le portrait de Napoléon, don qu'il a fait de Sainte-Hélène, était suspendu au fond. Le manteau impérial, couvert d'abeilles d'or, saillissait dans l'ombre malgré le crépuscule. On nous a ouvert les fenêtres, et le jour est entré et a inondé toute la pièce, découvrant tout, comme un drap qu'on eût retiré. Alors nous avons vu la cheminée, les murs, les tableaux, le tapis, le sofa, les statues ; les meubles étaient adossés à la muraille tendue de papier grisâtre à petits pois verts ; tout était propre, rangé, habité encore. Mais il n'y a plus le fauteuil où sa mère le mit au monde, ce n'est plus le même lit non plus. Sur la table de nuit se trouvait un livre, et retourné de manière à ne pouvoir en lire le titre. Je le pris et je lus : "Manuel du cultivateur provençal indiquant les divers modes d'engrais, etc." ; je reposai le livre avec dégoût et m'avançai dans l'autre pièce. C'est là, à l'entrée et près de la porte, le vieux canapé de la famille, fané, à franges arrachées, aux couleurs ternies ; il est encore souple, on enfonce dans son duvet et on s'y met à rêver à bien des choses grandes.

C'est le lendemain matin, à 3 heures, que nous avons commencé notre grande tournée, expédition pour Bastia à travers la Corse. Après avoir embrassé notre excellent hôte, nous sommes partis dans sa voiture qui devait nous mener jusqu'à Bogogna. Le capitaine Laurelli nous accompagne et nous sommes conduits par l'ancien cocher de Pozzo di Borgo, le neveu du ministre russe assassiné il y a quelque temps dans sa voiture, en retournant chez lui. On nous avait montré sur la route de Vico la place où le meurtre s'accomplit, et nous vîmes les trous que les balles ont fait dans le granit de la route. Lestement emportés par nos deux chevaux arabes, nous arrivons vers midi à Bocognano, où nous déjeunons. Chemin faisant, le capitaine nous a raconté des histoires de bandits. M. Laurelli est un ancien bandit lui-même qui a tenu trois ans le maquis. Je ne me rappelle plus bien son histoire, mais c'est toujours l'injustice d'un général qui l'a forcé à fuir dans la campagne ; il était à cette époque maire de la commune cTIisolaccio. C'est lui qui, depuis, a purgé tout le Fiumorbo des bandes qui l'infestaient, et qui le premier a fait payer l'impôt à ce pays que l'on ne traversait pas, il y a vingt ans, sans faire son testament. Il nous a indiqué les mouvements stratégiques opérés par les voltigeurs pour s'emparer des bandits et nous a donné sur cette matière tous les documents que nous lui avons demandés. Rarement ou, pour mieux dire, jamais un bandit ne se rend ; attaqué, il se bat tant que sa cartouchière est pleine, et sa dernière balle, il la réserve pour lui. Quelquefois, quand le maquis où il se tient est cerné de toutes parts, le bandit reste couché à plat ventre sous les broussailles et échappe ainsi à toute investigation ; c'est même la manière la plus sûre .

Le capitaine nous raconta l'histoire d'un bandit des environs de Bastia qu'il a tué de sa main. D'une force prodigieuse et d'une férocité analogue, cet homme exerçait sur la Corse entière un absolutisme asiatique : il assignait aux pères et aux maris le jour et le lieu où ils devaient lui envoyer leurs filles et leurs femmes. Quand le capitaine l'eut tué, on fit une fête générale dans le pays, et depuis Bastia jusqu'à Isolaccio, tous les paysans se pressaient à sa rencontre pour le remercier.

A Bocognano, nous trouvons nos chevaux et nous piquons vers la forêt de Vizzavona. Le capitaine s'est fait escorter par deux voltigeurs. Est-ce pour nous faire honneur ? Est-ce par prudence ?

ÉCRIT AU RETOUR.

J'en étais resté à Marseille de mon voyage, je le reprends à quinze jours de distance. Me voilà réinstallé dans mon fauteuil vert, auprès de mon feu qui brûle, voilà que je recommence ma vie des ans passés. Qu'ont donc les voyages de si attrayant pour qu'on les regrette à peine finis ? Oh ! je rêverai encore longtemps des forêts de pins où je me promenais il y a trois semaines, et de la Méditerranée qui était si bleue, si limpide, si éclairée de soleil il y a quinze jours ; je sens bien que cet hiver, quand la neige couvrira les toits et que le vent sifflera dans les serrures, je me surprendrai à errer dans les maquis de myrtes, le long du golfe de Liamone, ou à regarder la lune dans la baie d'Ajaccio.

Maintenant, les arbres ici n'ont plus de feuilles, et la boue est dans les chemins. J'entends encore le chant de nos guides et le bruit du vent dans les châtaigniers ; c'est pour cela que je reprendrai souvent ces notes interrompues et reprises à des places différentes, avec des encre si diverses qu'elles semblent une mosaïque. Je les allongerai, je les détaillerai de plus en plus, ce sera comme un homme qui a un peu de vin dans son verre et qui y met de l'eau pour délayer son plaisir et boire plus longtemps. Quand on marche on veut l'avenir, on désire avancer, on court, on s'élance, regardant toujours en avant et, la route à peine finie, on détourne la tête et l'on regrette les chemins parcourus si vite, de sorte que l'homme, quoi qu'on en dise, aspire sans cesse au passé et à l'avenir, à tout ce qui n'est pas de sa vie actuelle en un mot, puisqu'il se reporte toujours vers le matin qui n'est plus, vers la nuit qui n'est pas encore (réflexion neuve).

Notre guide s'appelle Francesco, et nous faisons connaissance avec lui. Nous n'avons pas voulu reprendre celui qui nous avait conduits à Vico. Charles était un gros garçon joufflu, gai, obséquieux les premiers jours, mais d'une tendresse si exagérée pour ses chevaux qu'il nous défendait presque de les faire trotter. Nous nous sommes débarrassés de sa tutelle, et son successeur paraît plus complaisant ; petit, maigre et hâve, il forme en tous points contraste parfait avec l'autre ; le temps nous dira si nous avons gagné au change.

A une lieue environ de Bocognano, au haut de la vallée dont ce village tient la base, on quitte la grande route d'Ajaccio à Bastia et l'on entre dans la forêt de Vizzavona. Le chemin devient de plus en plus ardu et difficile, si bien qu'il faut mettre pied à terre. Chacun marche comme il peut. Vers les 4 heures du soir nous sommes arrivés sur un plateau où nos montures et nous-mêmes avons soufflé à l'aise. Tout à l'heure nous avons failli peut-être avoir une aventure : un coup de fusil est parti devant nous sur la montagne, le capitaine s'arrête, appelle un de ses hommes, lui demande sa carabine, l'arme, et marche devant nous en nous disant de le suivre. Les arbres étaient si hauts, le soleil si resplendissant, toute la nature en un mot était si belle que nous n'avions guère peur, car on ne se figure bien une tragédie que de nuit et par un orage ; mais en plein jour, sous un beau ciel, quand les oiseaux chantent dans le bois, quand, les pieds tout fatigués, on se repose à marcher sur les tapis d'herbes, le cœur se dilate, s'épanouit, aspire en lui la vie luxuriante qui l'entoure, les couleurs qui brillent, tout le bonheur qui se présente. Comment croire alors à quelque chose de triste ? Cela pouvait être pourtant un bandit qui eût quelque querelle avec le capitaine, une vengeance à assouvir sur lui, mille choses probables. Comment se fait-il alors que ces préparatifs de guerre m'aient paru ridicules, et que je me sois diverti de penser qu'ils n'étaient pas peut-être inutiles ? Et à quelques pas de là nous avons rencontré des chasseurs. On voit dans les forêts, de temps en temps, de grands arbres calcinés qui sont encore debout au milieu de leurs frères tout verts et tout chargés de feuilles. Quand les bergers y ont rallumé le feu, et qu'il fait un orage, ils se brisent et tombent par terre ; quelquefois, leurs branches s'embarrassent dans celles des arbres voisins, et ils restent ainsi suspendus dans leurs bras ; les vivants tiennent embrassés les morts qui allaient tomber. Nous avons laissé passer devant nous nos compagnons et nous sommes restés, M. Cloquet et moi, à nous amuser comme des enfants, à faire les hercules du Nord, en soulevant avec une main des arbres de trente pieds et nous les brisant sur le dos en riant aux éclats. C'était chose assez comique que de nous voir enlever de terre des poutres énormes et les lancer à quarante pas aussi facilement que nous eussions fait d'une badine. Après nous être ainsi divertis une bonne demi-heure et avoir ri tout notre soûl, nous avons rejoint nos gens à qui nous avons dit que nous venions de faire des observations botaniques. Il était tard quand nous sommes arrivés à Ghisoni, maigre village où il me semblait impossible de loger des honnêtes gens. On nous a conduits devant une grande maison grise et délabrée. Quoiqu'il fût nuit, je ne voyais aucune lumière aux fenêtres, et la porte qui s'ouvrait sur la rue était celle d'une salle basse où grognaient des pourceaux. A un angle de cette pièce enfumée était placée une large échelle en bois et dont les marches peu profondes ne permettaient de monter qu'en se tournant de côté. Nous avons trouvé le mahre et sa femme qui ne nous attendaient que le lendemain. Ils se sont donc beaucoup excusés sur ce qu'ils avaient déjà dîné, et se sont mis tout de suite à préparer notre repas. La maîtresse était une grande femme maigre, vêtue d'une robe bleue faite sans doute d'après une gravure de mode du temps de l'Empire, c'est là, du reste, tout ce que je puis dire d'elle, car elle ne nous a pas adressé un mot et nous a servis silencieusement et respectueusement comme une servante. C'est, du reste, une chose à remarquer en Corse que le rôle insignifiant qu'y joue la femme ; si son mari tient à la garder pure, ce n'est ni par amour ni par respect pour elle, c'est par orgueil pour lui-même, c'est par vénération pour le nom qu'il lui a donné. D'ailleurs, il n'y a entre eux deux aucune communication d'idées et de sentiments ; le fils, même enfant, est plus respecté et plus maître que sa mère(1).

Tandis que vous voyez l'homme bien vêtu, portant une veste de velours, un bon pantalon de gros drap, la pipe à la bouche et le fusil sur l'épaule, chevauchant à son aise sur une bonne bête, sa femme, à quelques pas de là, le suit pieds nus et portant tous les fardeaux. Vous voyagerez dans toute la Corse, vous y serez partout bien reçu, on vous accueillera d'une manière cordiale qui vous ira jusqu'au cœur, et le lendemain matin votre hôte pleurera presque en vous quittant ; de sa famille, vous ne connaîtrez que lui. En descendant de cheval vous avez bien vu des enfants jouer devant la porte, ce sont les siens, mais ils ne paraissent pas à table ; leur mère ne se montre presque jamais et reste avec eux tant qu'ils sont jeunes. Les liens de famille sont forts, il est vrai, mais à la manière antique, entre frères,

O Dans un curieux mémoire que M. Lauvergne a publié sur la Corse, il dit qu'il a vu un jeune garçon de douze ans environ s'amuser à tenir sa mère couchée en joue au bout de son fusil ; il lui faisait faire ainsi toutes les évolutions qu'il lui commandait et la faisait danser comme un chien avec un fouet. Le père était à deux pas de là et riait beaucoup de cette plaisanterie barbare. entre cousins, entre alliés, même à des degrés éloignés. Quand un membre de la famille est insulté, tout le reste est solidaire de sa vengeance ; s'il succombe c'est à eux de le remplacer, de sorte qu'instantanément il se forme une association de cinquante à soixante hommes, tous servant la même cause, gardant le même secret, animés de la même haine.

La femme compte pour peu de chose et on ne la consulte jamais pour prendre mari. Quand un fils a 14 ou 15 ans, son père lui dit qu'il est temps d'être homme, qu'il faut se marier ; if lui choisît lui-même une femme, les deux familles négocient longtemps l'affaire et avec toutes les précautions possibles, le pacte d'alliance se conclut, les noces se font avec pompe, on y chante des chansons guerrières ; puis les enfants arrivent dans le ménage, on leur apprend à tirer le fusil, on leur enseigne un peu de français, ils vont à la chasse et c'est là toute fa vie, une vie de paresse, d'orgueil et de grandeur.

Nous avons dîné tard ; le capitaine nous a servis, comme s'il eût été le maître de la maison. Un avoué de Corte, attiré dans le pays par les affaires de la Compagnie Corse, se chauffait au coin de la cheminée et nous a tenu conversation, car notre hôte restait à distance et avait l'air tout humilié de recevoir des personnages. Après le dîner, on m'a conduit dans une pièce délabrée où je devais coucher. Les murs étaient barbouillés de chaux, une petite gravure noire représentant un moine italien canonisé était à la tête du grand lit qui en occupait l'angle ; la petite fenêtre donnait sans doute sur la campagne ; la lune n'était pas encore levée, je me mis à me déshabiller, éclairé par un flambeau à l'huile placé sur une chaise près de mon chevet et dont la faible lueur néanmoins me faisait très bien voir que les draps n'étaient ni propres ni de fine toile. Je fis alors des réflexions philosophiques et je me dis que sans doute les gens qui dormaient dans ce lit-là devaient y bien dormir n'ayant ni amour contenu, ni ambition rentrée, ni aucune des passions du monde moderne. Tout cela était si loin de la France, si loin du siècle, resté à une époque que nous rêvons maintenant dans les livres, et je me demandais (tout en graissant d'huile mes cuisses rougies) si après tout, quand on voyagera en diligence, quand il y aura au lieu de ces maisons délabrées des restaurants à la carte, et quand tout ce pays pauvre sera devenu misérable grâce à la cupidité qu'on y introduira, si tout cela enfin vaudra bien mieux ; et je comparais le bruit du vent dans les arbres, celui des clochettes de chèvres sur les montagnes, au roulement des voitures dans la rue de Rivoli, au bruit des pompes à feu dans la vallée de Déville. Je me rappelais alors la baie d'Ajaccio et la molle langueur qui vous prend dans la plaine de Liamone, en vue de ces trois lacs que j'aime tant ; je me rappellerai le soleil de midi, les jours fuyants sur le tronc des hêtres, la lune le matin dans la vallée de Bocognano, et reportant les jeux sur cette chambre si calme, si paisible, je pensais à d'autres chambres où il y a des tapis, des velours, des rideaux de mousseline, etc. Je m'endormis enfin, m'amusant peu de mes réflexions et harassé de la course du jour et de mes exercices acrobatiques. Non, non, on ne dort pas mieux (de corps du moins) à Ghisoni que dans des lits de pourpre (style poétique, car je n'ai jamais couché que dans des draps blancs) ; cela veut dire que les puces m'ont tenu éveillé pendant trois heures, quelque invention que j'aie prise pour les fuir. J'avais éteint mon flambeau, et la lune avec tous ses rayons entraînait dans ma chambre et m'éclairait comme en plein jour. Je me levai et je regardai la campagne, je voyais les chèvres marcher dans les sentiers du maquis et sur les collines ; çà et là les feux de bergers, j'entendais leurs chants ; il faisait si beau qu'on eût dit le jour, mais un jour tout étrange, un jour de lune. Etant arrivé de nuit dans le village, je n'avais pu voir le paysage où il se trouve placé, mais il m'était maintenant facile d'en saisir tous les accidents, tout aussi bien qu'en plein soleil. Entre les gorges des montagnes il y avait des vapeurs bleues et diaphanes qui montaient et qui semblaient se bercer à droite et à gauche, comme de grandes gazes d'une couleur indéfinissable qu'une brise aurait agitées sur le flanc de toutes ces collines. Leur grande silhouette se projetait en avant, de l'autre côté de la vallée ; la lumière s'étendait, claire et blanche, autour de la lune, et devenait de plus en plus humide et tendre en s'approchant du haut faite inégal des montagnes. Tous les contours, toutes les lignes saillaient librement, grâce à leur teinte grise qui surplombait les grandes masses noires du maquis. Le ciel semblait haut, haut, et la lune avait l'air d'être lancée et perdue au milieu ; tout alentour elle éclairait l'azur, le pénétrait de blancheur, laissant tomber sur la vallée en pluie lumineuse ses vapeurs d'argent qui, une fois arrivées à la terre, semblaient remonter vers elle comme de la fumée.

Nous sommes repartis le lendemain de bonne heure, après que M. Cloquet eut vu, je crois, tous les malades du pays qui encombraient la maison de notre hôte avec les curieux venus pour nous voir. Ils sont amenés par un pharmacien italien, grand gaillard blond aux yeux bleus, qui a plutôt l'air d'un Bas-Normand que d'un Parmesan, sauf toutefois la vivacité faciale. C'est un réfugié politique qui paraît fort patriote ; il attend le signal de l'autre rivage pour laisser là la Corse et se mettre le fusil sur l'épaule ; il nous parle beaucoup de M. Libri dont il se dit l'ami intime.

Chemin faisant, je raconte au capitaine mes doléances et mes malédictions de la nuit passée ; ce pauvre Laurelli avait été encore plus mal traité que moi, il ne s'est pas déshabillé et s'est couché sur une malle.

La route est étroite, monte et descend continuellement. Nous sommes au fond d'une vallée dont les deux côtés sont couverts de pins immenses qui font partie de la forêt de Sorba.

Nous nous arrêtons à une rivière qui sépare celle-ci de la forêt de Marmano. Là nous nous sommes assis, et avons dévoré les provisions que le capitaine avait fourrées dans ses sacoches. On a monté dans les arbres pour casser des branches vertes pour nos chevaux qui nous regardent d'un œil d'envie. L'herbe est fraîche, de grands troncs dépouillés et tout blancs s'étendent en travers du torrent, les rochers et les pierres qui sont dans son lit le font murmurer ; les grands arbres nous entourent, et sur leur faite le soleil commence à darder vigoureusement.

Nous sommes accompagnés par un brave homme de Ghisoni qui doit nous indiquer la route d'isolaccio, qu'ignorent également notre guide et le capitaine. Il marche à côté de ce dernier et lui parle sans s'arrêter pendant plus d'une heure, sans que celui-ci lui réponde un seul mot.

Nous avons monté depuis le matin et nous entrons dans la forêt de Marmano. Le chemin est raide et va en zigzag à travers les sapins, dont le tronc a des lueurs du soleil qui pénètre à travers les branches supérieures et éclaire tout le pied de la forêt ; l'air embaume de l'odeur du bois vert. Il ne faut pas écrire tout cela.

De temps en temps les arbres avaient l'air de nous quitter, et nous passions alors devant des huttes de bergers, faites de cailloux rapportés et de branchages morts. Enfin nous parvînmes, vers le soir, sur le plateau appelé le Prato. Nous étions placés sur une des plus hautes montagnes de la Corse et nous voyions à nos côtés toutes les vallées et toutes les montagnes qui s'abaissaient en descendant vers la mer ; les ondulations des coteaux avaient des couleurs diversement nuancées suivant qu'ils étaient couverts de maquis, de châtaigniers, de pins, de chênes-liège ou de prairies ; en face de nous et dans un horizon de plus de trente lieues, s'étendait la mer Tyrrhénienne, comprenant l'île d'Elbe, Sainte-Christine, les îles Caprera, un coin de la Sardaigne ; à nos pieds s'étendait la plaine d'Aleria, immense et blanche comme une vue de l'Orient, où allaient se rendre toutes les vallées qui partaient en divergeant du centre où nous étions ; et là, en face, au fond de cette mer bleue où les rayons de soleil tracent sur les flots de grandes lignes qui scintillent, c'est la Romagne, c'est l'Italie ! Nous étions descendus de nos chevaux et nous les avons laissé aller brouter l'herbe courte qui pousse entre le granit. Nous nous sommes avancés pour contempler plus à notre aise un roc escarpé en espèce de promontoire. On ne saurait dire ce qui se passe en vous à de pareils spectacles ; je suis resté une demi-heure sans remuer, et regardant comme un idiot la grande ligne blanche qui s'étendait à l'horizon. Isolaccio est situé au fond des gorges que nous dominions. Du Prato il faut bien trois heures pour y atteindre. Nous avons descendu par des chemins abrupts, à l'aventure, comme nous avons pu.

Tout le revers de la montagne est couvert d'une forêt de hêtres qui poussent on ne sait comment dans les granits ; de grands glacis s'étendent les uns sur les autres ; nos malheureuses bêtes, que personne ne conduisait, hésitaient à chaque pas à avancer et piétinaient de devant, toutes tremblantes de peur ; nous-mêmes, à l'aide de grands bâtons que nous avions ramassés, ne pouvions faire autrement que de marcher à pas de géants et de sauter tant bien que mal par-dessus les racines qui ressortaient du sol et s'étendaient au loin au milieu des pierres.

Nous avons trouvé au bas de cette côte quelques amis du capitaine ( tous armés de fusils et accompagnés de chiens), qui étaient venus à sa rencontre. Il faisait presque nuit, le vent du soir venait sécher la sueur qui trempait nos cheveux ; comme je me sentais bon jarret, je fis lestement à pied la distance qui nous séparait du village, le maquis alors n'avait pas plus de deux pieds de hauteur ; cela reposait de courir dans les ronces et les joncs marins, après avoir sauté sur du granit. Enfin au détour d'une petite colline, nous aperçûmes des champs enclos de haies et nous entendîmes des chiens japper, et bientôt nous arrivâmes au village.

La maison du fils du capitaine, où nous devons loger, se trouve la dernière du pays. A la voir extérieurement, avec toutes ses vitres cassées, et ses sombres murs gris, je présumais un triste gîte ; mais deux gros enfants joufflus et bruns, qui vinrent embrasser leur grand-père à la descente de cheval, nous montrèrent à leur bon air et à leurs vêtements propres que mes prévisions étaient injustes, et je me sentis alors soulagé de tout l'espoir d'un bon dîner et d'un bon lit. Les gens qui restent non loin de leur feu, les pieds dans les pantoufles, et à qui l'on vient dire tous les jours, quand il est six heures, que la table est mise, s'étonnent quelquefois dans les récits de voyage de la voracité et des joies bestiales de celui qu'ils lisent ou qu'ils écoutent ; il faut avoir passé plusieurs jours à chevaucher sous un soleil de 23 degrés, pendant douze ou treize heures, s'arrêtant une fois dans la journée pour boire l'eau d'une fontaine et manger du pain sec, avoir marché de longues heures sur des pointes de marbre ou de granit, pour sentir la joie inexprimable (et ne plus la condamner) de dévorer en silence le bouc rôti sur les charbons et de s'étendre ensuite dans une couche molle et propre.

Un jeune homme de 22 ans environ, en veste de velours vert, nu-tête et de manières graves, se tenait sur le perron ; c'était le fils de M. Laurelli. H nous a fait monter en haut où nous avons dîné comme des affamés, en compagnie d'un sergent voltigeur qui a gardé le silence tout le repas et qui, la bouche béante, à chaque mot que nous disions avait l'air d'attendre les suivants comme de bons morceaux.

Le capitaine Laurelli est le propriétaire des eaux minérales de Pietra-Pola, situées à environ deux lieues d'isolaccio dans la direction de la mer. Le médecin du pays nous y a accompagnés (c'est le même dont j'ai parlé plus haut), il s'appuyait sur une petite canne en jonc très courte et terminée par une longue pointe en fer ; il n'estime les médecins qu'autant qu'ils sont bons philosophes, mot qu'il nous répétait souvent. Cela étonne et fait plaisir à la fois de trouver au milieu des forêts, à trente lieues d'une ville, dans un désert pour ainsi dire et chez des gens qui n'ont jamais quitté leur village, tout le bon sens pratique de ceux qui ont vécu longtemps dans le monde, une finesse rare dans les jugements sur les hommes et sur les choses de la vie. L'esprit des Corses n'a rien de ce qu'on appelle l'esprit français ; il y a en eux un mélange de Montaigne et de Corneille, c'est de la finesse et de l'héroïsme, ils vous disent quelquefois sur la politique et sur les relations humaines des choses antiques et frappées à un coin solennel ; jamais un Corse ne vous ennuiera du récit de ses affaires, ni de sa récolte et de ses troupeaux ; son orgueil, qui est immense, l'empêche de vous entretenir de choses vulgaires.

Le capitaine nous avait parlé d'un de ses neveux retiré au maquis pour homicide et nous avait proposé de nous le faire voir. A la nuit close, et sur les dix heures du soir, il fut introduit dans la maison. Comme la salle où nous avions mangé était pleine d'amis qui étaient venus faire visite après dîner, et celle où avait couché M. Cloquet se trouvant au fond, ce fut donc dans la mienne, au haut de l'escalier qui donnait sur la rue, qu'on le fit entrer. Le capitaine nous fit signe et nous sortîmes comme pour aller nous coucher.

Le bandit se tenait au fond de ma chambre, le flambeau placé sur la table de nuit me le fit voir dès en entrant. C'était un grand jeune homme, bien vêtu et de bonne mine, sa main droite s'appuyait sur sa carabine. Il nous a salués avec une politesse réservée et nous nous sommes regardés quelque temps sans rien dire, embarrassés un peu de notre contenance. Il était beau, toute sa personne avait quelque chose de naïf et d'ardent, ses yeux noirs qui brillaient avec éclat étaient pleins de tendresse à voir des hommes qui lui tendaient la main ; sa peau était rosée et fraîche, sa barbe noire était bien peignée ; il avait quelque chose de nonchalant et de vif tout à la fois, plein de grâce et de coquetterie montagnarde. Il n'y a rien de bête comme de représenter les scélérats l'œil hagard, déguenillés, bourrelés de remords. Celui-là, au contraire, avait le sourire sur les lèvres, des dents blanches, les mains propres ; on eut plutôt dit qu'il venait de sortir de son lit que du maquis. Il y a pourtant trois ans qu'il y vit, trois ans qu'il n'a été reçu sous un toit, qu'il couche l'hiver dans la neige et que les voltigeurs et les gendarmes lui font la chasse comme à une bête fauve. Brave et grand cœur qui palpite seul et librement dans les bois, sans avoir besoin de vous pour vivre, plus pur et plus haut placé, sans doute, que la plupart des honnêtes gens de France, à commencer par le plus mince épicier de province pour monter jusqu'au roi !

A côté de lui se tenait un autre homme maigre et noir, une figure pleine de feu, grimaçant et pétillant d'expression rustique : c'est le parent qui communique avec lui, lui fait parvenir les vivres et les nouvelles. Tout le temps il est resté assis sur une malle qui se trouvait là et a gardé son bonnet de laine, il parlait à voix basse et très vivement.

Nous avons causé longtemps ensemble, nous nous sommes occupés des moyens de le faire sortir de la Corse. Comme son signalement au besoin eût pu passer pour le mien, je lui ai proposé mon passeport, mais l'autre homme en a tiré un autre de sa poche qu'il s'était procuré sous un faux nom ; de ce côté les mesures sont bien prises. Il a été question de le faire aller à la sucrerie de M. Dupuis et de là on l'aurait fait passer en Normandie avec les ouvriers qui retourneraient chez eux, mais il aborderait peut-être plus difficilement sur la terre de France que sur celle d'Italie ; il est donc décidé que la première barque que l'on pourra trouver à Sagone doublera Bonifacio et viendra le prendre la nuit sur le rivage de Fiumorbo. De là il ira à Livourne, tâchera de s'accrocher à quelque commerçant d'Alexandrie ou de Smjrne et de passer avec lui en Égypte où il prendra du service.

Au bout d'une heure il nous a quittés, le capitaine lui a versé une goutte, deux doigts d'eau-de-vie ; enfin il nous a dit adieu à plusieurs reprises, nous lui avons souhaité bonne réussite, il nous a longuement serré la main et nous a quittés le cœur tout navré de tendresse.

Nous devons aller coucher le lendemain soir à Corte, il nous fallait traverser tout le Fiumorbo et fa plaine d'Aleria. C'était une forte journée, aussi commençâmes-nous à 4 heures du matin. Comme il faisait encore froid, nous marchâmes deux heures environ pour nous échauffer ; le fils LaureHi nous a accompagnés jusqu'au bout du pays, et là nous nous sommes séparés. Car c'est là voyager ! On arrive dans un lieu, des amitiés se lient, et à l'heure où elfes vont s'accomplir, tout se défait, et l'on sème ainsi partout quelque chose de son cœur. Les premiers jours cela attriste, on s'arrache difficilement de tout ce que l'on a vu qui vous plaît, mais l'habitude venant, il ne vous prend plus envie de regarder en arrière, on pense toujours au lendemain, quelquefois au jour même, jamais à la veille ; l'esprit, comme les jambes, s'accoutume à vous porter en avant, et comme dans un panorama perpétuel, tout passe près de vous rapidement, vu au galop de votre course. Vallées pleines d'ombre, maquis de myrtes, sentiers sinueux dans les fougères, golfes aux doux murmures dans les mers bleues, larges horizons de soleil, grandes forêts aux pins décharnés, confidences faites dans le chemin, figures qu'on rencontre, aventures imprévues, longues causeries avec des amis d'hier, tout cela glisse emporté et vite s'oublie pour l'instant, mais bientôt se resserre dans je ne sais quelle synthèse harmonieuse qui ne vous présente plus ensuite qu'un grand mélange suave de sentiments et d'images où la mémoire se reporte toujours avec bonheur, vous replace vous-même et vous les donne à remâcher, embaumés cette fois de je ne sais quel parfum nouveau qui vous les fait chérir d'une autre manière.

A Prunelli, le capitaine nous a fait arrêter pour dire le bonjour à deux de ses filles mariées dans ce village. C'était là le quartier général des Corses qui rossèrent si élégamment le marquis de Rivière, ambassadeur à Constantinople. Déjà nous avons vu à la préfecture le général Paoli, à qui la gloire de cette guerre est revenue en entier ; néanmoins, c'est bien notre ami le capitaine Laurelli qui, dans le pays, passe pour y avoir eu la part la plus active. La veille, en allant aux eaux de Pietra-Pola, il nous avait montré tous les lieux où l'action s'est portée, en homme qui parle de ce qu'il a vu ; chez lui, à Corte, il a conservé les étriers du général Sebastiani qui était descendu de cheval pour fuir plus à l'aise dans la campagne. Nous sommes descendus à travers de grands maquis et des chênes-liège jusqu'à l'immense plaine qui forme tout le littoral oriental de la Corse et qui s'étend depuis Bonifacio jusqu'à Bastia. Elle est inculte dans sa plus grande partie, couverte çà et là d'un maquis dont fa touffe de verdure paraît de loin au milieu de cette terre blanche ; on en a brûlé, manière de défricher adoptée dans toute la Corse, mais tous les efforts, la plupart du temps, n'ont pas été au delà et les jeunes pousses reparaissent entre les arbustes calcinés. De temps à autre un grand chêne-liège décharné élève son branchage clairsemé sans donner d'ombrage ; ailleurs, nous allons dans des sentiers à travers de hautes fougères, et chacun voit la tête de celui qui le précède passer rapidement, en mille détours, le long de leur tige. Les voltigeurs nous ont accompagnés jusqu'à la rivière, et nous avons continué seuls notre route. Le pays est désert, vide d'habitants ; ceux qu'on rencontre dans tout le Fiumorbo sont jaunes de fièvre, vêtus de haillons et ont l'air triste. La misère dans le Nord n'a rien de bien choquant, le ciel est gris ; toute la nature est lugubre ; mais ici, quand le soleil répand tant de splendeur et de vie rayonnante, les couleurs sombres sont bien sombres, les têtes pâles sont plus pâles, sous ce beau ciel si bleu et si uni les guenilles sont bien plus déchirées.

Nous avons un peu quitté la plaine et repris à gauche en longeant le pied des mêmes montagnes que nous dominions la veille. J'aime à me redire tous ces détails. Il me semble que nous tournons encore dans les chemins du maquis, que j'arrache encore en passant les fruits rouges de l'arbousier et les petites fleurs blanches des myrtes ; nous allons sous des berceaux de verdure, de temps en temps nous nous perdons de vue, tout est vert et frais, et quand on se retrouve dans la plaine, marchant dans les chaumes, tout au contraire est long et lumineux. Quand nos chevaux s'arrêtent, le bruit se tait, et nous ne voyons que l'immense horizon bleu de la Méditerranée qui s'agrandit à mesure que nous montons. La plaine, comme la mer, se déploie aussi de plus en plus, elle agrandit, comme elle, ses perspectives sans nombre. Des masses grises de cailloux vous indiquent dans la plaine quelques petits villages. Dans l'immense baie que la mer découpe devant nous, à quatre lieues en face, était la ville d'Aléria. On nous dit que des flottes pouvaient contenir dans ce port comblé et qu'il ne faudrait qu'enlever les sables pour en faire demain le plus beau du monde. Elle garde un renom de splendeur passée. Quand l'avait-elle ? Personne ne vous le dira ; n'y a sans doute bien des siècles qu'elle regarde ainsi en face l'Italie sans se lever de ses sables et que les lièvres viennent brouter le thym dans les pierres de son aqueduc. Ensevelie dans cette plaine vide et blanche elle me semblait une de ces cités de l'Orient, mortes depuis longtemps et que nous rêvons si tristes et si belles, y remplaçant tous les rêves de grandeur que l'humanité a eus.

Cependant nous marchions sur la crête de petites collines, dans des cailloux de cuivre qui ressortaient de sous terre comme des bronzes antiques ; des plantes sauvages poussaient parmi eux, tout était pavé d'airain rouge et noir ; le soleil brillait dessus, et les rayons qui tombaient sur les arêtes saillantes en rebondissaient en paillettes. J'aimais à regarder à gauche la ligne blanche qui bordait la vue et que je savais être l'Italie. Elle s'étendait dans toute la longueur du grand horizon bleu qu'elle contemplait avec une langueur inexprimable. Notre guide nous chantait je ne sais quelle ballata que je n'écoutais pas, laissant buter mon cheval à chaque pierre et tout ébloui, étourdi de tant de soleil, de tant d'images, et de toutes les pensées qui arrivaient les unes sur les autres, sereines et limpides comme des flots sur des flots. Il faisait du vent, un vent tiède qui venait de courir sur les ondes, il arrivait de là-bas, d'au delà de cet horizon, nous apportant vaguement, avec l'odeur de la mer, comme un souvenir de choses que je n'avais pas vues. J'aurais presque pleuré quand je me suis enfoncé de nouveau dans la montagne. Non, ce n'est jamais devant l'océan, devant nos mers du Nord, vertes et furieuses, que les dix mille eussent poussé le cri d'immense espoir dont parle Xénophon ; mais c'est bien devant cette mer-là, quand, avec tout son azur, elle surgit au soleil entre les fentes de rochers gris, que le cœur alors prend une immense volée pour courir sur la cime de ces flots si doux, à ces rivages aimés, où les poètes antiques ont placé toutes les beautés, à ces pays suaves où l'écume, un matin, apporta dans une coquille la Vénus endormie.

Le jour était déjà avancé, et nous n'avions point mangé. De temps à autre nous rencontrions bien quelque hutte en chêne-liège de dessous laquelle ressortaient des yeux noirs brillant comme ceux des chats ; des familles entières accroupies se tenaient au milieu de la fumée sous ces maisons de trois à quatre pieds de hauteur ainsi qu'on nous représente les Hottentots ou les naturels de la Nouvelle-Zélande ; mais toutes ces cabanes n'avaient point d'eau, il fallait donc aller plus loin. Nous en trouvâmes enfin vers i heure de l'après-midi à Acquaviva, petit village ombragé d'une touffe de châtaigniers. Nous sommes entrés dans une maison où le bienheureux capitaine nous a fait déjeuner. Quelques charbons se trouvaient au milieu de la cuisine entre trois ou quatre pierres rangées en carré, la fumée s'en allait au ciel à travers les poutres du toit.

Nous avons été reçus par une vieille femme et par une jeune fille très jolie et fort bourrue, dont les naïvetés gaillardes nous ont fait rire encore deux heures après l'avoir quittée ; mon excellent compagnon, eh se séparant d'elle, se roulait sur le perron, et sa bonne humeur l'a mis en train de me faire des confidences facétieuses pendant une partie de la route que nous avons parcourue, cette fois, l'estomac plein tout en devisant et en pantagruélisant.

Après une journée de dix heures de cheval, nous sommes arrivés à Corte. M<sup>TM</sup>8 Laurelli nous a reçus avec une distinction toute parisienne ; ses manières et sa figure ne sont pas de la Corse, où le beau sexe a les unes et les autres assez peu agréables. Hélas ! il a fallu se séparer le lendemain de notre bon capitaine qui nous a embrassés avec effusion et qui nous a bien promis de venir nous voir en France.

La grande route nous a menés jusqu'à trois heures de Corte où nous avons deux voltigeurs qui, par ordre du capitaine, devaient nous accompagner jusqu'à Piedicroce. Nous nous élevons dans la direction de l'Italie et parcourons une route à peu près semblable à celle que nous avons faite de Bocognano à Ghisoni. Les montagnes de la Corse se montrent à nous de nouveau, et le soleil couchant nous les éclaire encore. Arrivés sur la hauteur où nous avons revu la Méditerranée, elles avaient complètement disparu. Le soir venait et le chemin se faisait de plus en plus mauvais ; il a fallu descendre de cheval et aller à pied. Bientôt nous sommes entrés dans une forêt de châtaigniers, et l'obscurité est devenue tout à fait complète. Notre guide ne contribue pas médiocrement à nous rendre la route désagréable, if s'est enivré à Corte, nous étourdit de ses chansons ; il est baveux, bavard et bravache.

Comme la lune n'était pas encore parue et que les arbres étaient touffus, nous marchions doucement de peur de rouler dans les pierres, soutenant nos pas avec la baguette qui nous avait servi de cravache. Toute la vallée était couverte de châtaigniers, et les pentes qui s'étendaient sous nous, les hauteurs qui nous dominaient, tout était sombre, silencieux. Le jour qui pénétrait dans les clairières nous faisait voir de gros troncs d'arbres qui apparaissaient les uns derrière les autres ; de temps à autre nous enfoncions les pieds dans des sources d'eau vive. Notre guide, qui conduisait les chevaux, s'inquiétait d'ailleurs fort peu de savoir si nous le suivions, tout entier qu'il était à l'expansion lyrique que la boisson avait provoquée en lui. Souvent nous nous arrêtons pour reprendre haleine et nous demander si bientôt enfin nous arrivions. Les châtaignes tombaient sur les feuilles, sur la mousse ou sur nos chapeaux. Au loin, au fond de la vallée, un chien aboyait après la lune qui commençait à se lever un peu, toute rousse et entourée de nuages ; quelques lumières brillaient çà et là dans les montagnes voisines et disparaissaient les unes après les autres. Francesco de plus belle reprenait sa chanson ou continuait d'exciter ses chevaux avec cet ignoble cri qu'on retrouve par toute la Corse pour faire aller les bêtes, et qui ressemble à celui d'un homme qu'on assommerait à coups de massue. Ce n'était pas sans raison que le brave capitaine nous a fait escorter, nos deux voltigeurs en effet avaient reçu de lui l'ordre de frapper notre guide au moindre signe de rébellion, et l'un d'eux me paraissait très disposé à lui tirer un coup de fusil. J'avoue que j'eus un moment d'inconcevable rage, lorsque tout fatigué, mourant de soif et désespéré de rien avoir sous la dent, je lui demandai la gourde qu'on avait remplie le matin à Corte, et que le misérable me répondit froidement que le bouchon en était tombé et que tout s'était perdu... Il me sembla alors qu'on m'enterrait vif, et que toutes les colères du ciel étaient en moi ; je m'étais vivement rapproché de lui, haletant, espérant boire, je me voyais déjà saisissant la bienheureuse gourde, je sentais si bien couler dans mon estomac fatigué... j'arrive, rien. On a beau parler des désillusions morales, celle-là fut atroce. Je déguisai ma douleur sous une ironie magnifique dont je ne me rappelle plus la forme, mais elle l'écrasa, et j'eus pour satisfaction de faire rire les deux voltigeurs qui étaient là et qui, comme moi, n'auraient pas été fâchés de boire.

Nous continuâmes encore à marcher dans des chemins de plus en plus mauvais ; de temps en temps nous tâtions avec les mains pour nous guider, et nous tombions dans les grosses pierres ; le bois était toujours aussi sombre, et la lune rongée se montrait seulement pour l'acquit de sa conscience. Je pensais alors aux contes que l'on débite sur les voyageurs égarés dans les bois, et qui aperçoivent au loin une lumière ; ils s'approchent pour demander du secours, c'est une cabane de faux monnayeurs, où pour la plupart du temps ils sont égorgés. Nous avons frappé aussi à une cabane pour savoir si nous étions loin de Piedicroce. Un vieillard est venu nous ouvrir ; il était seul dans sa maison et nous a dit tout d'abord que nous serions mal logés chez lui parce que toute sa famille était absente et qu'on ne pourrait pas nous servir ; d'ailleurs il ne nous restait plus qu'une heure de chemin. Puis il a refermé sa porte, et toute sa cabane est rentrée dans le silence et l'obscurité. Un de nos gens nous a dit qu'à l'air dont il nous avait répondu, ce vieillard, à coup sûr, était resté le seul de sa famille ; tous les autres ayant été tués par vendetta, il se souciait peu de la visite des étrangers.

Nous avons donc repris courage, et continuant d'un pas plus leste nous sommes enfin arrivés à 9 heures à Piedicroce. M. Paoli nous attendait avec son oncle, vieux curé de la commune, qui se tenait à table tout en prenant patience. C'était un petit gros vieillard, tout blanc, en bonnet de coton et en culotte courte ; il sait peu de français et ne nous a guère parlé que pour dire que le clergé devait se mettre à la tête de la nation et charger le fusil, si le sol venait à être envahi par l'Anglais.

M. Paoli, frère du procureur du roi de Calvi, que nous avons vu à Ajaccio, est un grand gaillard mince ; il était décolleté, en veste de toile, il nous a reçus avec beaucoup de franchise et paraît plus gai et plus causeur que ses compatriotes. Pendant le dîner, il nous a parlé de son pays longuement et même avec une rare sagacité. Cet homme, qui s'exprime si purement en français, qui a tant de finesse et de bon sens, n'est jamais sorti de sa commune dont il est le maire, il est vrai, et à qui il porte un amour d'administrateur.

Nos courses en Corse allaient bientôt finir ; le soir même nous devons aller coucher à Bastia. M. Paoli nous a accompagnés jusqu'à Orezza, monté sur une superbe bête qui bondissait sous lui et sautait comme un chevreuil. Le reste de la route, jusqu'à Saint-Pancrace, se fait dans une grande forêt de châtaigniers, sur des pelouses unies. Nous avons plusieurs fois traversé le Golo dont nous avons suivi le courant. A 4 heures du soir enfin nous atteignons Saint-Pancrace, où M. Podesta avait eu l'obligeance d'envoyer la voiture ; ça a été pour nous une chose toute nouvelle de nous sentir traînés sur une grande route et sur de bons ressorts. Bastia paraît de loin étendue au bas du cap Corse, au fond du golfe ; son phare brillait dans les flots, et la nuit était déjà venue quand nous entrâmes dans les rues de la ville.

Il ne nous restait plus qu'une journée, qu'une journée et tout était fini ! Adieu la Corse, ses belles forêts, sa route de Vico au bord de la mer ; adieu ses maquis, ses fougères, ses collines, car Bastia n'est pas de la Corse ; c'en est la honte, disent-ils là-bas. Sa richesse, son commerce, ses mœurs continentales, tout la fait haïr du reste de l'île. Il n'y a que là, en effet, que l'on trouve des cafés, des bains, un hôtel, où il y ait des calèches, des gants jaunes et des bottes vernies, toutes les commodités des sociétés civilisées. Bastiacci, disent-ils, méchants habitants de Bastia, hommes vils qui ont quitté les mœurs de leurs ancêtres, pour prendre celles de l'Italie et de la France. Il est vrai que les petits commis des douanes et de l'enregistrement, les surnuméraires des domaines, les officiers en garnison, toute la classe élastique désignée sous le nom de jeunes gens, n'a pas besoin, comme à Ajaccio, de faire de temps en temps de petites excursions à Livourne et à Marseille pour y bannir la mélancolie, comme on dit dans les chansons ; ces messieurs profitent ici de l'avilissement du caractère national. Malgré tous ces avantages incontestables pour le consommateur, qu'il y a loin de Bastia à Ajaccio, cette ville si éclairée, si pure de couleur, si ouverte au grand air, où les palmiers poussent sur la place publique et dont la baie vaut, dit-on, celle de Palerme. A Bastia, les rues au contraire sont petites, noires, encombrées de monde ; son port est étroit, malaisé ; la grande place Saint-Laurent ne vaut pas à coup sûr l'esplanade qui est devant la forteresse ni la terrasse du cardinal Fesch, où je me suis promené le dernier soir à Ajaccio.

Le palais est inachevé, la lune entrait par les vitres et se jouait dans les grandes pièces nues ; les escaliers étaient vides et sonores. Du haut de la terrasse j'ai revu la baie avec toutes les côtes qui l'entourent. La lune en face se reflétait dans les flots ; suivant qu'elle montait dans le ciel, son image prenait sous l'eau des formes changeantes, tantôt celle d'un immense candélabre d'argent, tantôt celle d'un serpent dont les anneaux montaient en droite ligne à la surface et dont le corps remuait en ondulant ; les montagnes étaient éclairées, et de l'autre côté, au large, à travers les ombres, la grande immensité azurée apparaissait toute sereine.

Les églises de Bastia n'ont rien qui me plaise, fraîchement peintes, luisantes, ornées dans le goût italien.

Nous avons été voir les prisons pour y trouver quelque bon type corse et non pour goûter la soupe comme les philanthropes. Le geôlier d'Ajaccio était un vigoureux gaillard, capable de résister seul à une émeute ; celui de Bastia est geignard et douxereux ; il se plaint de l'exiguïté de son logement, quoiqu'il ait envahi une bonne partie des prisons ; un de ses fils est borgne et l'autre est attaqué d'une maladie de poitrine ; ce dernier, nous a-t-il dit, est un fort bon sujet qui s'est rendu malade à force de travailler, nous n'avions qu'à demander au proviseur. .. Nous vîmes en effet étendu dans son lit un maigre jeune homme toussant et crachant, pauvre brute ! que l'ambition dévore et qui se tue pour devenir un savant ! Corse, Corse, gagne plutôt le maquis ! là, tu entendras sous le myrte la chanson des rossignols et tu n'auras pas besoin de dictionnaire pour la comprendre, le vent dans la forêt de Marmano te sifflera un autre rythme que celui de ton Virgile que tu ne comprends guère. Allons, philosophe, jette au feu ton Cousin dont tu voudrais bien être le valet, et va un peu le soir t'étendre sur le sable du golfe de Lucia, à regarder les étoiles. Te voilà devenu professeur de philosophie dans ta ville natale, le maire te fait des compliments dans son discours au jour de la distribution des prix, et tu rougis sans doute devant l'auditoire avec une grâce charmante ; tu as des répétitions au collège et des leçons particulières en ville. Eh bien ! homme vertueux, homme d'esprit, homme que tes frères respectent et que ton père regarde ébahi, tu me parais, à te voir ainsi couché dans ce lit avec ton sot bonnet sur ta tête déjà chauve, et ne voyant de jour qu'à travers les barreaux de cette cage que tu illustres, tu me semblés plus misérable, plus stupide et plus condamnable que tous ceux qui sont là derrière la muraille, aigles de la montagne qui soupirent après l'heure où ils pourront reprendre leur volée.

J'ai vu, dans les cellules des prisonniers, un jeune garçon de Sartene qui a porté faux témoignage ; il était condamné à un an de prison, mais il souriait, passant la main dans ses cheveux, il avait un large front et des dents blanches. J'ai vu aussi plusieurs meurtriers qui m'avaient l'air fort heureux ; j'ai revu mon vieux Bastianesi qui va bientôt sortir ; il y avait de plus une femme adultère qui va bientôt accoucher et qui pense au fils qui va naître, et un Génois accusé de viol, qui a une figure fort bouffonne. Tous m'ont fait plus de plaisir à voir que toi, homme à bonne conduite, parce que ceux-là aiment et haïssent, qu'ils ont des souvenirs, des espoirs, des projets ; ils aiment la lumière, le grand jour, la liberté, la montagne ; mieux que toi, savant, ils comprennent l'élégie que soupire le laurier-rose à la brise du soir, le dithyrambe des pins qui se cassent, le monologue de l'orage qui hurle et de la haine quand elle emplit les cœurs vigoureux. Us n'ont point de poitrine étriquée, de membres amaigris, d'esprit sec, de vanité misérable. Je te hais, fils de geôlier qui veux devenir académicien, et il n'a fallu rien moins pour te faire oublier que l'excellent déjeuner que nous avons fait chez Letellier en compagnie du bon Multedo que j'avais retrouvé le matin dans la rue, et des docteurs Arrighi et Manfredi.

Puisque j'ai rendu compte de ma traversée de Toulon à Ajaccio avec une exactitude psychologique, digne de l'école écossaise, je puis me faire le plaisir de parler de celle du retour.

Quand nous avons quitté Bastia, le temps était superbe, la mer calme. La Corse belle me disait un dernier adieu. Pauvre Corse ! il a fallu en quit ter la vue bien vite pour aller se clouer dans une étroite cabine où, le corps ployé en deux, je recevais le soleil dans la face. Là, fermant les yeux, étourdi du roulis, suant et soufflant, je m'imaginai être un fort poulet à la broche : l'astre du jour me rôtiissait et je ne vous dirai pas quel jus tombait dans la lèche-frite.

Vers 5 heures du soir je me suis résigné à monter sur le pont, où je passai la nuit, enveloppé dans ce gros manteau corse que M. Cloquet avait acheté à Ajaccio. La nuit fut belle, je dormis, je rêvai, je regardai la lune, la mer ; je pensais aux peuples d'Orient qui par la même nuit regardaient les mêmes étoiles et qui s'acheminaient lentement dans les sables vers quelque grande cité, je pensais aussi à mon voyage qui allait finir, je regardais le bout du mât se balancer à droite et à gauche, j'écoutais le vent siffler dans les poulies et, à travers les écouteilles, les bruits des vomissants montaient jusqu'à moi ; j'avais pour eux le dédain du bonheur.

Le matin, quand nous longeâmes les côtes de la Provence, le temps devint rude, les flots fumaient à l'horizon, notre navire s'avancait lentement et rudement secoué, et sa proue pointait dans l'eau. J'ai fait la conversation avec un officier qui a entré en fraude une grande quantité de tabac corse, et avec un épicier qui m'a pris pour un commis voyageur. Allons, finissons-en vite, arrivons au port, puisque nous sommes en rade. C'est en vain que depuis huit jours je suis à m'amuser à ceci, il faut bien plier la feuille, tout cela à deux mains, et quitter le passé, lui qui vous quitte si facilement. J'ai fait le traînard tant que j'ai pu, me promenant cent fois d'Ajaccio à Bastia, de Ghisoni dans la forêt de Marmano, revenant sur mes pas, revoyant les sentiers parcourus, ramassant des feuilles tombées, me jouant avec mes souvenirs comme avec de vieux habits ; il faut se hâter de finir mon voyage qui, du train que je mets à le raconter, pourra bien finir au mois d'août prochain.

Je vous fais grâce du bagne et de l'arsenal, de la description pittoresque et des réflexions humanitaires, j'aime mieux dire qu'un certain soir encore j'ai été à la bastide de Lauvergne. La mer vient battre au pied de sa terrasse ; à gauche il y a une anse dans le rocher, faite exprès par les Tritons pour y nager aux heures de nuit ; de dessus un tombeau turc qui sert de banc, on voit toute la Méditerranée ; son jardin est en désordre, l'herbe pousse dans les murs, la fontaine est tarie, les cannes de Provence sont cassées, mais l'éternelle jeunesse de la mer sourit en face à chaque rayon de soleil, dans chaque vague azurée.

Si je demeurais à Toulon, j'irais aussi tous les jours au jardin botanique ; ce serait peut-être une sottise, car il est choses dont il ne faut garder qu'une vision, comme Arles, par exemple. Que le cloître Saint-Trophime était beau, à la tombée du jour ! Des femmes venaient puiser de l'eau dans le puits de marbre qui se trouve là, à droite en entrant. Les femmes d'Arles ! quel autre souvenir ! Elles sont toutes en noir ; elles marchaient, il m'a semblé, deux à deux dans les rues, et elles parlaient à voix basse se tenant par le bras. J'en ai revu une à Toulon, elle s'en allait aussi la tête penchée un peu sur l'épaule, le regard vers la terre ; avec leur jupe courte, leur démarche si légère et si grave, toute leur stature robuste et svelte, elles ressemblent à la Muse antique.

Il faisait du mistrao à Toulon ; nous étions aveuglés de poussière. Une fois entrés dans le jardin, je ne sais si cela tient aux murs qui nous abritaient, l'air est devenu calme. Après la maison du concierge, il y a quelques petites maisonnettes en bois qui servent de serres ; des cages d'oiseaux étaient attachées aux murs extérieurs, elles étaient remplies de gazouillements et de battements d'ailes. Je vis là sous de grands arbres pleins d'ombrages, à côté d'un banc de gazon, deux ou trois forçats qui travaillaient au jardin ; ils n'avaient ni gardechourme, ni sergents, ni argousins ; on entendait pourtant leur chaîne qui traînait sur le sable.

Tandis que les autres étaient au bain à soulever des poutres, à clouer îa carcasse des vaisseaux, à manier le fer et le bois, ceux-là entendaient le bruit du vent dans les palmiers et dans les aloès, car il y a là des roseaux de l'Inde à forme étrange, et des bananiers, des agaves, des myrtes encore, des cactus, toutes ces belles plantes des contrées inconnues, sous lesquelles les tigres bondissent, les serpents s'enroulent, où les oiseaux bigarrés perchent et se mettent à chanter. Il me semble que cela doit leur amollir le cœur de vivre toujours avec ces plantes, avec ce silence, cet ombrage, toutes ces feuilles petites et grandes, ces petits bassins qui murmurent, ces jets d'eau qui arrosent ; il fait frais sous les arbres et chaud au soleil, le vent agite le branchage sur le treillis, il y a du jasmin qui embaume, des chèvrefeuilles, des fleurs dont je ne sais pas le nom, mais qui font qu'en les respirant on se sent le cœur faible et tout prêt à aimer ; des nénufars sont étendus dans les sources, avec des roseaux qui s'épanchent de tous côtés. Le vent avait renversé les arbustes et il agitait les palmiers dont le faite murmurait, deux palmiers, de ceux qu'on appelle rois ; ils sont au bout du jardin, et si beaux que j'ai compris alors que Xercès en eut été amoureux et, comme à une maîtresse, ait passé à un d'eux autour du cou des anneaux et des colliers. Les rameaux du haut retombaient en gerbes avec des courbes douces et molles, ce mistrao qui soufflait en haut les poussait les uns sur les autres en leur faisant faire un bruit qui n'est point de nos pays, le tronc restait calme et immobile, comme une femme dont les cheveux seuls remuent au vent. Un palmier pour nous c'est toute l'Inde, tout l'Orient ; sous le palmier l'éléphant paré d'or bondit et balance au son des tambourins, la bayadère danse sous son ombrage, l'encens fume et monte dans ses rameaux pendant que le brahme assis chante les louanges de Brahma et des Dieux.

C'était fini du Midi ! A Marseille il faisait froid, tout se rembrunissait et sentait déjà le retour. Il y aurait pourtant de l'injustice à ne rien dire du dîner d'adieu chez M. Cauvière. Il a une petite salle romaine en pierre de taille, voûtée, pavée de marbre, comme Horace devait en avoir une ; je vous réponds qu'il s'y est bien bu du bon vin, qu'il s'y est dit bien des choses spirituelles. Ce fut un dîner exquis en tout point, comme les rois n'ont pas l'esprit d'en faire, où il y eut, dit Commynes, "toutes sortes de bonnes épices qui font boire de l'eau point" ; les mets, les vins, le langage, tout cela eut un caractère à part, bon jusqu'à l'excellent, original et de bon goût ; l'ivresse et la plaisanterie allèrent jusqu'à ce point délicat où l'on ne perd ni l'esprit ni la décence, il y avait des dames. Il faudrait une autre mémoire et une autre plume surtout pour vous rapporter cette délicieuse soirée, les lumières étaient douces, tout allait harmonieusement, Porto se promenait lentement autour de la table à la manière des grands animaux ; le soir on nous apporta sur la table une colonne de tabac de Lataki, avec des pipes de bambou ; nous bûmes, en fumant, un vin spécial appelé Lep-Fraidi, je n'en écris pas plus.

Avant de m'emboîter pour Paris, j'ai été dire un dernier adieu à la Méditerranée. Il faisait encore beau sur le quai, le soleil brillant, le mistrao ne soufflait pas, le ciel était pur comme le jour où j'y fus avant de partir pour la Corse, alors que j'avais devant moi encore, et dans un rose horizon, un mois de beau temps, d'excursions libres, encore tout un mois de Méditerranée et de grand soleil. Les navires étaient attachés sur le quai par des câbles tendus, néanmoins ils remuaient un peu, comme les cœurs par les temps plus calmes, aussi amarrés au rivage, font des bonds qu'eux seuls sentent, pour repartir au large. J'ai encore vu quelques pantalons plissés, des pelisses arabes, des dolmans turcs, et puis il a fallu repartir, tourner le dos à tout cela, sans savoir quand je reverrai ni Arles, ni Marseille, et la baie aux Oursins, et les golfes de Liamone, de Chopra, de Sagone, le Prato, la plaine d'Aleria.

La première page de ceci a été écrite à Bordeaux dans un accès de bonne humeur, le matin, la fenêtre ouverte ; la rue était pleine de cris de femmes, de chansons, de voix joyeuses.

Maintenant il pleut, il fait froid, les arbres dépouillés ont l'air de squelettes verts ou noirs. Au lieu de partir bientôt pour Bayonne, pour Biarritz, pour Fontarabie, me voilà empêtré dans des plans d'études admirables, ayant cinq ou six fois plus de travaux qu'un honnête homme ne peut en accomplir ; dans un mois ce sera la même chose, je serai à la même table, sur la même chaise et toujours ainsi de même. Mais je me console en pensant que cet hiver je pourrai boire quelquefois du Champagne frappé et manger du canard sauvage ; et puis quand reviendra la saison où les blés commencent à mûrir, je m'en irai aussi dans les champs ou dans les îles de la Seine, je nagerai en regardant les arbres qui se mirent au bord, je fumerai une pipe à l'ombre, je laisserai aller ma barque à la dérive vers 5 heures, quand le soleil se couche, mais non !

Car je retournerai à Bordeaux, je passerai Saint-Jean-de-Luz, Irun ; j'irai en Espagne. Il serait trop stupide en effet qu'un homme bien élevé n'ait pas vu l'Andalousie ni les lauriers-roses qui bordent le Guadalquivir, ni l'Alhambra, ni Tolède, ni Séville, ni toutes ces vieilles villes aux balcons noirs, où les Inès chantent la nuit les romances du Cid.

Mais, de grâce, Arles aussi, et Marseille également, et Toulon, parce que je désire avant de mourir dîner encore deux ou trois fois chez M. Cauvière. Plus loin même, je dépasserai la bastide de Raynaud et j'irai à Venise, à Rome, à Naples, dans la baie de Baia, puisque je relis maintenant Tacite et que je vais apprendre Properce.

Mais la Méditerranée est si belle, si bleue, si calme, si souriante qu'elle vous appelle sur son sein, vous attire à elle avec des séductions charmantes. J'irai bien en Grèce ; me voilà lisant Homère, son vieux poète qui l'aimait tant, et à Constantinople, à qui j'ai pensé plus d'heures dans ma vie qu'il n'en faudrait pour faire d'ici le voyage à pied, ayant toute ma vie aimé à me coucher sur des tapis, à respirer des parfums, regrettant de n'avoir ni esclaves, ni sérails, ni mosquées pavées de marbre et de porphyre, ni cimetière de Damas pour faire tomber les têtes de ceux qui m'ennuient.

Oh ! moi qui si souvent en regardant la lune, soit les hivers à Rouen, soit l'été sous le ciel du Midi, ai pensé à Babylone, à Ninive, à Persépolis, à Palmyre, aux campements d'Alexandre, aux marches des caravanes, aux clochettes des chamelles, aux grands silences du désert, aux horizons rouges et vides, est-ce que je n'irai pas m'abreuver de poésie, de lumière, de choses immenses et sans nom à cette source où remontent tous mes rêves ?

Povero ! Tu iras dimanche prochain à Déville, s'il fait beau ; cet été, à Pont-l'Évêque.

Encore un mot : Je réserve dix cahiers de bon papier que j'avais destinés à être noircis en route, je vais les cacheter et les serrer précieusement, après avoir écrit sur le couvert : papier blanc pour d'autres voyages.

LAST LETTER

PREFATORY NOTE

This translation of the correspondence between George Sand and Gustave Flaubert was undertaken in consequence of a suggestion by Professor Stuart P. Sherman. The translator desires to acknowledge valuable criticism given by Professor Sherman, Ruth M. Sherman, and Professor Kenneth McKenzie, all of whom have generously assisted in revising the manuscript.

INTRODUCTION

The correspondence of George Sand and Gustave Flaubert, if approached merely as a chapter in the biographies of these heroes of nineteenth century letters, is sufficiently rewarding. In a relationship extending over twelve years, including the trying period of the Franco-Prussian War and the Commune, these extraordinary personalities disclose the aspects of their diverse natures which are best worth the remembrance of posterity. However her passionate and erratic youth may have captivated our grandfathers, George Sand in the mellow autumn of her life is for us at her most attractive phase. The storms and anguish and hazardous adventures that attended the defiant unfolding of her spirit are over. In her final retreat at Nohant, surrounded by her affectionate children and grandchildren, diligently writing, botanizing, bathing in her little river, visited by her friends and undistracted by the fiery lovers of the old time, she shows an unguessed wealth of maternal virtue, swift, comprehending sympathy, fortitude, sunny resignation, and a goodness of heart that has ripened into wisdom. For Flaubert, too, though he was seventeen years her junior, the flamboyance of youth was long since past; in 1862, when the correspondence begins, he was firmly settled, a shy, proud, grumpy toiling hermit of forty, in his family seat at Croisset, beginning his seven years' labor at L'Education Sentimentale, master of his art, hardening in his convictions, and conscious of increasing estrangement from the spirit of his age. He, with his craving for sympathy, and she, with her inexhaustible supply of it, meet; he pours out his bitterness, she her consolation; and so with equal candor of self-revelation they beautifully draw out and strengthen each the other's characteristics, and help one another grow old.

But there is more in these letters than a satisfaction for the biographical appetite, which, indeed, finds ITS account rather in the earlier chapters of the correspondents' history. What impresses us here is the banquet spread for the reflective and critical faculties in this intercourse of natural antagonists. As M. Faguet observes in a striking paragraph of his study of Flaubert:

“It is a curious thing, which does honor to them both, that Flaubert and George Sand should have become loving friends towards the end of their lives. At the beginning, Flaubert might have been looked upon by George Sand as a furious enemy. Emma [Madame Bovary] is George Sand's heroine with all the poetry turned into ridicule. Flaubert seems to say in every page of his work: 'Do you want to know what is the real Valentine, the real Indiana, the real Lelia? Here she is, it is Emma Roualt.' 'And do you want to know what becomes of a woman whose education has consisted in George Sand's books? Here she is, Emma Roualt.' So that the terrible mocker of the bourgeois has written a book which is directly inspired by the spirit of the 1840 bourgeois. Their recriminations against romanticism 'which rehabilitates and poetises the courtesan,' against George Sand, the Muse of Adultery, are to be found in acts and facts in Madame Bovary."

Now, the largest interest of this correspondence depends precisely upon the continuance, beneath an affectionate personal relationship, of a fundamental antagonism of interests and beliefs, resolutely maintained on both sides. George Sand, with her lifelong passion for propaganda and reformation, labors earnestly to bring Flaubert to her point of view, to remould him nearer to her heart's desire. He, with a playful deference to the sex and years of his friend, addresses her in his letters as "Dear Master." Yet in the essentials of the conflict, though she never gives over her effort, he never budes a jot; he has taken his ground, and in his last unfinished work, Bouvard and Pecuchet, he dies stubbornly fortifying his position. To the last she speaks from a temperament lyrical, sanguine, imaginative, optimistic and sympathetic; he from a temperament dramatic, melancholy, observing, cynical, and satirical. She insists upon natural goodness; he, upon innate depravity. She urges her faith in social regeneration; he vents his splenetic contempt for the mob. Through all the successive shocks of disillusioning experience, she expects the renovation of humanity by some religious, some semi-mystical, amelioration of its heart; he grimly concedes the greater part of humanity to the devil, and can see no escape for the remnant save in science and aristocratic organization. For her, finally, the literary art is an instrument of social salvation — it is her means of touching the world with her ideals, her love, her aspiration; for him the literary art is the avenue of escape from the meaningless chaos of existence — it is his subtly critical condemnation of the world.

The origins of these unreconciled antipathies lie deep beneath the personal relationship of George Sand and Gustave Flaubert; lie deep beneath their successors, who with more or less of amenity in their manners are still debating the same questions today. The main currents of the nineteenth century, with fluent and refluxing tides, clash beneath the controversy; and as soon as one hears its "long withdrawing roar," and thinks it is dying away, and is become a part of ancient history, it begins again, and will be heard, no doubt, by the last man as a solemn accompaniment to his final contention with his last adversary.

George Sand was, on the whole, a natural and filial daughter of the French Revolution. The royal blood which she received from her father's line mingled in her veins with that of the Parisian milliner, her mother, and predestined her for a leveller by preparing in her an instinctive ground of revolt against all those inherited prejudices which divided the families of her parents. As a young girl wildly romping with the peasant children at Nohant she discovered a joy in untrammelled rural life which was only to increase with years. At the proper age for beginning to fashion a conventional young lady, the hoyden was put in a convent, where she underwent some exalting religious experiences; and in 1822 she was assigned to her place in the "established social order" by her marriage at seventeen to M. Dudevant. After a few years of rather humdrum domestic life in the country, she became aware that this gentleman, her husband, was behaving as we used to be taught that all French husbands ultimately behave; he was, in fact, turning from her to her maids. The young couple had never been strongly united — the impetuous dreamy girl and her coarse hunting mate; and they had grown wide apart. She should, of course, have adjusted herself quietly to the altered situation and have kept up appearances. But this young wife had gradually become an "intellectual"; she had been reading philosophy and poetry; she was saturated with the writings of Rousseau, of Chateaubriand, of Byron. None of the spiritual masters of her generation counselled acquiescence in servitude or silence in misery. Every eloquent tongue of the time-spirit urged self-expression and revolt. And she, obedient to the deepest impulses of her blood and her time, revolted.

At the period when Madame Dudevant withdrew her neck from the conjugal yoke and plunged into her literary career in Paris, the doctrine that men are created for freedom, equality and fraternity was already somewhat hackneyed. She, with an impetus from her own private fortunes, was to give the doctrine a recrudescence of interest by resolutely applying it to the status of women. We cannot follow her in detail from the point where she abandons the domestic sewing-basket to reappear smoking black cigars in the Latin Quarter. We find her, at about 1831, entering into competition with the brilliant literary generation of Balzac, Hugo, Alfred de Musset, Merimee, Stendhal, and Sainte-Beuve. To signalize her equality with her brothers in talent, she adopts male attire: "I had a sentry-box coat made, of rough grey cloth, with trousers and waist-coat to match. With a grey hat and a huge cravat of woolen material, I looked exactly like a first-year student." In the freedom of this rather unalluring garb she entered into relations Platonic, fraternal, or tempestuously passionate with perhaps the most distinguished series of friends and lovers that ever fluttered about one flame. There was Aurelien de Seze; Jules Sandeau, her first collaborator, who "reconciled her to life" and gave her a nom de guerre; the inscrutable Merimee, who made no one happy; Musset — an encounter from which both tiger-moths escaped with singed wings; the odd transitional figure of Pagello; Michel Euraed; Liszt; Chopin, whom she loved and nursed for eight years; her master Lamennais; her master Pierre Leroux; her father-confessor Sainte-Beuve; and Gustave Flaubert, the querulous friend of her last decade.

As we have compressed the long and complex story of her personal relationships, so we must compress the intimately related history of her works and her ideas. When under the inspiration of Rousseau, the emancipated George Sand began to write, her purposes were but vaguely defined. She conceived of life as primarily an opportunity for unlimited self-expansion, and of literature as an opportunity for unrestricted self-expression. "Nevertheless," she declares, "my instincts have formed, without my privity, the theory I am about to set down, — a theory which I have generally followed unconsciously. ... According to this theory, the novel is as much a work of poetry as of analysis. It demands true situations, and characters not only true but real, grouped about a type intended to epitomize the sentiment or the main conceptions of the book. This type generally represents the passion of love, since almost all novels are love- stories. According to this theory (and it is here that it begins) the writer must idealize this love, and consequently this type, — and must not fear to attribute to it all the powers to which he inwardly aspires, or all the sorrows whose pangs he has observed or felt. This type must in no wise, however, become degraded by the vicissitude of events; it must either die or triumph.”

In 1831, when her pen began its fluent course through the lyrical works of her first period — Indiana, Valentine, Lelia, Jacques, and the rest — we conceive George Sand’s culture, temper, and point of view to have been fairly comparable with those of the young Shelley when, fifteen years earlier, he with Mary Godwin joined Byron and Jane Clairmont in Switzerland — young revoltes, all of them, nourished on eighteenth century revolutionary philosophy and Gothic novels. Both these eighteenth century currents meet in the work of the new romantic group in England and in France. The innermost origin of the early long poems of Shelley and the early works of George Sand is in personal passion, in the commotion of a romantic spirit beating its wings against the cage of custom and circumstance and institutions. The external form of the plot, whatever is fantastic and wilful in its setting and its adventures, is due to the school of Ann Radcliffe. But the quality in Shelley and in George Sand which bewitched even the austere Matthew Arnold in his green and salad days is the poetising of that liberative eighteenth century philosophy into “beautiful idealisms” of a love emancipated from human limitations, a love exalted to the height of its gamut by the influences of nature, triumphantly seeking its own or shattered in magnificent despair. In her novels of the first period, George Sand takes her Byronic revenge upon M. Dudevant. In Indiana and its immediate successors, consciously or unconsciously, she declares to the world what a beautiful soul M. Dudevant condemned to sewing on buttons; in Jacques she paints the man who might fitly have matched her spirit; and by the entire series, which now impresses us as fantastic in sentiment no less than in plot, she won her early reputation as the apologist for free love, the adversary of marriage.

In her middle period — say from 1838 to 1848 — of which The Miller of Aginbault, Consuelo, and The Countess of Rudolstadt are representative works, there is a marked subsidence of her personal emotion, and, in compensation, a rising tide of humanitarian enthusiasm. Gradually satiated with erotic passion, gradually convinced that it is rather a mischief-maker than a reconstructive force in a decrepit society, she is groping, indeed, between her successive liaisons for an elusive felicity, for a larger mission than inspiring Musset's Alexandrines or Chopin's nocturnes. It is somewhat amusing, and at the same time indicative of her vague but deep-seated moral yearnings, to find her writing rebukingly to Sainte-Beuve, as early as 1834, apropos of his epicurean Volupté: "Let the rest do as they like; but you, dear friend, you must produce a book which will change and better mankind, do you see? You can, and therefore should. Oh, if poor I could do it! I should lift my head again and my heart would no longer be broken; but in vain I seek a religion: Shall it be God, shall it be love, friendship, the public welfare? Alas, it seems to me that my soul is framed to receive all these impressions, without one effacing another ... Who shall paint justice as it should, as it may, be in our modern society?"

To Sainte-Beuve, himself an unscathed intellectual Odysseus, she declares herself greatly indebted intellectually; but on the whole his influence seems to have been tranquillizing. The material for the radical program, economic, political, and religious, which, like a spiritual ancestor of H. G. Wells, she eagerly sought to popularize by the novels of her middle years, was supplied mainly by Saint-Simon, Lamennais, and Leroux. Her new "religion of humanity," a kind of theosophical socialism, is too fantastically garbed to charm the sober spirits of our age. And yet from the ruins of that time and from the emotional extravagance of books grown tedious, which she has left behind her, George Sand emerges for us with one radiant perception which must be included in whatever religion animates a democratic society: "Everyone must be happy, so that the happiness of a few may not be criminal and cursed by God."

One of George Sand's French critics, M. Caro, a member of the Academy, who deals somewhat austere with her religious enthusiasms and with her Utopian projects for social reformation, remarks gravely and not without tenderness:

"The one thing needful to this soul, so strong, so rich in enthusiasm, is a humble moral quality that she disdains, and when she has occasion to speak of it, even slanders, — namely resignation. This is not, as she seems to think, the sluggish virtue of base souls, who, in their superstitious servitude to force, hasten to crouch beneath every yoke. That is a false and degrading resignation; genuine resignation grows out of the conception of the universal order, weighed against which individual sufferings, without ceasing to be a ground of merit, cease to constitute a right of revolt. ... Resignation, in the true, the philosophical, the Christian sense, is a manly acceptance of moral law and also of the laws essential to the social order; it is a free adherence to order, a sacrifice approved by reason of a part of one's private good and of one's personal freedom, not to might nor to the tyranny of a human caprice, but to the exigencies of the common weal, which subsists only by the concord of individual liberty with obedient passions."

Well, resigned in the sense of defeated, George Sand never became; nor did she, perhaps, ever wholly acquiesce in that scheme of things which M. Caro impressively designates as "the universal order." Yet with age, the abandonment of many distractions, the retreat to Nohant, the consolations of nature, and her occupation with tales of pastoral life, beginning with La Mare au Diable, there develops within her, there diffuses itself around her, there appears in her work a charm like that which falls upon green fields from the level rays of the evening sun after a day of storms. It is not the charm, precisely, of resignation; it is the charm of serenity — the serenity of an old revolutionist who no longer expects victory in the morning yet is secure in her confidence of a final triumph, and still more secure in the goodness of her cause. "A hundred times in life," she declares, "the good that one does seems to serve no immediate purpose; yet it maintains in one way and another the tradition of well wishing and well doing, without which all would perish." At the outset of her career we compared her with Shelley. In her last phase, she reminds us rather of the authors of Far from the Madding Crowd and The Mill on the Floss, and of Wordsworth, once, too, a torch of revolution, turning to his Michaels and his leech-gatherers and his Peter Bells. Her exquisite pictures of pastoral life are idealizations of it; her representations of the peasant are not corroborated by Zola's; to the last she approaches the shield of human nature from the golden side. But for herself at least she has found a real secret of happiness in country life, tranquil work, and a right direction given to her own heart and conscience.

It is at about this point in her spiritual development that she turns towards Gustave Flaubert — perhaps a little suspiciously at first, yet resolved from the first, according to her natural instinct and her now fixed principles, to stimulate by believing in his admirable qualities. Writing from Nohant in 1866 to him at Croisset, she epitomises her distinction as a woman and as an author in this playful sally: “Sainte-Beuve, who loves you nevertheless, pretends that you are dreadfully vicious. But perhaps he sees with eyes a bit dirty, like that learned botanist who pretends that the germander is of a DIRTY yellow. The observation was so false that I could not help writing on the margin of his book: ‘IT IS YOU, WHOSE EYES ARE DIRTY.’”

We have spoken of George Sand as a faithful daughter of the French Revolution; and by way of contrast we may speak of Flaubert as a disgruntled son of the Second Empire. Between his literary advent and hers there is an interval of a generation, during which the proud expansive spirit and the grandiose aspirations imparted to the nation by the first Napoleon dwindled to a spirit of mediocrity and bourgeois smugness under a Napoleon who had inherited nothing great of his predecessor but his name. This change in the time-spirit may help to explain the most significant difference between Flaubert and George Sand. He inherited the tastes and imagination of the great romantic generation; but he inherited none of its social and political enthusiasm. He was disciplined by the romantic writers; yet his reaction to the literary culture of his youth is not ethical but aesthetic; he finds his inspiration less in Rousseau than in Chateaubriand. He is bred to an admiration of eloquence, the poetic phrase, the splendid picture, life in the grand style; with increasing disgust he finds himself entering a society which, he feels, neither understands nor values any of these things, and which threatens their destruction. Consequently, we find him actuated as a writer by two complementary passions — the love of splendor and the hatred of mediocrity — two passions, of which the second sometimes alternates with the first, sometimes inseparably fuses with it, and ultimately almost extinguishes it.

The son of an eminent surgeon of Rouen, Gustave Flaubert may have acquired from his father something of that scientific precision of observation and that cutting accuracy of expression, by which he gained his place at the head of modern French realism and won the discipleship of the Goncourts, Daudet, Zola, and Maupassant and the applause of such connoisseurs of technique as Walter Pater and Henry James. From his mother's Norman ancestry he inherited the physique of a giant, tainted with epilepsy; a Viking countenance, strong-featured with leonine moustaches; and a barbaric temper, habitually somewhat lethargic but irritable, and, when roused, violent and intolerant of opposition. He had a private education at Rouen, with wide desultory reading; went to Paris, which he hated, to study law, which he also hated; frequented the theatres and studios; travelled in Corsica, the Pyrenees, and the East, which he adored, seeing Egypt, Palestine, Constantinople, and Greece; and he had one, and only one, important love-affair, extending from 1846 to 1854 — that with Mme. Louise Colet, a woman of letters, whose difficult relations with Flaubert are sympathetically touched upon in Pater's celebrated essay on "Style." When by the death of his father, in 1845, he succeeded to the family-seat at Croisset, near Rouen, he settled himself in a studious solitude to the pursuit of letters, which he followed for thirty-four years with anguish of spirit and dogged persistence.

Flaubert probably loved glory as much as any man; but he desired to receive it only on his own terms. He profoundly appeals to writers endowed with "the artistic conscience" as "the martyr of literary style." In morals something of a libertine, in matters of art he exhibited the intolerance of weakness in others and the remorseless self-examination and self-torment commonly attributed to the Puritan. His friend Maxime Du Camp, who tried to bring him out and teach him the arts of popularity, he rebuffed with deliberate insult. He developed an aversion to any interruption of his work, and such tension and excitability of nerves that he shunned a day's outing or a chat with an old companion, lest it distract him for a month afterward. His mistress he seems to have estranged by an ill-concealed preference to her of his exacting Muse. To illustrate his "monkish" consecration to his craft we cannot do better than reproduce a passage, quoted by Pater, from his letters to Madame Colet:

"I must scold you for one thing, which shocks, scandalises me, the small concern, namely, you show for art just now. As regards glory be it so — there I approve. But for art! — the one thing in life that is good and real — can you compare with it an earthly love? — prefer the adoration of a relative beauty to the cultus of the true beauty? Well! I tell you the truth. That is the one thing good in me: the one thing I have, to me estimable. For yourself, you blend with the beautiful a heap of alien things, the useful, the agreeable, what not?

“The only way not to be unhappy is to shut yourself up in art, and count everything else as nothing. Pride takes the place of all beside when it is established on a large basis. Work! God wills it. That, it seems to me, is clear.

“I am reading over again the Aeneid, certain verses of which I repeat to myself to satiety. There are phrases there which stay in one’s head, by which I find myself beset, as with those musical airs which are forever returning, and cause you pain, you love them so much. I observe that I no longer laugh much, and am no longer depressed. I am ripe, you talk of my serenity, and envy me. It may well surprise you. Sick, irritated, the prey a thousand times a day of cruel pain, I continue my labour like a true working-man, who, with sleeves turned up, in the sweat of his brow, beats away at his anvil, never troubling himself whether it rains or blows, for hail or thunder. I was not like that formerly.”

The half-dozen works which Flaubert beat out on his “anvil,” with an average expenditure of half-a-dozen years to each, were composed on a theory of which the prime distinguishing feature was the great doctrine of “impersonality.” George Sand’s fluent improvisations ordinarily originated, as we have noted, in an impulse of her lyrical idealism; she began with an aspiration of her heart, to execute which she invented characters and plot so that she is always on the inside of her story. According to Flaubert’s theory, the novel should originate in a desire to present a certain segment of observed life. The author is to take and rigorously maintain a position outside his work. The organ with which he collects his materials is not his heart but his eyes, supplemented by the other senses. Life, so far as the scientific observer can be sure of it, and so far as the artist can control it for representation, is a picture or series of pictures, a dramatic scene or a concatenation of dramatic scenes. Let the novelist first, therefore, with scrupulous fidelity and with minute regard for the possible significance of every observable detail, fill his notebooks, amass his materials, master his subject. After Flaubert, a first-rate sociological investigator is three-fourths of a novelist. The rest of the task is to arrange and set forth these facts so that they shall tell the truth about life impressively, in scene and dramatic spectacle, the meaning of which shall be implicit in the plot and shall reach the reader's consciousness through his senses.

Critics have spent much time in discussing the conflict of "romantic" and "realistic" tendencies in Flaubert's works. And it is obviously easy, so far as subject-matter is concerned, to group his books in two divisions: on the one hand, The Temptation of St. Anthony, Salamambo, and two of the Trois Contes; on the other hand, Madame Bovary, L'Education Sentimentale, and the incomplete Bouvard and Pecuchet. We may call the tales in the first group romantic, because the subject-matter is remote in time and place, and because in them Flaubert indulges his passion for splendor — for oriental scenery, for barbaric characters, the pomp of savage war and more savage religion, events strange, terrible, atrocious. We may call the stories in the other group realistic, because the subject-matter is contemporary life in Paris and the provinces, and because in them Flaubert indulges his hatred for mediocrity — for the humdrum existence of the country doctor, the apothecary, the insipid clerk, the vapid sentimental woman, and the charlatans of science. But as a matter of fact, ALL his books are essentially constructed on the same theory: all are just as "realistic" as Flaubert could make them.

Henry James called Madame Bovary a brilliantly successful application of Flaubert's theory; he pronounced L'Education Sentimentale "elaborately and massively dreary"; and he briefly dismissed Salamambo as an accomplished work of erudition. Salamambo is indeed a work of erudition; years were spent in getting up its archaeological details. But Madame Bovary is also a work of erudition, and Bouvard and Pecuchet is a work of enormous erudition; a thousand volumes were read for the notes of the first volume and Flaubert is said to have killed himself by the labor of his unfinished investigations. There is no important distinction to be made between the method or the thoroughness with which he collected his facts in the one case or the other; and the story of the war of the mercenaries against the Carthaginians is evolved with the same alternation of picture and dramatic spectacle and the same hard merciless externality that distinguish the evolution of Emma Bovary's history.

We may go still farther than that towards wiping out the distinction between Flaubert's "romantic" and his "realistic" works; and by the same stroke what is illusory in the pretensions of the realists, namely, their aspiration to an "impersonal art."

If we were seeking to prove that an author can put NOTHING BUT HIMSELF into his art, we should ask for no more impressive illusions than precisely, Madame Bovary and Salammbô. These two masterpieces disclose to reflection, no less patently than the works of George Sand, their purpose and their meaning. And that purpose and meaning are not a whit less personal to Flaubert than the purpose and meaning of Indiana, let us say, are personal to George Sand. The "meaning" of Madame Bovary and Salammbô is, broadly speaking, Flaubert's sense of the significance — or, rather, of the insignificance — of human life; and the "purpose" of the books is to express it. The most lyrical of idealists can do no more to reveal herself.

The demonstration afforded by a comparison of Salammbô and Madame Bovary is particularly striking because the subject-matters are superficially so unlike. But take any characteristic series of pictures or incidents from Salammbô: take the passing of the children through the fire to Moloch, or the description of the leprous Hanno, or the physical surrender of the priestess to her country's enemy, or the following picture of the crucified lion:

"They were marching through a wide defile, hedged in by two chains of reddish hillocks, when a nauseous odor struck their nostrils, and they believed that they saw something extraordinary at the top of a carob tree; a lion's head stood up above the foliage.

"Running towards it, they found a lion attached to a cross by its four limbs, like a criminal; his enormous muzzle hung to his breast, and his forepaws, half concealed beneath the abundance of his mane, were widely spread apart, like a bird's wings in flight; under the tightly drawn skin, his ribs severally protruded and his hind legs were nailed together, but were slightly drawn up; black blood had trickled through the hairs, and collected in stalactites at the end of his tail, which hung straight down the length of the cross. The soldiers crowded around the beast, diverting themselves by calling him ‘Consul!’ and ‘Citizen of Rome!’ and threw pebbles into his eyes to scatter the swarming gnats.”

And now take any characteristic series of pictures or incidents from Madame Bovary: take Bovary’s bungling and gruesome operations on the club-footed ostler’s leg, with the entire village clustering agape; take the picture of the eyeless, idiotic beggar on the road to Rouen; or the scene in which Emma offers herself for three thousand francs to Rodolphe; or the following bit, only a bit, from the detailed account of the heroine’s last hours, after the arsenical poisoning:

“Emma’s head was turned towards her right shoulder, the corner of her mouth, which was open, seemed like a black hole at the lower part of her face; her two thumbs were bent into the palms of her hands; a kind of white dust besprinkled her lashes, and her eyes were beginning to disappear in that viscous pallor that looks like a thin web, as if spiders had spun it over. The sheet sunk in from her breast to her knees, and then rose at the tips of her toes, and it seemed to Charles that infinite masses, an enormous load, were weighing upon her.

“The church clock struck two. They could hear the loud murmur of the river flowing in the darkness at the foot of the terrace. Monsieur Bournisien from time to time blew his nose noisily and Homais’ pen was scratching over the paper.”

In these two detached pictures — the one from a so-called “romantic,” the other from a so-called “realistic” book — one readily observes the likeness in the subjects, which are of a ghastly repulsiveness; the same minuteness of observation — e.g., the lion’s hind legs “slightly drawn up,” the woman’s thumbs “bent into the palms of her hands”; the same careful notation of effect on the several senses; the same rhetorical heightening — e.g., the “stalactites at the end of his tail,” the web in the woman’s eyes “as if spiders had spun it over”; and finally, that celebrated detachment, that air as of a medical examiner, recording the results of an autopsy. What can we know of such an author? All, or nearly all, that he knew of himself, provided we will searchingly ask ourselves what sort of mind is steadily attracted to the painting of such pictures, to the representation of such incidents, and what sort of mind expresses a lifetime of brooding on the significance of life in two such books as Madame Bovary and Salamambo.

At its first appearance, Madame Bovary was prosecuted, though unsuccessfully, as offensive to public morals. In derision of this famous prosecution, Henry James with studious jauntiness, asserts that in the heat of his first admiration he thought what an excellent moral tract it would make. "It may be very seriously maintained," he continues, "that M. Flaubert's masterpiece is the pearl of 'Sunday reading.'" As a work of fiction and recreation the book lacks, in his opinion, one quite indispensable quality: it lacks charm. Well, there are momentary flashes of beauty and grace, dazzling bits of color, haunting melancholy cadences in every chapter of Flaubert; but a charming book he never wrote. A total impression of charm he never gave — he never could give; because his total impression of life was not charming but atrocious. It is perhaps an accident, as has been suggested, that one can so readily employ Madame Bovary to illustrate that text on the "wages of sin." Emma, to be sure, goes down the easy and alluring path to disgrace and ruin. But that is only an incident in the wider meaning of Flaubert's fiction, a meaning more amply expressed in Salamambo, where not one foolish woman alone but thousands on thousands of men, women, and children, mingled with charging elephants and vipers, flounder and fight in indescribable welters of blood and filth, and go down to rot in a common pit. If I read Flaubert's meaning right, all human history is there; you may show it by painting on broad canvas a Carthaginian battle-scene or by photographing the details of a modern bedroom: a brief brightness, night and the odor of carrion, a crucified lion, a dying woman, the jeering of ribald mercenaries, the cackle of M. Homais. It is all one. If Flaubert deserved prosecution, it was not for making vice attractive, but for expressing with invasive energy that personal and desperately pessimistic conception of life by which he was almost overwhelmed.

That a bad physical regimen, bad habits of work in excessive quantities, and the solitude of his existence were contributory to Flaubert's melancholy, his exacerbated egotism, and his pessimism is sufficiently obvious in the letters. This Norman giant with his aching head buried all day long in his arms, groping in anguish for a phrase, has naturally a kindly disposition towards various individuals of his species — is even capable of great generosity; but as he admits with a truth and pathos, deeply appealing to the maternal sympathies of his correspondent, he has no talent for living. He has never been able, like richer and more resourceful souls, to reconcile being a man with being an author. He has made his choice; he has renounced the cheerful sanities of the world:

“I pass entire weeks without exchanging a word with a human being; and at the end of the week it is not possible for me to recall a single day nor any event whatsoever. I see my mother and my niece on Sundays, and that is all. My only company consists of a band of rats in the garret, which make an infernal racket above my head, when the water does not roar or the wind blow. The nights are black as ink, and a silence surrounds me comparable to that of the desert. Sensitiveness is increased immeasurably in such a setting. I have palpitations of the heart for nothing.

To George Sand, who wrote as naturally as she breathed and almost as easily, seclusion and torment were by no means the necessary conditions of literary activity. Enormously productive, with a hundred books to his half-a-dozen, she has never dedicated and consecrated herself to her profession but has lived heartily and a bit recklessly from day to day, spending herself in many directions freely, gaily, extravagantly. Now that she has definitely said farewell to her youth, she finds that she is twenty years younger; and now that she is, in a sense, dissipating her personality and living in the lives of others, she finds that she is happier than ever before. “It can’t be imperative to work so painfully” — such is the burden of her earlier counsels to Flaubert; “spare yourself a little, take some exercise, relax the tendons of your mind, indulge a little the physical man. Live a little as I do; and you will take your fatigues and illnesses and occasional dolours and dumps as incidents of the day’s work and not magnify them into the mountainous overshadowing calamities from which you deduce your philosophy of universal misery.” No advice could have been more wholesome or more timely. And with what pictures of her own busy felicity she reenforces her advice! I shall produce three of them here in order to emphasize that precious thing which George Sand loved to impart, and which she had the gift of imparting, namely, joy, the spontaneous joyousness of her own nature. The first passage is from a letter of June 14, 1867:

“I am a little remorseful to take whole days from your work, I who am never bored with loafing, and whom you could leave for whole hours under a tree, or before two lighted logs, with the assurance that I should find there something interesting. I know so well how to live OUTSIDE OF MYSELF. It hasn’t always been like that. I also was young and subject to indignations. It is over! Since I have dipped into real nature, I have found there an order, a system, a calmness of cycles which is lacking in mankind, but which man can, up to a certain point, assimilate when he is not too directly at odds with the difficulties of his own life. When these difficulties return, he must endeavor to avoid them; but if he has drunk the cup of the eternally true, he does not get too excited for or against the ephemeral and relative truth.”

The second passage is of June 21:

“I love everything that makes up a milieu, the rolling of the carriages and the noise of the workmen in Paris, the cries of a thousand birds in the country, the movement of the ships on the waters. I love also absolute, profound silence, and, in short, I love everything that is around me, no matter where I am.”

The last passage gives a glimpse of the seventeenth of January, 1869, a typical day in Nohant:

“The individual named George Sand is well: he is enjoying the marvellous winter which reigns in Berry, gathering flowers, noting interesting botanical anomalies, making dresses and mantles for his daughter-in-law, costumes for the marionettes, cutting out scenery, dressing dolls, reading music, but above all spending hours with the little Aurore, who is a marvellous child. There is not a more tranquil or a happier individual in his domestic life than this old troubadour retired from business, who sings from time to time his little song to the moon, without caring much whether he sings well or ill, provided he sings the motif that runs in his head, and who, the rest of the time, idles deliciously.... This pale character has the great pleasure of loving you with all his heart, and of not passing a day without thinking of the other old troubadour, confined in his solitude of a frenzied artist, disdainful of all the pleasures of the world.”

Flaubert did “exercise” a little — once or twice — in compliance with the injunctions of his “dear master”; but he rather resented the implication that his pessimism was personal, that it had any particular connection with his peculiar temperament or habits. He wished to think of himself as a stoic, quite indifferent about his “carcase.” His briefer black moods he might acknowledge had transitory causes. But his general and abiding conceptions of humanity were the result of dispassionate reflections. “You think,” he cries in half-sportive pique, “that because I pass my life trying to make harmonious phrases, in avoiding assonances, that I too have not my little judgments on the things of this world? Alas! Yes! and moreover I shall burst, enraged at not expressing them.” And later: “Yes, I am susceptible to disinterested angers, and I love you all the more for loving me for that. Stupidity and injustice make me roar, — and I howl in my corner against a lot of things ‘that do not concern me.’” “On the day that I am no longer in a rage, I shall fall flat as the marionette from which one withdraws the support of the stick.”

So far as Flaubert’s pessimism has an intellectual basis, it rests upon his researches in human history. For Salamambo and The Temptation of St. Anthony he ransacked ancient literature, devoured religions and mythologies, and saturated himself in the works of the Church Fathers. In order to get up the background of his Education Sentimentale he studied the Revolution of 1848 and its roots in the Revolution of 1789. He found, shall we say? what he was looking for—inexhaustible proofs of the cruelty and stupidity of men. After “gulping” down the six volumes of Buchez and Roux, he declares: “The clearest thing I got out of them is an immense disgust for the French.... Not a liberal idea which has not been unpopular, not a just thing that has not caused scandal, not a great man who has not been mobbed or knifed. ‘The history of the human mind is the history of human folly,’ as says M. Voltaire. ... Neo-Catholicism on the one hand, and Socialism on the other, have stultified France.” In another letter of the same Period and similar provocation: “However much you fatten human cattle, giving them straw as high as their bellies, and even gilding their stable, they will remain brutes, no matter what one says. All the advance that one can hope for, is to make the brute a little less wicked. But as for elevating the ideas of the mass, giving it a larger and therefore a less human conception of God, I have my doubts.”

In addition to the charges of violence and cruelty, which he brought against all antiquity as well as against modern times, much in the fashion of Swift or the older Mark Twain, Flaubert nursed four grave causes of indignation, made four major charges of folly against modern “Christian” civilization. In religion, we have substituted for Justice the doctrine of Grace. In our sociological considerations we act no longer with discrimination but upon a principle of universal sympathy. In the field of art and literature we have abandoned criticism and research for the Beautiful in favor of universal puffery. In politics we have nullified intelligence and renounced leadership to embrace universal suffrage, which is the last disgrace of the human spirit.

It must be acknowledged that Flaubert’s arraignment of modern society possesses the characteristics commended by the late Barrett Wendell: it is marked in a high degree by “unity, mass, and coherence.” It must be admitted also that George Sand possessed in a high degree the Pauline virtue of being “not easily provoked,” or she never could have endured so patiently, so sweetly, Flaubert’s reiterated and increasingly ferocious assaults upon her own master passion, her ruling principle. George Sand was one whose entire life signally attested the power of a “saving grace,” resident in the creative and recuperative energies of nature, resident in the magical, the miracle-working, powers of the human heart, the powers of love and sympathy. She was a modern spiritual adventurer who had escaped unscathed from all the anathemas of the old theology; and she abounded, like St. Francis, in her sense of the new dispensation and in her benedictive exuberance towards all the creatures of God, including not merely sun, moon, and stars and her sister the lamb but also her brother the wolf. On this principle she loves Flaubert! — and archly asserts her arch-heresy in his teeth. He complains that her fundamental defect is that she doesn’t know how to “hate.” She replies, with a point that seems never really to have pierced his thick casing of masculine egotism:

“Artists are spoiled children and the best are great egotists. You say that I love them too well; I like them as I like the woods and the fields, everything, everyone that I know a little and that I study continually. I make my life in the midst of all that, and as I like my life, I like all that nourishes it and renews it. They do me a lot of ill turns which I see, but which I no longer feel. I know that there are thorns in the hedges, but that does not prevent me from putting out my hands and finding flowers there. If all are not beautiful, all are interesting. The day you took me to the Abbey of Saint-Georges I found the scrofularia borealis, a very rare plant in France. I was enchanted; there was much — — in the neighborhood where I gathered it. Such is life!

“And if one does not take life like that, one cannot take it in any way, and then how can one endure it? I find it amusing and interesting, and since I accept EVERYTHING, I am so much happier and more enthusiastic when I meet the beautiful and the good. If I did not have a great knowledge of the species, I should not have quickly understood you, or known you or loved you.”

Two years later the principles and tempers of both these philosophers were put to their severest trial. In 1870, George Sand had opportunity to apply her doctrine of universal acceptance to the Prussians in Paris. Flaubert had opportunity to welcome scientific organization in the Prussian occupation of his own home at Croisset. The first reaction of both was a quite simple consternation and rage, in which Flaubert cries, “The hopeless barbarism of humanity fills me with a black melancholy,” and George Sand, for the moment assenting, rejoins: “Men are ferocious and conceited brutes.” As the war thickens around him and the wakened militancy of his compatriots presses him hard, Flaubert becomes more and more depressed; he forebodes a general collapse of civilization — before the century passes, a conflict of races, “in which several millions of men kill one another in one engagement.” With the curiously vengeful satisfaction which mortals take in their own misery when it offers occasion to cry “I told you so,” he exclaims: “Behold then, the NATURAL MAN. Make theories now! Boast the progress, the enlightenment and the good sense of the masses, and the gentleness of the French people! I assure you that anyone here who ventured to preach peace would get himself murdered.”

George Sand in her fields at Nohant — not “above” but a little aside from the conflict — turns instinctively to her peasant doggedly, placidly, sticking at his plow; turns to her peasant with a kind of intuition that he is a symbol of faith, that he holds the keys to a consolation, which the rest of us blindly grope for: "He is imbecile, people say; no, he is a child in prosperity, a man in disaster, more of a man than we who complain; he says nothing, and while people are killing, he is sowing, repairing continually on one side what they are destroying on the other." Flaubert, who thinks that he has no "illusions" about peasants or the "average man," brings forward his own specific of a quite different nature: "Do you think that if France, instead of being governed on the whole by the crowd, were in the power of the mandarins, we should be where we are now? If, instead of having wished to enlighten the lower classes, we had busied ourselves with instructing the higher, we should not have seen M. de Keratry proposing the pillage of the duchy of Baden."

In the great war of our own time with the same foes, our professional advocates of "preparedness," our cheerful chemists, our scientific "intellectuals" — all our materialistic thinkers hard-shell and soft-shell, — took the position of Flaubert, just presented; reproached us bitterly for our slack, sentimental pacificism; and urged us with all speed to emulate the scientific spirit of our enemy. There is nothing more instructive in this correspondence than to observe how this last fond illusion falls away from Flaubert under the impact of an experience which demonstrated to his tortured senses the truth of the old Rabelaisian utterance, that "science without conscience is the ruin of the soul."

"What use, pray," he cries in the last disillusion, "is science, since this people abounding in scholars commits abominations worthy of the Huns and worse than theirs, because they are systematic, cold-blooded, voluntary, and have for an excuse, neither passion nor hunger?" And a few months later, he is still in mad anguish of desolation:

"I had some illusions! What barbarity! What a slump! I am wrathful at my contemporaries for having given me the feelings of a brute of the twelfth century! I'm stifling in gall! These officers who break mirrors with white gloves on, who know Sanskrit, and who fling themselves on the champagne; who steal your watch and then send you their visiting card, this war for money, these civilized savages give me more horror than cannibals. And all the world is going to imitate them, is going to be a soldier! Russia has now four millions of them.

All Europe will wear a uniform. If we take our revenge, it will be ferocious in the last degree; and, mark my word, we are going to think only of that, of avenging ourselves on Germany.”

Under the imminence of the siege of Paris, Flaubert had drilled men, with an out-flashing of the savage fighting spirit of his ancestors, of which he was more than half ashamed. But at heart he is more dismayed, more demoralized, more thoroughly prostrated than George Sand. He has not fortitude actually to face the degree of depravity which he has always imputed to the human race, the baseness with which his imagination has long been easily and cynically familiar. As if his pessimism had been only a literary pigment, a resource of the studio, he shudders to find Paris painted in his own ebony colors, and his own purely “artistic” hatred of the bourgeois, translated into a principle of action, expressing itself in the horrors of the Commune, with half the population trying to strangle the other half. Hatred, after all, contempt and hatred, are not quite the most felicitous watchwords for the use of human society. Like one whose cruel jest has been taken more seriously than he had intended and has been turned upon his own head, Flaubert considers flight: “I cherish the following dream: of going to live in the sun in a tranquil country.” As a substitute for a physical retreat, he buries himself in a study of Buddhism, and so gradually returns to the pride of his intellectual isolation. As the tumult in his senses subsides, he even ventures to offer to George Sand the anodyne of his old philosophical despair: “Why are you so sad? Humanity offers nothing new. Its irremediable misery has filled me with sadness ever since my youth. And in addition I now have no disillusion. I believe that the crowd, the common herd will always be hateful. The only important thing is a little group of minds always the same — which passes the torch from one to another.”

There we must leave Flaubert, the thinker. He never passes beyond that point in his vision of reconstruction: a “legitimate aristocracy” established in contempt of the average man — with the Academy of Sciences displacing the Pope.

George Sand, amid these devastating external events, is beginning to feel the insidious siege of years. She can no longer rally her spiritual forces with the “bright speed” that she had in the old days. The fountain of her faith, which has never yet failed of renewal, fills more slowly. For weeks she broods in silence, fearing to augment her friend's dismay with more of her own, fearing to resume a debate in which her cause may be better than her arguments and in which depression of her physical energy may diminish her power to put up a spirited defence before the really indomitable "last ditch" of her position. When Flaubert himself makes a momentary gesture towards the white flag, and talks of retreat, she seizes the opportunity for a short scornful sally. "Go to live in the sun in a tranquil country! Where? What country is going to be tranquil in this struggle of barbarity against civilization, a struggle which is going to be universal?" A month later she gives him fair warning that she has no intention of acknowledging final defeat: "For me, the ignoble experiment that Paris is attempting or is undergoing, proves nothing against the laws of the eternal progression of men and things, and, if I have gained any principles in my mind, good or bad, they are neither shattered nor changed by it. For a long time I have accepted patience as one accepts the sort of weather there is, the length of winter, old age, lack of success in all its forms." But Flaubert, thinking that he has detected in her public utterances a decisive change of front, privately urges her in a finely figurative passage of a letter which denounces modern republicanism, universal suffrage, compulsory education, and the press — Flaubert urges her to come out openly in renunciation of her faith in humanity and her popular progressivistic doctrines. I must quote a few lines of his attempt at seduction:

"Ah, dear good master, if you could only hate! That is what you lack, hate. In spite of your great Sphinx eyes, you have seen the world through a golden colour. That comes from the sun in your heart; but so many shadows have risen that now you are not recognizing things any more. Come now! Cry out! Thunder! Take your great lyre and touch the brazen string: the monsters will flee. Bedew us with drops of the blood of wounded Themis."

That summons roused the citadel, but not to surrender, not to betrayal. The eloquent daughter of the people caught up her great lyre — in the public Reponse a un ami of October 3, 1871. But her fingers passed lightly over the "brazen string" to pluck again with old power the resonant golden notes. Her reply, with its direct retorts to Flaubert, is not perhaps a very closely reasoned argument. In making the extract

I have altered somewhat the order of the sentences:

“And what, you want me to stop loving? You want me to say that I have been mistaken all my life, that humanity is contemptible, hateful, that it always has been and always will be so? ... What, then, do you want me to do, so as to isolate myself from my kind, from my compatriots, from the great family in whose bosom my own family is only one ear of corn in the terrestrial field? ... But it is impossible, and your steady reason puts up with the most unreasonable of Utopias. In what Eden, in what fantastic Eldorado will you hide your family, your little group of friends, your intimate happiness, so that the lacerations of the social state and the disasters of the country shall not reach them? ... In vain you are prudent and withdraw, your refuge will be invaded in its turn, and in perishing with human civilization you will be no greater a philosopher for not having loved, than those who threw themselves into the flood to save some debris of humanity. ... The people, you say! The people is yourself and myself. It would be useless to deny it. There are not two races. ... No, no, people do not isolate themselves, the ties of blood are not broken, people do not curse or scorn their kind. Humanity is not a vain word. Our life is composed of love, and not to love is to cease to live.”

This is, if you please, an effusion of sentiment, a chant of faith. In a world more and more given to judging trees by their fruits, we should err if we dismissed this sentiment, this faith, too lightly. Flaubert may have been a better disputant; he had a talent for writing. George Sand may have chosen her side with a truer instinct; she had a genius for living. This faith of hers sustained well the shocks of many long years, and this sentiment made life sweet.

EARLY LETTERS

I. TO GEORGE SAND 1863

Dear Madam,

I am not grateful to you for having performed what you call a duty. The goodness of your heart has touched me and your sympathy has made me proud. That is the whole of it.

Your letter which I have just received gives added value to your article [Footnote: Letter about Salammbô, January, 1863, Questions d'art et de littérature.] and goes on still further, and I do not know what to say to you unless it be that I QUITE FRANKLY LIKE YOU.

It was certainly not I who sent you in September, a little flower in an envelope. But, strange to say, at the same time, I received in the same manner, a leaf of a tree.

As for your very cordial invitation, I am not answering yes or no, in true Norman fashion. Perhaps some day this summer I shall surprise you. For I have a great desire to see you and to talk with you.

It would be very delightful to have your portrait to hang on the wall in my study in the country where I often spend long months entirely alone. Is the request indiscreet? If not, a thousand thanks in advance. Take them with the others which I reiterate.

II. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, 15 March, 1864

Dear Flaubert,

I don't know whether you lent me or gave me M. Taine's beautiful book. In the uncertainty I am returning it to you. Here I have had only the time to read a part of it, and at Nohant, I shall have only the time to scribble for Buloz; but when I return, in two months, I shall ask you again for this admirable work of which the scope is so lofty, so noble.

I am sorry not to have said adieu to you; but as I return soon, I hope that you will not have forgotten me and that you will let me read something of your own also.

You were so good and so sympathetic to me at the first performance of Villemer that I no longer admire only your admirable talent, I love you with all my heart.

George Sand

III. TO GEORGE SAND

Paris, 1866

Why of course I am counting on your visit at my own house. As for the hindrances which the fair sex can oppose to it, you will not notice them (be sure of it) any more than did the others. My little stories of the heart or of the senses are not displayed on the counter. But as it is far from my quarter to yours and as you might make a useless trip, when you arrive in Paris, give me a rendezvous. And at that we shall make another to dine informally tete-a-tete.

I sent your affectionate little greeting to Bouilhet.

At the present time I am disheartened by the populace which rushes by under my windows in pursuit of the fatted calf. And they say that intelligence is to be found in the street!

IV. To M. Flobert (Justave) M. of Letters Boulevard du Temple, 42, Paris Paris, 10 May, 1866

[The postage stamp bears the mark Palaiseau 9 May, '66.]

M. Flobaire, You must be a truly dirty oaf to have taken my name and written a letter with it to a lady who had some favors for me which you doubtless received in my place and inherited my hat in place of which I have received yours which you left there. It is the lowness of that lady's conduct and of yours that make me think that she lacks education entirely and all those sentiments which she ought to understand. If you are content to have written Fanie and Salkenpeau I am content not to have read them. You mustn't get excited about that, I saw in the papers that there were outrages against the Religion in whose bosom I have entered again after the troubles I had with that lady when she made me come to my senses and repent of my sins with her and, in consequence if I meet you with her whom I care for no longer you shall have my sword at your throat. That will be the Reparation of my sins and the punishment of your infamy at the same time. That is what I tell you and I salute you.

Coulard

At Palaiseau with the Monks

They told me that I was well punished for associating with the girls from the theatre and with aristocrats.

V. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT 1866

Sir,

After the most scrupulous combined searches I found at last the body of my beloved brother. You are in belles-lettres and you would have been struck by the splendor of that scene. The corpse which was a Brother extended nonchalantly on the edge of a foul ditch. I forgot my sorrow a moment to contemplate he was good this young man whom the matches killed, but the real guilty one was that woman whom passions have separated in this disordered current in which our unhappy country is at the moment when it is more to be pitied than blamed for there are still men who have a heart. You who express yourself so well tell that siren that she has destroyed a great citizen. I don't need to tell you that we count on you to dig his noble tomb. Tell Silvanit also that she can come notwithstanding for education obliges me to offer her a glass of wine. I have the honor to salute you.

I also have the honor to salute Silvanit for whom I am a brother much to be pitied.

Goulard the elder

Have the goodness to transmit to Silvanit the last wishes of my poor Theodore. [Footnote: Letter written by Eugene Lambert.]

VI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Palaiseau 14 May, 1866

This is not a letter from Goulard. He is dead! The false Goulard killed him by surpassing him in the real and the comic. But this false Goulard also does not deny himself anything, the rascal!

Dear friend, I must tell you that I want to dedicate to you my novel which is just coming out. But as every one has his own ideas on the subject — as Goulard would say — I would like to know if you permit me to put at the head of my title page simply: to my friend Gustave Flaubert. I have formed the habit of putting my novels under the patronage of a beloved name. I dedicated the last to Fromentin.

I am waiting until it is good weather to ask you to come to dine at Palaiseau with Goulard's Sirenne, and some other Goulards of your kind and of mine. Up to now it has been frightfully cold and it is not worth the trouble to come to the country to catch a cold.

I have finished my novel, and you?

I kiss the two great diamonds which adorn your face.

Jorje Sens

The elder Goulard is my little Lambert, it seems to me that he is quite literary in that way.

VII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Palaiseau, Wednesday, 16 May, 1866

Well, my dear friend, since you are going away, and as in a fortnight, I am going to Berry for two or three months, do try to find time to come tomorrow Thursday. You will dine with dear and interesting Marguerite Thuillier who is also going away.

Do come to see my hermitage and Sylvester's. By leaving Paris, gare de Sceaux, at 1 o'clock, you will be at my house at 2 o'clock, or by leaving at 5, you will be there at 6, and in the evening you could leave with my strolling players at 9 or 10. Bring the copy. [Footnote: This refers to Monsieur Sylveitre, which had just appeared.] Put in it all the criticisms which occur to you. That will be very good for me. People ought to do that for each other as Balzac and I used to do. That doesn't make one person alter the other; quite the contrary, for in general, one gets more determined in one's moi, one completes it, explains it better, entirely develops it, and that is why friendship is good, even in literature, where the first condition of any worth is to be one's self.

If you can not come — I shall have a thousand regrets, but then I am depending upon you Monday before dinner. Au revoir and thank you for the fraternal permission of dedication.

G. Sand

VIII. TO GEORGE SAND

Paris, 17 or 18 May, 1866

Don't expect me at your house on Monday. I am obliged to go to Versailles on that day. But I shall be at Magny's.

A thousand fond greetings from your

G. Flaubert

IX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 31 July, 1866

My good dear comrade,

Will you really be in Paris these next few days as you led me to hope? I leave here the 2nd. What good luck if I found you at dinner on the following Monday. And besides, they are putting on a play [Footnote: Les Don Juan de village.] by my son and me, on the 10th. Could I possibly get along without you on that day? I shall feel some EMOTION this time because of my dear collaborator. Be a good friend and try to come! I embrace you with all my heart in that hope.

The late Goulard,

G. Sand.

X. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, 4 Aug., 1866

Dear friend, as I'm always out, I don't want you to come and find the door shut and me far away. Come at six o'clock and dine with me and my children whom I expect tomorrow. We dine at Magny's always at 6 o'clock promptly. You will give us 'a sensible pleasure' as used to say, as would have said, alas, the unhappy Goulard. You are an exceedingly kind brother to promise to be at Don Juan. For that I kiss you twice more.

G. Sand

Saturday evening.

XI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

It is next THURSDAY,

I wrote you last night, and our letters must have crossed.

Yours from the heart,

G. Sand

Sunday, 5 August, 1866.

XII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, Wednesday evening, 22 August, 1866

My good comrade and friend, I am going to see Alexandre at Saint-

Valery Saturday evening. I shall stay there Sunday and Monday, I shall return Tuesday to Rouen and go to see you. Tell me how that strikes you. I shall spend the day with you if you like, returning to spend the night in Rouen, if I inconvenience you as you are situated, and I shall leave Wednesday morning or evening for Paris. A word in response at once, by telegraph if you think that your answer would not reach me by post before Saturday at 4 o'clock.

I think that I shall be all right but I have a horrid cold. If it grows too bad, I shall telegraph that I can not stir; but I have hopes, I am already better.

I embrace you.

G. Sand

XIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Saint-Valery, 26 August, 1866 Monday, 1 A.M.

Dear friend, I shall be in Rouen on Tuesday at 1 o'clock, I shall plan accordingly. Let me explore Rouen which I don't know, or show it to me if you have the time. I embrace you. Tell your mother how much I appreciate and am touched, by the kind little line which she wrote to me.

G. Sand

XIV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset

Paris, 31 August, 1866

First of all, embrace your good mother and your charming niece for me. I am really touched by the kind welcome I received in your clerical setting, where a stray animal of my species is an anomaly that one might find constraining. Instead of that, they received me as if I were one of the family and I saw that all that great politeness came from the heart. Remember me to all the very kind friends. I was truly exceedingly happy with you. And then, you, you are a dear kind boy, big man that you are, and I love you with all my heart. My head is full of Rouen, of monuments and queer houses. All of that seen with you strikes me doubly. But your house, your garden, your CITADEL, it is like a dream and it seems to me that I am still there.

I found Paris very small yesterday, when crossing the bridges.

I want to start back again. I did not see you enough, you and your surroundings; but I must rush off to the children, who are calling and threatening me. I embrace you and I bless you all.

G. Sand

Paris, Friday.

On going home yesterday, I found Couture to whom I said on your behalf that HIS portrait of me was, according to you, the best that anyone had made. He was not a little flattered. I am going to hunt up an especially good copy to send you.

I forgot to get three leaves from the tulip tree, you must send them to me in a letter, it is for something cabalistic.

XV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, 2 September, 1866

Send me back the lace shawl. My faithful porter will forward it to me wherever I am. I don't know yet. If my children want to go with me into Brittany, I shall go to fetch them, if not I shall go on alone wherever chance leads me. In travelling, I fear only distractions. But I take a good deal on myself and I shall end by improving myself. You write me a good dear letter which I kiss. Don't forget the three leaves from the tulip tree. They are asking me at the Odeon to let them perform a fairy play: la Nuit de Noel from the Theatre de Nohant, I don't want to, it's too small a thing. But since they have that idea, why wouldn't they try your fairy play? Do you want me to ask them? I have a notion that this would be the right theatre for a thing of that type. The management, Chilly and Duquesnel, wants to have scenery and MACHINERY and yet keep it literary. Let us discuss this when I return here.

You still have the time to write to me. I shall not leave for three days yet. Love to your family.

G. S.

Sunday evening

I forgot! Levy promises to send you my complete works, they are endless. You must stick them on a shelf in a corner and dig into them when your heart prompts you.

XVI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croissset

Nohant, 21 September, 1866

I have just returned from a twelve days trip with my children, and on getting home I find your two letters. That fact, added to the joy of seeing Mademoiselle Aurore again, fresh and pretty, makes me quite happy. And you my Benedictine, you are quite alone in your ravishing monastery, working and never going out? That is what it means TO HAVE ALREADY gone out too much. Monsieur craves Syrias, deserts, dead seas, dangers and fatigues! But nevertheless he can make Bovarys in which every little cranny of life is studied and painted with mastery. What an odd person who can also compose the fight between the Sphinx and the Chimaera! You are a being quite apart, very mysterious, gentle as a lamb with it all. I have had a great desire to question you, but a too great respect for you has prevented me; for I know how to make light only of my own calamities, while those which a great mind has had to undergo so as to be in a condition to produce, seem to me like sacred things which should not be touched roughly nor thoughtlessly.

Sainte-Beuve, who loves you all the same, claims that you are horribly vicious. But perhaps he may see with somewhat unclean eyes, like this learned botanist who asserts that the germander is of DIRTY yellow color. The observation was so false, that I could not refrain from writing on the margin of his book: IT IS BECAUSE YOU HAVE DIRTY EYES.

I suppose that a man of intelligence may have great curiosity. I have not had it, lacking the courage. I have preferred to leave my mind incomplete, that is my affair, and every one is free to embark either on a great ship in full sail, or on a fisherman's vessel. The artist is an explorer whom nothing ought to stop, and who does neither good nor ill when turning to the right or to the left. His end justifies all.

It is for him to know after a little experience, what are the conditions of his soul's health. As for me, I think that yours is in a good condition of grace, since you love to work and to be alone in spite of the rain.

Do you know that, while there has been a deluge everywhere, we have had, except a few downpours, fine sunshine in Brittany? A horrible wind on the shore, but how beautiful the high surf! and since the botany of the coast carried me away, and Maurice and his wife have a passion for shellfish, we endured it all gaily. But on the whole,

Brittany is a famous see-saw.

However, we are a little fed up with dolmens and menhirs and we have fallen on fetes and have seen costumes which they said had been suppressed but which the old people still wear. Well! These men of the past are ugly with their home-spun trousers, their long hair, their jackets with pockets under the arms, their sottish air, half drunkard, half saint. And the Celtic relics, uncontestably curious for the archaeologist, have naught for the artist, they are badly set, badly composed, Carnac and Erdeven have no physiognomy. In short, Brittany shall not have my bones! I prefer a thousand times your rich Normandy, or, in the days when one has dramas in his HEAD, a real country of horror and despair. There is nothing in a country where priests rule and where Catholic vandalism has passed, razing monuments of the ancient world and sowing the plagues of the future.

You say US a propos of the fairy play. I don't know with whom you have written it, but I still fancy that it ought to succeed at the Odeon under its present management. If I was acquainted with it, I should know how to accomplish for you what one never knows how to do for one's self, namely, to interest the directors. Anything of yours is bound to be too original to be understood by that coarse Dumaine. Do have a copy at your house, and next month I shall spend a day with you in order to have you read it to me. Le Croisset is so near to Palaiseau! — and I am in a phase of tranquil activity, in which I should love to see your great river flow, and to keep dreaming in your orchard, tranquil itself, quite on top of the cliff. But I am joking, and you are working. You must forgive the abnormal intemperance of one who has just been seeing only stones and has not perceived even a pen for twelve days.

You are my first visit to the living on coming out from the complete entombment of my poor Moi. Live! There is my oremus and my benediction and I embrace you with all my heart.

G. Sand

XVII. TO GEORGE SAND

Croisset, 1866

I a mysterious being, dear master, nonsense! I think that I am sickeningly platitudinous, and I am sometimes exceedingly bored with the bourgeois which I have under my skin. Sainte-Beuve, between ourselves, does not know me at all, no matter what he says. I even swear to you (by the smile of your grandchild) that I know few men less vicious than I am. I have dreamed much and have done very little. What deceives the superficial observer is the lack of harmony between my sentiments and my ideas. If you want my confession, I shall make it freely to you. The sense of the grotesque has restrained me from an inclination towards a disorderly life. I maintain that cynicism borders on chastity. We shall have much to say about it to each other (if your heart prompts you) the first time we see each other.

Here is the program that I propose to you. My house will be full and uncomfortable for a month. But towards the end of October or the beginning of November (after Bouilhet's play) nothing will prevent you, I hope, from returning here with me, not for a day, as you say, but for a week at least. You shall have "your little table and everything necessary for writing." Is it agreed?

As for the fairy play, thanks for your kind offers of service. I shall get hold of the thing for you (it was done in collaboration with Bouilhet). But I think it is a trifle weak and I am torn between the desire of gaining a few piasters and the shame of showing such a piece of folly.

I think that you are a little severe towards Brittany, not towards the Bretons who seem to me repulsive animals. A propos of Celtic archaeology, I published in L'Artiste in 1858, a rather good hoax on the shaking stones, but I have not the number here and I don't remember the month.

I read, straight through, the 10 volumes of Histoire de ma vie, of which I knew about two thirds but only fragmentarily. What struck me most was the life in the convent. I have a quantity of observations to make to you which occurred to me.

XVIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 28 September, 1866

It is agreed, dear comrade and good friend. I shall do my best to be in Paris for the performance of your friend's play, and I shall do my fraternal duty there as usual; after which we shall go to your house and I shall stay there a week, but on condition that you will not put yourself out of your room. To be an inconvenience distresses me and I don't need so much bother in order to sleep. I sleep everywhere, in the ashes, or under a kitchen bench, like a stable dog. Everything shines with spotlessness at your house, so one is comfortable everywhere. I shall pick a quarrel with your mother and we shall laugh and joke, you and I, much and more yet. If it's good weather, I shall make you go out walking, if it rains continually, we shall roast our bones before the fire while telling our heart pangs. The great river will run black or grey under the window saying always, QUICK! QUICK! and carrying away our thoughts, and our days, and our nights, without stopping to notice such small things.

I have packed and sent by EXPRESS a good proof of Couture's picture, signed by the engraver, my poor friend, Manceau. It is the best that I have and I have only just found it. I have sent with it a photograph of a drawing by Marchal which was also like me; but one changes from year to year. Age gives unceasingly another character to the face of people who think and study, that is why their portraits do not look like one another nor like them for long. I dream so much and I live so little, that sometimes I am only three years old. But, the next day I am three hundred, if the dream has been sombre. Isn't it the same with you? Doesn't it seem at moments, that you are beginning life without even knowing what it is, and at other times don't you feel over you the weight of several thousand centuries, of which you have a vague remembrance and a sorrowful impression? Whence do we come and whither do we go? All is possible since all is unknown.

Embrace your beautiful, good mother for me. I shall give myself a treat, being with you two. Now try to find that hoax on the Celtic stones; that would interest me very much. When you saw them, had they opened the galgal of Lockmariaker and cleared away the ground near Plouharnel?

Those people used to write, because there are stones covered with hieroglyphics, and they used to work in gold very well, because very beautifully made torques [Footnote: Gallic necklaces.] have been found.

My children, who are, like myself, great admirers of you, send you their compliments, and I kiss your forehead, since Sainte-Beuve lied.

G. Sand

Have you any sun today? Here it is stifling. The country is lovely. When will you come here?

XIX. TO GEORGE SAND

Croisset, Saturday evening, ... 1866

Good, I have it, that beautiful, dear and famous face! I am going to have a large frame made and hang it on my wall, being able to say, as did M. de Talleyrand to Louis Philippe: "It is the greatest honor that my house has received"; a poor phrase, for we two are worth more than those two amiable men.

Of the two portraits, I like that of Couture's the better. As for Marchal's he saw in you only "the good woman," but I who am an old Romantic, find in the other, "the head of the author" who made me dream so much in my youth.

XX. TO GEORGE SAND

Croisset, Saturday evening, 1866

Your sending the package of the two portraits made me think that you were in Paris, dear master, and I wrote you a letter which is waiting for you at rue des Feuillantines.

I have not found my article on the dolmens. But I have my manuscript (entire) of my trip in Brittany among my "unpublished works." We shall have to gabble when you are here. Have courage.

I don't experience, as you do, this feeling of a life which is beginning, the stupefaction of a newly commenced existence. It seems to me, on the contrary, that I have always lived! And I possess memories which go back to the Pharaohs. I see myself very clearly at different ages of history, practising different professions and in many sorts of fortune. My present personality is the result of my lost personalities. I have been a boatman on the Nile, a leno in Rome at the time of the Punic wars, then a Greek rhetorician in Subura where I was devoured by insects. I died during the Crusade from having eaten too many grapes on the Syrian shores, I have been a pirate, monk, mountebank and coachman. Perhaps also even emperor of the East?

Many things would be explained if we could know our real genealogy. For, since the elements which make a man are limited, should not the same combinations reproduce themselves? Thus heredity is a just principle which has been badly applied.

There is something in that word as in many others. Each one takes it by one end and no one understands the other. The science of psychology will remain where it lies, that is to say in shadows and folly, as long as it has no exact nomenclature, so long as it is allowed to use the same expression to signify the most diverse ideas. When they confuse categories, adieu, morale!

Don't you really think that since '89 they wander from the point? Instead of continuing along the highroad which was broad and beautiful, like a triumphal way, they stray off by little sidepaths and flounder in mud holes. Perhaps it would be wise for a little while to return to Holbach. Before admiring Proudhon, supposing one knew Turgot? But le Chic, that modern religion, what would become of it!

Opinions chic (or chiques): namely being pro-Catholicism (without believing a word of it) being pro-Slavery, being pro-the House of Austria, wearing mourning for Queen Amelie, admiring Orphee aux Enfers, being occupied with Agricultural Fairs, talking Sport, acting indifferent, being a fool up to the point of regretting the treaties of 1815. That is all that is the very newest.

Oh! You think that because I pass my life trying to make harmonious phrases, in avoiding assonances, that I too have not my little judgments on the things of this world? Alas! Yes! and moreover I shall burst, enraged at not expressing them.

But a truce to joking, I should finally bore you.

The Bouilhet play will open the first part of November. Then in a month we shall see each other.

I embrace you very warmly, dear master.

XXI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset
Nohant, Monday evening, 1 October, 1866

Dear friend,

Your letter was forwarded to me from Paris. It isn't lost. I think too much of them to let any be lost. You don't speak to me of the floods, therefore I think that the Seine did not commit any follies at your place and that the tulip tree did not get its roots wet. I feared lest you were anxious and wondered if your bank was high enough to protect you.

Here we have nothing of that sort to be afraid of; our streams are very wicked, but we are far from them.

You are happy in having such clear memories of other existences. Much imagination and learning — those are your memories; but if one does not recall anything distinct, one has a very lively feeling of one's own renewal in eternity. I have a very amusing brother who often used to say "at the time when I was a dog. ..." He thought that he had become man very recently. I think that I was vegetable or mineral. I am not always very sure of completely existing, and sometimes I think I feel a great fatigue accumulated from having lived too much. Anyhow, I do not know, and I could not, like you, say, "I possess the past."

But then you believe that one does not really die, since one LIVES AGAIN? If you dare to say that to the Smart Set, you have courage and that is good. I have the courage which makes me pass for an imbecile, but I don't risk anything; I am imbecile under so many other counts.

I shall be enchanted to have your written impression of Brittany, I did not see enough to talk about. But I sought a general impression and that has served me for reconstructing one or two pictures which I need. I shall read you that also, but it is still an unformed mass.

Why did your trip remain unpublished? You are very coy. You don't find what you do worth being described. That is a mistake. All that issues from a master is instructive, and one should not fear to show one's sketches and drawings. They are still far above the reader, and so many things are brought down to his level that the poor devil remains common. One ought to love common people more than oneself, are they not the real unfortunates of the world? Isn't it the people without taste and without ideals who get bored, don't enjoy anything and are useless? One has to allow oneself to be abused, laughed at, and misunderstood by them, that is inevitable. But don't abandon them, and always throw them good bread, whether or not they prefer filth; when they are sated with dirt they will eat the bread; but if there is none, they will eat filth in secula seculorum.

I have heard you say, "I write for ten or twelve people only." One says in conversation, many things which are the result of the impression of the moment; but you are not alone in saying that. It was the opinion of the Lundi or the thesis of that day. I protested inwardly. The twelve persons for whom you write, who appreciate you, are as good as you are or surpass you. You never had any need of reading the eleven others to be yourself. But, one writes for all the world, for all who need to be initiated; when one is not understood, one is resigned and recommences. When one is understood, one rejoices and continues. There lies the whole secret of our persevering labors and of our love of art. What is art without the hearts and minds on which one pours it? A sun which would not project rays and would give life to no one.

After reflecting on it, isn't that your opinion? If you are convinced of that, you will never know disgust and lassitude, and if the present is sterile and ungrateful, if one loses all influence, all hold on the public, even in serving it to the best of one's ability, there yet remains recourse to the future, which supports courage and effaces all the wounds of pride. A hundred times in life, the good that one does seems not to serve any immediate use; but it keeps up just the same the tradition of wishing well and doing well, without which all would perish.

Is it only since '89 that people have been floundering? Didn't they have to flounder in order to arrive at '48 when they floundered much more, but so as to arrive at what should be? You must tell me how you mean that and I will read Turgot to please you. I don't promise to go as far as Holbach, ALTHOUGH HE HAS SOME GOOD POINTS, THE RUFFIAN!

Summon me at the time of Bouilhet's play. I shall be here, working hard, but ready to run, and loving you with all my heart. Now that I am no longer a woman, if the good God was just, I should become a man; I should have the physical strength and would say to you: "Come let's go to Carthage or elsewhere." But there, one who has neither sex nor strength, progresses towards childhood, and it is quite elsewhere that one is renewed; WHERE? I shall know that before you do, and, if I can, I shall come back in a dream to tell you.

XXII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 19 October

Dear friend, they write me from the Odeon that Bouilhet's play is on the 27th. I must be in Paris the 26th. Business calls me in any event. I shall dine at Magny's on that day, and the next, and the day after that. Now you know where to find me, for I think that you will come for the first performance. Yours always, with a full heart,

G. Sand

XXIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 23 October, 1866

Dear friend, since the play is on the 29th I shall give two more days to my children and I leave here the 28th. You have not told me if you will dine with me and your friend on the 29th informally, at Magny's at whatever hour you wish. Let me find a line at 97 rue des Feuillantines, on the 28th.

Then we shall go to your house, the day you wish. My chief talk with you will be to listen to you and to love you with all my heart. I shall bring what I have "ON THE STOCKS." That will GIVE ME COURAGE, as they say here, to read to you my EMBRYO. If I could only carry the sun from Nohant. It is glorious.

I embrace and bless you.

G. Sand

XXIV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, 10 November, 1866

On reaching Paris I learn sad news. Last evening, while we were talking — and I think that we spoke of him day before yesterday — my friend Charles Duveyrier died, a most tender heart and a most naive spirit. He is to be buried tomorrow. He was one year older than I am. My generation is passing bit by bit. Shall I survive it? I don't ardently desire to, above all on these days of mourning and farewell. It is as God wills, provided He lets me always love in this world and in the next.

I keep a lively affection for the dead. But one loves the living differently. I give you the part of my heart that he had. That joined to what you have already, makes a large share. It seems to me that it consoles me to make that gift to you. From a literary point of view he was not a man of the first rank, one loved him for his goodness and spontaneity. Less occupied with affairs and philosophy, he would have had a charming talent. He left a pretty play, Michel Perrin.

I travelled half the way alone, thinking of you and your mother at Croisset and looking at the Seine, which thanks to you has become a friendly GODDESS. After that I had the society of an individual with two women, as ordinary, all of them, as the music at the pantomime the other day. Example: "I looked, the sun left an impression like two points in my eyes." HUSBAND: "That is called luminous points," and so on for an hour without stopping.

I shall do all sorts of errands for the house, for I belong to it, do I not? I am going to sleep, quite worn out; I wept unrestrainedly all the evening, and I embrace you so much the more, dear friend. Love me MORE than before, because I am sad.

G. Sand

Have you a friend among the Rouen magistrates? If you have, write him a line to watch for the NAME Amedee Despruneaux. It is a civil case which will come up at Rouen in a few days. Tell him that this Despruneaux is the most honest man in the world; you can answer for him as for me. In doing this, if the thing is feasible, you will do me a personal favor. I will do the same for any friend of yours.

XXV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT 11 November, 1866

I send you my friend Despruneaux in person. If you know a judge or two, — or if your brother could give him a word of support, do arrange it, I kiss you three times on each eye.

G. Sand

Five minutes' interview and that's all the inconvenience. Paris, Sunday

XXVI. TO GEORGE SAND

Monday night

You are sad, poor friend and dear master; it was you of whom I thought on learning of Duveyrier's death. Since you loved him, I am sorry for you. That loss is added to others. How we keep these dead souls in our hearts. Each one of us carries within himself his necropolis.

I am entirely UNDONE since your departure; it seems to me as if I had not seen you for ten years. My one subject of conversation with my mother is you, everyone here loves you. Under what star were you born, pray, to unite in your person such diverse qualities, so numerous and so rare?

I don't know what sort of feeling I have for you, but I have a particular tenderness for you, and one I have never felt for anyone, up to now. We understood each other, didn't we, that was good.

I especially missed you last evening at ten o'clock. There was a fire at my wood-seller's. The sky was rose color and the Seine the color of gooseberry sirup. I worked at the engine for three hours and I came home as worn out as the Turk with the giraffe.

A newspaper in Rouen, le Nouvelliste, told of your visit to Rouen, so that Saturday after leaving you I met several bourgeois indignant at me for not exhibiting you. The best thing was said to me by a former sub-prefect: "Ah! if we had known that she was here ... we would have ... we would have ..." he hunted five minutes for the word; "we would have smiled for her." That would have been very little, would it not?

To "love you more" is hard for me — but I embrace you tenderly. Your letter of this morning, so melancholy, reached the BOTTOM of my heart. We separated at the moment when many things were on the point of coming to our lips. All the doors between us two are not yet open. You inspire me with a great respect and I do not dare to question you.

XXVII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset

Paris, 13 November, 1866 Night from Tuesday to Wednesday

I have not yet read my play. I have still something to do over. Nothing pressing. Bouilhet's play goes admirably well, and they told me that my little friend Cadol's [Footnote: Edward Cadol, a dramatic author and a friend of Maurice Sand.] play would come next. And, for nothing in the world, do I want to step on the body of that child. That puts me quite a distance off and does not annoy me — NOR INJURE ME AT ALL. What style! Luckily I am not writing for Buloz.

I saw your friend last evening in the foyer at the Odeon. I shook hands with him. He had a happy look. And then I talked with Duquesnel about the fairy play. He wants very much to know it. You have only to present yourself when ever you wish to busy yourself with it. You will be received with open arms.

Mario Proth will give me tomorrow or next day the exact date on the transformation of the journal. Tomorrow I shall go out and buy your dear mother's shoes. Next week I am going to Palaiseau and I shall hunt up my book on faience. If I forget anything, remind me of it.

I have been ill for two days. I am cured. Your letter does my heart good. I shall answer all the questions quite nicely, as you have answered mine. One is happy, don't you think so, to be able to relate one's whole life? It is much less complicated than the bourgeois think, and the mysteries that one can reveal to a friend are always the contrary of what indifferent ones suppose.

I was very happy that week with you: no care, a good nesting-place a lovely country, affectionate hearts and your beautiful and frank face which has a somewhat paternal air. Age has nothing to do with it. One feels in you the protection of infinite goodness, and one evening when you called your mother "MY DAUGHTER," two tears came in my eyes. It was hard to go away, but I hindered your work, and then, — and then, — a malady of my old age is, not being able to keep still. I am afraid of getting too attached and of wearying others. The old ought to be extremely discreet. From a distance I can tell you how much I love you without the fear of repetition. You are one of the RARE BEINGS remaining impressionable, sincere, loving art, not corrupted by ambition, not drunk with success. In short you will always be twenty-five years of age because of all sorts of ideas which have become old-fashioned according to the senile young men of today. With them, I think it is decidedly a pose, but it is so stupid! If it is a weakness, it is still worse. They are MEN OF LETTERS and not MEN. Good luck to the novel! It is exquisite; but oddly enough there is one entire side of you which does not betray itself in what you do, something that you probably are ignorant of. That will come later, I am sure of it.

I embrace you tenderly, and your mother too, and the charming niece! [Footnote: Madame Caroline Commanville.] Ah! I forgot, I saw Couture this evening; he told me that in order to be nice to you, he would make your portrait in crayon like mine for whatever price you wish to arrange. You see I am a good commissioner, use me.

XXVIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT 16 November, 1866

Thanks, dear friend of my heart, for all the trouble that I gave you with my Berrichon Despruneaux. They are friends from the old country, a whole adorable family of fine people, fathers, children, wives, nephews, all in the close circle at Nohant. He must have been MOVED at seeing you. He looked forward to it, all personal interest aside. And I who am not practical, forgot to tell you that the judgment would not be given for a fortnight. That in consequence any preceding within the next two weeks would be extremely useful. If he gains his suit relative to the constructions at Yport, he will settle there and I shall realize the plan formed long since of going every year to his house; he has a delicious wife and they have loved me a long time. You then are threatened with seeing me often scratching at your gate in passing, giving you a kiss on the forehead, crying courage for your labor and running on. I am still awaiting our information on the journal. It seems that it is a little difficult to be exact for '42. I have asked for the most scrupulous exactitude.

For two days I have been taking out to walk my Cascaret, [Footnote: Francis Laur.] the little engineer of whom I told you. He has become very good looking, the ladies lift their lorgnons at him, and it depends only on him to attain the dignity of a negro "giraffier," but he loves, he is engaged, he has four years to wait, to work to make himself a position, and he has made a vow. You would tell him that he is stupid, I preach to him, on the contrary, my old troubadour doctrine.

Morality aside, I don't think that the children of this day have sufficient force to manage at the same time, science and dissipation, cocottes and engagements. The proof is that nothing comes from young Bohemia any longer. Good night, friend, work well, sleep well. Walk a little for the love of God and of me. Tell your judges who promised me a smile, to smile on my Berrichon.

XXIX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT 16 November, 1866

Don't take any further steps. Contrary to all anticipations, Despruneaux has gained his suit during the session.

Whether you have done it or not, he is none the less grateful about it and charges me to thank you with all his good and honest heart.

Bouilhet goes from better to better. I have just seen the directors who are delighted.

I love you and embrace you.

Think sometimes of your old troubadour. Friday

XXX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT 18 November (?), 1866

I think that I shall give you pleasure and joy when I tell you that La Conjuración d'Ambroise, thus says my porter, is announced as a real money-maker. There was a line this evening as at Villemer, and Magny which is also a barometer, shows fair weather.

So be content, if that keeps up, Bouilhet is a success. Sunday

XXXI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Palaiseau, 22 November, 1866

I think that it will bring me luck to say good evening to my dear comrade before starting to work.

I am QUITE ALONE in my little house. The gardener and his family live in the pavilion in the garden and we are the last house at the end of the village, quite isolated in the country, which is a ravishing oasis. Fields, woods, apple trees as in Normandy; not a great river with its steam whistles and infernal chain; a little stream which runs silently under the willows; a silence ... ah! it seems to me that I am in the depths of the virgin forest: nothing speaks except the little jet of the spring which ceaselessly piles up diamonds in the moonlight. The flies sleeping in the corners of my room, awoken at the warmth of my fire. They had installed themselves there to die, they come near the lamp, they are seized with a mad gaiety, they buzz, they jump, they laugh, they even have faint inclinations towards love, but it is the hour of death and paf! in the midst of the dance, they fall stiff. It is over, farewell to dancing!

I am sad here just the same. This absolute solitude, which has always been vacation and recreation for me, is shared now by a dead soul [Footnote: Alexandre Manceau, the engraver, a friend of Maurice Sand.] who has ended here, like a lamp which is going out, yet which is here still. I do not consider him unhappy in the region where he is dwelling; but the image that he has left near me, which is nothing more than a reflection, seems to complain because of being unable to speak to me any more.

Never mind! Sadness is not unhealthy. It prevents us from drying up. And you dear friend, what are you doing at this hour? Grubbing also, alone also; for your mother must be in Rouen. Tonight must be beautiful down there too. Do you sometimes think of the “old troubadour of the Inn clock, who still sings and will continue to sing perfect love?” Well! yes, to be sure! You do not believe in chastity, sir, that’s your affair. But as for me, I say that SHE HAS SOME GOOD POINTS, THE JADE!

And with this, I embrace you with all my heart, and I am going to, if I can, make people talk who love each other in the old way.

You don’t have to write to me when you don’t feel like it. No real friendship without ABSOLUTE liberty.

In Paris next week, and then again to Palaiseau, and after that to Nohant. I saw Bouilhet at the Monday performance. I am CRAZY about it. But some of us will applaud at Magny’s. I had a cold sweat there, I who am so steady, and I saw everything quite blue.

XXXII. TO GEORGE SAND

Croisset, Tuesday

You are alone and sad down there, I am the same here.

Whence come these attacks of melancholy that overwhelm one at times? They rise like a tide, one feels drowned, one has to flee. I lie prostrate. I do nothing and the tide passes.

My novel is going very badly for the moment. That fact added to the deaths of which I have heard; of Cormenin (a friend of twenty-five years’ standing), of Gavarni, and then all the rest, but that will pass. You don’t know what it is to stay a whole day with your head in your hands trying to squeeze your unfortunate brain so as to find a word. Ideas come very easily with you, incessantly, like a stream. With me it is a tiny thread of water. Hard labor at art is necessary for me before obtaining a waterfall. Ah! I certainly know THE AGONIES OF STYLE.

In short I pass my life in wearing away my heart and brain, that is the real TRUTH about your friend.

You ask him if he sometimes thinks of his “old troubadour of the clock,” most certainly! and he mourns for him. Our nocturnal talks were very precious (there were moments when I restrained myself in order not to KISS you like a big child).

Your ears ought to have burned last night. I dined at my brother’s with all his family. There was hardly any conversation except about you, and every one sang your praises, unless perhaps myself, I slandered you as much as possible, dearly beloved master.

I have reread, a propos of your last letter (and by a very natural connection of ideas), that chapter of father Montaigne’s entitled “some lines from Virgil.” What he said of chastity is precisely what I believe. It is the effort that is fine and not the abstinence in itself. Otherwise shouldn’t one curse the flesh like the Catholics? God knows whither that would lead. Now at the risk of repetition and of being a Prudhomme, I insist that your young man is wrong. [Footnote: Refers to Francis Laur.] If he is temperate at twenty years old, he will be a cowardly roue at fifty. Everything has its compensations. The great natures which are good, are above everything generous and don’t begrudge the giving of themselves. One must laugh and weep, love, work, enjoy and suffer, in short vibrate as much as possible in all his being.

That is, I think, the real human existence.

XXXIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset

Palaiseau, 29 November, 1866

One need not be spiritualist nor materialist, you say, but one should be a naturalist. That is a great question.

My Cascaret, that is what I call the little engineer, will decide it as he thinks best. He is not stupid and he will have many ideas, deductions and emotions before realizing the prophecy that you make. I do not catechise him without reserve, for he is stronger than I am on many points, and it is not Catholic spiritualism that stifles him. But the question by itself is very serious, and hovers above our art, above us troubadours, more or less clock-bearing or clockshaped.

Treat it in an entirely impersonal way; for what is good for one might be quite the reverse for another. Let us ask ourselves in making an abstract of our tendencies or of our experiences, if the human being can receive and seek its own full physical development without intellectual suffering. Yes, in an ideal and rational society that would be so. But, in that in which we live and with which we must be content, do not enjoyment and excess go hand in hand, and can one separate them or limit them, unless one is a sage of the first class? And if one is a sage, farewell temptation which is the father of real joys.

The question for us artists, is to know if abstinence strengthens us or if it exalts us too much, which state would degenerate into weakness, — You will say, “There is time for everything and power enough for every dissipation of strength.” Then you make a distinction and you place limits, there is no way of doing otherwise. Nature, you think, places them herself and prevents us from abusing her. Ah! but no, she is not wiser than we who are also nature.

Our excesses of work, as our excesses of pleasure, kill us certainly, and the more we are great natures, the more we pass beyond bounds and extend the limits of our powers.

No, I have no theories. I spend my life in asking questions and in hearing them answered in one way or another without any victoriously conclusive reply ever being given me. I await the brilliance of a new state of my intellect and of my organs in a new life; for, in this one, whosoever reflects, embraces up to their last consequences, the limits of pro and con. It is Monsieur Plato, I think, who asked for and thought he held the bond. He had it no more than we. However, this bond exists, since the universe subsists without the pro and con, which constitute it, reciprocally destroying each other. What shall one call it in material nature? EQUILIBRIUM, that will do, and for spiritual nature? MODERATION, relative chastity, abstinence from excess, whatever you want, but that is translated by EQUILIBRIUM; am I wrong, my master?

Consider it, for in our novels, what our characters do or do not do, rests only on that. Will they or will they not possess the object of their ardent desires? Whether it is love or glory, fortune or pleasure, ever since they existed, they have aspired to one end. If we have a philosophy in us, they walk right according to us; if we have not, they walk by chance, and are too much dominated by the events which we put in the way of their legs. Imbued by our own ideas and ruled by fatality, they do not always appear logical. Should we put much or little of ourselves in them? Shouldn't we put what society puts in each one of us?

For my part, I follow my old inclination, I put myself in the skin of my good people. People scold me for it, that makes no difference. You, I don't really know if by method or by instinct, take another course. What you do, you succeed in; that is why I ask you if we differ on the question of internal struggles, if the hero ought to have any or if he ought not to know them.

You always astonish me with your painstaking work; is it a coquetry? It does not seem labored. What I find difficult is to choose out of the thousand combinations of scenic action which can vary infinitely, the clear and striking situation which is not brutal nor forced. As for style, I attach less importance to it than you do.

The wind plays my old harp as it lists. It has its HIGH NOTES, its LOW NOTES, its heavy notes — and its faltering notes, in the end it is all the same to me provided the emotion comes, but I can find nothing in myself. It is THE OTHER who sings as he likes, well or ill, and when I try to think about it, I am afraid and tell myself that I am nothing, nothing at all. But a great wisdom saves us; we know how to say to ourselves, "Well, even if we are absolutely nothing but instruments, it is still a charming state and like no other, this feeling oneself vibrate."

Now, let the wind blow a little over your strings. I think that you take more trouble than you need, and that you ought to let THE OTHER do it oftener. That would go just as well and with less fatigue.

The instrument might sound weak at certain moments, but the breeze in continuing would increase its strength. You would do afterwards what I don't do, what I should do. You would raise the tone of the whole picture and would cut out what is too uniformly in the light.

Vale et me ama.

XXXIV. TO GEORGE SAND

Saturday morning

Don't bother yourself about the information relative to the journals. That will occupy little space in my book and I have time to wait. But when you have nothing else to do, jot down on paper whatever you can recall of '48. Then you can develop it in talking. I don't ask you for copy of course, but to collect a little of your personal memories.

Do you know an actress at the Odeon who plays Macduff in Macbeth? Dugueret? She would like to have the role of Nathalie in Mont-reveche. She will be recommended to you by Girardin, Dumas and me. I saw her yesterday in Faustine, in which she showed talent. My opinion is that she has intelligence and that one could profit by her.

If your little engineer has made a VOW, and if that vow does not cost him anything, he is right to keep it; if not, it is pure folly, between you and me. Where should liberty exist if not in passion?

Well! no, IN MY DAY we didn't take such vows and we loved! and swaggeringly. But all participated in a great eclecticism and when one strayed FROM LADIES it was from pride, in defiance of one's self, and for effect. In short, we were Red Romantics, perfectly ridiculous to be sure, but in full bloom. The little good which remains to me comes from that epoch.

XXXV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Palaiseau, 30 November, 1866

There would be a good deal to say on all that, my comrade. My Cascaret, that is to say, the fiance in question, keeps himself for his fiancee. She said to him, "Let us wait till you have accomplished certain definite work," and he works. She said to him, "Let us keep ourselves pure for each other," and he keeps himself pure. It is not that he is choked by Catholic spiritualism; but he has a high ideal of love, and why counsel him to go and lose it when his conscience and his honor depend on keeping it?

There is an equilibrium which Nature, our ruler, herself puts in our instincts, and she sets the limit to our appetites. Great natures are not the most robust. We are not developed in all our senses by a very logical education. We are compressed in every way, and we thrust out our roots and branches when and how we can. Great artists are often weak also, and many are impotent. Some too strong in desire are quickly exhausted. In general I think that we have too intense joys and sorrows, we who work with our brains. The laborer who works his land and his wife hard by day and night is not a forceful nature. His brain is very feeble. You say to develop one's self in every direction? Come, not all at the same time, not without rest.

Those who brag of that, are bluffing a bit, or IF THEY DO everything, do everything ill. If love for them is a little bread- and- butter and art a little pot-boiler, all right; but if their pleasure is great, verging on the infinite, and their work eager, verging on enthusiasm, they do not alternate these as in sleeping and waking.

As for me, I don't believe in these Don Juans who are Byrons at the same time. Don Juan did not make poems and Byron made, so they say, very poor love. He must have had sometimes — one can count such emotions in one's life — a complete ecstasy of heart, mind and senses. He knew enough about them to be one of the poets of love. Nothing else is necessary for the instrument of our vibration. The continual wind of little appetites breaks them.

Try some day to write a novel in which the artist (the real artist) is the hero, you will see what great, but delicate and restrained, vigor is in it, how he will see everything with an attentive eye, curious and tranquil, and how his infatuations with the things he examines and delves into, will be rare and serious. You will see also how he fears himself, how he knows that he can not surrender himself without exhaustion, and how a profound modesty in regard to the treasures of his soul prevents him from scattering and wasting them.

The artist is such a fine type to do, that I have never dared really to do him. I do not consider myself worthy to touch that beautiful and very complicated figure; that is aiming too high for a mere woman. But if it could certainly tempt you some day, it would be worth while.

Where is the model? I don't know, I have never REALLY known any one who did not show some spot in the sunlight, I mean some side where the artist verged on the Philistine. Perhaps you have not that spot; you ought to paint yourself. As for me I have it. I love classifications, I verge on the pedagogue. I love to sew and to care for children, I verge on the servant. I am easily distracted and verge on the idiot. And then I should not like perfection; I feel it but I shouldn't know how to show it.

But one could give him some faults in his nature. What ones? We shall hunt for them some day. That is not really what you are working on now and I ought not to distract you from it.

Be less cruel to yourself. Go ahead and when the afflatus shall have produced everything you must elevate the general tone and cut out what ought not to come down front stage. Can't that be done? It seems to me that it can. What you do appears so easy, so abundant! It is a perpetual overflow, I do not understand your anguish. Good night, dear brother, my love to all yours. I have returned to my solitude at Palaiseau, I love it. I leave it for Paris, Monday. I embrace you warmly. Good luck to your work.

G. Sand

XXXVI. Monsieur Gustave Flobert at Croisset, Rouen [The postage stamp bears the mark, Paris, 4, December, 1866]

Sir the noise that you make in literature by your distinguished talent I also made in my day in the manner that my means permitted me I began in 1804 under the auspices of the celebrated Madame Saqui and bore off palms and left memories in the annals of the tight-rope and coregrafie balancer in all countries where I have been there appreciated by generals and other officers of the Empire by whom I have been solicited up to an advanced age so that wives of prefects and ministers could not have been complimented about it I have read your distinguished works notably Madame Bovarie of which I think I am capable of being a model to you when she breaks the chains of her feet to go where her heart calls her. I am well preserved for my advanced age and if you have a repugnance for an artist in misfortune, I should be content with your ideal sentiments. You can then count on my heart not being able to dispose of my person being married to a man of light character who squandered my wax cabinet wherein were all figures of celebrities, kings, emperors, ancient and modern and celebrated crimes, which if I had had your permission about it you would have been placed in the number I had then a place in the railroad substation to have charge of the cabinets which the jealousy of my rival made me lose, it is in these sentiments that I write you if you deign to write the history of my unhappy life you alone would be worthy of it and would see in it things of which you would be worthy of appreciating I shall present myself at your house in Rouen whose address I had from M. Bouilhet who knows me well having come to see me in his youth he will tell you that I have the phthisic still agreeably and always faithful to all who knew me whether in the civil or in the military and in these sentiments for life your affectionate

XXXVII. TO GEORGE SAND

Wednesday night, 5th December, 1866

Oh! how lovely the letter of Marengo the Swallow is! Seriously, I think it a masterpiece, not a word which is not a word of genius. I have laughed aloud many times. I thank you very dear master, you are as good as can be.

You never tell me what you are doing. How far has the play gone?

I am not at all surprised that you don't understand my literary agonies. I don't understand them myself. But they exist nevertheless, and violent ones.

I don't in the least know how to set to work to write, and I begin by expressing only the hundredth part of my ideas after infinite gropings. Not one who seizes the first impulse, your friend, no! not at all! Thus for entire days I have polished and re-polished a paragraph without accomplishing anything. I feel like weeping at times. You ought to pity me!

As for our subject under discussion (a propos of your young man), what you write me in your last letter is so my way of thinking, that I have not only practised it but preached it. Ask Theo. However, let us understand one another. Artists (who are priests) risk nothing in being chaste; on the contrary. But the bourgeois, what is the use in it for them? Of course there must be certain ones among humanity who stick to chastity. Happy indeed those who don't depart from it.

I don't agree with you that there is anything worth while to be done with the character of the IDEAL ARTIST; he would be a monster. Art is not made to paint the exceptions, and I feel an unconquerable repugnance to putting on paper something from out of my heart. I even think that a novelist HASN'T THE RIGHT TO EXPRESS HIS OPINION on any subject whatsoever. Has the good God ever uttered it, his opinion? That is why there are not a few things that choke me which I should like to spit out, but which I swallow. Why say them, in fact! The first comer is more interesting than Monsieur Gustave Flaubert, because he is more GENERAL and therefore more typical.

Nevertheless, there are days when I consider myself below imbecility. I have still a globe of goldfish and that amuses me. They keep me company while I dine. Is it stupid to be interested in such simple things? Adieu, it is late, I have an aching head.

I embrace you.

XXXVIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Paris December, 1866

“Not put one’s heart into what one writes?” I don’t understand at all, oh! not at all! As for me, I think that one can not put anything else into it. Can one separate one’s mind from one’s heart? Is it something different? Can sensation itself limit itself? Can existence divide itself? In short, not to give oneself entirely to one’s work, seems to me as impossible as to weep with something else than one’s eyes, and to think with something else than one’s brain.

What was it you meant? You must tell me when you have the time.

XXXIX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, 8 December, 1866

You ask me what I am doing? Your old troubadour is content this evening. He has passed the night in re-doing a second act which did not go properly and which has turned out well, so well that my directors are delighted, and I have good hopes of making the end effective — it does not please me yet, but one must pull it through. In short, I have nothing to tell you about myself which is very interesting. When one has the patience of an ox and the wrist broken from crushing stones well or badly, one has scarcely any unexpected events or emotions to recount. My poor Manceau called me the ROAD-MENDER, and there is nothing less poetic than those beings.

And you, dear friend, are you experiencing the anguish and labors of childbirth? That is splendid and youthful. Those who want them don’t always get them!

When my daughter-in-law brings into the world dear little children, I abandon myself to such labor in holding her in my arms that it reacts on me, and when the infant arrives, I am sicker than she is, and even seriously so. I think that your pains now react on me, and I have a headache on account of them. But alas! I cannot assist at any birth and I almost regret the time when one believed it hastened deliverances to burn candles before an image.

I see that that rascal Bouilhet has betrayed me; he promised me to copy the Marengo letter in a feigned hand to see if you would be taken in by it. People have written to me seriously things like that. How good and kind your great friend is. He is adored at the Odeon, and this evening they told me that his play was going better and better. I went to hear it again two or three days ago and I was even more delighted with it than the first time.

Well, well, let's keep up our heart, whatever happens, and when you go to rest remember that someone loves you. Affectionate regards to your mother, brother and niece.

XL. TO GEORGE SAND

Croisset, Saturday night

I have seen Citizen Bouilhet, who had a real ovation in his own country. His compatriots who had absolutely ignored him up to then, from the moment that Paris applauded him, screamed with enthusiasm.- He will return here Saturday next, for a banquet that they are giving him, — 80 covers, at least.

As for Marengo the Swallow, he kept your secret so well, that he read the letter in question with an astonishment which duped me.

Poor Marengo! she is a figure! and one that you ought to put in a book. I wonder what her memoirs would be, written in that style? — Mine (my style) continues to give me no small annoyance. I hope, however, in a month, to have crossed the most barren tract. But at the moment I am lost in a desert; well, by the grace of God, so much the worse for me! How gladly I shall abandon this sort of thing, never to return to it to my dying day! Depicting the modern French bourgeois is a stench in my nostrils! And then won't it be time perhaps to enjoy oneself a bit in life, and to choose subjects pleasant to the author?

I expressed myself badly when I said to you that "one should not write from the heart." I meant to say: not put one's personality into the picture. I think that great art is scientific and impersonal. One should, by an effort of mind, put oneself into one's characters and not create them after oneself. That is the method at least; a method which amounts to this: try to have a great deal of talent and even of genius if you can. How vain are all the poetic theories and criticisms! — and the nerve of the gentlemen who compose them sickens me. Oh! nothing restrains them, those boneheads!

Have you noticed that there is sometimes in the air a current of common ideas? For instance, I have just read my friend Du Camp's new novel: Forces Perdues. It is very like what I am doing, in many ways. His book is very naive and gives an accurate idea of the men of our generation having become real fossils to the young men of today. The reaction of '48 opened a deep chasm between the two Frances.

Bouilhet told me that you had been seriously ill at one of the recent Magny's, although you do pretend to be a "woman of wood." Oh! no you are not of wood, dear good great heart! "Beloved old troubadour," would it not perhaps be opportune to rehabilitate him at the Theatre Almanzor? I can see him with his toque and his guitar and his apricot tunic howling at the black-gowned students from the top of a rock. The talk would be fine. Now, good night; I kiss you on both cheeks tenderly.

XLI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, 7 December, 1866

Something like a week ago someone came to my house in the morning to ask me the address of the bootmaker, my maid did not want to awaken me, and it was not until noon that I read the letter; the bearer said he came from the Hotel Helder on the rue Helder. I answered at once that Simonin lived at 15 rue Richelieu, I wrote to your mother thinking that it was she who wrote to me. I see that she did not receive my note and I don't understand about it, but it is not my fault.

Your old Troubadour is sick as a dog again today, but it will not prevent him from going to Magny's this evening. He could not die in better company; although he would prefer the edge of a ditch in the spring.

Everything else goes well and I leave for Nohant on Saturday. I am trying hard to push the entomological work which Maurice is publishing. It is very fine.

I am doing for him what I have never done for myself. I am writing to the newspaper men.

I shall recommend Mademoiselle Bosquet to whom I can, but that appeals to another public, and I don't stand in as well with the literary men as I do with the scholars. But certainly Marengo the Swallow MUST BE DONE and the apricot troubadour also. All that was of the Cadios of the revolution who began to be or who wanted to be something, no matter what. I am of the last comers and you others born of us, you are between the illusions of my time and the crude deception of the new times. It is quite natural that Du Camp should go parallel with you in a series of observations and ideas, that does not mean anything. There will be no resemblance.

Oh no! I have not found a title for you, it is too serious, and then I should need to know everything. In any case I am no good today to do anything except to draw up my epitaph. Et in Arcadia ego, you know, I love you, dear friend brother, and bless you with all my heart.

XLII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croissset

Paris, 9 January, 1867

Dear comrade,

Your old troubadour has been tempted to bite the dust. He is still in Paris. He should have left the 25th of December; his trunk was strapped; your first letter was awaiting him every day at Nohant. At last he is all ready to leave and he goes tomorrow with his son Alexandre [Footnote: Alexandre Dumas fils.] who is anxious to accompany him.

It is stupid to be laid on one's back and to lose consciousness for three days and to get up as enfeebled as if one had done something painful and useful. It was nothing after all, except temporary impossibility of digesting anything whatever. Cold, or weakness, or work, I don't know. I don't think of it any longer. Sainte-Beuve is much more disquieting, somebody have written you about it. He is better also, but there will be serious trouble, and on account of that, accidents to look out for. I am very saddened and anxious about it.

I have not worked for two weeks; so my task has not progressed very much, and as I don't know if I am going to be in shape very soon, I have given the Odeon A VACATION. They will take me when I am ready. I think of going a little to the south when I have seen my children. The plants of the coast are running through my head. I am prodigiously uninterested in anything which is not my little ideal of peaceful work, country life, and of tender and pure friendship. I really think that I am not going to live a long time, although I am quite cured and well. I get this warning from the great calm, CONTINUALLY CALMER, which exists in my formerly agitated soul. My brain only works from synthesis to analysis, and formerly it was the contrary. Now, what presents itself to my eyes when I awaken is the planet; I have considerable trouble in finding again there the MOI which interested me formerly, and which I begin to' call YOU in the plural. It is charming, the planet, very interesting, very curious but rather backward, and as yet somewhat unpractical; I hope to pass into an oasis with better highways and possible to all. One needs so much money and resources in order to travel here! and the time lost in order to procure these necessities is lost to study and to contemplation. It seems to me that there is due me something less complicated, less civilized, more naturally luxurious, and more easily good than this feverish halting-place. Will you come into the land, of my dreams, if I succeed in finding the road? Ah! who can know?

And the novel, is it getting on? Your courage has not declined? Solitude does not weigh on you? I really think that it is not absolute, and that somewhere there is a sweetheart who comes and goes, or who lives near there. But there is something of the anchorite in your life just the same, and if envy your situation. As for me, I am too alone at Palaiseau, with a dead soul; not alone enough at Nohant, with the children whom I love too much to belong to myself, — and at Paris, one does not know what one is, one forgets oneself entirely for a thousand things which are not worth any more than oneself. I embrace you with all my heart, dear friend; remember me to your mother, to your dear family, and write me at Nohant, that will do me good.

The cheeses? I don't know at all, it seems to me that they spoke to me of them, but I don't remember at all. I will tell you that from down there.

XLIII. TO GEORGE SAND

Croisset, Saturday night

No, dear master, you are not near your end. So much the worse for you perhaps. But you will live to be old, very old, as giants live, since you are of that race: only you MUST rest. One thing astonishes me and that is that you have not died twenty times over, having thought so much, written so much and suffered so much. Do go then, since you have the desire, to the Mediterranean. Its azure sky quiets and invigorates. There are the Countries of Youth, such as the Bay of Naples. Do they make one sadder sometimes? I do not know.

Life is not easy! What a complicated and extravagant affair! I know something about that. One must have money for everything! So that with a modest revenue and an unproductive profession one has to make up one's mind to have but little. So I do! The habit is formed, but the days that work does not go well are not amusing. Yes indeed! I would love to follow you into another planet. And a propos of money, it is that which will make our planet uninhabitable in the near future, for it will be impossible to live here, even for the rich, without looking after one's property; one will have to spend several hours a day fussing over one's INCOME. Charming! I continue to fuss over my novel, and I shall go to Paris when I reach the end of my chapter, towards the middle of next month.

And whatever you suspect, no "lovely lady" comes to see me. Lovely ladies have occupied my mind a good deal, but have taken up very little of my time. Applying the term anchorite to me is perhaps a juster comparison than you think.

I pass entire weeks without exchanging a word with a human being, and at the end of the week it is not possible for me to recall a single day nor any event whatsoever. I see my mother and my niece on Sundays, and that is all. My only company consists of a band of rats in the garret, which make an infernal racket above my head, when the water does not roar or the wind blow. The nights are black as ink, and a silence surrounds me comparable to that of the desert. Sensitiveness is increased immeasurably in such a setting. I have palpitations of the heart for nothing.

All that results from our charming profession. That is what it means to torment the soul and the body. But perhaps this torment is our proper lot here below?

I told you, didn't I, that I had reread Consuelo and the Comtesse de Rudolstadt; it took me four days. We must discuss them at length, when you are willing. Why am I in love with Siverain? Perhaps because I am of both sexes.

XLIV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT at Croissset Nohant, 15 January, 1867

Here I am at home, fairly strong except for several hours during the evening. Yet, THAT WILL PASS. THE EVIL OR HE WHO ENDURES IT, my old cure used to say, CAN NOT LAST. I received your letter this morning, dear friend of my heart. Why do I love you more than most of the others, even more than old and well-tried friends? I am asking, for my condition at this hour, is that of being

THOU WHO GOEST SEEKING, AT SUNSET, FORTUNE! ...

Yes, intellectual fortune, LIGHT! Oh well, here it is: one gets, being old, at the sunset of life, — which is the most beautiful hour of tones and reflections, — a new idea of everything and of affection above all.

In the age of power and of personality, one tests one's friends as one tests the earth, from the point of view of reciprocity. One feels oneself solid, one wants to find that which bears one or leads one, solid. But, when one feels the intensity of the moi fleeing, one loves persons and things for what they are in themselves, for what they represent in the eyes of one's soul, and not at all for what they add further to one's destiny. It is like the picture or the statue which one would like to own, when one dreams at the same time of a beautiful house of one's own in which to put it.

But one has passed through green Bohemia without gathering anything there; one has remained poor, sentimental and troubadourish. One knows very well that it will always be the same, and that one will die without a hearth or a home. Then one thinks of the statue, of the picture which one would not know what to do with and which one would not know where to place with due honor, if one owned it. One is content to know that they are in some temple not profaned by cold analysis, a little far from the eye, and one loves them so much the more. One says: I will go again to the country where they are. I shall see again and I shall love always that which has made me love and understand them. The contact of my personality will not have changed them, it will not be myself that I shall love in them.

And it is thus, truly, that the ideal which one does not dream of grasping, fixes itself in one because it remains ITSELF. That is all the secret of the beautiful, of the only truth, of love, friendship, of art, of enthusiasm, and of faith. Consider it, you will see.

That solitude in which you live would be delicious to me in fine weather. In winter I find it stoical, and am forced to recall to myself that you have not the moral need of locomotion AS A HABIT. I used to think that was another expenditure of strength during this season of being shut in; — well, it is very fine, but it must not continue indefinitely; if the novel has to last longer, you must interrupt it, or vary it with distractions. Really, my dear friend, think of the life of the body, which gets upset and nervous when you subdue it too much. When I was ill in Paris, I saw a physician, very mad, but very intelligent, who said very true things on that subject. He said that I SPIRITUALIZED myself in a disquieting manner, and when I told him, exactly, a propos of you, that one could abstract oneself from everything except work, and have more rather than less strength, he answered that the danger was as great in accumulating as in losing, and a propos of this, many excellent things which I wish I could repeat to you.

Besides, you know them, but you never pay any attention to them. Then this work which you abuse so in words, is a passion, and a great one! Now, I shall tell you what you tell me. For our sake and for the sake of your old troubadour, do SPARE yourself a little.

Consuelo, La Comtesse de Rudolstadt, what are they? Are they mine? I don't recall a single word in them. You are reading that, you? Are you really amused? Then I shall read them one of these days and I shall love myself if you love me.

What is being hysterical? I have perhaps been that also, I am perhaps; but I don't know anything about it, never having profoundly studied the thing, and having heard of it without having studied it. Isn't it an uneasiness, an anguish caused by the desire of an impossible SOMETHING OR OTHER? In that case, we are all attacked by it, by this strange illness, when we have imagination; and why should such a malady have a sex?

And still further, there is this for those strong in anatomy: THERE IS ONLY ONE SEX. A man and a woman are so entirely the same thing, that one hardly understands the mass of distinctions and of subtle reasons with which society is nourished concerning this subject. I have observed the infancy and the development of my son and my daughter. My son was myself, therefore much more woman, than my daughter, who was an imperfect man.

I embrace you. Maurice and Lina who have tasted your cheese, send you their regards, and Mademoiselle Aurore cries to you, WAIT, WAIT, WAIT! That is all that she knows how to say while laughing like a crazy person; for, at heart she is serious, attentive, clever with her hands as a monkey and amusing herself better with games she invents, than with those one suggests to her. I think that she will have a mind of her own.

If I do not get cured here, I shall go to Cannes, where some friends are urging me to come. But I can not yet mention it to my children. When I am with them it is not easy to move. There is passion and jealousy. And all my life has been like that, never my own! Pity yourself then, you who belong to yourself!

XLV. TO GEORGE SAND

Wednesday evening

I have followed your counsel, dear master, I have EXERCISED!!! Am I not splendid; eh?

Sunday night, at eleven o'clock, there was such lovely moonlight along the river and on the snow that I was taken with an itch for movement, and I walked for two hours and a half imagining all sorts of things, pretending that I was travelling in Russia or in Norway. When the tide came in and cracked the cakes of ice in the Seine and the thin ice which covered the stream, it was, without any exaggeration, superb. Then I thought of you and I missed you.

I don't like to eat alone. I have to associate the idea with someone with the things that please me. But this someone is rare. I too wonder why I love you. Is it because you are a great man or a charming being? I don't know. What is certain is that I experience a PARTICULAR sentiment for you and I cannot define it.

And a propos of this, do you think (you who are a master of psychology), that one can love two people in the same way and that one can experience two identical sensations about them? I don't think so, since our individuality changes at every moment of its existence.

You write me lovely things about "disinterested affection." That is true, so is the opposite! We make God always in our own image. At the bottom of all our loves and all our admirations we find ourselves again: ourselves or something approaching us. What is the difference if the OURSELVES is good!

My moi bores me for the moment. How this fool weighs on my shoulders at times! He writes too slowly and is not bluffing at all when he complains of his work. What a task! and what a devil of an idea to have sought such a subject! You should give me a recipe for going faster: and you complain of seeking a fortune! You! I have received a little note from Saint-Beuve which reassures about his health, but it is sad. He seemed to me depressed at not being able to haunt the dells of Cyprus. He is within the truth, or at least within his own truth, which amounts to the same thing. I shall be like him perhaps, when I am his age. However, I think not. Not having had the same youth, my old age will be different.

That reminds me that I once dreamed a book on Saint Perrine. Champfleury treated that subject badly. For I don't see that he is comic: I should have made him atrocious and lamentable. I think that the heart does not grow old; there are even people whose hearts grow bigger with age. I was much drier and more bitter twenty years ago than now. I am feminized and softened by wear, as others get harder, and that makes me INDIGNANT. I feel that I am becoming a COW, it takes nothing to move me; everything troubles and agitates me, everything is to me as the north wind is to the reed.

A word from you, which I remembered, has made me reread now the Fair Maid of Perth. It is a good story, whatever one says about it. That fellow decidedly had an imagination.

Well, adieu. Think of me. I send you my best love.

XLVI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset Nohant, 1867

Bah! zut! troulala! Well! well! I am not sick any more, or at least I am only half sick. The air of the country restores me, or patience, or THE OTHER person, the one who wants to work again and to produce. What is my illness? Nothing. Everything is all right, but I have something that they call anemia, an effect without a tangible cause, a breakdown which has been threatening for several years, and which became noticeable at Palaiseau, after my return from Croisset. An emaciation that is too rapid to be within reason, a pulse too slow, too feeble, an indolent or capricious stomach, with a sensation of stifling and a fondness for inertia. I was not able to keep a glass of water on my poor stomach for several days, and that brought me so low that I thought I was hardly curable; but, all is getting on, and I have even been working since yesterday.

You, dear, you go walking in the night, in the snow. That is something which for an exceptional excursion, is rather foolish and might indeed make you ill also. Good Heavens! It is not the moon, it is the sun that I advise; we are not owls, OBVIOUSLY! We have just had three spring days. I wager that you have not climbed up to my dear orchard which is so pretty and which I love so much. If it was only in remembrance of me, you ought to climb up every fine day at noon. Your work would flow more abundantly afterward and you would regain the time you lost and more too.

Then you are worrying about money? I don't know what that is, since I have not a sou in the world. I live by my day, work as does the proletarian; when I can no longer do my day's work, I shall be packed up for the other world, and then I shall have no more need of anything. But you must live. How can you live by your pen if you always let yourself be duped and shorn? It is not I who can teach you how to protect yourself But haven't you a friend who knows how to act for you? Alas, yes, the world is going to the devil in that respect; and I was talking of you, the other day, to a very dear friend, while I was showing him the artist, a personage become so rare, and cursing the necessity of thinking of the material side of life. I send you the last page of his letter; you will see that you have in him a friend whom you did not suspect, and whose name will surprise you.

No, I shall not go to Cannes, in spite of a strong temptation! Imagine, I received a little box filled with flowers gathered out- doors, five or six days ago; for the package followed me to Paris and to Palaiseau. Those flowers are adorably fresh, they smell sweetly, they are as pretty as anything. — Ah! to go, go at once to the country of the sun. But I have no money, and besides I have no time. My illness has delayed me and put me off. Let us stay here. Am I not well? If I can't go to Paris next month, won't you come to see me here? Certainly, it is an eight hours' journey. You can not see this ancient nook. You owe me a week, or I shall believe that I love a big ingrate who does not pay me back.

Poor Sainte-Beuve! More unhappy than we, he who has never had any great disappointments and who has no longer any material worries. He bewails what is the least regrettable and the least serious in life understood as he understood it! And then very proud, having been a Jansenist, his heart has cooled in that direction. Perhaps the intelligence was developed, but that does not suffice to make us live, and does not teach us how to die. Barbes, who has expected for a long time that a stroke would carry him off, is gentle and smiling. It does not seem to him, and it does not seem to his friends, that death will separate him from us. He who quite goes away, is he who believes he ends and does not extend a hand so that anyone can follow him or rejoin him.

And good-night, dear friend of my heart. They are ringing for the performance. Maurice regales us this evening with marionettes. They are very amusing, and the theatre is so pretty! A real artist's jewel. Why aren't you here? It is horrid not to live next door to those one loves.

XLVII. TO GEORGE SAND

Wednesday

I received yesterday your son's book. I shall start it when I have gotten rid of less amusing readings, probably. Meanwhile, don't thank him any the less, dear master.

First, let's talk of you; "arsenic." I am sure of it! You must drink iron, walk, and sleep, and go to the south, no matter what it costs, there! Otherwise the WOODEN WOMAN will break down. As for money, we shall find it; and as for the time, take it. You won't do anything that I advise, of course. Oh! well, you are wrong, and you hurt me.

No, I have not what you call worries about money; my revenues are very small, but they are sure. Only, as it is your friend's habit to anticipate them he finds himself short at times, and he grumbles "in the silence of his closet," but not elsewhere. Unless I have extraordinary reverses, I shall have enough to feed me and warm me until the end of my days. My heirs are or will be rich (for it is I who am the poor one of the family). Then, zut!

As for gaining money by my pen, that is an aspiration that I have never had, recognizing that I was radically incapable of it.

I have to live as a small retired countryman, which is not very amusing. But so many others who are worth more than I am not having the land, it would be unfair for me to complain. Accusing Providence is, moreover a mania so common, that one ought to refrain from it through simple good taste.

Another word about money and one that shall be quite between ourselves. I can, without being inconvenienced at all, as soon as I am in Paris, that is to say from the 20th to the 23rd of the present month, lend you a thousand francs, if you need them in order to go to Cannes. I make you this proposition bluntly, as I would to Bouilhet, or any other intimate friend. Come, don't stand on ceremony!

Between people in society, that would not be correct, I know that, but between troubadours many things are allowable.

You are very kind with your invitation to go to Nohant. I shall go, for I want very much to see your house. I am annoyed not to know it when I think of you. But I shall have to put off that pleasure till next summer. Now I have to stay some time in Paris. Three months are not too long for all I want to do there.

I send you back the page from the letter of your friend Barbès, whose real biography I know very imperfectly. All I know of him is that he is honest and heroic. Give him a hand-shake for me, to thank him for his sympathy. Is he, BETWEEN OURSELVES, as intelligent as he is good?

I feel the importance now, of getting men of that class to be rather frank with me. For I am going to start studying the Revolution of '48. You have promised me to hunt in your library at Nohant for (1) an article of yours on faience; (2) a novel by father X — -, a Jesuit, on the Holy Virgin.

But what sternness for the father Beuve who is neither Jesuit nor virgin! He regrets, you say, "what is the least regrettable, understood as he understood it." Why so? Everything depends upon the intensity that one puts on the thing.

Men always find that the most serious thing of their existence is enjoyment.

Woman for us all is the highest point of the infinite. That is not noble, but that is the real depth of the male. They exaggerate that unmercifully, God be thanked, for literature and for individual happiness also.

Oh! I have missed you so much. The tides are superb, the wind groans, the river foams and overflows. It blows from the ocean, which benefits one.

XLVIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Paris

Nohant, 8 February, 1867

No, I am not Catholic, but I reject monstrosities. I say that the hideous old man who buys young girls does not make love and that there is in it neither death nor birth, nor infinity, nor male nor female. It is a thing against nature; for it is not desire that drives the young girl into the arms of the ugly old man, and where there is not liberty nor reciprocity there is an attack against holy nature. Therefore that which he regrets is not regrettable, unless he thinks that his little cocottes will regret his person, and I ask you if they will regret anything else than their dirty wages? That was the gangrene in this great and admirable mind, so lucid and so wise on all other subjects. One pardons everything in those one loves, when one is obliged to defend them from their enemies. But what we say between ourselves is buried, and I can tell you that vice has quite spoiled my old friend.

We must believe that we love one another a great deal, dear comrade, for we both had the same thought at the same time. You offer me a thousand francs with which to go to Cannes; you who are as hard up as I am, and, when you wrote to me that you WERE BOTHERED about money matters, I opened my letter again, to offer you half of what I have, which still amounts to about two thousand francs; it is my reserve. And then I did not dare. Why? It is quite stupid; you were better than I, you came straight to the point. Well, I thank you for that kind thought and I do not accept. But I would accept, be sure of it, if I did not have other resources. Only I tell you that if anyone ought to lend to me, it is Buloz who has bought chateaux and lands with my novels. He would not refuse me, I know. He even offers it to me. I shall take from him then, if I have to. But I am not in a condition to leave, I have had a relapse these last few days. I slept thirty-six hours together, exhausted. Now I am on my feet again, but weak. I confess to you that I have not the energy TO WISH TO LIVE. I don't care about it; moving from where I am comfortable, to seek new fatigues, working like a dog to renew a dog's life, it is a little stupid, I think, when it would be so sweet to pass away like that, still loving, still loved, at strife with no one, not discontent with oneself and dreaming of the wonders of other worlds- -this assumes that the imagination is still fresh. But I don't know why I talk to you of things considered sad,

I have too much the habit of looking at them pleasantly. I forget that they appear afflicting to those who seem in the fulness of life. Don't let's talk about them any longer and let spring do the work, spring which perhaps will breathe into me the desire to take up my work again. I shall be as docile to the interior voice that tells me to walk as to that telling me to sit down.

It is not I who promised you a novel on the Holy Virgin. At least I don't think so. I can not find my article on faience. Do look and see if it was printed at the end of one of my volumes to complete the last sheet. It was entitled Giovanni Freppa ou les Maioliques.

Oh! what luck! While writing to you it has come back to me that there is a corner where I have not looked. I hasten there, I find it! I find something better than my article, and I send you three works which will make you as learned as I am. That of Passeri is charming.

Barbes has intelligence, certainly! but he is a sugar loaf. Brain on a lofty scale, head of an Indian, with gentle instincts, almost impossible to find; all for metaphysical thought which becomes an instinct and a passion that dominates everything. Add to that a character that one can only compare to Garibaldi. A creature of incredible sanctity and perfection. Immense worth without immediate application in France. The setting of another age or another country is what this hero needs. And now good-night, — O God, what a CALF I am! I leave you the title of COW, which you give yourself in your days of weariness. Never mind, tell me when you are to be in Paris. It is probable that I shall have to go there for a few days for one thing or another. We must embrace each other and then you shall come to Nohant this summer. It is agreed, it must be!

My affectionate regards to your mother and to your lovely niece.

Please acknowledge the receipt of the three pamphlets; they would be a loss.

XLIX. TO GEORGE SAND

Dear master,

You really ought to go to see the sun somewhere; it is foolish to be always suffering; do travel; rest; resignation is the worst of the virtues.

I have need of it in order to endure all the stupidities that I hear! You can not imagine to what a degree they have reached. France which has been sometimes taken with St. Vitus dance (as under Charles VI), seems to me now to have a paralysis of the brain. They are mad with fear. Fear of the Prussians, fear of the strikes, fear of the Exposition which does not go well, fear of everything. We have to go back to 1849 to find such a degree of imbecility.

There was at the last Magny such inane conversation that I swore to myself never to put foot inside the place again. The only subjects under discussion all the time were Bismarck and the Luxembourg. I was stuffed with it! For the rest I don't find it easy to live. Far from becoming blunted my sensibilities are sharper; a lot of insignificant things make me suffer. Pardon this weakness, you who are so strong and tolerant.

The novel does not go at all well. I am deep in reading the newspapers of '48. I have had to make several (and have not yet finished) journeys to Sevres, to Creil, etc.

Father Sainte-Beuve is preparing a discourse on free thought which he will read at the Senate a propos of the press law. He has been very shrewd, you know.

You tell your son Maurice that I love him very much, first because he is your son and secundo because he is he. I find him good, clever, cultivated, not a poseur, in short charming, and "with talent."

L. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 4 March, 1867

Dear good friend, the friend of my heart, the old troubadour is as well as ten thousand men — who are well, and he is gay as a finch, because the sun shines again and copy is progressing.

He will probably go to Paris soon for the play by his son Dumas, let us try to be there together.

Maurice is very proud to be declared COCK by an eagle. At this moment he is having a spree with veal and wine in honor of his firemen.

The AMERICAN [Footnote: Henry Harrisse.] in question is charming. He has, literally speaking, a passion for you, and he writes me that after seeing you he loves you more, that does not surprise me.

Poor Bouilhet! Give him this little note enclosed here. I share his sorrow, I knew her.

Are you amused in Paris? Are you as sedentary there as at Croisset?
In that case I shall hardly see you unless I go to see you.

Tell me the hours when you do not receive the fair sex, and when sexagenarian troubadours do not incommode you.

Cadio is entirely redone and rewritten up to the part I read to you, it is less offensive.

I am not doing Montreveyche. I will tell you about that. It is quite a story. I love you and I embrace you with all my heart.

Your old George Sand

Did you receive my pamphlets on the faience? You have not acknowledged them. They were sent to Croisset the day after I got your last letter.

LI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT 14 March, 1867

Your old troubadour is again prostrate. Every moment his guitar threatens to be broken. And then he sleeps forty-eight hours and is cured — but feeble, and he can not be in Paris on the 16th as he had intended. Maurice went alone a little while ago, I shall go to join him in five or six days.

Little Aurore consoles me for this mischance. She twitters like a bird along with the birds who are twittering already as in full spring time.

The anemone Sylvia which I brought from the woods into the garden and which I had a great deal of trouble in acclimating is finally growing thousands of white and pink stars among the blue periwinkle.
It is warm and damp. One can not break one's guitar in weather like this. Good-bye, dear good friend.

G. Sand

LII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Friday, 22 March, 1867

Your old troubadour is here, not so badly off. He will go to dine on Monday at Magny's, we shall agree on a day for both of us to dine with Maurice. He is at home at five o'clock but not before Monday.

He is running around!

He embraces you.

LIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT 1867 (?)

Then Wednesday, if you wish, my dear old fellow. Whom do you want to have with us? Certainly, the dear Beuve if that is possible, and no one if you like.

We embrace you.

G. S. Maurice Saturday evening.

LIV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 11 April, 1867

Here I am back again in my nest, and almost cured from a bad fever which attacked me in Paris, the day before my departure.

Really your old troubadour has had ridiculous health for six months. March and April have been such stupid months for him. It makes no difference, however, for he is recovering again, and is seeing once more the trees and the grass grow, it is always the same thing and that is why it is beautiful and good. Maurice has been touched by the friendship that you have shown him; you have seduced and ravished him, and he is not demonstrative.

He and his wife, — who is not at all an ordinary woman, — desire absolutely that you come to our house this year, I am charged to tell you so very seriously and persistently if need be And is that hateful grip gone? Maurice wanted to go to get news of you; but on seeing me so prostrated by the fever, he thought of nothing except packing me up and bringing me here like a parcel. I did nothing except sleep from Paris to Nohant and I was revived on receiving the kisses of Aurore who knows now how to give great kisses, laughing wildly all the while; she finds that very funny.

And the novel? Does it go on its way the same in Paris as in Croisset? It seems to me that everywhere you lead the same hermitlike existence. When you have the time to think of friends, remember your old comrade and send him two lines to tell him that you are well and that you don't forget him.

LV. TO GEORGE SAND

I am worried at not having news from you, dear master. What has become of you? When shall I see you?

My trip to Nohant has fallen through. The reason is this: my mother had a little stroke a week ago. There is nothing left of it, but it might come on again. She is anxious for me, and I am going to hurry back to Croisset. If she is doing well towards the month of August, and I am not worried, it is not necessary to tell you that I shall rush headlong towards your home.

As regards news, Sainte-Beuve seems to me very ill, and Bouilhet has just been appointed librarian at Rouen.

Since the rumours of war have quieted down, people seem to me a little less foolish. My nausea caused by the public cowardice is decreasing.

I went twice to the Exposition; it is amazing. There are splendid and extraordinary things there. But man is made to swallow the infinite. One would have to know all sciences and all arts in order to be interested in everything that one sees on the Champ de Mars. Never mind; someone who had three entire months to himself, and went every morning to take notes, would save himself in consequence much reading and many journeys.

One feels oneself there very far from Paris, in a new and ugly world, an enormous world which is perhaps the world of the future. The first time that I lunched there, I thought all the time of America, and I wanted to speak like a negro.

LVI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset

Nohant, 9 May, 1867

Dear friend of my heart,

I am well, I am at work, I am finishing Cadio. It is warm, I am alive, I am calm and sad, I hardly know why. In this existence so even, so tranquil, and so gentle as I have here, I am in an element that weakens me morally while strengthening me physically; and I fall into melancholies of honey and roses which are none the less melancholy. It seems to me that all those I love forget me, and that it is justice, because I live a selfish life having nothing to do for any one of them.

I have lived with tremendous attachments which overwhelmed me, which exceeded my strength and which I often used to curse. And it happens that having nothing more to carry them on with, I am bored by being well. If the human race went on very well or very ill, one would reattach oneself to a general interest, would live with an idea, wise or foolish. But you see where we are now, you who storm so fiercely against cowards. That disappears, you say? But only to recommence! What kind of a society is it that becomes paralyzed in the midst of its expansions, because tomorrow can bring a storm? The thought of danger has never produced such demoralizations. Have we declined to such an extent that it is necessary to beg us to eat, telling us at the same time that nothing will happen to disturb our digestion? Yes, it is silly, it is shameful. Is it the result of prosperity, and does civilization involve this sickly and cowardly selfishness?

My optimism has had a rude jolt of late. I worked up a joy, a courage at the idea of seeing you here. It was like a cure that I carefully contrived, but you are worried about your dear, old mother, and certainly I can not protest.

Well, if, before your departure from Paris, I can finish Cadio, to which I am bound under pain of having nothing wherewith to pay for my tobacco and my shoes, I shall go with Maurice to embrace you. If not, I shall hope for you about the middle of the summer. My children, quite unhappy by this delay, beg to hope for you also, and we hope it so much the more because it would be a good sign for the dear mother.

Maurice has plunged again into Natural History; he wants to perfect himself in the MICROS; I learn on the rebound. When I shall have fixed in my head the name and the appearance of two or three thousand imperceptible varieties, I shall be well advanced, don't you think so? Well, these studies are veritable OCTOPUSES, which entwine about you and which open to you I don't know what infinity. You ask if it is the destiny of man to DRINK THE INFINITE; my heavens, yes, don't doubt it, it is his destiny, since it is his dream and his passion.

Inventing is absorbing also; but what fatigue afterwards! How empty and worn out intellectually one feels, when one has scribbled for weeks and months about that animal with two legs which has the only right to be represented in novels! I see Maurice quite refreshed and rejuvenated when he returns from his beasts and his pebbles, and if I aspire to come out from my misery, it is to bury myself also in studies, which in the speech of the Philistines, are not of any use. Still it is worth more than to say mass and to ring the bell for the adoration of the Creator.

Is it true what you tell me of G — — ? Is it possible? I can not believe it. Is there in the atmosphere which the earth engenders nowadays, a gas, laughing or otherwise, which suddenly seizes the brain, and carries it on to commit extravagances, as there was under the first revolution a maddening fluid which inspired one to commit cruelties? We have fallen from the Hell of Dante into that of Scarron.

Of what are you thinking, good head and good heart, in the midst of this bacchanal? You are wrathful, oh very well, I like that better than if you were laughing at it; but when you are calmer and when you reflect?

Must one find some fashion of accepting the honor, the duty, and the fatigue of living? As for me, I revert to the idea of an everlasting journey through worlds more amusing, but it would be necessary to go there quickly and change continually. The life that one fears so much to lose is always too long for those who understand quickly what they see. Everything repeats itself and goes over and over again in it.

I assure you that there is only one pleasure: learning what one does not know, and one happiness: loving the exceptions. Therefore I love you and I embrace you tenderly.

Your old troubadour G. Sand

I am anxious about Sainte-Beuve. What a loss that would be! I am content if Bouilhet is content. Is it really a good position?

LVII. TO GEORGE SAND

Paris, Friday morning

I am returning to my mother next Monday, dear master. I have little hope of seeing you before then!

But when you are in Paris, what is to prevent you from pushing on to Croisset where everyone, including myself, adores you? Sainte-Beuve has finally consented to see a specialist and to be seriously treated. And he is better anyway. His morale is improving.

Bouilhet's position gives him four thousand francs a year and lodging. He now need not think of earning his living, which is a real luxury.

No one talks of the war any more, they don't talk of anything.

The Exposition alone is what "everybody is thinking about," and the cabmen exasperate the bourgeois.

They were beautiful (the bourgeois) during the strike of the tailors. One would have said that SOCIETY was going to pieces.

Axiom: Hatred of the bourgeois is the beginning of virtue. But I include in the word bourgeois, the bourgeois in blouses as well the bourgeois in coats.

It is we and we alone, that is to say the literary men, who are the people, or to say it better: the tradition of humanity.

Yes, I am susceptible to disinterested angers and I love you all the more for loving me for that. Stupidity and injustice make me roar, — and I HOWL in my corner against a lot of things “that do not concern me.”

How sad it is not to live together, dear master, I admired you before I knew you. From the day I saw your lovely and kind face, I loved you. There you are. — And I embrace you warmly.

Your old

Gustave Flaubert

I shall have the package of pamphlets about faience sent to the rue des Feuillantines. A good handshake to Maurice. A kiss on the four cheeks of Mademoiselle Aurore.

LVIII. TO GEORGE SAND

I stayed thirty-six hours in Paris at the beginning of this week, in order to be present at the Tuileries ball. Without any exaggeration, it was splendid. Paris on the whole turns to the colossal. It is becoming foolish and unrestrained. Perhaps we are returning to the ancient Orient. It seems to me that idols will come out of the earth. We are menaced with a Babylon.

Why not? The INDIVIDUAL has been so denied by democracy that he will abase himself to a complete effacement, as under the great theocratic despotisms.

The Tsar of Russia displeased me profoundly; I found him a rustic.

On a parallel with Monsieur Floquet who cries without any danger:

“Long live Poland!” We have chic people who have had themselves registered at the Elysee. Oh! what a fine epoch!

My novel goes piano. The further I get on the more difficulties arise. What a heavy cart of sandstone to drag along! And you pity yourself for a labor that lasts six months!

I have enough more for two years, at least (OF MINE). How the devil do you find the connection between your ideas? It is that that delays me. Moreover this book demands tiresome researches. For instance on Monday; I was at the Jockey Club, at the Cafe Anglais, and at a lawyer's in turn. Do you like Victor Hugo's preface to the Paris-Guide? Not very much, do you? Hugo's philosophy seems to me always vague.

I was carried away with delight, a week ago, at an encampment of Gypsies who had established at Rouen. This is the third time that I have seen them and always with a new pleasure. The great thing is that they excite the hatred of the bourgeois, although they are as inoffensive as sheep.

I appeared very badly before the crowd because I gave them a few sous, and I heard some fine words a la Prudhomme. That hatred springs from something very profound and complex. One finds it among all orderly people.

It is the hatred that one feels for the bedouin, for the heretic, the philosopher, the solitary, the poet; and there is a fear in that hate. I, who am always for the minority, am exasperated by it. It is true that many things exasperate me. On the day that I am no longer outraged, I shall fall flat as the marionette from which one withdraws the support of the stick.

Thus, THE STAKE that has supported me this winter, is the indignation that I had against our great national historian, M. Thiers, who had reached the condition of a demi-god, and the pamphlet Trochu, and the everlasting Changarnier coming back over the water. God be thanked that the Exposition has delivered us momentarily from these GREAT MEN.

LIX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset

Nohant, 30 May, 1867

Here you are at home, old friend of my heart, and I and Maurice must go to embrace you. If you are still buried in work, we shall only come and go. It is so near to Paris, that you must not hesitate to tell us. I have finished Cadiao, hurray! I have only to POLISH it a little. It is like an illness, carrying this great affair for so long in one's HEAD. I have been so interrupted by real illnesses that I have had great trouble in setting to work again at it. But I am wonderfully well since the fine weather and I am going to take a bath of botany.

Maurice will take one of entomology. He walks three leagues with a friend of like energy in order to hunt in a great plain for an animal which has to be looked at with a magnifying glass. That is happiness! That is being really infatuated. My gloom has disappeared in making Cadio; at present I am only fifteen years old, and everything to me appears for the best in the best possible of worlds. That will last as long as it can. These are the intervals of innocence in which forgetfulness of evil compensates for the inexperience of the golden age.

How is your dear mother? She is fortunate to have you again near her! And the novel? Good heavens! it must get on! Are you walking a little? Are you more reasonable?

The other day, some people not at all stupid were here who spoke highly of Madame Bovary, but with less zest of Salammbô. Lina got into a white heat, not being willing that those wretches should make the slightest objection to it; Maurice had to calm her, and moreover he criticised the work very well, as an artist and as a scholar; so well that the recalcitrants laid down their arms. I should like to have written what he said. He speaks little and often badly; but that time he succeeded extraordinarily well.

I shall then not say adieu, but au revoir, as soon as possible. I love you much, much, my dear old fellow, you know it. My ideal would be to live a long life with a good and great heart like yours. But then, one would want never to die, and when one is really OLD, like me, one must hold oneself ready for anything.

I embrace you tenderly, so does Maurice. Aurore is the sweetest and the most ridiculous person. Her father makes her drink while he says: Dominus vobiscum! then she drinks and answers: Amen! How she is getting on! What a marvel is the development of a little child! No one has ever written about that. Followed day by day, it would be precious in every respect. It is one of those things that we all see without noticing.

Adieu again; think of your old troubadour who thinks unceasingly of you.

G. Sand

LX. TO Gustave Flaubert

Nohant, 14 June, 1867

Dear friend of my heart, I leave with my son and his wife the 20th of the month to stay two weeks in Paris, perhaps more if the revival of Villemer delays me longer. Therefore your dear good mother, whom I do not want to miss, has all the time she needs to go to see her daughters. I shall wait in Paris until you tell me if she has returned, or rather, if I make you a real visit, you shall tell me the time that suits you best.

My intention, for the moment, was quite simply to go to pass an hour with you, and Lina was tempted to accompany me; I should have shown her Rouen, and then we should have embraced you in time to return in the evening to Paris; for the dear little one has always her ear and her heart listening when she is away from Aurore, and her holidays are marked by a continual uneasiness which I quite understand. Aurore is a treasure of gentleness which absorbs us all. If it can be arranged, we shall then go on the run to grasp your hands. If it can not, I shall go alone later when your heart says so, and, if you are going south, I shall put it off until everything can be arranged without disturbing whatever may be the plans of your mother or yourself. I am very free. So, don't disturb yourself, and arrange your summer without bothering about me.

I have thirty-six plans also, but I don't incline to any one; what amuses me is what seizes me and takes me off suddenly. It is with a journey as with a novel: those who travel are those who command. Only when one is in Paris, Rouen is not a journey, and I shall always be ready when I am there, to respond to your call. I am a little remorseful to take whole days from your work, I who am never bored with loafing, and whom you could leave for whole hours under a tree, or before two lighted logs, with the assurance that I should find there something interesting. I know so well how to live OUTSIDE OF MYSELF! It hasn't always been like that. I also was young and subject to indignations. It is over!

Since I have dipped into real nature, I have found there an order, a system, a calmness of cycles which is lacking in mankind, but which man can, up to a certain point, assimilate when he is not too directly at odds with the difficulties of his own life. When these difficulties return he must endeavor to avoid them; but if he has drunk the cup of the eternally true, he does not get too excited for or against the ephemeral and relative truth.

But why do I say this to you? Because it comes to my pen-point; for in considering it carefully, your state of overexcitement is probably truer, or at least more fertile and more human than my SENILE tranquillity. I would not like to make you as I am, even if by a magical operation I could. I should not be interested in myself if I had the honor to meet myself. I should say that one troubadour is enough to manage and I should send the other to Chaillot.

A propos of gypsies, do you know that there are gypsies of the sea? I discovered in the outskirts of Tamaris, among the furthest rocks, great boats well sheltered, with women and children, a coast settlement, very restricted, very tanned; fishing for food without trading; speaking a language that the people of the country do not understand; living only in these great boats stranded on the sand, when the storms troubled them in their rocky coves; intermarrying, inoffensive and sombre, timid or savage; not answering when any one speaks to them. I don't even know what to call them. The name that I have been told has escaped me but I could get some one to tell me again. Naturally the country people hate them and that they have no religion; if that is so they ought to be superior to us. I ventured all alone among them. "Good day, sirs." Response, a slight bend of the head. I looked at their encampment, no one moved. It seemed as if they did not see me. I asked them if my curiosity annoyed them. A shrug of the shoulders as if to say, "What do we care?" I spoke to a young man who was mending the meshes in a net very cleverly; I showed him a piece of five francs in gold. He looked the other way. I showed him one in silver. He deigned to look at it. "Do you want it?" He bent his head on his work. I put it near him, he did not move. I went away, he followed me with his eyes. When he thought that I could not see him any longer, he took the piece and went to talk with a group. I don't know what happened. I fancy that they put it in the common exchequer. I began botanizing at some distance within sight to see if they would come to ask me something or to thank me. No one moved. I returned as if by chance towards them; the same silence, the same indifference. An hour later, was at the top of the cliff, and I asked the coast-guard who those people were who spoke neither French, nor Italian, nor patois. He told me their name, which I have not remembered.

He thought that they were Moors, left on the coast since the time of the great invasions from Provence, and perhaps he is not mistaken. He told me that he had seen me among them from his watch tower, and that I was wrong, for they were a people capable of anything; but when I asked him what harm they did he confessed to me that they had done none. They lived by their fishing and above all on the things cast up by the sea which they knew how to gather up before the most alert. They were an object of perfect scorn. Why? Always the same story. He who does not do as all the world does can only do evil.

If you go into the country, you might perhaps meet them at the end of the Brusq. But they are birds of passage, and there are years when they do not appear at all. I have not even seen the Paris Guide. They owe me a copy, however; for I gave something to it without receiving payment. It is because of that no doubt that they have forgotten me.

To conclude, I shall be in Paris from the 20th of June to the 5th of July. Send me a word always to 97 rue des Feuillantines. I shall stay perhaps longer, but I don't know. I embrace you tenderly, my splendid old fellow. Walk a little, I beg of you. I don't fear anything for the novel; but I fear for the nervous system taking too much the place of the muscular system. I am very well, except for thunder bolts, when I fall on my bed for forty-eight hours and don't want any one to speak to me. But it is rare and if I do not relent so that they can nurse me, I get up perfectly cured.

Maurice's love. Entomology has taken possession of him this year; he discovers marvels. Embrace your mother for me, and take good care of her. I love you with all my heart.

G. Sand

LXI. To GUSTAVE FLATUBERT

Nohant, 24 July, 1867

Dear good friend, I spent three weeks in Paris with my children, hoping to see you arriving or to receive a line from you which would tell me to come and embrace you. But you were HEAD OVER HEELS and I respect these crises of work; I know them! Here am I back again in old Nohant, and Maurice at Nerac terminating by a compromise the law-suit which keeps him from his inheritance. His agreeable father stole about three hundred thousand francs from his children in order to please his cook; happily, although Monsieur used to lead this edifying life, I used to work and did not cut into my capital. I have nothing, but I shall leave the daily bread assured.

They write me that Villemer goes well. Little Aurore is as pretty as anything and does a thousand gracious tricks. My daughter Lina is always my real daughter The OTHER is well and is beautiful, that is all that I ask of her.

I am working again; but I am not strong. I am paying for my energy and activity in Paris. That does not make any difference, I am not angry against life, I love you with all my heart. I see, when I am gloomy, your kind face, and I feel the radiant power of your goodness. You are a charm in the Indian summer of my sweet and pure friendships, without egoisms, and without deceptions in consequence.

Think of me sometimes, work well and call me when you are ready to loaf. If you are not ready, never mind. If your heart told you to come here, there would be feasting and joy in the family. I saw Sainte-Beuve, I am content and proud of him.

Good night, friend of my heart. I embrace you as well as your mother.

G. Sand

LXII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Paris

Nohant, 6 August, 1867

When I see how hard my old friend has to work in order to write a novel, it discourages my facility, and I tell myself that I write BOTCHED literature. I have finished Cadrio; it has been in Buloz' hands a long time. I am writing another thing,[Footnote: Mademoiselle Merquem.] but I don't see it yet very clearly; what can one do without sun and without heat? I ought to be in Paris now, to see the Exposition again at my leisure, and to take your mother to walk with you; but I really must work, since I have only that to live on. And then the children; that Aurore is a wonder. You really must see her, perhaps I shall not see her long, If I don't think I am destined to grow very old; I must lose no time in loving!

Yes, you are right, it is that that sustains me. This hypocritical fit has a rough disillusionment in store for it, and one will lose nothing by waiting. On the contrary, one will gain. You will see that, you who are old though still quite young. You are my son's age. You will laugh together when you see this heap of rubbish collapse.

You must not be a Norman, you must come and see us for several days, you will make us happy; and it will restore the blood in my veins and the joy in my heart.

Love your old troubadour always and talk to him of Paris; a few words when you have the time.

Outline a scene for Nohant with four or five characters, we shall enjoy it. We embrace you and summon you.

G. Sand

LXIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset

Nohant, 18 August, 1867

Where are you, my dear old fellow? If by chance you should be in Paris, during the first few days of September, let us try to see each other. I shall stay there three days and I shall return here. But I do not hope to meet you there. You ought to be in some lovely country, far from Paris and from its dust. I do not know even if my letter will reach you. Never mind, if you can give news of yourself, do so. I am in despair. I have lost suddenly, without even knowing that he was ill, my poor dear, old friend, Rollinat, an angel of goodness, of courage, of devotion. It is a heavy blow for me. If you were here you would give me courage; but my poor children are as overwhelmed as I am. We adored him, all the countryside adored him.

Keep well, and think sometimes of your absent friends. We embrace you affectionately. The little one is very well, she is charming.

LXIV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Paris

Nohant, August, 1867

I bless you, my dear old fellow, for the kind thought that you had of coming; but you were right not to travel while you were ill. Ah! my God, I dream of nothing but illness and unhappiness: take care of yourself, my old comrade. I shall go to see you if I can pull myself together; for, since this new dagger-thrust, I am feeble and crushed and I have a sort of fever. I shall write you a line from Paris. If you are prevented, you must answer me by telegram. You know that with me there is no need of explanation: I know every hindrance in life and I never blame the hearts that I know. — I wish that, right away, if you have a moment to write, you would tell me where I should go for three days to see the coast of Normandy without striking the neighborhood where “THE WORLD” goes. In order to go on with my novel, I must see a countryside near the Channel, that all the world has not talked about, and where there are real natives at home, peasants, fisherfolk, a real village in a corner of the rocks. If you are in the mood we will go there together. If not, don’t bother about me. I go everywhere and I am not disturbed by anything. You told me that the population of the coasts was the best in the country, and that there were real dyed-in-the-wool simple-hearted men there. It would be good to see their faces, their clothes, their houses, and their horizons. That is enough for what I want to do, I need only accessories; I hardly want to describe; SEEING it is enough in order not to make a false stroke. How is your mother? Have you been able to take her to walk and to distract her a little? Embrace her for me as I embrace you.

G. Sand

Maurice embraces you; I shall go to Paris without him: he is drawn on the jury for the 2 September till...no one knows. It is a tiresome task. Aurore is very cunning with her arms, she offers them to you to kiss; her hands are marvels and they are incredibly clever for her age.

Au revoir, then, if I can only pull myself out of the state I am now in. Insomnia is the devil; in the daytime one makes a lot of effort not to sadden others. At night one falls back on oneself.

LXV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset
Nohant, 10 September, 1867

Dear old fellow,

I am worried at not having news of you since that illness of which you spoke. Are you well again? Yes, we shall go to see the rollers and the beaches next month if you like, if your heart prompts you. The novel goes on apace; but I shall besprinkle it with local color afterwards.

While waiting, I am still here, stuck up to my chin in the river every day, and regaining my strength entirely in this cold and shady stream which I adore, and where I have passed so many hours of my life reviving myself after too long sessions in company with my ink- well. I go definitely to Paris, the 16th; the 17th at one o'clock, I leave for Rouen and Jumieges, where my friend Madame Lebarbier de Tinan awaits me at the house of M. Lepel-Cointet, the landowner; I shall stay there the 18th so as to return to Paris the 19th. Will it be inconvenient if I come to see you? I am sick with longing to do so; but I am so absolutely forced to spend the evening of the 19th in Paris that I do not know if I shall have the time. You must tell me. I can get a word from you the 16th in Paris, 97 rue des Feuillantines. I shall not be alone; I have as a travelling companion a charming young literary woman, Juliette Lamber. If you were lovely, lovely, you would walk to Jumieges the 19th. We would return together so that I could be in Paris at six o'clock in the evening at the latest. But if you are even a little bit ill still, or are PLUNGED in ink, pretend that I have said nothing, and prepare to see us next month. As for the WINTER walk on the Norman coast, that gives me a cold in my back, I who plan to go to the Gulf of Juan at that time.

I have been sick over the death of my friend Rollinat. My body is cured, but my soul! I should have to stay a week with you to refresh myself in your affectionate strength; for cold and purely philosophical courage to me, is like cauterizing a wooden leg.

I embrace you and I love you (also your mother). Maurice also, what French! One is happy to forget it, it is a tiresome thing.

Your troubadour

G. Sand

LXVI. TO GEORGE SAND

Dear master,

What, no news?

But you will answer me since I ask you a service. I read this in my notes: "National of 1841. Bad treatments inflicted on Barbes, kicks on his breast, dragged by the beard and hair in order to put him in an in-pace. Consultation of lawyers signed: E. Arago, Favre, Berryer, to complain of these abominations.”

Find out from him if all that is true; I shall be obliged.

LXVII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset
Paris, Tuesday, 1st October, 1867

Dear friend, you shall have your information. I asked Peyrat last evening, I am writing today to Barbès who will answer directly to you.

Where do you think I have come from? From Normandy. A charming opportunity took me there six days ago. I had been enchanted with Jumieges. This time I saw Etretat, Yport, the prettiest of all the villages, Fecamp, Saint-Valery, which I knew, and Dieppe, which dazzled me; the environs, the chateau d'Arques, Limes, what a country! And I went back and forth twice within two steps of Croisset and I sent you some big kisses; always ready to return with you to the seaside or to talk with you at your house when you are free. If I had been alone, I should have bought an old guitar and should have sung a ballad under your mother's window. But I could not take a large family to you.

I am returning to Nohant and I embrace you with all my heart.

G. Sand

I think that the Bois-Dore is going well, but I don't know anything about it. I have a way of my own of being in Paris, namely, being at the seaside, which does not keep me informed of what is going on. But I gathered gentians in the long grass of the immense Roman fort of Limes where I had quite a STUNNING view of the sea. I walked out like an old horse, but I am returning quite frisky.

LXVIII. TO GEORGE SAND

At last, at last, I have news of you, dear master, and good news, which is doubly agreeable.

I am planning to return to my home in the country with Madame Sand, and my mother hopes that will be the case. What do you say? For, with all that goes on, we never see each other, confound it!

As for my moving, it is not that I lack the desire of being free to move about. But I should be lost if I stirred before I finish my novel. Your friend is a man of wax; everything gets imprinted on him, is encrusted on him, penetrates him. If I should visit you, I should think of nothing but you and yours, your house, your country, the appearance of the people I had met, etc. I require great efforts to gather myself together; I always tend to scatter myself. That is why, dear adored master, I deprive myself of going to sit down to dream aloud in your house. But, in the summer or autumn of 1869, you shall see what a fine commercial traveller I am, once let loose to the open air. I am abject, I warn you.

As to news, there is a quiet once more since the Kerveguen incident has died its beautiful death. Was it not a farce? and silly?

Sainte-Beuve is preparing a lecture on the press law. He is better, decidedly. I dined Tuesday with Renan. He was marvellously witty and eloquent, and artistic! as I have never seen him. Have you read his new book? His preface causes talk. My poor Theo worries me. I do not think him strong.

LXIX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Paris

Nohant, 12 October, 1867

I have sent your letter to Barbes; it is fine and splendid, as you are. I know that the worthy man will be glad of it. But as for me, I want to throw myself out of the window; for my children are unwilling to hear of my leaving so soon. Yes, it is horrid to have seen your house four times without going to see you. But I am cautious to the point of fear. To be sure the idea of summoning you to Rouen for twenty minutes did occur to me. But you are not, as I am, on tiptoe, all ready to start off. You live in your dressing gown, the great enemy of liberty and activity. To force you to dress, to go out, perhaps in the middle of an absorbing chapter, and only to see someone who does not know how to say anything quickly, and who, the more he is content, the stupider he is, — I did not dare to. Here I am obliged to finish something which drags along, and before the final touch I shall probably go to Normandy. I should like to go by the Seine to Honfleur. It will be next month, if the cold does not make me ill, and I shall try this time to carry you away in passing. If not, I shall see you at least, and then I shall go to Provence.

Ah! if I could only take you there! And if you could, if you would, during the second week in October when you are going to be free, come to see me here! You promised, and my children would be so happy if you would! But you don't love us enough for that, scoundrel that you are! You think that you have a lot of better friends: you are very much mistaken; it is always one's best friends whom one neglects or ignores.

Come, a little courage; you can leave Paris at a quarter past nine in the morning, and get to Chateauroux at four, there you would find my carriage and be here at six for dinner. It is not bad, and once here, we all laugh together like good-natured bears; no one dresses; there is no ceremony, and we all love one another very much. Say yes!

I embrace you. And I too have been bored at not seeing you, FOR A

YEAR.

Your old troubadour

LXX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset

Nohant, 27 October, 1867

I have just made a resume in a few pages of my impressions as a landscape painter, gathered in Normandy: it has not much importance, but I was able to quote three lines from Salammbô, which seemed to me to depict the country better than all my phrases, and which had always struck me as a stroke from a master brush. In turning over the pages to find these lines, I naturally reread almost all, and I remain convinced that it is one of the most beautiful books that have been made since they began to make books.

I am well, and I am working quickly and much, so as to live on my INCOME this winter in the South. But what will be the delights of Cannes and where will be the heart to engage in them? My spirits are in mourning while thinking that at this hour people are fighting for the pope. Ah! ISIDORE! [Footnote: Name applied to Napoleon III.]

I have tried in vain this month to go again to see ma Normandie, that is to say, my great, dear heart's friend. My children have threatened me with death if I leave them so soon. Just at present friends are coming. You are the only one who does not talk of coming on. Yet, that would be so fine! Next month I shall move heaven and earth to find you wherever you are, and meanwhile I love you tremendously. And you. Your work? your mother's health? I am worried at not having news of you.

G. Sand

LXXI. TO GEORGE SAND 1st November, 1867

Dear master,

I was as much ashamed as touched, last evening, when I received your “very nice” letter. I am a wretch not to have answered the first one. How did that happen? For I am usually prompt.

My work does not go very well. I hope that I shall finish my second part in February. But in order to have it all finished in two years, I must not budge from my arm-chair till then. That is why I am not going to Nohant. A week of recreation means three months of revery for me. I should do nothing but think of you, of yours in Berry, of all that I saw. My unfortunate spirit would navigate in strange waters. I have so little resistance.

I do not hide the pleasure that your little word about SALAMMBO gives me. That old book needs to be relieved from a few inversions, there are too many repetitions of ALORS, MAIS and ET. The labor is too evident.

As for the one I am doing, I am afraid that the idea is defective, an irremediable fault; will such weak characters be interesting? Great effects are reached only through simple means, through positive passions. But I don’t see simplicity anywhere in the modern world.

A sad world! How deplorable and how lamentably grotesque are affairs in Italy! All these orders, counter-orders of counter-orders of the counter-orders! The earth is a very inferior planet, decidedly.

You did not tell me if you were satisfied with the revivals at the Odeon. When shall you go south? And where shall you go in the south?

A week from today, that is to say, from the 7th to the 10th of November, I shall be in Paris, because I have to go sauntering in Auteuil in order to discover certain little nooks. What would be nice would be for us to come back to Croisset together. You know very well that I am very angry at you for your two last trips in Normandy.

Then, I shall see you soon? No joking? I embrace you as I love you, dear master, that is to say, very tenderly.

Here is a bit that I send to your dear son, a lover of this sort of fluff:

“One evening, expected by Hortense,
Having his eyes fixed on the clock,
And feeling his heart beat with eager throbs,
Young Alfred dried up with impatience.”
(Memoires de l’Academie de Saint-Quentin.)

LXXII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 5 December, 1867

Your old troubadour is no good, I admit it. He has been working like an ox to have the money to go away with this winter to the gulf of Juan, and at the moment of leaving he would like to stay behind. He is worried at leaving his children and the little Aurore, but he suffers with the cold, he fears anemia, and he thinks he is doing his duty in going to find a land which the snow does not render impracticable, and a sky under which one can breathe without having dagger-thrusts in one’s lungs.

So you see.

He has thought of you, probably much more than you think of him; for he has stupid and easy work, and his thoughts run elsewhere very far from him, and from his task, when his hand is weary of writing. As for you, you work for truth, and you become absorbed, and you have not heard my spirit, which more than once has TAPPED at your study door to say to you: “It is I.” Or else you have said: “It is a spirit tapping let him go to the devil!”

Aren’t you coming to Paris? I am going there between the 15th and the 20th. I shall stay there only a few days, and then flee to Cannes. Will you be there? God grant it! On the whole I am pretty well; I am furious with you for not wanting to come to Nohant; I won’t reproach you for I don’t know how. I have scribbled a lot; my children are always good and kind to me in every sense of the word. Aurore is a love.

We have RAVED politically; now we try not to think of it any more and to have patience. We often speak of you and we love you. Your old troubadour especially who embraces you with all his heart, and begs to be remembered to your good mother.

G. Sand

LXXIII. TO GEORGE SAND

Wednesday night

Dear master, dear friend of the good God, “let us talk a little of Dozenval,” let us roar at M. Thiers! Can a more triumphant imbecile, a more abject dabster, a more stercoraceous bourgeois be found! No, nothing can give the idea of the puking with which this old diplomatic idiot inspires me in piling up his stupidity on the dung- hill of bourgeoisie! Is it possible to treat philosophy, religion, peoples, liberty, the past and future, history, and natural history, everything and more yet, with an incoherence more inept and more childish! He seems to me as everlasting as mediocrity! He overwhelms me!

But the fine thing is the brave national guards whom he stuffed in 1848, who are beginning to applaud him again! What infinite madness! That proves that everything consists of temperament. Prostitutes, — like France, — always have a weakness for old buffoons.

Furthermore, I shall try in the third part of my novel (when I reach the reaction that followed the days of June) to insert a panegyric about him a propos of his book: De la propriete, and I hope that he will be pleased with me.

What form should one take to express occasionally one’s opinion on the things of this world, without the risk of passing later for an imbecile? It is a tough problem. It seems to me that the best thing is simply to depict the things which exasperate one. To dissect is to take vengeance. Well! it is not he with whom I am angry, nor with the others but with OURS.

If they had paid more attention to the education of the SUPERIOR classes, delaying till later the agricultural meetings; in short, if the head had been put above the stomach, should we have been likely to be where we are now?

I have just read, this week, Buchez’ Preface to his Histoire parlementaire. Many inanities which burden us today come from that among other things.

And now, it is not good of you to say that I do not think of “my old Troubadour”; of whom then, do I think? perhaps of my wretched book? but that is more difficult and less agreeable.

How long do you stay at Cannes?

After Cannes shan’t you return to Paris? I shall be there towards the end of January.

In order to finish my book in the spring of 1869, I must not give myself a week of holiday; that is why I do not go to Nohant. It is always the story of the Amazons. In order to draw the bow better they crushed their breast. It is a fine method after all.

Adieu, dear master, write to me, won't you?

I embrace you tenderly.

LXXIV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset

Nohant, 31 December, 1867

I don't agree with you at all that it is necessary to destroy the breast to draw a bow. I have quite a contrary belief which I follow, and I think that it is good for many others, probably for the majority. I have just developed my idea on that subject in a novel which has been sent to the Revue and will appear after About's. I think that the artist ought to live according to his nature as much as possible. To him who loves struggle, warfare; to him who loves women, love; to an old fellow like me who loves nature, travel and flowers, rocks, fine landscapes, children also, the family, all that stirs the emotions, that combats moral anemia.

I think that art always needs a palette overflowing with soft or striking colors according to the subject of the picture; the artist is an instrument on which everything ought to play before he plays on others; but all that is perhaps not applicable to a mind like yours which has acquired much and now has only to digest. I shall insist on one point only, that the physical being is necessary to the moral being and that I fear for you some day a deterioration of health which will force you to suspend your work and let it grow cold.

Well, you are coming to Paris the beginning of January and we shall see each other; for I shall not go until after the New Year. My children have made me promise to spend that day with them, and I could not resist, in spite of the great necessity of moving. They are so sweet! Maurice has an inexhaustible gaiety and invention. He has made for his marionette theatre, marvelous scenery, properties, and machinery and the plays which they give in that ravishing box are incredibly fantastic.

The last one was called 1870. One sees in it, Isidore with Antonelli commanding the brigands of Calabria, trying to regain his throne and to re-establish the papacy. Everything is in the future; at the end the widow Euphemia marries the Grand Turk, the only remaining sovereign. It is true that he is a former DEMOCRAT and is recognized as none other than the great tumbler Coquenbois when unmasked. These plays last till two o'clock in the morning and we are crazy on coming out of them. We sup till five o'clock. There is a performance twice a week, and the rest of the time they make the properties, and the play continues with the same characters, going through the most incredible adventures.

The public is composed of eight or ten young people, my three great nephews, and sons of my old friends. They get excited to the point of yelling. Aurore is not admitted; the plays are not suited to her age. As for me, I am so amused that I become exhausted. I am sure that you would be madly amused by it also; for there is a splendid fire and abandon in these improvisations; and the characters done by Maurice have the appearance of living beings, of a burlesque life that is real and impossible at the same time; it seems like a dream. That is how I have been living for the ten days that I have not been working.

Maurice gives me this recreation in my intervals of repose that coincide with his. He brings to it as much ardor and passion as to his science. He has a truly charming nature and one never gets bored with him. His wife is also charming, quite large just now, always moving, busying herself with everything, lying down on the sofa twenty times a day, getting up to run after her child, her cook, her husband, who demands a lot of things for his theatre, coming back to lie down again; crying out that she feels ill and bursting into shrieks of laughter at a fly that circles about; sewing layettes, reading the papers with fervor, reading novels which make her weep; weeping also at the marionettes when there is a little sentiment, for there is some of that too. In short a personality and a type: she sings ravishingly, she gets angry, she gets tender, she makes succulent dainties TO SURPRISE US WITH, and every day of our vacation there is a little fete which she organizes.

Little Aurore promises to be very sweet and calm, understanding in a marvelous manner what is said to her and YIELDING TO REASON at two years of age. It is very extraordinary and I have never seen it before. It would be disquieting if one did not feel a great serenity in that little brain.

But how I am gossiping with you! Does all this amuse you? I should like this chatty letter to substitute for one of those suppers of ours which I too regret, and which would be so good here with you, if you were not a stick-in-the-mud, who won't let yourself be dragged away to LIFE FOR LIFE'S SAKE. Ah! when one is on a vacation, how work, logic, reason seem strange CONTRASTS! One asks whether one can ever return to that ball and chain.

I tenderly embrace you, my dear old fellow, and Maurice thinks your letter so fine that he is going to put the phrases and words at once in the mouth of his first philosopher. He bids me embrace you for him.

Madame Juliette Lambert [Footnote: Afterwards, Madame Edmond Adam.] is really charming; you would like her a great deal, and then you have it 18 degrees above zero down there, and here we are in the snow. It is severe; moreover, I rarely go out, and my dog himself doesn't want to go out. He is not the least amazing member of society. When he is called Badinguet, he lies on the ground ashamed and despairing, and sulks all the evening.

LXXV. TO GEORGE SAND 1st January, 1868

It is unkind to sadden me with the recital of the amusements at Nohant, since I cannot share them. I need so much time to do so little that I have not a minute to lose (or gain), if I want to finish my dull old book by the summer of 1869.

I did not say it was necessary to suppress the heart, but to restrain it, alas! As for the regime that I follow which is contrary to the laws of hygiene, I did not begin yesterday. I am accustomed to it. I have, nevertheless, a fairly seasoned sense of fatigue, and it is time that my second part was finished, after which I shall go to Paris. That will be about the end of the month. You don't tell me when you return from Cannes.

My rage against M. Thiers is not yet calmed, on the contrary! It idealizes itself and increases.

LXXVI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 12 January, 1868

No, it is not silly to embrace each other on New Year's day: on the contrary, it is good and it is nice. I thank you for having thought of it and I kiss you on your beautiful big eyes. Maurice embraces you also. I am housed here by the snow and the cold, and my trip is postponed. We amuse ourselves madly at home so as to forget that we are prisoners, and I am prolonging my holidays in a ridiculous fashion. Not an iota of work from morning till night. What luck if you could say as much! — But what a fine winter, don't you think so? Isn't it lovely, the moonlight on the trees covered with snow? Do you look at that at night while you are working? — If you are going to Paris the end of the month, I shall still have a chance to meet you.

From far, or from near, dear old fellow, I think of you and I love you from the depth of my old heart which does not know the flight of years.

G. Sand

My love to your mother always. I imagine that she is in Rouen during this severe cold.

LXXVII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, 10 May, 1868

Yes, friend of my heart, am I not in the midst of terrible things; that poor little Madame Lambert [Footnote: Madame Eugene Lambert, the wife of the artist] is severely threatened.

I saw M. Depaul today. One must be prepared for anything! — If the crisis is passed or delayed, for there is question of bringing on the event, I shall be happy to spend two days with my old troubadour, whom I love tenderly.

G. Sand.

LXXVIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, 11 May, 1868

If you were to be at home Wednesday evening, I should go to chat an hour alone with you after dinner in your quarters. I despair somewhat of going to Croisset; it is tomorrow that that they decide the fate of my poor friend.

A word of response, and above all do not change any plan. Whether I see you or not, I know that two old troubadours love each other devotedly!

G. Sand Monday evening.

LXXIX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, 17 May, 1868

I have a little respite, since they are not going to bring on the confinement. I hope to go to spend two days at that dear Croisset. But then don't go on Thursday, I am giving a dinner for the prince [Footnote: Prince Jerome Napoleon.] at Magny's and I told him that I would detain you by force. Say yes, at once. I embrace you and I love you.

G. Sand

LXXX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

I shall not go with you to Croisset, for you must sleep, and we talk too much. But on Sunday or Monday if you still wish it; only I forbid you to inconvenience yourself. I know Rouen, I know that there are carriages at the railway station and that one goes straight to your house without any trouble.

I shall probably go in the evening.

Embrace your dear mamma for me, I shall be happy to her again.

G. Sand

If those days do not suit you, a word, and I shall communicate with you again. Have the kindness to put the address on the ENCLOSED letter and to put it in the mail.

LXXXI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, 21 Thursday — May, 1868

I see that the day trains are very slow, I shall make a great effort and shall leave at eight o'clock Sunday, so as to lunch with you; if it is too late don't wait for me, I lunch on two eggs made into an omelet or shirred, and a cup of coffee. Or dine on a little chicken or some veal and vegetables.

In giving up trying to eat REAL MEAT, I have found again a strong stomach. I drink cider with enthusiasm, no more champagne! At Nohant, I live on sour wine and galette, and since I am not trying any more to THOROUGHLY NOURISH myself, no more anemia; believe then in the logic of physicians!

In short you must not bother any more about me than about the cat and not even so much. Tell your little mother, just that. Then I shall see you at last, all I want to for two days. Do you know that you are INACCESSIBLE in Paris? Poor old fellow, did you finally sleep like a dormouse in your cabin? I would like to give you a little of my sleep that nothing, not even a cannon, can disturb.

But I have had bad dreams for two weeks about my poor Esther, and now at last, here are Depaul, Tarnier, Gueniaux and Nelaton who told us yesterday that she will deliver easily and very well, and that the child has every reason to be superb. I breathe again, I am born anew, and I am going to embrace you so hard that you will be scandalised. I shall see you on Sunday then, and don't inconvenience yourself.

G. Sand

LXXXII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT Paris, 26 May, 1868

Arrived while dozing. Dined with your delightful and charming friend Du Camp. We talked of you, only of you and your mother, and we said a hundred times that we loved you. I am going to sleep so as to be ready to move tomorrow morning.

I am charmingly located on the Luxembourg garden.

I embrace you, mother and son, with all my heart which is entirely yours.

G. Sand Tuesday evening, rue Gay-Lussac, 5.

LXXXIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT Paris, 28 May, 1868

My little friend gave birth this morning after two hours of labor, to a boy who seemed dead but whom they handled so well that he is very much alive and very lovely this evening. The mother is very well, what luck!

But what a sight! It was something to see. I am very tired, but very content and tell you so because you love me.

G. Sand

Thursday evening. I leave Tuesday for Nohant.

LXXXIV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset
Nohant, 21 June, 1868

Here I am again, BOTHERING you for M. Du Camp's address which you never gave me, although you forwarded a letter for me to him, and from WHOM I never thought of asking for it when I dined with him in Paris. I have just read his Forces Perdues; I promised to tell him my opinion and I am keeping my word. Write the address, then give it to the postman and thank you.

There you are alone at odds with the sun in your charming villa!

Why am I not the...river which cradles you with its sweet MURMURING and which brings you freshness in your den! I would chat discreetly with you between two pages of your novel, and I would make that fantastic grating of the chain [Footnote: The chain of the tug-boat going up or coming down the Seine.] which you detest, but whose oddity does not displease me, keep still. I love everything that makes up a milieu, the rolling of the carriages and the noise of the workmen in Paris, the cries of a thousand birds in the country, the movement of the ships on the waters; I love also absolute, profound silence, and in short, I love everything that is around me, no matter where I am; it is AUDITORY IDIOCY, a new variety. It is true that I choose my milieu and don't go to the Senate nor to other disagreeable places.

Everything is going on well at our house, my troubadour. The children are beautiful, we adore them; it is warm, I adore that. It is always the same old story that I have to tell you and I love you as the best of friends and comrades. You see that is not new. I have a good and strong impression of what you read to me; it seemed to me so beautiful that it must be good. As for me, I am not sticking to anything. Idling is my dominant passion. That will pass, what does not pass, is my friendship for you.

G. Sand

Our affectionate regards.

LXXXV. TO GEORGE SAND

Croisset, Sunday, 5 July, 1868

I have sawed wood hard for six weeks. The patriots won't forgive me for this book, nor the reactionaries either! What do I care! I write things as I feel them, that is to say, as I think they are. Is it foolish of me? But it seems to me that our unhappiness comes exclusively from people of our class. I find an enormous amount of Christianity in Socialism. There are two notes which are now on my table.

"This system (his) is not a system of disorder, for it has its source in the Gospels, and from this divine source, hatred, warfare, the clashing of every interest, CAN NOT PROCEED! for the doctrine formulated from the Gospel, is a doctrine of peace, union and love." (L. Blanc).

"I shall even dare to advance the statement that together with the respect for the Sabbath, the last spark of poetic fire has been extinguished in the soul of our rhymesters. It has been said that without religion, there is no poetry!" (Proudhon).

A propos of that, I beg of you, dear master, to read at the end of his book on the observance of the Sabbath, a love-story entitled, I think, Marie et Maxime. One must know that to have an idea of the style of les Penseurs. It should be placed on a level with Le Voyage en Bretagne by the great Veuillot, in Ca et La. That does not prevent us from having friends who are great admirers of these two gentlemen.

When I am old, I shall write criticism; that will console me, for I often choke with suppressed opinions. No one understands better than I do, the indignation of the great Boileau against bad taste: "The senseless things which I hear at the Academy hasten my end." There was a man!

Every time now that I hear the chain of the steam-boats, I think of you, and the noise irritates me less, when I say to myself that it pleases you. What moonlight there is tonight on the river!

LXXXVI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset

Nohant, 31 July, 1868

I am writing to you at Croisset in any case, because I doubt if you are in Paris during this Toledo-like heat; unless the shade of Fontainebleau has kept you. What a lovely forest, isn't it? but it is especially so in winter, without leaves, with its fresh moss, which has chic. Did you see the sand of Arbonne? There is a little Sahara there which ought to be lovely now.

We are very happy here. Every day a bath in a stream that is always cold and shady; in the daytime four hours of work, in the evening, recreation, and the life of Punch and Judy. A TRAVELLING THEATRICAL COMPANY came to us; it was part of a company from the Odeon, among whom were several old friends to whom we gave supper at La Chatre, two successive nights with all their friends, after the play; — songs, laughter, with champagne frappe, till three o'clock in the morning to the great scandal of the bourgeois, who would have committed any crime to have been there. There was a very comic Norman, a real Norman, who sang real peasant songs to us, in the real language. Do you know that they have quite a Gallic wit and mischief? They contain a mine of master-pieces of genre. That made me love Normandy still more. You may know that comedian. His name is Freville. It is he who is charged in the repertory with the parts of the dull valets, and with being kicked from behind. He is detestable, impossible, but out of the theatre, he is as charming as can be. Such is fate!

We have had some delightful guests at our house, and we have had a joyous time without prejudice to the Lettres d'un Voyageur in the Revue, or to botanical excursions in some very surprising wild places. The little girls are the loveliest thing about it all. Gabrielle is a big lamb, sleeping and laughing all day; Aurore, more spiritual, with eyes of velvet and fire, talking at thirty months as others do at five years, and adorable in everything. They are keeping her back so that she shall not get ahead too fast.

You worry me when you tell me that your book will blame the patriots for everything that goes wrong. Is that really so? and then the victims! it is quite enough to be undone by one's own fault without having one's own foolishness thrown in one's teeth. Have pity! There are so many fine spirits among them just the same! Christianity has been a fad and I confess that in every age it is a lure when one sees only the tender side of it; it wins the heart. One has to consider the evil it does in order to get rid of it. But I am not surprised that a generous heart like Louis Blanc dreamed of seeing it purified and restored to his ideal. I also had that illusion; but as soon as one takes a step in this past, one sees that it can not be revived, and I am sure that now Louis Blanc smiles at his dream. One should think of that also.

One must remind oneself that all those who had intelligence have progressed tremendously during the last twenty years and that it would not be generous to reproach them with what they probably reproach themselves.

As for Proudhon, I never thought him sincere. He is a rhetorician of GENIUS, as they say. But I don't understand him. He is a specimen of perpetual antithesis, without solution. He affects one like one of the old Sophists whom Socrates made fun of.

I am trusting you for GENEROUS sentiments. One can say a word more or less without wounding, one can use the lash without hurting, if the hand is gentle in its strength. You are so kind that you cannot be cruel.

Shall I go to Croisset this autumn? I begin to fear not, and to fear that Cadix is not being rehearsed. But I shall try to escape from Paris even if only for one day.

My children send you their regards. Ah! Heavens! there was a fine quarrel about Salammbo; some one whom you do not know, went so far as not to like it, Maurice called him BOURGEOIS, and to settle the affair, little Lina, who is high tempered, declared that her husband was wrong to use such a word, for he ought to have said IMBECILE. There you are. I am well as a Turk. I love you and I embrace you.

Your old Troubadour,
G. Sand

LXXXVII. TO GEORGE SAND

Dieppe, Monday

But indeed, dear master, I was in Paris during that tropical heat (trop picole, as the governor of the chateau of Versailles says), and I perspired greatly. I went twice to Fontainebleau, and the second time by your advice, saw the sands of Arboronne. It is so beautiful that it made me almost dizzy.

I went also to Saint-Gratien. Now I am at Dieppe, and Wednesday I shall be in Croisset, not to stir from there for a long time, the novel must progress.

Yesterday I saw Dumas: we talked of you, of course, and as I shall see him tomorrow we shall talk again of you.

I expressed myself badly if I said that my book "will blame the patriots for everything that goes wrong." I do not recognize that I have the right to blame anyone. I do not even think that the novelist ought to express his own opinion on the things of this world. He can communicate it, but I do not like him to say it. (That is a part of my art of poetry.) I limit myself, then, to declaring things as they appear to me, to expressing what seems to me to be true. And the devil take the consequences; rich or poor, victors or vanquished, I admit none of all that. I want neither love, nor hate, nor pity, nor anger. As for sympathy, that is different; one never has enough of that. The reactionaries, besides, must be less spared than the others, for they seem to be more criminal.

Is it not time to make justice a part of art? The impartiality of painting would then reach the majesty of the law, — and the precision of science!

Well, as I have absolute confidence in your great mind, when my third part is finished, I shall read it to you, and if there is in my work, something that seems MEAN to you, I will remove it.

But I am convinced beforehand that you will object to nothing.

As for allusions to individuals, there is not a shadow of them.

Prince Napoleon, whom I saw at his sister's Thursday, asked for news of you and praised Maurice. Princess Matilde told me that she thought you "charming," which made me like her better than ever.

How will the rehearsals of Cadio prevent you from coming to see your poor old friend this autumn? It is not impossible. I know Freville. He is an excellent and very cultivated man.

LXXXVIII. TO GEORGE SAND

Croisset, Wednesday evening, 9 September, 1868

Is this the way to behave, dear master? Here it is nearly two months since you have written to your old troubadour! you in Paris, in Nohant, or elsewhere? They say that Cadio is now being rehearsed at the Porte Saint-Martin (so you have fallen out with Chilly?) They say that Thuillier will make her re-appearance in your play. (But I thought she was dying). And when are they to play this Cadio? Are you content? etc., etc.

I live absolutely like an oyster. My novel is the rock to which I attach myself, and I don't know anything that goes on in the world.

I do not even read, or rather I have not read La Lanterne! Rochefort bores me, between ourselves. It takes courage to venture to say even hesitatingly, that possibly he is not the first writer of the century. O Velches! Velches! as M. de Voltaire would sigh (or roar)! But a propos of the said Rochefort, have they been somewhat imbecilic? What poor people!

And Sainte-Beuve? Do you see him? As for me, I am working furiously. I have just written a description of the forest of Fontainebleau that made me want to hang myself from one of its trees. As I was interrupted for three weeks, I am having terrible trouble in getting back to work. I am like the camels, which can't be stopped when they are in motion, nor started when they are resting. It will take me a year to finish the book. After that I shall abandon the bourgeois definitely. He is too difficult and on the whole too ugly. It will be high time to do something beautiful and that I like.

What would please me well for the moment, would be to embrace you.

When will that be? Till then, a thousand affectionate thoughts.

LXXXIX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset

Paris, 10 September, 1868

Just at present, dear friend, there is a truce to my correspondence. On all sides I am reproached, WRONGLY, for not answering letters. I wrote you from Nohant about two weeks ago that I was going to Paris, on business about Cadio: — and now, I am returning to Nohant tomorrow at dawn to see my Aurore. I have written during the last week, four acts of the play, and my task is finished until the end of the rehearsals which will be looked after by my friend and collaborator, Paul Meurice. All his care does not prevent the working out of the first part from being a horrible bungle. One needs to see the putting-on of a play in order to understand that, and if one is not armed with humor and inner zest for the study of human nature in the actual individuals whom the fiction is to mask, there is much to rage about. But I don't rage any more, I laugh; I know too much of all that to get excited about it, and I shall tell you some fine stories about it when we meet.

However, as I am an optimist just the same, I look at the good side of things and people; but the truth is that everything is bad and everything is good in this world.

Poor Thuillier has not sparkling health; but she hopes to carry the burden of the work once more. She needs to earn her living, she is cruelly poor. I told you in my lost letter that Sylvanie [Footnote: Madame Arnould-Plessy.] had been several days at Nohant. She is more beautiful than ever and quite well again after a terrible illness.

Would you believe that I have not seen Sainte-Beuve? That I have had only the time here to sleep a little, and to eat in a hurry? It is just that. I have not heard anyone whatsoever talked about outside of the theatre and of the players. I have had mad desires to abandon everything and to go to surprise you for a couple of hours; but I have not been a day without being kept at FORCED LABOR.

I shall return here the end of the month, and when they play Cadio, I shall beg you to spend twenty-four hours here for me. Will you do it? Yes, you are too good a troubadour to refuse me. I embrace you with all my heart, and your mother too. I am happy that she is well.

G. Sand

XC. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 18 September, 1868

It will be, I think, the 8th or 10th of October. The management announces it for the 26th of September. But that seems impossible to everyone. Nothing is ready; I shall be advised, I shall advise you. I have come to spend the days of respite that my very conscientious and very devoted collaborator allows me. I am taking up again a novel on the THEATRE, the first part of which I had left on my desk, and I plunge every day in a little icy torrent which tumbles me about and makes me sleep like a top. How comfortable one is here with these two little children who laugh and chatter from morning till night like birds, and how foolish it is to go to compose and to put on MADE UP THINGS when the reality is so easy and so fine! But one gets accustomed to regarding all that as a military order, and goes to the front without asking oneself if it means wounds or death. Do you think that that bothers me? No, I assure you; but it does not amuse me either. I go straight ahead, stupid as a cabbage and patient as a Berrichon. Nothing is interesting in my life except OTHER PEOPLE. Seeing you soon in Paris will be more of a pleasure than my business will be an annoyance to me. Your novel interests me more than all mine. Impersonality, a sort of idiocy which is peculiar to me, is making a noticeable progress. If I were not well, I should think that it was a malady. If my old heart did not become each day more loving, I should think it was egotism; in short, I don't know what it is, and there you are. I have had trouble recently. I told you of it in the letter which you did not receive. A person whom you know, whom I love greatly, Celimene, [Footnote: Madame Arnould-Plessy.] has become a religious enthusiast, oh! indeed, an ecstatic, mystic, molinistic religious enthusiast, I don't know what, imbecile! I have exceeded my limits. I have raged, I have said the hardest things to her, I have laughed at her. Nothing made any difference, it was all the same to her. Father Hyacinthe replaces for her every friendship, every good opinion; can you understand that? Her very noble mind, a real intelligence, a worthy character! and there you are! Thuillier is also religious, but without being changed; she does not like priests, she does not believe in the devil, she is a heretic without knowing it. Maurice and Lina are furious against THE OTHER. They don't like her at all. As for me, it gives me much sorrow not to love her any more.

We love you, we embrace you.

I thank you for coming to see Cadio.

G. Sand

XCI. TO GEORGE SAND

Does that astonish you, dear master? Oh well! it doesn't me! I told you so but you would not believe me.

I am sorry for you. For it is sad to see the friends one loves change. This replacement of one soul by another, in a body that remains the same as it was, is a distressing sight. One feels oneself betrayed! I have experienced it, and more than once.

But then, what idea have you of women, O, you who are of the third sex? Are they not, as Proudhon said, "the desolation of the Just"? Since when could they do without delusions? After love, devotion; it is in the natural order of things. Dorine has no more men, she takes the good God. That is all.

The people who have no need of the supernatural, are rare. Philosophy will always be the lot of the aristocrats. However much you fatten human cattle, giving them straw as high as their bellies, and even gilding their stable, they will remain brutes, no matter what one says. All the advance that one can hope for, is to make the brute a little less wicked. But as for elevating the ideas of the mass, giving it a larger and therefore a less human conception of God, I have my doubts.

I am reading now an honest book (written by one of my friends, a magistrate), on the Revolution in the Department of Eure. It is full of extracts from writings of the bourgeois of the time, simple citizens of the small towns. Indeed I assure you that there is now very little of that strength! They were literary and fine, full of good sense, of ideas, and of generosity.

Neo-catholicism on the one hand, and Socialism on the other, have stultified France. Everything moves between the Immaculate Conception and the dinner pails of the working people.

I told you that I did not flatter the democrats in my book. But I assure you that the conservatives are not spared. I am now writing three pages on the abominations of the national guard in June, 1848, which will cause me to be looked at favorably by the bourgeois. I am rubbing their noses in their own dirt as much as I can. But you don't give me any details about Cadio. Who are the actors, etc.? I mistrust your novel about the theatre. You like those people too much! Have you known any well who love their art? What a quantity of artists there are who are only bourgeois gone astray!

We shall see each other in three weeks at the latest. I shall be very glad of it and I embrace you.

And the censorship? I really hope for you that it will make some blunders. Besides, I should be distressed if it was wanting in its usual habits.

Have you read this in the paper? "Victor Hugo and Rochefort, the greatest writers of the age." If Badinguet now is not avenged, it is because he is hard to please in the matter of punishments.

XCII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

The halcyons skim over the water and are common every where. The name is pretty and sufficiently well known.

I embrace you.

Your troubadour.

Paris, Friday evening, 28 August or 4 September, 1868. In October, yes, I will try!

XCIII. TO GEORGE SAND

Saturday evening

I received your two notes, dear master. You send me "halcyon" to replace the word, "dragonfly." Georges Pouchet suggested gerre of the lakes (genus, Gerris). Well! neither the one nor the other suits me, because they do not immediately make a picture for the ignorant reader.

Must I then describe that little creature? But that would retard the movement! That would fill up all the landscape I shall put "insects with large feet" or "long insects." That would be clear and short.

Few books have gripped me more than Cadio, and I share entirely Maxime's [Footnote: Maxime Du Camp.] admiration.

I should have told you of it sooner if my mother and my niece had not taken my copy. At last, this evening, they gave it back to me; it is here on my table, and I am turning the pages as I write you.

In the first place, it seems to me as if IT OUGHT TO HAVE BEEN THE WAY IT IS! It is plain, it gets you and thrills you. How many people must be like Saint-Gueltras, like Count de Sauvieres, like Rebec! and even like Henri, although the models are rarer. As for the character of Cadio, which is more of an invention than the others, what I like best in him is his ferocious anger. In it is the special truth of the character. Humanity turned to fury, the guillotine become mystic, life only a sort of bloody dream, that is what must take place in such heads. I think you have one Shakespearean scene: that of the delegate to the Convention with his two secretaries, is of an incredible strength. It makes one cry out! There is one also which struck me very much at the first reading: the scene where Saint-Gueltras and Henri each have the pistols in their pockets: and many others. What a fine page (I open by chance) is page 161!

In the play won't you have to give a longer role to the wife of the good Saint-Gueltras? The play ought not to be very hard to cut. It is only a question of condensing and shortening it. If it is played, I'll guarantee a terrific success. But the censorship?

Well, you have written a masterpiece, that's true! and a very amusing one. My mother thinks it recalls to her stories that she heard while a child. A propos of Vendee, did you know that her paternal grandfather was, after M. Lescure, the head of the Vendee army? The aforesaid head was named M. Fleuriot d'Argentan. I am not any the prouder for that; besides the thing is doubtful, for my grandfather, a violent republican, hid his political antecedents.

My mother is going in a few days to Dieppe, to her grandchild's. I shall be alone a good part of the summer, and I plan to grub.

"I labor much and shun the world.

It is not at balls that the future is founded."

(Camilla Doucet.)

But my everlasting novel bores me sometimes in an incredible manner! These tiny details are stupid to bother with! Why annoy oneself about such a miserable subject?

I would write you at length about Cadio; but it is late and my eyes are smarting.

So, thank you, very kindly, my dear master.

XCIV. To M. GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croissset
Paris, end of September, 1868

Dear friend,

It is for Saturday next, 3rd October. I am at the theatre every evening from six o'clock till two in the morning. They talk of putting mattresses behind the scenes for the actors who are not in front. As for me, as used to wakefulness as you are, I experience no fatigue; but I should be very much bored if I had not the resource that one has always, of thinking of other things. I am sufficiently accustomed to it to be writing another play while they are rehearsing, and there is something quite exciting in these great dark rooms where mysterious characters move, talking in low tones, in unexpected costumes; nothing is more like a dream, unless one imagines a conspiracy of patients escaped from Bicetre.

I don't at all know what the performance will be. If one did not know the prodigies of harmony and of vim which occur at the last moment, one would judge it all impossible, with thirty-five or forty speaking actors of whom only five or six speak well. One spends hours over the exits and entrances of the characters in blue or white blouses who are to be the soldiers or the peasants, but who, meanwhile perform incomprehensible manoeuvres. Still the dream. One has to be a madman to put on these things. And the frenzy of the actors, pale and worn out, who drag themselves to their place yawning, and suddenly start like crazy people to declaim their tirade; continually the assembling of insane people.

The censorship has left us alone as regards the manuscript; tomorrow these gentlemen will inspect the costumes, which perhaps will frighten them.

I left my dear world very quiet at Nohant. If Cadio succeeds, it will be a little DOT for Aurore; that is all my ambition. If it does not succeed, I shall have to begin over again, that is all.

I shall see you. Then, in any case, that will be a happy day. Come to see me the night before, if you arrive the night before, or even the same day. Come to dine with me the night before or the same day; I am at home from one o'clock to five. Thank you; I embrace you and I love you.

G. Sand

XCV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, 5 October, 1868

Dear good friend, I recommend again to your good offices, my friend Despruneaux, so that you will again do what you can to be of use to him in a very just suit which has already been judged in his favor.

Yours,

G. Sand

XCVI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 15 October, 1868

Here I am “ter hum” where, after having hugged my children and my grandchildren, I slept thirty-six hours at one stretch. You must believe that I was tired and did not notice it. I am waking from that animal-hibernation and you are the first person to whom I want to write. I did not thank you enough for coming to Paris for my sake, you who go about so little: and I did not see you enough either; when I knew that you had supped with Plauchut, [Footnote: Edmond Plauchut, a writer and a friend of George Sand.] I was angry at having stayed to take care of my sickly Thuillier, to whom I was of no use, and who was not particularly pleased about it. Artists are spoiled children and the best are great egoists. You say that I like them too well; I like them as I like the woods and the fields, everything, every one that I know a little and that I study continually. I make my life in the midst of all that, and as I like my life I like all that nourishes it and renews it. They do me a lot of ill turns which I see, but which I no longer feel. I know that there are thorns in the hedges, but that does not prevent me from putting out my hands and finding flowers there. If all are not beautiful, all are interesting. The day you took me to the Abbey of Saint-Georges I found the scrofularia borealis, a very rare plant in France. I was enchanted; there was much...in the neighborhood where I gathered it. Such is life!

And if one does not take life like that, one cannot take it in any way, and then how can one endure it? I find it amusing and interesting, and since I accept EVERYTHING, I am so much happier and more enthusiastic when I meet the beautiful and the good. If I did not have a great knowledge of the species, I should not have quickly understood you, or known you or loved you. I can have an enormous indulgence, perhaps banal, for I have had to practice it so much; but appreciation is quite another thing, and I do not think that it is entirely worn out in your old troubadour's mind.

I found my children still very good and very tender, my two little grandchildren still pretty and sweet. This morning I dreamed, and I woke up saying this strange sentence: "There is always a youthful great first part in the drama of life. First part in mine: Aurore." The fact is that it is impossible not to idolize that little one. She is so perfect in intelligence and goodness, that she seems to me like a dream.

You also, without knowing it, YOU ARE A DREAM ... like that. Plauchut saw you once, and he adored you. That proves that he is not stupid. When he left me in Paris, he told me to remember him to you.

I left Cadix in doubt between good and average receipts. The cabal against the new management relaxed after the second day. The press was half favorable, half hostile. The good weather is against it. The hateful performance of Roger is also against it. So that we don't know yet if we shall make money or not. As for me, when money comes, I say, "So much the better," without excitement, and if it does not come, I say, "So much the worse," without any chagrin. Money not being the aim, ought not to be the preoccupation. It is, moreover, not the real proof of success, since so many vapid or poor things make money.

Here I am with another play already underway, so as to keep my hand in. I have a novel also on the stocks, on the STROLLING PLAYERS. I have studied them a good deal this time without learning anything new. I already had the plot. It is not complicated and is very logical.

I embrace you tenderly as well as your little mother. Give me some sign of life. Does the novel get on?

G. Sand

XCVII. TO GEORGE SAND

Saturday evening

I am remorseful for not having answered at length your last letter, my dear master. You told me of the “ill turns” that people did you. Did you think that I did not know it? I confess to you even (between ourselves), that I was hurt on account of them more because of my good taste, than because of my affection for you. I did not think that several of your friends were warm enough towards you. “My God! my God! how mean literary men are!” A bit out of the correspondence of the first Napoleon. What a nice bit, eh? Doesn’t it seem to you that they belittle him too much?

The infinite stupidity of the masses makes me indulgent to individualities, however odious they may be. I have just gulped down the first six volumes of Buchez and Roux. The clearest thing I got out of them is an immense disgust for the French. My Heavens! Have we always been bunglers in this fair land of ours? Not a liberal idea which has not been unpopular, not a just thing that has not caused scandal, not a great man who has not been mobbed or knifed! “The history of the human mind is the history of human folly!” as says M. de Voltaire.

And I am convinced more and more of this truth: the doctrine of grace has so thoroughly permeated us that the sense of justice has disappeared. What terrified me so in the history of ‘48 has quite naturally its origins in the Revolution, which had not liberated itself from the middle ages, no matter what they say. I have re-discovered in Marat entire fragments of Proudhon (sic) and I wager that they would be found again in the preachers of the League.

What is the measure that the most advanced proposed after Varennes? Dictatorship and military dictatorship. They close the churches, but they raise temples, etc.

I assure you that I am becoming stupid with the Revolution. It is a gulf which draws me in.

However, I work at my novel like a lot of oxen. I hope on New Year’s Day not to have over a hundred pages more to write, that is to say, still six good months of work. I shall go to Paris as late as possible. My winter is to pass in complete solitude, good way of making life run along rapidly.

XCVIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, in Paris
Nohant, 20 November, 1868

You say to me, "When shall we see each other?" About the 15th of December, we are baptizing here our two little girls as Protestants. It is Maurice's idea; he was married before the pastor, and does not want the persecution and influence of the Catholic church about his children. Our friend Napoleon is the godfather of Aurore, and I am the godmother. My nephew is the godfather of the other. All that takes place just among ourselves, in the family. You must come, Maurice wants you to, and if you say no, you will disappoint him greatly. You shall bring your novel, and in a free moment, you shall read it to me; it will do you good to read it to one who listens well. One gets a perspective and judges one's work better. I know that. Say yes to your old troubadour, he will be EXCEEDINGLY GRATEFUL to you for it.

I embrace you six times if you say yes.

G. Sand

XCIX. TO GEORGE SAND

Tuesday

Dear master,

You cannot imagine the sorrow you give me! In spite of the longing I have, I answer "no." Yet I am distracted with my desire to say "yes." It makes me seem like a gentleman who cannot be disturbed, which is very silly. But I know myself: if I go to your house at Nohant, I shall have a month of dreaming about my trip. Real pictures will replace in my brain the fictitious pictures which I compose with great difficulty. All my house of cards will topple over.

Three weeks ago because I was foolish enough to accept an invitation to dinner at a country place nearby, I lost four days (sic). What would it be on leaving Nohant? You do not understand that, you strong Being! I think that you will be a little vexed with your old troubadour for not coming to the baptism of the two darlings of his friend Maurice? The dear master must write to me if I am wrong, and to give me the news!

Here is mine! I work immoderately and am absolutely ENCHANTED by the prospect of the end which begins to be visible.

So that it may arrive more quickly, I have made the resolution to live here all winter, probably until the end of March. Even admitting that everything goes perfectly, I shall not have finished all before the end of May. I don't know anything that goes on and I read nothing, except a little of the French Revolution, after my meals, to aid digestion. I have lost my former good habit of reading every day in Latin. Therefore I don't know a word of it any more! I shall polish it up again when I am freed from my odious bourgeois, and I am nowhere near it.

My only excitement consists in going to dine on Sundays at Rouen with my mother. I leave at six o'clock, and I am home at ten. Such is my life.

Did I tell you that I had a visit from Tourgueneff? How you would love him!

Sainte-Beuve gets along. Anyway, I shall see him next week when I am in Paris for two days, to get necessary information. What is the information about? The national guard!!!

Listen to this: le Figaro not knowing with what to fill its columns, has had the idea of saying that my novel tells the life of Chancellor Pasquier. Thereupon, fear of the aforesaid family, which wrote to another part of the same family living in Rouen, which latter has been to find a lawyer from whom my brother received a visit, so that ... in short, I was very stupid not to "get some benefit from the opportunity." Isn't it a fine piece of idiocy, eh?

C. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, AT CEOISSET

Nohant, 21 December, 1868

Certainly, I am cross with you and angry with you, not from unreasonableness nor from selfishness, but on the contrary, because we were joyous and HILARIOUS and you would not distract yourself and amuse yourself with us. If it was to amuse yourself elsewhere, you would be pardoned in advance; but it was to shut yourself up, to get all heated up, and besides for a work which you curse, and which — wishing to do and being obliged to do anyhow, — you ought to be able to do at your ease and without becoming too absorbed in it.

You tell me that you are like that. There is nothing more to say; but one may well be distressed at having an adored friend, a captive in chains far away, whom one may not free. It is perhaps a little coquettish on your part, so as to make yourself pitied and loved the more. I, who have not buried myself alive in literature, have laughed and lived a great deal during these holidays, but always thinking of you and talking of you with our friend of the Palais Royal, [Footnote: Jerome Napoleon.] who would have been happy to see you and who loves you and appreciates you a great deal. Tourgueneff has been more fortunate than we, since he was able to snatch you from your ink-well. I know him personally very little, but I know his work by heart. What talent! and how original and polished! I think that the foreigners do better than we do. They do not pose, while we either put on airs or grovel: the Frenchman has no longer a social milieu, he has no longer an intellectual milieu.

I except you, you who live a life of exception, and I except myself, because of the foundation of careless unconventionally which was bestowed upon me; but I, I do not know how to be “careful” and to polish, and I love life too much, and I am amused too much by the mustard and all that is not the real “dinner,” to ever be a litterateur. I have had flashes of it, but they have not lasted. Existence where one ignores completely one’s “moi” is so good, and life where one does not play a role is such a pretty performance to watch and to listen to! When I have to give of myself, I live with courage and resolution, but I am no longer amused.

You, oh! fanatical troubadour, I suspect you of amusing yourself at your profession more than at anything in the world. In spite of what you say about it, art could well be your sole passion, and your shutting yourself up, at which I mourn like the silly that I am, your state of pleasure. If it is like that then, so much the better, but acknowledge it to console me.

I am going to leave you in order to dress the marionettes, for the plays and the laughter have been resumed with the bad weather, and that will keep us busy for a part of the winter, I fancy. Behold! here I am, the imbecile that you love, and that you call MASTER. A fine master who likes to amuse himself better than to work!

Scorn me profoundly, but love me still. Lina tells me to tell you that you are not much, and Maurice is furious too; but we love you in spite of ourselves and embrace you just the same. Our friend Plauchut wants to be remembered to you; he adores you too.

Yours, you huge ingrate,
G. Sand

I had read the hoax of le Figaro and had laughed at it. It turns out to have assumed grotesque proportions. As for me, they gave me a grandson instead of two granddaughters, and a Catholic baptism instead of a Protestant. That does not make any difference. One really has to lie a little to divert oneself.

CI. TO GEORGE SAND*Saint Sylvester's night, one o'clock, 1869

Why should I not begin the year of 1869 in wishing to you and to yours "Happy New Year and many of them"? It is rococo, but it pleases me. Now, let us talk.

No, I don't get into a heat, for I have never been better. They thought me, in Paris, "fresh as a young girl," and those people who don't know my life attributed that appearance of health to the air of the country. That is what conventional ideas are. Every one has his system. For my part, when I am not hungry, the only thing I can eat is dry bread. And the most indigestible food, such as apples in sour cider, and bacon, are what cure me of the stomach-ache. And so on. A man who has no common sense ought not to try to live according to common-sense rules.

As for my frenzy for work, I will compare it to an attack of herpes. I scratch myself while I cry. It is both a pleasure and a torture at the same time. And I am doing nothing that I want to! For one does not choose one's subjects, they force themselves on one. Shall I ever find mine? Will an idea fall from Heaven suitable to my temperament? Can I write a book to which I shall give myself heart and soul? It seems to me in my moments of vanity, that I am beginning to catch a glimpse of what a novel ought to be. But I still have three or four of them to write before that one (which is, moreover, very vague), and at the rate I am going, if I write these three or four, that will be the most I can do. I am like M. Prudhomme, who thinks that the most beautiful church would be one which had at the same time the spire of Strasbourg, the colonnade of Saint Peter's, the portico of the Parthenon, etc. I have contradictory ideals. Thence embarrassment, hesitation, impotence.

As to whether the "claustration" to which I condemn myself may be a "state of joy," no. But what can I do? To get drunk with ink is more worth while than to get drunk with brandy. The muse, cross-grained as she is, gives less trouble than a woman. I cannot harmonize the one with the other. I must choose. My choice was made a long time ago. There remains the matter of the senses. They have always been my servants. Even at the time of my earliest youth, I did exactly as I wanted with them. I have reached my fiftieth year, and it is not their ardor that troubles me.

This regime is not amusing, I agree to that. There are moments of empty and horrible boredom. But they become more and more rare in proportion as one grows older. In short, LIVING seems to me a business for which I was not made, and yet...!

I stayed in Paris for three days, which I made use of in hunting up information, and in doing errands about my book. I was so worn out last Friday, that I went to bed at seven o'clock in the evening. Such are my mad orgies at the capital.

I found the Goncourts in a frenzied (sic) admiration over a book entitled Histoire de ma vie by George Sand. Which proves more good taste than learning on their part. They even wanted to write to you to express all their admiration. (In return I found ***** stupid. He compares Feydeau to Chateaubriand, admires very much the Lepreux de la cite d'Aoste, finds Don Quichotte tedious, etc.).

Do you notice how rare literary sense is? The knowledge of language, archeology, history, etc., all that should be useful however! Well! well! not at all! The so-called enlightened people are becoming more and more incompetent in the matter of art. Even what art means escapes them. The glosses for them are more important than the text. They pay more attention to the crutches than to the legs themselves.

CII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT 1st January, 1869

It is one o'clock, I have just embraced my children. I am tired from having spent the night in making a complete costume for a large doll for Aurore; but I don't want to turn in without embracing you also, my great friend, and my dear, big child. May '69 be easy for you, and may it see the end of your novel. May you keep well and be always yourself! I don't know anything better, and I love you.

G. Sand

I have not the address of the Goncourts. Will you put the enclosed answer in the mail?

CIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset

Nohant, 17 January, 1869

The individual named George Sand is well: he is enjoying the marvelous winter which reigns in Berry, gathering flowers, noting interesting botanical anomalies, making dresses and mantles for his daughter-in-law, costumes for the marionettes, cutting out scenery, dressing dolls, reading music, but above all spending hours with the little Aurore who is a marvelous child. There is not a more tranquil or a happier individual in his domestic life than this old troubadour retired from business, who sings from time to time his little song to the moon, without caring much whether he sings well or ill, provided he sings the motif that runs in his head, and who, the rest of the time, idles deliciously. It has not always been as nice as this. He had the folly to be young; but as he did no evil nor knew evil passions, nor lived for vanity, he is happy enough to be peaceful and to amuse himself with everything.

This pale character has the great pleasure of loving you with all his heart, and of not passing a day without thinking of the other old troubadour, confined in his solitude of a frenzied artist, disdainful of all the pleasures of this world, enemy of the magnifying glass and of its attractions. We are, I think, the two most different workers that exist; but since we like each other that way, it is all right. The reason each of us thinks of the other at the same hour, is because each of us has a need of his opposite; we complete ourselves, in identifying ourselves at times with what is not ourselves.

I told you, I think, that I had written a play on returning from Paris. They liked it; but I don't want them to play it in the spring, and the end of the winter is filled up, unless the play they are rehearsing fails. As I do not know how to WISH my colleagues ill luck, I am in no hurry and my manuscript is on the shelf. I have the time. I am writing my little annual novel, when I have one or two hours a day to get to work on it; I am not sorry to be prevented from thinking of it. That develops it. Always before going to sleep, I have an agreeable quarter of an hour to continue it in my head; there you have it.

I know nothing, nothing at all of the Sainte-Beuve incident. I get a dozen newspapers, whose wrappers I respect to such an extent that without Lina, who tells me the chief news from time to time, I would not know if Isidore were still among us.

Sainte-Beuve is very high tempered, and, as regards opinions, so perfectly skeptical, that I should never be astonished at anything he did, in one sense or the other. He was not always like that, at least not so much so. I have known him to be more credulous and more republican than I was then. He was thin and pale, and gentle; how people change! His talent, his knowledge, his mind have increased enormously, but I used to like his character better. Just the same, there is still much good in him. There is still love and reverence for letters — and he will be the last of the critics. Criticism rightly so-called, will disappear. Perhaps there is no longer any reason for its existence. What do you think about it?

It appears that you are studying the boor (pignouf). As for me, I avoid him. I know him too well. I love the Berrichon peasant who is not, who never is, a boor, even when he is of no great account; the word pignouf has its depths; it was created exclusively for the bourgeois, wasn't it? Ninety out of a hundred provincial middle-class women are boorish (pignouf lardes) to a high degree, even with pretty faces that ought to give evidence of delicate instincts. One is surprised to find a basis of gross self-sufficiency in these false ladies. Where is the woman now? She is becoming a freak in society.

Good night, my troubadour: I love you, and I embrace you warmly; Maurice also.

G. Sand

CIV. TO GEORGE SAND

Croisset, Tuesday, 2 February, 1869

My dear master,

You see in your troubadour a worn-out man. I have spent a week in Paris, looking up wearisome information (from seven to nine hours in fiacres every day, which is a fine way to make money out of literature). Oh, well!

I have just reread my outline. All that I have still to write horrifies me, or rather disgusts me, so that I want to vomit. It is always so, when I get to work. It is then that I am bored, bored, bored! But this time exceeds all others. That is why I dread so much interruptions in the daily grind. I could not do otherwise, however. I dragged about at funerals at Pere-Lachaise, in the valley of Montmorency, through shops of religious objects, etc.

In short, I have enough material for four or five months now. What a big "Hooray" I shall utter, when it is finished, and when I am not in the midst of remaking the bourgeois! It is high time that I enjoyed life.

I saw Sainte-Beuve and the Princess Mathilde, and I know thoroughly the story of their break, which seems to me irrevocable. Sainte-Beuve was outraged against Dalloz and has gone to le Temps. The princess begged him not to do anything about it. He did not listen to her. That is all. My opinion on it, if you wish to know it, is this. The first wrong was done by the princess, who was hasty; but the second and the worst was by pere Beuve, who did not behave as a courteous man. If one has a friend, a rather good fellow, and that friend has given one thirty thousand francs a year income, one owes him some consideration. It seems to me that in Sainte-Beuve's place I should have said, "That displeases you, let us talk no more about it." He lacked manners and poise. What disgusted me a little, between ourselves, was the way he praised the emperor to me! yes, he praised Badinguet, to me! — And we were alone!

The princess had taken the thing too seriously from the beginning. I wrote to her, saying that Sainte-Beuve was right; he, I am sure, found me rather cold. It was then, in order to justify himself to me, that he made these protestations of isidorian love, which humiliated me a little; for it was as if he took me for a complete imbecile.

I think that he is preparing for a funeral like Beranger's, and that Hugo's popularity makes him jealous. Why write for the papers, when one can make books, and when one is not perishing of hunger? He's no sage, Sainte-Beuve. Not like you!

Your strength charms me and amazes me. I mean the strength of your entire being, not only that of your brain.

You speak of criticism in your last letter to me, telling me that it will soon disappear. I think, on the contrary, that it is, at most, only at its dawning. They are on a different tack from before, but nothing more. At the time of La Harpe, they were grammarians; at the time of Sainte-Beuve and of Taine, they are historians. When will they be artists, only artists, but really artists? Where do you know a criticism? Who is there who is anxious about the work in itself, in an intense way? They analyze very keenly the setting in which it was written, and the causes that produced it; but the UNCONSCIOUS poetic expression? Where it comes from? its composition, its style? the point of view of the author? Never.

That criticism would require great imagination and great sympathy. I mean a faculty of enthusiasm that is always ready, and then TASTE, a rare quality, even among the best, so much so that one does not talk about it any longer.

What irritates me every day, is to see a master-piece and a disgrace put on the same level. They exalt the little, and they lower the great, nothing is more imbecile nor more immoral.

At Pere-Lachaise I was seized with a profound and sorrowful disgust for humanity. You can not imagine the fetichism of the tombs. The real Parisian is more of an idolater than a negro is! It made me long to lie down in one of the graves.

And the PROGRESSIVES think that there is nothing better than to rehabilitate Robespierre! Note Hamel's book! If the Republic returned they would bless the liberty poles out of policy and believing that measure strong.

When shall I see you? I plan to be in Paris from Easter to the end of May, This spring I shall go to see you at Nohant, I swear it.

CV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 11 February, 1869

While you are running around to get material for your novel, I am inventing all sorts of pretexts not to write mine. I let myself be distracted by guilty fancies, something I am reading fascinates me and I set myself to scribbling on paper that will be left in my desk and bring me no return. That has amused me, or rather that has compelled me, for it would be in vain for me to struggle against these caprices; they interrupt me and force me...you see that I have not the strength of mind that you think.

As for our masculine friend, he is ungrateful, while our feminine friend is too exacting. You were right; they are both wrong and it is not their fault, it is the social machinery which insists on it. The kind of recognition, that is to say, submission that she exacts, depends on a tradition that the present time still profits by (there lies the evil); but does not accept any longer as a duty. The notions of the obliged are changed, those of the obliger ought to change also. It must be said that one does not buy moral liberty by any kindness, — and as for him, he should have foreseen that he would be considered enchained. The simplest thing would have been not to care about having thirty thousand francs a year. It is so easy to do without it. Let him extricate himself. They won't entangle us in it: we aren't so foolish!

You say very good things about criticism. But in order to do as you say, there must be artists, and the artist is too much occupied with his own work, to forget himself in estimating that of others.

Heavens, what fine weather! Don't you enjoy it, at least from your window? I'll wager that the tulip tree is in bud. Here, the peaches and the apricots are in flower. It is said that they will be ruined; that does not stop them from being pretty and not tormenting themselves about it.

We have had our family carnival: my niece, my grandchildren, etc. We all put on fancy dress; it is not difficult here, one only has to go to the wardrobe and one comes down again as Cassandra, Scapin, Mezzetin, Figaro, Basile, etc., all that is very pretty. The pearl was Lolo as a little Louis XIII in crimson satin, trimmed with white satin fringed and laced with silver. I spent three days in making this costume, which was very chic; it was so pretty and so funny on that little girl of three years, that we were all amazed in looking at her.

Then we played charades, had supper, and frolicked till daylight. You see that banished to a desert, we keep up a good deal of vitality. And that I delay all I can, the trip to Paris and the chapter of business. If you were there, I would not need to be urged. But you are going there the end of March if and I can not afford to wait till then. To conclude, you swear to come this summer and we count on it absolutely. Sooner than not have you come I shall go to drag you here by the hair. I embrace you most warmly on this good hope.

G. Sand

CVI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset
Nohant, 24 February, 1869

I am all alone at Nohant as you are all alone at Croisset. Maurice and Lina have gone to Milan, to see Calamatta who is dangerously ill.

Should they have the misfortune to lose him, they will have to go to Rome to settle his estate, an irksome task added to a sorrow, it is always like that. That sudden separation was sad, my poor Lina weeping at leaving her daughters and weeping at not being with her father. They left me the care of the children whom I rarely leave and who only let me work when they sleep; but I am happier at having this care on my shoulders to console me. I have, every day, in two hours news from Milan by telegram. The patient is better; my children are only as far as Turin today and do not know yet what I know. How this telegraph changes one's idea of life, and when the formalities and formulas are still more simplified, how full existence will be of facts and how free from uncertainties.

Aurore, who lives on adorations in the lap of her father and mother and who weeps every day when I am away, has not asked a single time where they are. She plays and laughs, then she stops; her great eyes stare, she says: MY FATHER? another time she says: MAMMA? I distract her, she thinks no more of it, and then she begins again. They are very mysterious, children! They think without understanding. Only one sad word is needed to bring out their sorrow. She carries it unconsciously. She looks in my eyes to see if I am sad or anxious; I laugh and she laughs, I think that we must keep her sensitiveness asleep as long as possible, and that she never would weep for me if they did not speak of me.

What is your advice, you who have brought up an intelligent and charming niece? Is it wise to make them loving and affectionate early? I thought so formerly: I was afraid when I saw Maurice too impressionable and Solange too much the opposite, and resisting affection. I would like little ones to be shown only the sweet and the good of life, until the time when reason can help them to accept or to fight the bad. What do you say?

I embrace you and ask you to tell me when you are going to Paris, my trip is delayed as my children may be absent a month; I shall be able, perhaps, to meet you in Paris.

Your old solitary,

G. Sand

What an admirable definition I rediscover with surprise in the fatalist Pascal!

“Nature acts progressively, itus et reditus. It goes on and returns, then it goes still further, then half as far, then further than ever.”
[Footnote: George Sand had copied this and fastened it over her work table at Nohant.]

What a way of speaking, eh? How the language turns, is twisted, made supple, is condensed under this grandiose “hand.”

CVII. TO GEORGE SAND

Tuesday night

What do I say about it, dear master? Should one excite or repress the sensitiveness of children? It seems to me that one should not have any set rule about it. It is according as they have a tendency to too much or too little. Moreover, the basis isn't changed. There are tender natures and hard natures, irremediably so. And then the same sight, the same lesson can produce opposite effects. Could anything have hardened me more than having been brought up in a hospital and having played, as a child, in a dissecting amphitheatre? But no one is more sensitive than I am to physical suffering. It is true that I am the son of an extremely humane man, sensitive in the true meaning of the word. The sight of a suffering dog made tears come to his eyes. He did his surgical operations none the less well, and he invented some dreadful ones.

“Show little ones only the sweet and the good of life until the time when reason can help them to accept or to fight the bad.” Such is not my opinion. For then something terrible, an infinite disenchantment is bound to be produced in their hearts. And then, how could reason form itself, if it does not apply itself (or if one does not apply it daily) to distinguish good from evil? Life ought to be a continual education; one must learn everything — from talking to dying.

You tell me very true things about the unconsciousness of children. He who could read clearly in these little brains would grasp in them the roots of the human race, the origin of the gods, the sap which produces actions later on, etc. A negro who talks to his idol, and a child who talks to her doll seem to me close together.

The child and the savage (the primitive) do not distinguish the real from the fantastic. I remember very clearly that at five or six years of age I wanted to “send my heart” to a little girl with whom I was in love

(I mean my material heart). I could see it in the middle of straw, in a basket, an oyster basket.

But no one has been so far as you in these analyses. There are some infinitely profound pages about it in the Histoire de ma vie. What I say is true, since minds quite opposite to yours have been amazed at them. For instance, the Goncourts.

The good Tourgueneff ought to be in Paris at the end of March. What would be fine, would be for us all three to dine together.

I am thinking again of Sainte-Beuve. Without doubt one can get along without thirty thousand francs a year. But there is something easier yet: that is, when one has them, not to launch into abuse, every week, in the papers. Why doesn't he write books, since he is rich and has talent?

I am just now reading Don Quichotte again. What a tremendous old book! Is there any more beautiful?

CVIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 7 March, 1869

Still alone with my grandchildren; my nephews and friends come to spend two out of every three days with me, but I miss Maurice and Lina. Poor Calamatta is at the last gasp.

Give me the address of the Goncourts, you have never given it to me.

Shall I never know it? My letter is still waiting there for them.

I love you and embrace you. I love you much, much, and I embrace you very warmly.

G. Sand

CIX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 12 March, 1869

Poor Calamatta died the 9th, my children are coming back. My Lina must be distressed. I have news from them only by telegraph. From Milan here in an hour and a half. But there are no details, and I am anxious. I embrace you tenderly,

G. Sand

Thank you for the address.

CX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset

Nohant, 2 April, 1869

Dear friend of my heart, here we are once more calm again. My children returned to me very exhausted. Aurore has been a little ill. Lina's mother has come to get into touch with her about their affairs. She is a loyal and excellent woman, very artistic, and very amiable. I too have had a bad cold, but everything is getting better now, and our charming little girls console their little mother. If it were less bad weather, and I had a less bad cold, I would go at once to Paris, for I want to see you there. How long do you stay there? Tell me quickly.

I shall be very glad to renew my acquaintance with Tourgueneff, whom I knew a little without having read him, and whom I have since read with a whole-hearted admiration. You seem to me to love him a great deal; then I love him too, and I wish when your novel is finished, that you would bring him to our house. Maurice also knows him and appreciates him greatly, he who likes whatever does not resemble anything else.

I am working at my novel about TRAVELING ACTORS [Footnote: Pierre qui roule.] like a convict. I am trying to have it amusing and to explain art; it is a new form for me and amuses me. Perhaps it will not have any success. The taste of the day is for marquises and courtesans; but what difference does that make? — You must find me a title, which is a resume of that idea: THE MODERN ROMAN COMIQUE.

My children send you affectionate greetings; your old troubadour embraces his old troubadour.

G. Sand

Answer quickly how long you expect to stay in Paris. You say that you are paying bills and that you are vexed. If you have need of quibus, I have at the moment a few sous I can lend you. You know that you offered once to lend me some. If I had been in a hole I would have accepted. Give all my regards to Maxime Du Camp and thank him for not forgetting me.

CXI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 17 April, 1869

I am well, I am finishing (today, I hope) my modern Roman comique which will be called I don't know what. I am a little tired, for I have done a lot of other things. But I am going to Paris in eight or ten days to rest, to embrace you, to talk of you, of your work, to forget mine, God be thanked! and to love you as always very much and very tenderly.

G. Sand

Regards from Maurice and his wife.

CXII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Monday, 26 April, 1869

I arrived last night, I am running around like a rat, but every day at 6 o'clock one is sure of finding me at Magny's, and the first day that you are free, come to dine with your old troubadour who loves you and embraces you.

Send word ahead to me, however, so that by an exceptional chance, I do not have the ill luck to miss you.

Monday.

CXIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Thursday evening, 29 April, 1869

I am back from Palaiseau and I find your letter. Saturday I am not sure of being free; I have to read my play with Chilly on account of some objections of detail, and I had told you so. But I see him tomorrow evening, and I shall try to get him to give me another day. I shall write you then, tomorrow evening, Friday, and if he frees me, I shall go to your house about three o'clock on Saturday so that we can read before and after dinner; I dine on a little fish, a chicken wing, an ice and a cup of coffee, never anything else, by which means my stomach keeps well. If I am kept by Chilly, we shall postpone till next week after Friday.

I sold Palaiseau today to a master shoemaker who has a LEATHER plaster on his right eye, and who calls the sumachs of the garden, the schumakre.

Then Saturday morning you shall have word from your old comrade.

G. Sand

CXIV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT 30 April, 1869

No way of going out today. This slavery to one's profession is horrid, isn't it? Between now and Friday I shall write to you so that we can again settle on a day. I embrace you, my old beloved troubadour.

G. Sand

CXV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT 3 May, 1869

They are encroaching upon my time more and more. All my days are full until and including next Sunday. — Tell me quickly if you want me Monday, a week from today — or if it is another day. Let us fix it for it is a fact that I don't really know whom to listen to.

Your troubadour who does not want THIS STATE OF AFFAIRS to continue!

G. Sand

Monday.

CXVI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, 4 May, 1869

On Monday then, and if I have an hour free I shall try to embrace my troubadour before that. But don't disturb yourself, I know very well that one does nothing here that one would like to do. Anyway, on Monday between three and four, clear out your windpipe so as to read me a part before dinner.

G. Sand

Tues. evening.

CXVII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Sunday, 9 May, 1869

Tomorrow, your reverence, I shall go to dine at your house. I shall be at home every day at five o'clock, but you might meet some guys whom you dislike. You would much better come to Magny's where you would find me alone, or with Plauchut, or with friends who are also yours.

I embrace you. I received today the letter which you wrote to me at Nohant.

G. Sand

CXVIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, 18 May, 1869

I saw Levy today, I tested him at first; I saw that he would not give up his contract at any price. I then said to him many good things about the book and made the remark that he had gotten it very cheap. But he said to me, if the book is in two volumes, it will be 20,000 francs, that is agreed. So I suppose that you will have two volumes, won't you?

However, I persisted and he said to me: If the book is a success, I shall not begrudge two or three thousand francs more. I said that you would not demand anything, that it was not your way of acting, but that for MY PART, I should insist for you without your knowledge, and he left me saying: Be easy, I don't say no. Should the book succeed I will make the author profit by it.

That is all that I have been able to do now, but I will take it up again at the proper time and place. Leave that to me, I will return your contract. What day next week will you dine with me at Magny's? I am a little weary.

You would be very kind to come to read at my house, we should be alone and one evening will be enough for the rest. Set the day, and AT SIX THIRTY if that does not bother you. My stomach is beginning to suffer a little from Paris habits. Your troubadour who loves you,

G. Sand

The rest of the week will finish up Palaiseau, but Sunday if you like, I am free. Answer if you want Sunday at Magny's at half past six.

CXIX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Then Monday, I count on you, at half past six; but as I am going to Palaiseau, I may be a few minutes late or early. The first one at Magny's must wait for the other. I am looking forward with pleasure to hearing THE REST. Don't forget the manuscript.

Your troubadour Thursday evening, 20 May, 1869.

CXX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT Paris, 29 May, 1869

Yes, Monday, my dear good friend, I count on you and I embrace you.

G. Sand

I am off for Palaiseau AND IT IS TEN O'CLOCK IN THE MORNING!

CXXI. TO GEORGE SAND

My prophecy is fulfilled; My friend X — — has gained only ridicule with his candidacy. That serves him right. When a man of style debases himself to practical life, he loses caste and should be punished. And then, is it a question of politics, now! The citizens who are excited for or against the Empire or the Republic seem to me as useful as those who discuss efficacious or efficient grace. Politics are as dead as theology! They have had three hundred years of existence, that is quite enough.

Just now I am lost in the Church Fathers. As for my novel l'Education sentimentale, I am paying no more attention to it, God be thanked! It is recopied. Other hands have gone over it. So, the thing is no longer mine. It does not exist any longer, good night. I have taken up again my old hobby of Saint Antoine. I have reread my notes, I am making another new plan and I am devouring the ecclesiastical memoirs of the Nain de Tillemont. I hope to succeed in finding a logical connection (and therefore a dramatic interest) between the different hallucinations of the Saint. This extravagant setting pleases me and I am absorbed in it, there you are!

My poor Bouilhet bothers me. He is in such a nervous state that they have advised him to take a little trip to the south of France. He is overwhelmed by an unconquerable melancholy. Isn't it queer! He who was so gay, formerly!

My Heavens! What a beautiful and farcical thing is the life of the desert Fathers! But without doubt they were all Buddhists. That is a stylish problem to work at, and its solution would be more important than the election of an academician. Oh! ye men of little faith! Long live Saint Polycarp!

Fangeat, who has reappeared recently, is the citizen who, on the 25th day of February, 1848, demanded the death of Louis-Philippe "without a trial." That is the way one serves the cause of progress.

CXXII. TO GEORGE SAND

What a good and charming letter was yours, adored master! There is no one but you! upon my word of honor! I am ending by believing it. A wind of stupidity and folly is now blowing over the world. Those who stand up firm and straight against it are rare.

This is what I meant when I wrote that the times of politics were over. In the 18th century the chief business was diplomacy. "The secrecy of the cabinets" really existed. The peoples still were sufficiently amenable to be separated and to be combined. That order of things seems to me to have said its last word in 1815. Since then, one has hardly done anything except dispute about the external form that it is fitting to give the fantastic and odious being called the State.

Experience proves (it seems to me) that no form contains the best in itself; orleanism, republic, empire do not mean anything anymore, since the most contradictory ideas can enter into each one of these pigeon holes. All the flags have been so soiled with blood and with filth that it is time not to have any at all. Down with words! No more symbols nor fetiches! The great moral of this reign will be to prove that universal suffrage is as senseless as the divine right although a little less odions!

The question is then out of place. One is concerned no longer with dreaming of the best form of government, since all are equal, but with making science prevail. That is the most important. The rest will follow inevitably. Purely intellectual men have rendered more service to the human race than all the Saint Vincent de Pauls in the world! And politics will be an everlasting folly so long as it is not subordinate to science. The government of a country ought to be a section of the Institute, and the last section of all.

Before concerning yourself with relief funds, and even with agriculture, send to all the villages in France, Robert Houdins to work miracles! The greatest crime of Isidore is the wretched condition in which he leaves our beautiful country. Dixi. I admire Maurice's occupations and his healthy life. But I am not capable of imitating him. Nature, far from fortifying me, drains my strength. When I lie on the grass I feel as if I am already under the earth and that the roots of green things are beginning to grow in my belly. Your troubadour is naturally an unhealthy man. I do not like the country except when travelling, because then the independence of my individuality causes me to rise above the knowledge of my nothingness.

CXXIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 6 August, 1869

Well, dear good friend, here it is August, and you have promised to come. We don't forget it, we count on it, we dream of it, and we talk of it every day. You were to take a trip to the seashore first if I am not mistaken. You must need to shake up your gloom. That does not dispel it, but it does force it to live with us and not be too oppressive. I have thought a great deal about you lately, I would have hastened to see you if I had not thought I should find you surrounded by older and better friends than I am. I wrote you at the same time that you wrote me, our letters crossed.

Come to see us, my dear old friend, I shall not go to Paris this month, I do not want to miss you. My children will be happy to spoil you and to try to distract you. We all love you, and I love you PASSIONATELY, as you know.

CXXIV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 14 August, 1869

Your change of plans distresses us, dear friend, but we do not dare to complain in the face of your anxieties and sorrows. We ought to wish you to do what would distract you the most, and take the least out of you. I am in hopes of finding you in Paris, as you are staying there some time and I always have business there. But it is so hard to see friends in Paris and one is so overwhelmed by so many tedious duties! Well, it is a real sorrow to me not to have to expect you any more at our house, where each one of us would have tried to love you better than the others and where you would have been at home; sad when you wanted to be, busy if you liked. I resign myself on condition that you will be better off somewhere else and that you will make it good to us when you can.

Have you at least arranged your affairs with Levy? Is he paying you for two volumes? I would like you to have something on which to live independently and as master of your time. Here there is repose for the mind in the midst of the exuberant activities of Maurice, and of his brave little wife who sets herself to love all he loves and to help him eagerly in all he undertakes. As for me, I have the appearance of incarnate idleness in the midst of this hard work. I botanize and I bathe in a little icy torrent. I teach my servant to read, I correct proof and I am well. That is my life and nothing bores me in this world where I think that AS FAR AS I AM CONCERNED all is for the best. But I am afraid of becoming more of a bore than I used to be. People don't like such as I am very much. We are too inoffensive. However, love me still a little, for I feel by the disappointment of not seeing you, that it would have gone hard with me if you had meant to break your word.

And I embrace you tenderly, dear old friend.

G. Sand

CXXV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Thursday

I know nothing either of Chilly or la petite Fadette. In a few days I am going to make a tour of Normandy. I shall go through Paris. If you want to come around with me, — oh! but no, you don't travel about; well, we shall see each other in passing. I have certainly earned a little holiday. I have worked like a beast of burden. I need too to see some blue, but the blue of the sea will do, and you would like the blue of the artistic and literary firmament over our heads. Bah! that doesn't exist. Everything is prose, flat prose in the environment in which mankind has settled itself. It is only in isolating oneself a little that one can find in oneself the normal being again.

I am resuming my letter interrupted for two days by my wounded hand which inconveniences me a good deal. I am not going to Normandy at all, my Lamberts whom I was going to see in Yport came back to Paris and my business calls me there too. I shall then see you next week probably, and I shall embrace you as if you were my dear big child. Why can't I put the rosy, tanned face of Aurore in the place of mine! She is not what you would call pretty, but she is adorable and so quick in comprehending that we all are astonished. She is as amusing in her chatter as a person, — who might be amusing. So I am going to be forced to start thinking about my business! It is the one thing of which I have a horror and which really troubles my serenity. You must console me by joking with me a little when you have the time.

I shall see you soon, have courage in the sickening work of proofreading. As for me I hurry over it quickly and badly, but you must not do as I do.

My children send you their love and your troubadour loves you.

G. Sand

Saturday evening

I have just received news from the Odeon. They are at work putting on my play and do not speak of anything else.

CXXVI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, 6 September, 1869

They wrote me yesterday to come because they wanted me at the Opera-Comique. Here I am rue Gay-Lussac. When shall we meet? Tell me. All my days, are still free.

I embrace you.

G. Sand

CXXVII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, 8 September, 1869

I send you back your handkerchief which you left in the carriage. It is surely tomorrow THURSDAY that we dine together? I have written to the big Marchal to come to Magny's too.

Your troubadour

G. Sand

Wednesday morning.

CXXVIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, Tuesday, 5 October, 1869

Where are you now, my dear troubadour? I am still writing to you at the boulevard du Temple, but perhaps you have taken possession of your delightful lodgings. I don't know the address although I have seen the house, the situation and the view. — I have been twice in the Ardennes and in a week or ten days, if Lina or Maurice does not come to Paris, as they have a slight desire to do, I shall leave again for Nohant.

We must then meet and see each other. Here am I a little sfogata (eased) from my need for travel, and enchanted with what I have seen. Tell me what day except tomorrow, Wednesday, you can give me for dinner at Magny's or elsewhere with or without Plauchut, with whomever you wish provided I see you and embrace you.

Your old comrade who loves you.

G. Sand

CXXIX. TO GEORGE SAND

Dear good adored master,

I have wanted for several days to write you a long letter in which I should tell you all that I have felt for a month. It is funny. I have passed through different and strange states. But I have neither the time nor the repose of mind to gather myself together enough.

Don't be disturbed about your troubadour. He will always have "his independence and his liberty" because he will always do as he has always done. He has left everything rather than submit to any obligation whatsoever, and then, with age, one's needs lessen. I suffer no longer from not living in the Alhambra.

What would do me good now, would be to throw myself furiously into Saint-Antoine, but I have not even the time to read.

Listen to this: in the very beginning, your play was to come after Aisse; then it was agreed that it should come BEFORE. Now Chilly and Duquesnel want it to come after, simply and solely "to profit by the occasion," to profit by my poor Bouilhet's death. They will give you a "sort of compensation." Well, I am the owner and the master of Aisse just as if I were the author, and I do not want that. You understand, I do not want you to inconvenience yourself in anything.

You think that I am as sweet as a lamb! Undeceive yourself, and act as if Aisse had never existed; and above all no sensitiveness? That would offend me. Between simple friends, one needs manners and politenesses; but between you and me, that would not seem at all suitable; we do not owe each other anything at all except to love each other.

I think that the directors of the Odeon will regret Bouilhet in every way. I shall be less easy than he was at rehearsals. I should very much like to read Aisse to you so as to talk a little about it; some of the actors whom they propose are, to my way of thinking, impossible. It is hard to have to do with uneducated people.

CXXX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Wednesday evening, 13 October, 1869

Our poor friend is not to be buried till the day after tomorrow, they will let me know where and when we ought to be there, I shall tell you by telegram.

I have seen the directors twice. It was agreed this morning with Duquesnel that they should make an attempt with de la T(our) Saint-Y(bars). I yielded my turn to Aisse. I was not to come till March. I went back there this evening, Chilly IS UNWILLING, and Duquesnel, better informed than this morning, regards the step as useless and harmful. I then quoted my contract, my right. What a fine thing, the theatre! M. Saint-Ybars' contract antedates mine. They had thought le Batard would last two weeks and it will last forty days longer. Then La Tour Saint-Ybars precedes us [Footnote: This refers to l'Affranchi.] and I can not give up my turn to Aisse without being postponed till next year, which I'll do if you want me to; but it would do me a good deal of harm, for I have gotten into debt with the Revue and I must refill my purse. — Are directors rascals in all that? No, but incompetents who are always afraid of not having enough plays, and accept too many, foreseeing that they will have failures. — When they are successful, if the authors contracted for are ANGRY they have to go to court. I have no taste for disputes and the scandals of the side-scenes and the newspapers; and neither have you. What would be the result? Inadequate compensation and a deal of uproar for nothing. One needs patience in any event, I have it, and I tell you again if you are really upset at this delay, I am ready to sacrifice myself.

With this I embrace you and I love you.

G. Sand

CXXXI. TO GEORGE SAND 14 October, 1869

Dear master,

No! no sacrifices! so much the worse! If I did not look at Bouilhet's affairs as mine absolutely, I should have at once accepted your proposition. But: (1) it is my affair, (2) the dead must not hurt the living.

But I am angry at these gentlemen, I do not hide it from you, for not having said anything to us about Latour Saint-Ybars. For the aforesaid Latour was engaged a long time ago. Why did we not know anything about him?

In short, let Chilly write me the letter on which we agreed Wednesday, and let there be no more discussion about it.

It seems to me that your play can be given the 15th of December, if l'Affranchi begins about the 20th of November. Two and a half months are about fifty performances; if you go beyond that, Aisse will not be presented till next year.

Then, it is agreed, since we can not suppress Latour Saint-Ybars; you shall go after him and Aisse next, if I think it suitable.

We shall meet Saturday at poor Sainte-Beuve's funeral. How the little band diminishes! How the few survivors of the Medusa's raft are disappearing!

A thousand affectionate greetings.

CXXXII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, 20 or 21 October, 1869

Impossible, dear old beloved. Brebant is too far, I have so little time. And then I have made an engagement with Marchal and Berton at Magny's to say farewell. If you can come, I shall be very happy and on the other hand if it is going to make you ill, don't come, I know very well that you love me and shall not be angry with you about anything.

G. Sand

CXXXIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset

Nohant, 15 Nov., 1869

What has become of you, my dear old beloved troubadour? are you correcting proof like a galley slave, up to the last minute? For the last two days they have been announcing your book FOR TOMORROW. I am looking for it with impatience, for you are not going to forget me, are you? You will be praised and condemned; you expect that. You are too truly superior not to arouse envy and you don't care, do you? Nor I either for you. You have the strength to be stimulated by what discourages others. There will certainly be a rumpus; your subject will be quite opportune in this time of REVOLUTIONISTS. The good progressives, the true democrats will approve of you. The idiots will be furious, and you will say: "Come weal, come woe!" I am also correcting proof of Pierre qui roule and I have half finished a new novel which will not make much of a stir; that is all that I ask for at the moment. I work alternately on MY novel, the one that I like, and on the one that the Revue does not dislike as much, but which I like very little. It is arranged that way; I don't know if I am making a mistake. Perhaps those which I like are the worst. But I have stopped worrying about myself, so far as I have ever done so. Life has always taken me out of myself, and so it will to the end. My heart is always affected to the detriment of my head. At present it is my little children who devour all my intellect; Aurore is a jewel, a nature before which I bow in admiration; will it last like that?

You are going to spend the winter in Paris, and I, I don't know when I shall go. The success of le Batard continues; but I am not impatient, you have promised to come as soon as you are free, at Christmas at the very latest, to keep revel with us. I think only of that, and if you break your word we shall be in despair here. With this I embrace you with a full heart as I love you.

G. Sand

CXXXIV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Paris

Nohant, 30 November, 1869

Dear friend of my heart, I wanted to reread your book [Footnote: l'Education sentimentale.]; my daughter-in-law has read it too, and some of my young people, all readers in earnest and of the first rank and not stupid at all. We are all of the same opinion, that it is a beautiful book, equal in strength to the best ones of Balzac and truer, that is to say more faithful to the truth from one end to the other.

One needs the great art, the exquisite form and the severity of your work to do without flowers of fancy. However, you throw poetry with a full hand on your picture, whether your characters understand it or not. Rosanette at Fontainebleau does not know on what grass she walks and nevertheless she is poetic.

All that issues from a master's hand, and your place is well won for always. Live then as calmly as possible in order to last a long time and to produce a great deal.

I have seen two short articles which did not seem to me to rebel against your success; but I hardly know what is going on, politics seems to me to absorb everything.

Keep me posted. If they did not do justice to you I should be angry and should say what I think. It is my right.

I don't know exactly when, but during the month, I shall go without doubt to embrace you and to get you, if I can pry you loose from Paris. My children still count on it, and all of us send you our praises and our affectionate greetings.

Yours, your old troubadour

G. Sand

CXXXV. TO GEORGE SAND

Dear good master,

Your old troubadour is vehemently slandered by the papers. Read the Constitutionnel of last Monday, the Gaulois of this morning, it is blunt and plain. They call me idiotic and common. Barbey d'Aurevilly's article (Constitutionnel) is a model of this character, and the good Sarcey's, although less violent, is in no way behind it. These gentlemen object in the name of morality and the Ideal! I have also been annihilated in le Figaro and in Paris, by Cesana and Duranty. I most profoundly don't care a fig! but that does not make me any the less astonished by so much hatred and bad faith.

La Tribune, le Pays and l'Opinion nationale on the other hand have highly praised me...As for the friends, the persons who received a copy adorned by my hand, they have been afraid of compromising themselves and have talked to me of other things. The brave are few. The book is selling very well nevertheless, in spite of politics, and Levy appears satisfied.

I know that the bourgeois of Rouen are furious with me "because of pere Roque and the cancan at the Tuileries." They think that one ought to prevent the publication of books like that (textual), that I lend a hand to the Reds, that I am capable of inflaming revolutionary passions, etc., etc. In short, I have received very few laurels, up to now, and no rose leaf hurts me.

I told you, didn't I, that I was working over the fairy play? I am doing now a description of the races and I have cut out all that seemed to me hackneyed. Raphael Felix didn't seem to me eager to become acquainted with it. Problem!

All the papers cite as a proof of my depravity, the episode of the Turkish woman, which they misrepresent, naturally; and Sarcey compares me to Marquis de Sade, whom he confesses he has not read!

All that does not upset me at all. But I wonder what use there is in printing my book?

CXXXVI. TO GEORGE SAND

Tuesday, 4 o'clock, 7 December, 1869

Dear master,

Your old troubadour is being jumped on in an unheard of manner. Those people who have read my novel are afraid to talk to me of it lest they compromise themselves or out of pity for me. The more indulgent declare I have made only pictures and that both composition and plan are quite lacking.

Saint-Victor, who puffs the books of Arsene Houssaye, won't write articles on mine, finding it too bad. There you are. Theo is away, and no one, absolutely no one takes my defense.

Another story: yesterday Raphael and Michel Levy listened to the reading of the fairy play. Applause, enthusiasm. I saw the moment during the reading in which the contract was going to be signed. Raphael so well understood the play that he gave me two or three EXCELLENT criticisms. I found him in other ways a charming boy. He asked me until Saturday to give me a definite answer. Then a little while ago, a letter (very polite) from the aforesaid Raphael in which he declares that the fairy play would entail expenses that would be too much for him.

Ditched again. I must look elsewhere. Nothing new at the Odeon. Sarcey has published a second article against me.

Barbey d'Aurevilly claims that I dirty a stream by washing myself in it (sic). All that does not bother me at all.

CXXXVII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Thursday, two o'clock in the morning, December 9, 1869

My comrade, it is finished, the article shall go tomorrow. I address it to whom? Answer by telegram. I have a mind to send it to Girardin.

But perhaps you have a better idea, I really don't know the importance and the credit of the various papers. Send me a suitable name and ADDRESS by telegram; I have Girardin's.

I am not content with my prose, I have had the fever and a sort of sprain for two days. But we must make haste. I embrace you.

G. Sand

CXXXVIII. TO GEORGE SAND 10 December, Friday, 10 o'clock in the evening, 1869

Dear master, good as good bread,

I have just sent you by telegram this message: "To Girardin." La Liberte will publish your article, at once. What do you think of my friend Saint-Victor, who has refused to write an article about it because he finds "the book bad"? you have not such a conscience as that, have you?

I continue to be rolled in the mud. La Gironde calls me Prudhomme.

That seems new to me.

How shall I thank you? I feel the need of saying affectionate things to you. I have so many in my heart that not one comes to the tips of my fingers. What a splendid woman you are and what a splendid man! To say nothing of all the other things!

CXXXIX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, Friday to Saturday during the night, 10 to 11 December, 1869

I have rewritten my article [Footnote: The article, Sur l'Education sentimentale, de Flaubert, was printed in the Questions d'art et de litterature, Calmann-Levy, p. 415.] today and this evening, I am better, it is clearer. I am expecting your telegram tomorrow. If you do not put your veto on it, I shall send the article to Ulbach, who begins his paper the 15th of this month; he wrote to me this morning to beg me urgently for any article I would send him. I think this first number will be widely read, and it would be good publicity. Michel Levy would be a better judge than we as to what is the best to do: consult him.

You seem astonished at the ill will. You are too simple. You do not know how original your book is, and how many personal feelings must be offended by the force it contains. You think you are doing things that will pass as a letter in the mail; ah! well, yes!

I have insisted on the PLAN of your book; that is what they understand the least and it is what is the most important. I tried to show the ordinary people how they should read; for it is the ordinary people who make successes. The clever ones don't like the successes of others. I don't pay attention to the malicious; it would honor them too much.

G. S.

My mother has your telegram and is sending her manuscript to Girardin.

4 o'clock in the afternoon.

Lina

CXL. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, in Paris

Nohant, 14 December, 1869

I do not see my article coming out, but others are appearing which are bad and unjust. One's enemies are always better served than one's friends. And then, when one frog begins to croak, all the others follow suit. After a certain reverence has been violated every one tries to see who can best jump on the shoulders of the statue; it is always like that. You are undergoing the disadvantages of having a style that is not yet familiar through repetition, and all are making idiots of themselves so as not to see it.

ABSOLUTE IMPERSONALITY is debatable, and I do not accept it ABSOLUTELY; but I wonder that Saint-Victor who has preached it so much and has criticised my plays because they were not IMPERSONAL, should abandon you instead of defending you. Criticism is in a sad way; too much theory!

Don't be troubled by all that and keep straight on. Don't attempt a system, obey your inspiration.

What fine weather, at least with us, and we are getting ready for our Christmas festivals with the family at home. I told Plauchut to try to carry you off; we are expecting him. If you can't come with him, come at least for the Christmas Eve revels and to escape from Paris on New Year's day; it is so boring there then!

Lina charges me to say to you that you are authorized to wear your wrapper and slippers continually. There are no ladies, no strangers. In short you will make us very happy and you have promised for a long time.

I embrace you and I am still more angry than you at these attacks, but I am not overcome, and if I had you here we should stimulate each other so well that you would start off again at once on the other leg to write a new novel.

I embrace you.

Your old troubadour,

G. Sand

CXLI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, in Paris

Nohant, 17 December, 1869

Plauchut writes us that YOU PROMISE to come the 24th. Do come the 23d in the evening, so as to be rested for the night of the 24th to the 25th and join in our Christmas Eve revels. Otherwise you will arrive from Paris tired and sleepy and our follies will not amuse you. You are coming to the house of children, I warn you, and as you are kind and affectionate, you love children. Did Plauchut tell you to bring a wrapper and slippers, for we do not want to sentence you to dressing up? I add that I am counting on your bringing some manuscript. The FAIRY PLAY re-done, Saint-Antoine, whatever you have finished. I hope indeed that you are in the mood for work. Critics are a challenge that stimulates.

Poor Saint-Rene Taillandier is as asininely pedantic as the Revue. Aren't they prudish in that set? I am in a pet with Girardin. I know very well that I am not strong in letters; I am not sufficiently cultivated for these gentlemen; but the good public reads me and listens to me all the same.

If you did not come, we should be unhappy and you would be a big ingrate. Do you want me to send a carriage for you to Chateauroux on the 23d at four o'clock? I am afraid that you may be uncomfortable in that stage-coach which makes the run, and it is so easy to spare you two and a half hours of discomfort!

We embrace you full of hope. I am working like an ox so as to have my novel finished and not to have to think of it a minute when you are here.

G. Sand

CXLII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 19 December, 1869

So women are in it too? Come, forget that persecution here, at a hundred thousand leagues from Parisian and literary life, or rather come be glad of it, for these great slatings are the sure proof of great worth. Tell yourself indeed that those who have not gone through that are GOOD FOR THE ACADEMY.

Our letters crossed. I begged you and I beg you again not to come Christmas Eve, but the night before so as to join in the revels the next night, the Eve, that is to say, the 24th. This is the program: we dine promptly at six o'clock, we have the Christmas tree and the marionettes for the children, so, that they can go to bed at nine o'clock. After that we chatter, and sup at midnight. But the diligence gets here at the earliest at half past six, and we should not dine till seven o'clock, which would make impossible the great joy of our little ones who would be kept up too late. So you must start Thursday 23d at nine o'clock in the morning, so that everyone may be perfectly comfortable, so that everyone may have time to embrace everyone else, and so that no one may be interrupted in the joy of your arrival on account of the imperious and silly darlings.

You must stay with us a very long time, a very long time, we shall have some more follies for New Year's day, and for Twelfth Night. This is a crazy happy house and it is the time of holiday after work. I am finishing tonight my year's task. Seeing you, dear old well-beloved friend, would be my recompense: do not refuse me.

G. Sand

Plauchut is hunting today with the prince, and perhaps will not return till Tuesday. I am writing him to wait for you till Thursday, you will be less bored on the way. I have just written to Girardin to complain.

CXLIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT 31 December, 1869

We hoped to have a word from you this morning. This sudden cold is so severe, I dreaded it for your trip. We know you got to Chateauroux all right. But did you find a compartment, and didn't you suffer on the way? Reassure us.

We were so happy to have you with us that we should be distressed if you had to suffer for this WINTER escapade. All goes well here and all of us adore one another. It is New Year's Eve. We send your share of the kisses that we are giving one another.

G. Sand

CXLIV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset*Nohant, 9 January, 1870

I have had so much proof to correct that I am stupefied with it. I needed that to console me for your departure, troubadour of my heart, and for another departure also, that of my drudge of a Plauchmar — and still another departure, that of my grand-nephew Edme, my favorite, the one who played the marionettes with Maurice. He has passed his examinations for collector and goes to Pithiviers- -unless by pull, we could get him as substitute at La Chatre.

Do you know M. Roy, the head of the management of the domains? If by chance the princess knew him and would be willing to say a word to him in favor of young Simonnet? I should be happy to owe her this joy for his family and this economy for his mother who is poor. It appears that it is very easy to obtain and that no rule opposes it. But one must HAVE PULL; a word to the princess, a line from M. Roy and our tears would change to joy.

That child is very dear to me. He is so loving and so good! They had hard work to bring him up, he was always ill, always dandled on the knees and always gentle and sweet. He has a great deal of intelligence and he works well at La Chatre, where his chief the collector adores him and mourns for him also. Well, do what you can, if you can do anything at all.

They continue to damn your book. That doesn't prevent it from being a fine and good book. Justice will come later, JUSTICE IS ALWAYS DONE. Apparently it did not come at the right moment, or rather it came too soon. It has demonstrated too well the disorder that reigns in people's minds. It has rubbed the open wound, people recognize themselves too well in it.

Everyone adores you here and our consciences are too pure to be upset at the truth: we talk of you every day. Yesterday, Lina said to me that she admired very much all you do, but that she preferred Salammbo to your modern descriptions. If you had been in a corner, this is what you would have heard from her, from me, and from THE OTHERS:

“He is taller and larger than the average person. His mind is like him, beyond ordinary proportions. In that he is like Victor Hugo, at least as much as like Balzac, but he has the taste and discernment that Hugo lacks, and he is an artist which Balzac was not. — Is he then more than both? Chi lo sa? — He hasn’t let himself out yet. The enormous volume of his brain troubles him. He doesn’t know if he is a poet or a realist; and the fact that he is both, hinders him. — He must get straightened out in his different lines of effort. He sees everything and wants to grasp everything at once. — He is not the cut of the public that wants to eat in little mouthfuls, whom large pieces choke. But the public will go to him, just the same, when it understands. — It will even go rather quickly if the author CONDESCENDS to be willing to be quite understood. — For that, perhaps there will have to be asked some concessions to the indolence of its mind. One ought to reflect before daring to give this advice.”

That sums up what we said. It is not useless to know the opinion of good people and of young people. The youngest say that l’Education sentimentale made them sad. They did not come across themselves in it, they who have not yet lived; but they have illusions and they say: “Why does this man, so good, so kind, so gay, so simple, so sympathetic, wish to discourage us from living?” What they say is poorly reasoned out, but as it is instinctive, perhaps it ought to be taken into account.

Aurore talks of you and still cradles her baby in her lap; Gabrielle calls Punch, HER LITTLE ONE, and will not eat her dinner unless he is opposite her. They are our continual idols, these brats.

Yesterday, I received, after your letter of the day before, a letter from Berton, who thinks that they will not play l’Affranchi longer than the 18th or the 20th. Wait for me, since you can delay your departure a little. It is too bad weather to go to Croisset; it is always an effort for me to leave my dear nest to go to attend to my miserable profession; but the effort is less when I hope to find you in Paris.

I embrace you for myself and for all my brood.

G. Sand

CXLV. TO GEORGE SAND

Wednesday afternoon.

Dear master,

Your commission was done yesterday at one o'clock. The princess in my presence took some notes on what you wanted, in order to look after it at once. She seemed to me very glad to do you a service.

People talk of nothing but the death of Noir! The general sentiment is fear, nothing else!

Into what miserable ways we are plunged! There is so much imbecility in the air that one gets ferocious. I am less indignant than disgusted! What do you think of these gentlemen who come to confer armed with pistols and sword canes! And of this person, of this prince, who lives in the midst of an arsenal and makes use of it? Pretty! Pretty!

What a sweet letter you wrote me day before yesterday! But your friendship blinds you, dear good master. I do not belong to the tribe you mention. I am acquainted with myself, I know what I lack! And I am enormously lacking.

In losing my poor Bouilhet, I lost my midwife, it was he who saw into my thought more clearly than I did myself. His death has left a void that I notice more each day. What is the use of making concessions? Why force oneself? I am quite resolved, on the contrary, to write in future for my personal satisfaction, and without any constraint. Come what may!

L'Affranchi is for Tuesday. I am working hurriedly to finish my corrections and I leave Tuesday morning. Come to dine with me at Magny's at six o'clock. Can you? If not, am I to keep a seat for you in my box? A word during the day of Tuesday, to my lodgings. You won't be forced to swallow down the entire performance if it bores you.

I love you and I embrace you for myself and for my brood. Thank you for Edme.

CXLVII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, 19 January, 1870

Dear friend of my heart, I did not see you in the theatre. The play applauded and hissed, more applauded than hissed. Barton very beautiful, Sarah very pretty, but no interest in the characters and too many second-rate actors, not good. — I do not think that it is a success.

I am better. Yet I am not bold enough to go to your house Saturday and to return from such a distance in this severe cold. I saw Theo this evening, I told him to come to dine with us both on Saturday at Magny's. Do say yes, it is I who invite you, and we shall have a quiet private room. After that we will smoke at my place.

Plauchut would not be able to go to you. He was invited to the prince's.

A word if it is NO. Nothing if it is yes. So I don't want you to write to me. I saw Tourgueneff and I told him all that I think of him. He was as surprised as a child. We spoke ill of you.

Wednesday evening.

(On the back of a letter from Edme Simonnet)

I don't see you, you come to the Odeon and when they tell me that you are there, I hurry and don't find you. Do set a day then when you will come to eat a chop with me. Your old exhausted troubadour who loves you.

CXLIX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, 15 February, 1870

My troubadour, we are two old rattle traps. As for me, I have had a bad attack of bronchitis and I am just out of bed. Now I am recovered but not yet out of my room. I hope to resume my work at the Odeon in a couple of days.

Do get well, don't go out, at least unless the thaw is not very bad. My play is for the 22d. [Footnote: This refers to L'Autre.] I hope very much to see you on that day. And meanwhile, I kiss you and I love you,

CL. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Sunday evening, 20th February, 1870

I went out today for the first time, I am better without being well. I am anxious at not having news about that reading of the fairy play. Are you satisfied? Did they understand? L'Autre will take place on Thursday, or Friday at the latest.

Will your nephew and niece go to the gallery or the balcony seats? Impossible to have a box. If yes, a word and I will send these seats out of my allotment — which, as usual, will not be grand.

Your old troubadour.

CLI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, February, 1870

It is for Friday. Then I am disposing of the two seats that I intended for your niece.

If you have a moment free, and come to the Odeon that night, you will find me in the manager's box, proscenium, ground floor. I am heavy-hearted about all you tell me. Here you are again in gloom, sorrow and chagrin. Poor dear friend! Let us continue to hope that you will save your patient, but you are ill too, and I am very anxious about you, I was quite overwhelmed by it this evening, when I got your note, and I have no more heart for anything.

A word when you can, to give me news.

CLII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, 2d March, 1870

Poor dear friend, your troubles distress me, you have too many blows in quick succession, and I am going away Saturday morning leaving you in the midst of all these sorrows! Do you want to come to Nohant with me, for a change of air, even if only for two or three days? I have a compartment, we should be alone and my carriage is waiting for me at Chateauroux. You could be sad without constraint at our house, we also have mourning in the family. A change of lodging, of faces, of habits, sometimes does physical good. One does not forget one's sorrow, but one forces one's body to endure it.

I embrace you with all my soul. A word and I expect you.
Wednesday evening.

CLIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 11 March, 1870

How are you, my poor child? I am glad to be here in the midst of my darling family, but I am unhappy all the same at having left you melancholy, ill and upset. Send me news, a word at least, and be assured that we all are unhappy over your troubles and sufferings.

G. Sand

CLIV. TO GEORGE SAND 17 March, 1870

Dear master,

I received a telegram yesterday evening from Madame Cornu containing these words: "Come to me, urgent business." I therefore hurried to her today, and here is the story.

The Empress maintains that you made some very unkind allusions to her in the last number of the Revue! "What about me, whom all the world is attacking now! I should not have believed that! and I wanted to have her nominated for the Academy! But what have I done to her? etc., etc." In short, she is distressed, and the Emperor too! He is not indignant but prostrated (sic). [Footnote: Malgre tout, Calmann-Levy, 1870.]

Madame Cornu explained to her that she was mistaken and that you had not intended to make any allusion to her.

Hereupon a theory of the manner in which novels are written.

— Oh well, then, let her write in the papers that she did not intend to wound me.

— But she will not do that, I answered.

— Write to her to tell you so.

— I will not allow myself to take that step.

— But I would like to know the truth, however! Do you know someone who...then Madame Cornu mentioned me.

— Oh, don't say that I spoke to you of it!

Such is the dialogue that Madame Cornu reported to me.

She wants you to write me a letter in which you tell me that the Empress was not used by you as a model. I shall send that letter to Madame Cornu who will have it given to the Empress.

I think that story stupid and those people are very sensitive! Much worse things than that are told to us.

Now dear master of the good God, you must do exactly what you please.

The Empress has always been very kind to me and I should not be sorry to do her a favor. I have read the famous passage. I see nothing in it to hurt her. But women's brains are so queer!

I am very tired in mine (my brain) or rather it is very low for the moment! However hard I work, it doesn't go! Everything irritates me and hurts me; and since I restrain myself before people, I give way from time to time to floods of tears when it seems to me as if I should burst. At last I am experiencing an entirely new sensation: the approach of old age. The shadow invades me, as Victor Hugo would say.

Madame Cornu has spoken to me enthusiastically of a letter you wrote her on a method of teaching.

CLV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croissset

Nohant, 17 March, 1870

I won't have it, you are not getting old. Not in the crabbed and MISANTHROPIC sense. On the contrary, when one is good, one becomes better, and, as you are already better than most others, you ought to become exquisite.

You are boasting, moreover, when you undertake to be angry against everyone and everything. You could not. You are weak before sorrow, like all affectionate people. The strong are those who do not love. You will never be strong, and that is so much the better. You must not live alone any more; when strength returns you must really live and not shut it up for yourself alone.

For my part, I am hoping that you will be reborn with the springtime. Today we have rain which relaxes, tomorrow we shall have the animating sun. We are all just getting over illnesses, our children had very bad colds, Maurice quite upset by lameness with a cold, I taken again by chills and anemia: I am very patient and I prevent the others as much as I can from being impatient, there is everything in that; impatience with evil always doubles the evil. When shall we be WISE as the ancients understood it? That, in substance, meant being PATIENT, nothing else. Come, dear troubadour, you must be a little patient, to begin with, and then you can get accustomed to it; if we do not work on ourselves, how can we hope to be always in shape to work on others?

Well, in the midst of all that, don't forget that we love you and that the hurt you give yourself hurts us too.

I shall go to see you and to shake you as soon as I have regained my feet and my will, which are both backward; I am waiting, I know that they will return.

Affectionate greetings from all our invalids. Punch has lost only his fiddle and he is still smiling and well gilded. Lolo's baby has had misfortunes, but its clothes dress other dolls. As for me, I can flap only one wing, but I kiss you and I love you.

G. Sand

CLVI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, in Paris

Nohant, 19 March, 1870

I know, my friend, that you are very devoted to her. I know that she [Footnote: Letter written about the rumour current, that George Sand had meant to depict the Empress in one of the chief characters of her novel, Malgre tout; the letter was sent by Flaubert to Madame Cornu, god-child of Queen Hortense, and foster-sister of Napoleon III.] is very kind to unfortunates who have been recommended to her; that is all that I know of her private life. I have never had any revelation nor document about her, NOT A WORD, NOT A DEED, which would authorize me to depict her. So I have drawn only a figure of fancy, I swear it, and those who pretended to recognize her in a satire would be, in any case, bad servants and bad friends.

But I don't write satires: I am ignorant even of the meaning of the word. I don't write PORTRAITS either; it is not my style. I invent. The public, who does not know in what invention consists, thinks it sees everywhere models. It is mistaken and it degrades art.

This is my SINCERE answer, I have only enough time to mail it.

G. Sand

CLVII. To MADAME HORTENSE CORNU

Your devotion was alarmed wrongly, dear madame, I was sure of it! Here is the answer that came to me by return mail.

People in society, I reiterate, see allusions where there are none. When I did Madame Bovary I was asked many times: "Is it Madame X. whom you meant to depict?" and I received letters from perfectly unknown people, among others one from a gentleman in Rheims who congratulated me on HAVING AVENGED HIM! (against a faithless one).

Every pharmacist in Seine-Inferieure recognizing himself in Homais, wanted to come to my house to box my ears. But the best (I discovered it five years later) is that there was then in Africa the wife of an army doctor named Madame Bovaries who was like Madame Bovary, a name I had invented by altering that of Bouvaret.

The first sentence of our friend Maury in talking to me about l'Education sentimentale was this: "Did you know X, an Italian, a professor of mathematics? Your Senecal is his physical and moral portrait! Everything is exact even to the cut of his hair!"

Others assert that I meant to depict in Arnoux, Bernard Latte (the former editor), whom I have never seen, etc., etc.

All that is to tell you, dear madame, that the public is mistaken in attributing to us intentions which we do not have.

I was very sure that Madame Sand had not intended to make any portrait; (1) because of her loftiness of mind, her taste, her reverence for art, and (2) because of her character, her feeling for the conventions — and also FOR JUSTICE. I even think, between ourselves, that this accusation has hurt her a little. The papers roll us in the dirt every day without our ever answering them, we whose business it is, however, to wield the pen, and they think that in order to MAKE AN EFFECT, to be applauded, we are going to attack such and such a one.

Oh! no! not so humble! our ambition is higher, and our courtesy greater. — When one thinks highly of one's mind one does not choose the necessary means to please the crowd. You understand me, don't you?

But enough of this. I shall come to see you one of these days.

Looking forward to that with pleasure, dear madame, I kiss your hands and am entirely yours,

Gustave Flaubert

Sunday evening.

CLVIII. TO GEORGE SAND

March, 1870

Dear master,

I have just sent your letter (for which I thank you) to Madame Cornu, enclosing it in a letter from your troubadour, in which I permitted myself to give bluntly my conception of things.

The two letters will be placed under the eyes of the LADY and will teach her a little about aesthetics.

I saw l'Autre last evening, and I wept several times. It did me good, really! How tender and exalting it is! What a charming work and how they love the author! I missed you. I wanted to give you a kiss like a little child. My oppressed heart is easier, thank you. I think that it will get better! There were a lot of people there. Berton and his son were recalled twice.

CLIX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 3 April, 1870

Your old troubadour has passed through cruel anguish, Maurice has been seriously, dangerously ill.[Footnote: With diphtheria.] Favre, MY OWN doctor, the only one in whom I have confidence, hastened to us in time. After that Lolo had violent attacks of fever, other terrors! At last our savior went off this morning leaving us almost tranquil and our invalids went out to walk in the garden for the first time. — But they still want a great deal of care and oversight, and I shall not leave them for two or three weeks. If then you are awaiting me in Paris, and the sun calls you elsewhere, have no regret about it. I shall try to go to see you in Croisset from Paris between the dawn and the dusk sometime.

At least tell me how you are, what you are doing, if you are on your feet in every way.

My invalids and my well ones send you their affectionate regards, and I kiss you as I love you; it is not little.

G. Sand

My friend Favre has quite a FANCY for you and wants to know you. He is not a physician who seeks practice, he only practices for his friends, and he is offended if they want to pay him. YOUR PERSONALITY interests him, that is all, and I have promised to present him to you, if you are willing. He is something more than a physician, I don't know what exactly, A SEEKER — after what? — EVERYTHING. He is amusing, original and interesting to the utmost degree. You must tell me if you want to see him, otherwise I shall manage for him not to think of it any more. Answer about this matter.

CLX. TO GEORGE SAND

Monday morning, 11 o'clock

I felt that something unpleasant had happened to you, because I had just written to you for news when your letter was brought to me this morning. I fished mine back from the porter; here is a second one.

Poor dear master! How uneasy you must have been and Madame Maurice also. You do not tell me what he had (Maurice). In a few days before the end of the week, write to confirm to me that everything has turned out well. The trouble lies, I think, with the abominable winter from which we are emerging! One hears of nothing but illnesses and funerals! My poor servant is still at the Dubois hospital, and I am distressed when I go to see him. For two months now he has been confined to his bed suffering horribly.

As for me, I am better. I have read prodigiously. I have overworked, but now I am almost on my feet again. The mass of gloom that I have in the depths of my heart is a little larger, that is all. But, in a little while, I hope that it will not be noticed. I spend my days in the library of the Institute. The Arsenal library lends me books that I read in the evening, and I begin again the next day. I shall return home to Croisset the first of May. But I shall see you before then. Everything will get right again with the sun.

The lovely lady in question made to me, for you, the most proper excuses, asserting to me that “she never had any intention of insulting genius.”

Certainly, I shall be glad to meet M. Favre; since he is a friend of yours I shall like him.

CLXI. TO GEORGE SAND

Tuesday morning

Dear master,

It is not staying in Paris that wears me out, but the series of misfortunes that I have had during the last eight months! I am not working too much, for what would become of me without work? However, it is very hard for me to be reasonable. I am overwhelmed by a black melancholy, which returns a propos of everything and nothing, many times a day. Then, it passes and it begins again. Perhaps it is because it is too long since I have written anything. Nervous reservoirs are exhausted. As soon as I am at Croisset, I shall begin the article about my poor Bouilhet, a painful and sad task which I am in a hurry to finish, so as to set to work at Saint- Antoine. As that is an extravagant subject, I hope it will divert me.

I have seen your physician, M. Favre, who seemed to me very strange and a little mad, between ourselves. He ought to like me for I let him talk all the time. There are high lights in his talk, things which sparkle for a moment, then one sees not a ray.

CLXII. TO GEORGE SAND

Paris, Thursday

M. X. — — sent me news of you on Saturday: so now I know that everything is going well with you, and that you have no more uneasiness, dear master. But you, personally, how are you? The two weeks are almost up, and I do not see you coming.

My mood continues not to be sportive. I am still given up to abominable readings, but it is time that I stopped for I am beginning to be disgusted with my subject.

Are you reading Taine's powerful book? I have gobbled it down, the first volume with infinite pleasure. In fifty years perhaps that will be the philosophy that will be taught in the colleges.

And the preface to the Idees de M. Aubray?

How I long to see you and to jabber with you!

CLXIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 16 April, 1870

What ought I to say to Levy so that he will take the first steps? Tell me again how things are, for my memory is poor. You had sold him one volume for ten thousand; — there are two, he himself told me that that would be twenty thousand. What has he paid you up to now? What words did you exchange at the time of this payment?

Answer, and I act.

Things are going better and better here, the little ones well again, Maurice recovering nicely, I tired from having watched so much and from watching yet, for he has to drink and wash out his mouth during the night, and I am the only one in the house who has the faculty of keeping awake. But I am not ill, and I work a little now and then while loafing about. As soon as I can leave, I shall go to Paris. If you are still there, it will be A PIECE OF GOOD LUCK, but I do not dare to wish you to prolong your slavery there, for I can see that you are still ill and that you are working too hard.

Croisset will cure you if you consent to take care of yourself.

I embrace you tenderly for myself and for all the family which adores you.

G. Sand

CLXIV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset Nohant, 20 May, 1870

It is a very long time since I have had news of my old troubadour. You must be in Croisset. If it is as warm there as it is here, you must be suffering; here it is 34 degrees in the shade, and in the night, 24. Maurice has had a bad relapse of sore throat, without membranes this time, and without danger. But the inflammation was so bad that for three days he could hardly swallow even a little water and wine. Bouillon did not go down. At last this excessive heat has cured him, it suits us all here, for Lina went to Paris this morning vigorous and strong. Maurice gardens all day. The children are gay and get prettier while you look at them. As for me, I am not accomplishing anything; I have too much to do taking care of and watching my boy, and now that the little mother is away, the little children absorb me. I work, however, planning and dreaming. That will be so much done when I can scribble.

I am still ON MY FEET, as Doctor Favre says. No old age yet, or rather normal old age, the calmness ... OF VIRTUE, that thing that people ridicule, and that I mention in mockery, but that corresponds by an emphatic and silly word, to a condition of forced inoffensiveness, without merit in consequence, but agreeable and good to experience. It is a question of rendering it useful to art when one believes in that, to the family and to friendship when one cares for that; I don't dare to say how very simple and primitive I am in this respect. It is the fashion to ridicule it, but let them. I do not want to change.

There is my SPRING examination of my conscience, so as not to think all summer about anything except what is not myself.

Come, you, your health first? And this sadness, this discontent that Paris has left with you, is it forgotten? Are there no longer any painful external circumstances? You have been too much shaken also. Two of your dearest friends gone one after the other. There are periods in life when destiny is ferocious to us. You are too young to concentrate on the idea of REGAINING your affections in a better world, or in this world made better. So you must, at your age (and at mine I still try to), become more attached to what remains. You wrote that to me when I lost Rollinat, my double in this life, the veritable friend whose feeling for the differences between the sexes had never hurt our pure affection, even when we were young. He was my Bouilhet and more than that; for to my heart's intimacy was joined a religious reverence for a real type of moral courage, which had undergone all trials with a sublime SWEETNESS. I have OWED him everything that is good in me, I am trying to keep it for love of him. Is there not a heritage that our beloved dead leave us?

The despair that would make us abandon ourselves would be a treason to them and an ingratitude. Tell me that you are calm and soothed, that you are not working too much and that you are working well. I am not without some anxiety because I have not had a letter from you for a long time. I did not want to ask for one till I could tell you that Maurice was quite well again; he embraces you, and the children do not forget you. As for me, I love you.

G. Sand

CLXV. TO GEORGE SAND

No, dear master! I am not ill, but I have been busy with moving from Paris and with getting settled in Croisset. Then my mother has been very much indisposed. She is well now; then I have had to set in order the rest of my poor Bouilhet's papers, on whom I have begun the article. I wrote this week nearly six pages, which was very good for me; this work is very painful in every way. The difficulty is in knowing what not to say. I shall console myself a little in blurting out two or three dogmatic opinions on the art of writing. It will be an opportunity to express what I think; a sweet thing and one I am always deprived of.

You say very lovely and also good things to me to restore my courage. I have hardly any, but I am acting as if I had, which perhaps comes to the same thing.

I feel no longer the need of writing, for I used to write especially for one person alone, who is no more. That is the truth! And yet I shall continue to write. But I have no more liking for it; the fascination is gone. There are so few people who like what I like, who are anxious about what I am interested in! Do you know in this Paris, which is so large, one SINGLE house where they talk about literature? And when it happens to be touched on incidentally, it is always on its subordinate and external sides, such as the question of success, of morality, of utility, of its timeliness, etc. It seems to me that I am becoming a fossil, a being unrelated to the surrounding world.

I would not ask anything better than to cast myself on some new affection. But how? Almost all my old friends are married officials, thinking of their little business the entire year, of the hunt during vacation and of whist after dinner. I don't know one of them who would be capable of passing an afternoon with me reading a poet. They have their business; I, I have none. Observe that I am in the same social position that I was at eighteen. My niece whom I love as my daughter, does not live with me, and my poor good simple mother has become so old that all conversation with her (except about her health) is impossible. All that makes an existence which is not diverting.

As for the ladies, "my little locality" furnishes none of them, and then, — even so! I have never been able to put Venus an Apollo in the same coop. It is one or the other, being a man of excess, a gentleman entirely given over to what he does.

I repeat to myself the phrase of Goethe: "Go forward beyond the tombs," and I hope to get used to the emptiness, but nothing more.

The more I know you, yourself, the more I admire you; how strong you are!

Aside from a little Spinoza and Plutarch, I have read nothing since my return, as I am quite occupied by my present work. It is a task that will take me up to the end of July. I am in a hurry to be through with it, so as to abandon myself to the extravagances of the good Saint-Antoine, but I am afraid of not being SUFFICIENTLY IN THE MOOD.

That is a charming story, Mademoiselle Hauterive, isn't it? This suicide of lovers to escape misery ought to inspire fine moral phrases from Prudhomme. As for me, I understand it. What they did is not American, but how Latin and antique it is! They were not strong, but perhaps very sensitive.

CLXVI. TO GEORGE SAND

Sunday, 26 June, 1870

You forget your troubadour who has just buried another friend! From the seven that we used to be at the beginning of the dinners at Magny's, we are only three now! I am gorged with coffins like an old cemetery! I am having enough of them, frankly.

And in the midst of all that I keep on working! I finished yesterday, such as it is, the article on my poor Bouilhet. I am going to see if there is not some way of reviving one of his comedies in prose. After that I shall set to work on Saint-Antoine.

And you, dear master, what is happening to you and all your family? My niece is in the Pyrenees, and I am living alone with my mother, who is becoming deafer and deafer, so that my existence lacks diversion absolutely. I should like to go to sleep on a warm beach. But for that I lack time and money. So I must push on my scratches and grub as hard as possible.

I shall go to Paris at the beginning of August. Then I shall spend all the month of October there for the rehearsals of Aisse. My vacation will be confined to a week spent in Dieppe towards the end of August. There are my plans.

It was distressing, the funeral of Jules Goncourt. Theo wept buckets full.

CLXVII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 27 June, 1870

Another grief for you, my poor old friend. I too have a great one, I mourn for Barbes, one of my religions, one of those beings who make one reconciled with humanity. As for you, you miss poor Jules [Footnote: De Goncourt.] and you pity the unhappy Edmond. You are perhaps in Paris, so as to try to console him. I have just written him, and I feel that you are struck again in your affections. What an age! Every one is dying, everything is dying, and the earth is dying also, eaten up by the sun and the wind. I don't know where I get the courage to keep on living in the midst of these ruins. Let us love each other to the end. You write me very little, I am worried about you.

G. Sand

CLXVIII. TO GEORGE SAND

Saturday evening, 2 July, 1870

Dear good master,

Barbes' death has saddened me because of you. We, both of us, have our mourning. What a succession of deaths during a year! I am as dazed by them as if I had been hit on the head with a stick. What troubles me (for we refer everything to ourselves), is the terrible solitude in which I live. I have no longer anyone, I mean anyone with whom to converse, "who is interested today in eloquence and style."

Aside from you and Tourgueneff, I don't know a living being to whom to pour out my soul about those things which I have most at heart; and you live far away from me, both of you!

However, I continue to write. I have resolved to start at my Saint-Antoine tomorrow or the day after. But to begin a protracted effort I need a certain lightness which I lack just now. I hope, however, that this extravagant work is going to get hold of me. Oh! how I would like not to think any more of my poor Moi, of my miserable carcass! It is getting on very well, my carcass. I sleep tremendously! "The coffer is good," as the bourgeois say.

I have read lately some amazing theological things, which I have intermingled with a little of Plutarch and Spinoza. I have nothing more to say to you.

Poor Edmond de Goncourt is in Champagne at his relatives'. He has promised to come here the end of this month. I don't think that the hope of seeing his brother again in a better world consoles him for having lost him in this one.

One juggles with empty words on this question of immortality, for the question is to know if the moi persists. The affirmative seems to me a presumption of our pride, a protest of our weakness against the eternal order. Has death perhaps no more secrets to reveal to us than life has?

What a year of evil! I feel as if I were lost in the desert, and I assure you, dear master, that I am brave, however, and that I am making prodigious efforts to be stoical. But my poor brain is enfeebled at moments. I need only one thing (and that is not given me), it is to have some kind of enthusiasm!

Your last letter but one was very sad. You also, heroic being, you feel worn out! What then will become of us!

I have just reread the conversations between Goethe and Eckermann. There was a man, that Goethe! But then he had everything on his side, that man.

CLXIX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croissset Nohant, 29 June, 1870

Our letters are always crossing, and I have now the feeling that if I write to you in the evening I shall receive a letter from you the next morning; we could say to each other:

“You appeared to me in my sleep, looking a little sad.”

What preoccupies me most about poor Jules' (de Goncourt) death, is the survivor. I am sure that the dead are well off, that perhaps they are resting before living again, and that in all cases they fall back into the crucible so as to reappear with what good they previously had and more besides. Barbès only suffered all his life. There he is now, sleeping deeply. Soon he will awaken; but we, poor beasts of survivors, we see them no longer. A little while before he died, Duveyrier, who seemed to have recovered, said to me: “Which one of us will go first?” We were exactly the same age. He complained that those who went first could not let those who were left know that they were happy, and that they remembered their friends. I said, WHO KNOWS? Then we promised each other that the first one to die should appear to the survivor, and should at least try to speak to him.

He did not come, I have waited for him, he has said nothing to me. He had one of the tenderest hearts, and a sincere good will. He was not able to; it was not permitted, or perhaps, it was I; I did not hear or understand.

It is, I say, this poor Edmond who is on my mind. That life lived together, quite ended. I cannot think why the bond was broken, unless he too believes that one does not really die.

I would indeed like to go to see you; apparently you have COOL WEATHER in Croisset since you want to sleep ON A WARM BEACH. Come here, you will not have a beach, but 36 degrees in the shade and a stream cold as ice, is not to be despised. I go there to dabble in it every day after my work; for I must work, Buloz advances me too much money. Here I am DOING MY BUSINESS, as Aurore says, and not being able to budge till autumn. I was too lazy after my fatigues as sick-nurse. Little Buloz recently came to stir me up again. Now here I am hard at it.

Since you are to be in Paris in August, you must come to spend several days with us. You did laugh here anyhow; we will try to distract you and to shake you up a bit. You will see the little girls grown and prettier; the little one is beginning to talk. Aurore chatters and argues. She calls Plauchut, OLD BACHELOR. And a propos, accept the best regards of that fine and splendid boy along with all the affectionate greetings of the family.

As for me, I embrace you tenderly and beg you to keep well.

G. Sand

CLXX. TO GEORGE SAND

Croisset, Wednesday evening...1870

What has become of you, dear master, of you and yours? As for me, I am disheartened, distressed by the folly of my compatriots. The hopeless barbarism of humanity fills me with a black melancholy. That enthusiasm which has no intelligent motive makes me want to die, so as not to see it any longer.

The good Frenchman wants to fight: (1) because he thinks he is provoked to it by Prussia; (2) because the natural condition of man is savagery; (3) because war in itself contains a mystic element which enraptures crowds.

Have we returned to the wars of races? I fear so. The terrible butchery which is being prepared has not even a pretext. It is the desire to fight for the sake of fighting.

I bewail the destroyed bridges, the staved-in tunnels, all this human labor lost, in short a negation so radical.

The Congress of Peace is wrong at present. Civilization seems to me far off. Hobbes was right: Homo homini lupus.

I have begun Saint-Antoine, and it would go perhaps rather well, if I did not think of the war. And you?

The bourgeois here cannot contain himself. He thinks Prussia was too insolent and wants to “avenge himself.” Did you see that a gentleman has proposed in the Chamber the pillage of the duchy of Baden! Ah! why can’t I live among the Bedouins!

CLXXI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset

Nohant, 26 July, 1870

I think this war is infamous; that authorized Marseillaise, a sacrilege. Men are ferocious and conceited brutes; we are in the HALF AS MUCH of Pascal; when will come the MORE THAN EVER!

It is between 40 and 45 degrees IN THE SHADE here. They are burning the forests; another barbarous stupidity! The wolves come and walk into our court, and we chase them away at night, Maurice with a revolver and I with a lantern. The trees are losing their leaves and perhaps their lives. Water for drinking is becoming scarce; the harvests are almost nothing; but we have war, what luck!

Farming is going to nought, famine threatens, poverty is lurking about while waiting to transform itself into Jacquerie; but we shall fight with the Prussians. Malbrough s’en va-t-en guerre!

You said rightly that in order to work, a certain lightness was needed; where is it to be found in these accursed times?

Happily, we have no one ill at our house. When I see Maurice and Lina acting, Aurore and Gabrielle playing, I do not dare to complain for fear of losing all.

I love you, my dear old friend, we all love you.

Your troubadour,

G. Sand

CLXXII. TO GEORGE SAND

Croisset, Wednesday, 3 August, 1870

What! dear master, you too are demoralized, sad? What will become of the weak souls?

As for me, my heart is oppressed in a way that astonishes me, and I wallow in a bottomless melancholy, in spite of work, in spite of the good Saint-Antoine who ought to distract me. Is it the consequence of my repeated afflictions? Perhaps. But the war is a good deal responsible for it. I think that we are getting into the dark.

Behold then, the NATURAL MAN. Make theories now! Boast the progress, the enlightenment and the good sense of the masses, and the gentleness of the French people! I assure you that anyone here who ventured to preach peace would get himself murdered. Whatever happens, we have been set back for a long time to come.

Are the wars between races perhaps going to begin again? One will see, before a century passes, several millions of men kill one another in one engagement. All the East against all Europe, the old world against the new! Why not? Great united works like the Suez Canal are, perhaps, under another form, outlines and preparations for these monstrous conflicts of which we have no idea.

Is Prussia perhaps going to have a great drubbing which entered into the schemes of Providence for reestablishing European equilibrium? That country was tending to be hypertrophied like France under Louis XIV and Napoleon. The other organs are inconvenienced by it. Thence universal trouble. Would formidable bleedings be useful?

Ah! we intellectuals! Humanity is far from our ideal! and our immense error, our fatal error, is to think it like us and to want to treat it accordingly.

The reverence, the fetichism, that they have for universal suffrage revolts me more than the infallibility of the pope (which has just delightfully missed its point, by the way). Do you think that if France, instead of being governed on the whole by the crowd, were in the power of the mandarins, we should be where we are now? If, instead of having wished to enlighten the lower classes, we had busied ourselves with instructing the higher, we should not have seen M. de Keratry proposing the pillage of the duchy of Baden, a measure that the public finds very proper!

Are you studying Prudhomme now? He is gigantic! He admires Musset's Rhin, and asks if Musset has done anything else. Here you have Musset accepted as the national poet and ousting Beranger! What immense buffoonery is...everything! But a not at all gay buffoonery.

Misery is very evident. Everyone is in want, beginning with myself! But perhaps we were too accustomed to comfort and tranquillity. We buried ourselves in material things. We must return to the great tradition, hold no longer to life, to happiness, to money nor to anything; be what our grandfathers were, light, effervescing people.

Once men passed their life in starving. The same prospect is on the horizon. What you tell me about poor Nohant is terrible. The country has suffered less here than with you.

CLXXIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset.

Nohant, 8 August, 1870

Are you in Paris in the midst of all this torment? What a lesson the people are getting who want absolute masters! France and Prussia are cutting each other's throats for reasons that they don't understand! Here we are in the midst of great disasters, and what tears at the end of it all, even should we be the victors! One sees nothing but poor peasants mourning for their children who are leaving.

The mobilization takes away those who were left with us and how they are being treated to begin with! What disorder, what disarray in that military administration, which absorbed everything and had to swallow up everything! Is this horrible experience going to prove to the world that warfare ought to be suppressed or that civilization has to perish?

We have reached the point this evening of knowing that we are beaten. Perhaps tomorrow we shall know that we have beaten, and what will there be good or useful from one or the other?

It has rained here at last, a horrible storm which destroyed everything.

The peasant is working and ploughing his fields; digging hard always, sad or gay. He is imbecile, people say; no, he is a child in prosperity, a man in disaster, more of a man than we who complain; he says nothing, and while people are killing, he is sowing, repairing continually on one side what they are destroying from the other. We are going to try to do as he, and to hunt a bubbling spring fifty or a hundred yards below ground. The engineer is here, and Maurice is explaining to him the geology of the soil.

We are trying to dig into the bowels of the earth to forget all that is going on above it. But we cannot distract ourselves from this terror!

Write me where you are; I am sending this to you on the day agreed upon to rue Murillo. We love you, and we all embrace you.

G. Sand

Nohant, Sunday evening.

CLXXIV. TO GEORGE SAND.

Croisset, Wednesday, 1870

I got to Paris on Monday, and I left it again on Wednesday. Now I know the Parisian to the very bottom, and I have excused in my heart those most ferocious politics of 1793. Now, I understand them! What imbecility! what ignorance! what presumption! My compatriots make me want to vomit. They are fit to be put in the same sack with Isidore!

This people deserves to be chastised, and I fear that it will be.

It is impossible for me to read anything whatever, still more so to write anything. I spend my time like everyone else in waiting for news. Ah! if I did not have my mother, I would already be gone!

CLXXV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset.

Nohant, 15 August, 1870

I wrote to you to Paris according to your instructions the 8th. Weren't you there then? Probably so: in the midst of all this confusion, to publish Bouilhet, a poet! this is not the moment. As for me, my courage is weak. There is always a woman under the skin of the old troubadour. This human butchery tears my poor heart to pieces. I tremble too for all my children and friends, who perhaps are to be hacked to pieces.

And YET, in the midst of all that, my soul exults and has ecstasies of faith; these terrific lessons which are necessary for us to understand our imbecility, must be of use to us. We are perhaps making our last return to the ways of the old world. There are sharp and clear principles for everyone today that ought to extricate them from this torment. Nothing is useless in the material order of the universe. The moral order cannot escape the law. Bad engenders good. I tell you that we are in the HALF AS MUCH of Pascal, so as to get TO THE MORE THAN EVER! That is all the mathematics that I understand.

I have finished a novel in the midst of this torment, hurrying up so as not to be worn out before the end. I am as tired as if I had fought with our poor soldiers.

I embrace you. Tell me where you are, what you are thinking.

We all love you.

What a fine St. Napoleon we have!

G. Sand

CLXXVI. TO GEORGE SAND.

Saturday, 1870

Dear master,

Here we are in the depths of the abyss! A shameful peace will perhaps not be accepted! The Prussians intend to destroy Paris! That is their dream.

I don't think the siege of Paris is very imminent. But in order to force Paris to yield, they are going to (1) terrify her by the sight of cannon, and (2) ravage the surrounding country.

We expect the visit of these gentlemen at Rouen, and as I have been (since Sunday) lieutenant of my company, I drill my men and I am going to Rouen to take lessons in military tactics.

The most deplorable thing is that opinions are divided, some for defence to the utmost, and others for peace at any price.

I AM DYING OF HUMILIATION. What a house mine is! Fourteen persons who sigh and unnerve me! I curse women! It is because of them that we perish.

I expect that Paris will have the fate of Warsaw, and you distress me, you with your enthusiasm for the Republic. At the moment when we are overcome by the plainest positivism, how can you still believe in phantoms? Whatever happens, the people who are now in power will be sacrificed, and the Republic will follow their fate. Observe that I defend that poor Republic; but I do not believe in it.

That is all that I have to say to you. Now I should have many more things to say, but my head is not clear. It is as if cataracts, floods, oceans of sadness, were breaking over me. It is not possible to suffer more. Sometimes I am afraid of going mad. The face of my mother, when I turn my eyes toward her, takes away all my strength.

This is where our passion for not wanting to see the truth has taken us! Love of pretence and of flap-doodle. We are going to become a Poland, then a Spain. Then it will be the turn of Prussia who will be devoured by Russia.

As for me, I consider myself a man whose career is ended. My brain is not going to recover. One can write no longer when one does not think well of oneself. I demand only one thing, that is to die, so to be at rest.

CLXXVII. TO GEORGE SAND

Sunday evening

I am still alive, dear master, but I am hardly any better, for I am so sad! I didn't write you any sooner, for I was waiting, for news from you. I didn't know where you were.

Here it is six weeks that we have been expecting the coming of the Prussians from day to day. We strain our ears, thinking we can hear the sound of the cannon from a distance. They are surrounding Seine-Inferieure in a radius of from fourteen to twenty leagues. They are even nearer, since they are occupying Vexin, which they have completely destroyed. What horrors! It makes one blush for being a man!

If we have had a success on the Loire, their appearance will be delayed. But shall we have it? When the hope comes to me, I try to repel it, and yet, in the very depths of myself, in spite of all, I cannot keep myself from hoping a little, a very little bit.

I don't think that there is in all France a sadder man than I am! (It all depends on the sensitiveness of people.) I am dying of grief. That is the truth, and consolations irritate me. What distresses me is: (1) the ferocity of men; (2) the conviction that we are going to enter upon a stupid era. People will be utilitarian, military, American and Catholic! Very Catholic! You will see! The Prussian War ends the French Revolution and destroys it.

But supposing we were conquerors? you will say to me. That hypothesis is contrary to all historical precedents. Where did you ever see the south conquer the north, and the Catholics dominate the Protestants? The Latin race is agonizing. France is going to follow Spain and Italy, and boorishness (pignouflism) begins!

What a cataclysm! What a collapse! What misery! What abominations! Can one believe in progress and in civilization in the face of all that is going on? What use, pray, is science, since this people abounding in scholars commits abominations worthy of the Huns and worse than theirs, because they are systematic, cold-blooded, voluntary, and have for an excuse, neither passion nor hunger?

Why do they abhor us so fiercely? Don't you feel overwhelmed by the hatred of forty millions of men? This immense infernal chasm makes me giddy.

Ready-made phrases are not wanting: France will rise again! One must not despair! It is a salutary punishment! We were really too immoral! etc. Oh! eternal poppycock! No! one does not recover from such a blow! As for me, I feel myself struck to my very marrow!

If I were twenty years younger, I should perhaps not think all that, and if I were twenty years older I should be resigned.

Poor Paris! I think it is heroic. But if we do find it again, it will not be our Paris any more! All the friends that I had there are dead or have disappeared. I have no longer any center. Literature seems to me to be a vain and useless thing! Shall I ever be in a condition to write again?

Oh! if I could flee into a country where one does not see uniforms, where one does not hear the drum, where one does not talk of massacres, where one is not obliged to be a citizen! But the earth is no longer habitable for the poor mandarins.

CLXXVIII. TO GEORGE SAND

Wednesday

I am sad no longer. I took up my Saint-Antoine yesterday. So much the worse, one has to get accustomed to it! One must accustom oneself to what is the natural condition of man, that is to say, to evil.

The Greeks at the time of Pericles made art without knowing if they should have anything to eat the next day. Let us be Greeks. I shall confess to you, however, dear master, that I feel rather a savage. The blood of my ancestors, the Natchez or the Hurons, boils in my educated veins, and I seriously, like a beast, like an animal, want to fight!

Explain that to me! The idea of making peace now exasperates me, and I would rather that Paris were burned (like Moscow), than see the Prussians enter it. But we have not gotten to that; I think the wind is turning.

I have read some soldiers' letters, which are models. One can't swallow up a country where people write like that. France is a resourceful jade, and will be up again.

Whatever happens, another world is going to begin, and I feel that I am very old to adapt myself to new customs.

Oh! how I miss you, how I want to see you!

We have decided here to all march on Paris if the compatriots of Hegel lay siege to it. Try to get your Berrichons to buck up. Call to them: "Come to help me prevent the enemy from drinking and eating in a country which is foreign to them!"

The war (I hope) will make a home thrust at the "authorities."

The individual, disowned, overwhelmed by the modern world, will he regain his importance? Let us hope so!

CLXXIX. TO GEORGE SAND.

Tuesday, 11 October, 1870

Dear master,

Are you still living? Where are you, Maurice, and the others?

I don't know how it is that I am not dead, I have suffered so atrociously for six weeks.

My mother has fled to Rouen. My niece is in London. My brother is busy with town affairs, and, as for me, I am alone here, eaten up with impatience and chagrin! I assure you that I have wanted to do right; what misery! I have had at my door today two hundred and seventy-one poor people, and they were all given something. What will this winter be?

The Prussians are now twelve hours from Rouen, and we have no commands, no orders, no discipline, nothing, nothing! They hold out false hopes to us continually with the army of the Loire. Where is it? Do you know anything about it? What are they doing in the middle of France? Paris will end by being starved, and no one is taking her any aid!

The imbecilities of the Republic surpass those of the Empire. Are they playing under all this some abominable comedy? Why such inaction?

Ah! how sad I am. I feel that the world is going by.

CLXXX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset.

Le Chatre, 14 October, 1870

We are living at Le Chatre. Nohant is ravaged by smallpox with complications, horrible. We had to take our little ones into the Creuse, to friends who came to get us, and we spent three weeks there, looking in vain for quarters where a family could stay for three months. We were asked to go south and were offered hospitality; but we did not want to leave the country where, from one day to another, one can be useful, although one hardly knows yet in what way to go at it.

So we have come back to the friends who lived the nearest to our abandoned hearth; and we are awaiting events. To speak of all the peril and trouble there is in establishing the Republic in the interior of our provinces would be quite useless. There can be no illusion: everything is at stake, and the end will perhaps be ORLEANISM. But we are pushed into the unforeseen to such an extent that it seems to me puerile to have anticipations; the thing to do is to escape the next catastrophe.

Don't let's say that it is impossible; don't let's think it. Don't let's despair about France. She is going through expiation for her madness, she will be reborn no matter what happens. We shall perhaps be carried away, the rest of us. To die of pneumonia or of a bullet is dying just the same. Let's die without cursing our race!

We still love you, and we all embrace you.

G. Sand

CLXXXI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset.

Nohant, 4 February, 1871.

Don't you receive my letters, then? Write to me I beg you, one word only: I AM WELL. We are so worried!

They are all well in Paris.

We embrace you.

G. Sand

CLXXXII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT.

Nohant, 22 February, 1871

I received your letter of the 15th this morning; what a cruel thorn it takes from my heart! One gets frantic with anxiety now when one does not receive answers. Let us hope that we can talk soon and tell all about our ABSENCE from each other. I too have had the good fortune not to lose any of my friends, young or old. That is all the good one can say. I do not regret this Republic, it has been the greatest failure of all! the most unfortunate for Paris, the most unsuitable in the provinces. Besides, if I had loved it, I should not regret anything; if only this odious war might end! We love you and we embrace you affectionately. I shall not hurry to go to Paris. It will be pestilential for some time to come.

Yours.

CLXXXIII. TO GEORGE SAND.

Dieppe, 11 March, 1871

When shall we meet? Paris does not seem amusing to me. Ah! into what sort of a world are we going to enter! Paganism, Christianity, idiotism, there are the three great evolutions of humanity! It is sad to find ourselves at the beginning of the third.

I shall not tell you all I have suffered since September. Why didn't I die from it? That is what surprises me! No one was more desperate than I was. Why? I have had bad moments in my life, I have gone through great losses. I have wept a great deal. I have undergone much anguish. Well! all these pangs accumulated together, are nothing in comparison to that. And I cannot get over them! I am not consoled! I have no hope!

Yet I did not see myself as a progressivist and a humanitarian. That doesn't matter. I had some illusions! What barbarity! What a slump! I am wrathful at my contemporaries for having given me the feelings of a brute of the twelfth century! I'M STIFLING IN GALL! These officers who break mirrors with white gloves on, who know Sanskrit and who fling themselves on the champagne, who steal your watch and then send you their visiting card, this war for money, these civilized savages give me more horror than cannibals. And all the world is going to imitate them, is going to be a soldier! Russia has now four millions of them. All Europe will wear a uniform. If we take our revenge, it will be ultra-ferocious, and observe that one is going to think only of that, of avenging oneself on Germany! The government, whatever it is, can support itself only by speculating on that passion. Wholesale murder is going to be the end of all our efforts, the ideal of France!

I cherish the following dream: of going to live in the sun in a tranquil country!

Let us look for new hypocrisies: declamations on virtue, diatribes on corruption, austerity of habits, etc. Last degree of pedantry!

I have now at Croisset twelve Prussians. As soon as my poor dwelling (of which I have a horror now) is emptied and cleaned, I shall return there; then I shall go doubtless to Paris, despite its unhealthfulness! But I don't care a hang for that.

CLXXXIV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset.

Nohant, 17 March, 1871

I received your letter of the 11th yesterday.

We have all suffered in spirit more than at any other time of our lives, and we shall always suffer from that wound. It is evident that the savage instinct tends to take the upper hand; but I fear something worse; it is the egoistic and cowardly instinct; it is the ignoble corruption of false patriots, of ultra-republicans who cry out for vengeance, and who hide themselves; a good pretext for the bourgeois who want a STRONG reaction. I fear lest we shall not even be vindictive, — all that bragging, coupled with poltroonery, will so disgust us and so impel us to live from day to day as under the Restoration, submitting to everything and only asking to be let alone.

There will be an awakening later. I shall not be here then, and you, you will be old! Go to live in the sun in a tranquil country! Where? What country is going to be tranquil in this struggle of barbarity against civilization, a struggle which is going to be universal? Is not the sun itself a myth? Either he hides himself or he burns you up, and it is thus with everything on this unhappy planet. Let us love it just the same, and accustom ourselves to suffering on it.

I have written day by day my impressions and my reflections during the crisis. The Revue des Deux Mondes is publishing this diary. If you read it, you will see that everywhere life has been torn from its very foundations, even in the country where the war has not penetrated.

You will see too, that I have not swallowed, although very greedy, party humbugs. But I don't know if you are of my opinion, that full and entire liberty would save us from these disasters and restore us to the path of possible progress again. The abuses of liberty give me no anxiety of themselves; but those whom they frighten always incline towards the abuse of power. Just now M. Thiers seems to understand it; but can he and will he know how to preserve the principle by which he has become the arbiter of this great problem?

Whatever happens, let us love each other, and do not keep me in ignorance of what concerns you. My heart is full to bursting and the remembrance of you eases it a little from its perpetual disquiet. I am afraid lest these barbarous guests devastate Croisset; for they continue in spite of peace to make themselves odious and disgusting everywhere. Ah! how I should like to have five billions in order to chase them away! I should not ask to get them back again.

Now, do come to us, we are so quiet here; materially, we have been so always. We force ourselves to take up our work again, we resign ourselves; what is there better to do? You are beloved here, we live here in a continual state of loving one another; we are holding on to our Lamberts, whom we shall keep as long as possible. All our children have come out of the war safe and sound. You would live here in peace and be able to work; for that must be, whether one is in the mood or not! The season is going to be lovely. Paris will calm itself during that time. You are looking for a peaceful spot. It is under your nose, with hearts which love you!

I embrace you a thousand times for myself and for all my brood. The little girls are splendid. The Lamberts' little boy is charming.

CLXXXV. TO GEORGE SAND.

Neuville near Dieppe, Friday, 31 March, 1871

Dear master,

Tomorrow, at last, I resign myself to re-enter Croisset! It is hard! But I must! I am going to try to make up again my poor Saint-Antoine and to forget France.

My mother stays here with her grandchild, till one knows where to go without fear of the Prussians or of a riot.

Some days ago I went from here with Dumas to Brussels from where I thought to go direct to Paris. But "the new Athens" seems to me to surpass Dahomey in ferocity and imbecility. Has the end come to the HUMBUGS? Will they have finished with hollow metaphysics and conventional ideas? All the evil comes from our gigantic ignorance. What ought to be studied is believed without discussion. Instead of investigating, people make assertions.

The French Revolution must cease to be a dogma, and it must become once more a part of science, like the rest of human things. If people had known more, they would not have believed that a mystical formula is capable of making armies, and that the word "Republic" is enough to conquer a million of well disciplined men. They would have left Badinguet on the throne EXPRESSLY to make peace, ready to put him in the galleys afterward. If they had known more, they would have known what the volunteers of '92 were and the retreat of Brunswick gained by bribery through Danton and Westermann. But no! always the same old story! always poppycock! There is now the Commune of Paris which is returning to the real Middle Ages! That's flat! The question of leases especially, is splendid! The government interferes in natural rights now, it intervenes in contracts between individuals. The Commune asserts that we do not owe what we owe, and that one service is not paid for by another. It is an enormity of absurdity and injustice.

Many conservatives who, from love of order, wanted to preserve the Republic, are going to regret Badinguet and in their hearts recall the Prussians. The people of the Hotel de Ville have changed the object of our hatred. That is why I am angry with them. It seems to me that we have never been lower.

We oscillate between the society of Saint-Vincent de Paul and the International. But this latter commits too many imbecilities to have a long life. I admit that it may overcome the troops at Versailles and overturn the government, the Prussians will enter Paris, and "order will reign" at Warsaw. If, on the contrary, it is conquered, the reaction will be furious and all liberty will be strangled.

What can one say of the socialists who imitate the proceedings of Badinguet and of William: requisitions, suppressions of newspapers, executions without trial, etc.? Ah! what an immoral beast is the crowd! and how humiliating it is to be a man!

I embrace you!

CLXXXVI. TO GEORGE SAND.

Croisset, Monday evening, two o'clock.

Dear master,

Why no letters? Haven't you received mine sent from Dieppe? Are you ill? Are you still alive? What does it mean? I hope very much that neither you (nor any of yours) are in Paris, capital of arts, cornerstone of civilization, center of fine manners and of urbanity?

Do you know the worst of all that? IT IS THAT WE GET ACCUSTOMED TO

IT. Yes! one does. One becomes accustomed to getting along without

Paris, to worrying about it no longer, and almost to thinking that it exists no longer.

As for me, I am not like the bourgeois; I consider that after the invasion there are no more misfortunes. The war with Prussia gave me the effect of a great upheaval of nature, one of those cataclysms that happen every six thousand years; while the insurrection in Paris is, to my eyes, a very clear and almost simple thing.

What retrogressions! What savages! How they resemble the people of the League and the men in armor! Poor France, who will never free herself from the Middle Ages! who labors along in the Gothic idea of the Commune, which is nothing else than the Roman municipality.

Oh! I assure you that my heart is heavy over it!

And the little reaction that we are going to have after that? How the good ecclesiastics are going to flourish again!

I have started at Saint-Antoine once more, and I am working tremendously.

CLXXXVII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset.

Nohant, 28 April, 1871

No, certainly I do not forget you! I am sad, sad, that is to say, that I am stunned, that I watch the spring, that I am busy, that I talk as if there were nothing; but I have not been able to be alone an instant since that horrible occurrence without falling into a bitter despair. I make great efforts to prevent it; I do not want to be discouraged; I do not want to deny the past and dread the future; but it is my will, it is my reason that struggles against a profound impression unsurmountable up to the present moment.

That is why I did not want to write to you before feeling better, not that I am ashamed to have crises of depression, but because I did not want to increase your sadness already so profound, by adding the weight of mine to it. For me, the ignoble experiment that Paris is attempting or is undergoing, proves nothing against the laws of the eternal progression of men and things, and, if I have gained any principles in my mind, good or bad, they are neither shattered nor changed by it. For a long time I have accepted patience as one accepts the sort of weather there is, the length of winter, old age, lack of success in all its forms. But I think that partisans (sincere) ought to change their formulas or find out perhaps the emptiness of every a priori formula.

It is not that which makes me sad. When a tree is dead, one should plant two others. My unhappiness comes from pure weakness of heart that I don't know how to overcome. I cannot sleep over the suffering and even over the ignominy of others. I pity those who do the evil! while I recognize that they are not at all interesting, their moral state distresses me. One pities a little bird that has fallen from its nest; why not pity a heap of consciences fallen in the mud? One suffered less during the Prussian siege. One loved Paris unhappy in spite of itself, one pities it so much the more now that one can no longer love it. Those who never loved get satisfaction by mortally hating it. What shall we answer? Perhaps we should not answer at all. The scorn of France is perhaps the necessary punishment of the remarkable cowardice with which the Parisians have submitted to the riot and its adventurers. It is a consequence of the acceptance of the adventurers of the Empire; other felons but the same cowardice.

But I did not want to talk to you of that, you ROAR about it enough as it is! one ought to be distracted; for if one thinks too much about it, one becomes separated from one's own limbs and lets oneself undergo amputation with too much stoicism.

You don't tell me in what state you found your charming nest at Croisset. The Prussians occupied it; did they ruin it, dirty it, rob it? Your books, your bibelots, did you find them all? Did they respect your name, your workshop? If you can work again there, peace will come to your spirit. As for me, I am waiting till mine gets well, and I know that I shall have to help myself to my own cure by a certain faith often shaken, but of which I make a duty.

Tell me whether the tulip tree froze this winter, and if the poppies are pretty.

I often take the journey in spirit; I see again your garden and its surroundings. How far away that is! How many things have happened since! One hardly knows whether one is a hundred years old or not!

My little girls bring me back to the notion of time; they are growing, they are amusing and affectionate; it is through them and the two beings who gave them to me that I feel myself still of the world; it is through you too, dear friend, whose kind and loving heart I always feel to be good and alive. How I should like to see you! But I have no longer a way of going and coming.

We embrace you, all of us, and we love you.

G. Sand

CLXXXVIII. TO GEORGE SAND

I am answering at once your questions that concern me personally. No! the Prussians did not loot my house. They HOOKED some little things of no importance, a dressing case, a bandbox, some pipes; but on the whole they did no harm. As for my study, it was respected. I had buried a large box full of letters and hidden my voluminous notes on Saint-Antoine. I found all that intact.

The worst of the invasion for me is that it has aged my poor, dear, old mother by ten years! What a change! She can no longer walk alone, and is distressingly weak! How sad it is to see those whom one loves deteriorate little by little!

In order to think no longer on the public miseries or on my own, I have plunged again with fury into Saint-Antoine, and if nothing disturbs me and I continue at this pace, I shall have finished it next winter. I am very eager to read to you the sixty pages which are done. When we can circulate about again on the railroad, do come to see me for a little while. Your old troubadour has waited for you for such a long time! Your letter of this morning has saddened me. What a proud fellow you are and what immense courage you have!

I am not like a lot of people whom I hear bemoaning the war of Paris. For my part, I find it more tolerable than the invasion, there is no more despair possible, and that is what proves once more our abasement. "Ah! God be thanked, the Prussians are there!" is the universal cry of the bourgeois. I put messieurs the workmen into the same pack, and would have them all thrust together into the river! Moreover they are on the way there, and then calm will return. We are going to become a great, flat industrial country like Belgium. The disappearance of Paris (as center of the government) will render France colorless and dull. She will no longer have a heart, a center, nor, I think, a spirit.

As for the Commune, which is about to die out, it is the last manifestation of the Middle Ages. The very last, let us hope!

I hate democracy (at least the kind that is understood in France), that is to say, the exaltation of mercy to the detriment of justice, the negation of right, in a word, antisociability.

The Commune rehabilitates murderers, quite as Jesus pardoned thieves, and they pillage the residences of the rich, because they have been taught to curse Lazarus, who was not a bad rich man, but simply a rich man. "The Republic is above every criticism" is equivalent to that belief: "The pope is infallible!" Always formulas! Always gods!

The god before the last, which was universal suffrage, has just shown his adherents a terrible farce by nominating “the murderers of Versailles.” What shall we believe in, then? In nothing! That is the beginning of wisdom. It was time to have done with “principles” and to take up science, and investigation. The only reasonable thing (I always come back to that) is a government by mandarins, provided the mandarins know something and even that they know many things. The people is an eternal infant, and it will be (in the hierarchy of social elements) always in the last row, since it is number, mass, the unlimited. It is of little matter whether many peasants know how to read and listen no longer to their cure, but it is of great matter that many men like Renan or Littre should be able to live and be listened to! Our safety is now only in a LEGITIMATE ARISTOCRACY, I mean by that, a majority that is composed of more than mere numbers.

If they had been more enlightened, if there had been in Paris more people acquainted with history, we should not have had to endure Gambetta, nor Prussia, nor the Commune. What did the Catholics do to meet a great danger? They crossed themselves while consigning themselves to God and to the saints. We, however, who are advanced, we are going to cry out, “Long live the Republic!” while recalling what happened in ‘92; and there was no doubt of its success, observe that. The Prussian existed no longer, they embraced one another with joy and restrained themselves from running to the defiles of the Argonne where there are defiles no longer; never mind, that is according to tradition. I have a friend in Rouen who proposed to a club the manufacture of lances to fight against the breech-loaders!

Ah! it would have been more practical to keep Badinguet, in order to send him to the galleys once peace was made! Austria did not have a revolution after Sadowa, nor Italy after Novara, nor Russia after Sebastopol! But the good French hasten to demolish their house as soon as the chimney has caught fire.

Well, I must tell you an atrocious idea; I am AFRAID that the destruction of the Vendome column is sowing the seeds of a third Empire! Who knows if in twenty or in forty years, a grandson of Jerome will not be our master?

For the moment Paris is completely epileptic. A result of the congestion caused by the siege. France, on the whole, has lived for several years in an extraordinary mental state. The success of la Lanterne and Troppman have been very evident symptoms of it. That folly is the result of too great imbecility, and that imbecility comes from too much bluffing, for because of lying they had become idiotic. They had lost all notion of right and wrong, of beautiful and ugly. Recall the criticism of recent years. What difference did it make between the sublime and the ridiculous? What lack of respect; what ignorance! what a mess! “Boiled or roasted, same thing!” and at the same time, what servility for the opinion of the day, the dish of the fashion!

All was false! False realism, false army, false credit, and even false harlots. They were called “marquises,” while the great ladies called themselves familiarly “cochonnettes.” Those girls who were of the tradition of Sophie Arnould, like Lagier, roused horror. You have not seen the reverence of Saint-Victor for la Paiva. And this falseness (which is perhaps a consequence of romanticism, predominance of passion over form, and of inspiration over rule) was applied especially in the manner of judging. They extolled an actress not as an actress, but as a good mother of a family! They asked art to be moral, philosophy to be clear, vice to be decent, and science to be within the range of the people.

But this is a very long letter. When I start abusing my contemporaries, I never get through with it.

CLXXXIX. TO GEORGE SAND

Croisset, Sunday evening, 10 June, 1871

Dear master,

I never had a greater desire or a greater need to see you than now. I have just come from Paris and I don't know to whom to talk. I am choking. I am overcome, or rather, absolutely disheartened.

The odor of corpses disgusts me less than the miasmas of egotism that exhale from every mouth. The sight of the ruins is as nothing in comparison with the great Parisian inanity. With a very few exceptions it seemed to me that everybody ought to be tied up.

Half the population wants to strangle the other half, and VICE VERSA. This is clearly to be seen in the eyes of the passers-by.

And the Prussians exist no longer! People excuse them and admire them. The “reasonable people” want to be naturalized Germans. I assure you it is enough to make one despair of the human race.

I was in Versailles on Thursday. The excesses of the Right inspire fear. The vote about the Orleans is a concession made to it, so as not to irritate it, and so as to have the time to prepare against it.

I except from the general folly, Renan who, on the contrary, seemed to me very philosophical, and the good Soulie who charged me to give you a thousand affectionate messages.

I have collected a mass of horrible and unpublished details which I spare you.

My little trip to Paris has troubled me extremely, and I am going to have a hard time in getting down to work again. What do you think of my friend Maury, who kept the tricolor over the Archives all during the Commune? I think few men are capable of such pluck.

When history clears up the burning of Paris, it will find several elements among which are, without any doubt: (1) the Prussians, and (2) the people of Badinguet; they have NO LONGER ANY written proof against the Empire, and Haussman is going to present himself boldly to the elections of Paris.

Have you read, among the documents found in the Tuileries last September, a plot of a novel by Isidore? What a scenario!

CXC. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Paris [FOOTNOTE:
Evidently an answer to a lost letter.] Nohant, 23 July, 1871

No, I am not ill, my dear old troubadour, in spite of the sorrow which is the daily bread of France; I have an iron constitution and an exceptional old age, abnormal even, for my strength increases at the age when it ought to diminish. The day that I resolutely buried my youth, I grew twenty years younger. You will tell me that the bark undergoes none the less the ravages of time. I don't care for that, the heart of the tree is very good and the sap still runs as in the old apple trees in my garden, which bear fruit all the better the more gnarly they are. Thank you for having worried over the illness which the papers have bestowed upon me. Maurice thanks you also and embraces you. He is still mingling with his scientific, literary, and agricultural studies, beautiful marionette shows. He thinks of you every time and says that he would like to have you here to note his progress, for he continually improves.

In what condition are we, according to your opinion?

In Rouen, you no longer have any Prussians at your back, that's something, and one would say that the bourgeois Republic wants to impose itself. It will be foolish. You foretold that, and I don't doubt it; but after the inevitable rule of the Philistines, life will extend and spread on all sides. The filth of the Commune shows us dangers which were not sufficiently foreseen and which enforce a new political life on everybody, carrying on one's affairs oneself and forcing the charming proletariat created by the Empire to know what is possible and what is not. Education does not teach honesty and disinterestedness overnight. The vote is immediate education. They have appointed Raoul Rigault and company. They know how much people like that cost now by the yard; let them go on and they will die of hunger. There is no other way to make them understand in a short time.

Are you working? Is Saint-Antoine going well? Tell me what you are doing in Paris, what you are seeing, what you are thinking. I have not the courage to go there. Do come to see me before you return to Croisset. I am blue from not seeing you, it is a sort of death.

G. Sand

CXCI. TO GEORGE SAND 25 July, 1871

I find Paris a little less mad than in June, at least on the surface. They are beginning to hate Prussia in a natural manner, that is to say, they are getting back into French tradition. They no longer make phrases in praise of her civilizations. As for the Commune, they expect to see it rise again later, and the "established order" does absolutely nothing to prevent its return. They are applying old remedies to new woes, remedies that have never cured (nor prevented) the least ill. The reestablishment of credit seems to me colossally absurd. One of my friends made a good speech against it; the godson of your friend Michel de Bourges, Bardoux, mayor of Clermont-Ferrand.

I think, like you, that the bourgeois republic can be established. Its lack of elevation is perhaps a guarantee of stability. It will be the first time that we have lived under a government without principles. The era of positivism in politics is about to begin.

The immense disgust which my contemporaries give me throws me back on the past, and I am working on my good Saint-Antoine with all my might. I came to Paris only for it, for it is impossible for me to get in Rouen the books that I need now; I am lost in the religions of Persia. I am trying to get a clear idea of the God Horn, and it isn't easy. I spent all the month of June in studying Buddhism, on which I already had many notes. But I wanted to get to the bottom of the subject as soon as possible. And I also did a little Buddha that I consider charming. Don't I want to read you that book (mine)!

I am not going to Nohant, for I don't care to go further I away from my mother now. Her society afflicts me and unnerves me, my niece Caroline takes turns with me in carrying on the dear and painful burden.

In a fortnight I shall be back in Croisset. Between the 15th and the 20th of August I am expecting the good Tourgueneff there. It would be very kind of you to come after him, dear master. I say come after, for we have only one decent room since the visit of the Prussians. Come, make a good effort. Come in September.

Have you any news of the Odeon? I can't get any response whatsoever from de Chilly. I have been to his house several times and I have written three letters to him: not a word! Those gay blades behave towards one like great lords, which is charming. I don't know if he is still director, or if the management has been given to the Berton, Laurent, Bernard company, do you?

Berton wrote to me to recommend him (and them) to d'Osmoy, deputy and president of the dramatic commission, but since then I have not heard anything mentioned.

CXCII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset Nohant, August, 1871

You want to see me, and you need me, and you don't come see me! That is not nice; for I too, and all of us here, sigh for you. We parted so gaily eighteen months ago, and so many atrocious things have happened in the meantime! Seeing each other would be the consolation DUE us. For my part, I cannot stir, I have not a penny, and I have to work like a negro. And then I have not seen a single Prussian, and I would like to keep my eyes pure from that stain. Ah! my friend, what years we are going through! We cannot go back again, for hope departs with the rest.

What will be the reaction from the infamous Commune? Isidore or Henry V. or the kingdom of incendiaries restored by anarchy? I who have had so much patience with my species and who have so long looked on the bright side, now see nothing but darkness. I judge others by myself. I had improved my real character, I had extinguished useless and dangerous enthusiasms, I had sowed grass and flowers that grew well on my volcanoes, and I imagined that all the world could become enlightened, could correct itself, or restrain itself; that the years passed over me and over my contemporaries could not be lost to reason and experience: and now I awaken from a dream to find a generation divided between idiocy and delirium tremens! Everything is possible at present.

However, it is bad to despair. I shall make a great effort, and perhaps I shall become just and patient again; but today I cannot. I am as troubled as you, and I don't dare to talk, nor to think, nor to write, I have such a fear of touching the wounds open in every soul.

I have indeed received your other letter, and I was waiting for courage to answer it; I would like to do only good to those I love, especially to you, who feel so keenly. I am no good at this moment. I am filled with a devouring indignation and a disgust which is killing me.

I love you, that is all I know. My children say the same. Embrace your good little mother for me.

G. Sand

CXCIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 6 September, 1871

Where are you, my dear old troubadour?

I don't write to you, I am quite troubled in the depths of my soul. But that will pass, I hope; but I am ill with the illness of my nation and my race. I cannot isolate myself in my reason and in my own IRREPROACHABILITY. I feel the great bonds loosened and, as it were, broken. It seems to me that we are all going off, I don't know where. Have you more courage than I have? Give me some of it?

I am sending you the pretty faces of our little girls. They remember you, and tell me I must send you their pictures. Alas! they are girls, we raise them with love like precious plants. What men will they meet to protect them and continue our work? It seems to me that in twenty years there will be only hypocrites and blackguards!

Give me news of yourself, tell me of your poor mother, your family, of Croisset. Love us still, as we love you.

G. Sand

CXCIV. TO GEORGE SAND

Croisset, Wednesday, 6 September

Well, dear master, it seems to me that you are forgetting your troubadour, aren't you? Are you then quite overwhelmed with work! How long a time it is since I saw your good firm writing! How long it is since we have talked together! What a pity that we should live so far from each other! I need you very much.

I don't dare to leave my poor mother! When I am obliged to be away, Caroline comes to take my place. If it were not for that, I should go to Nohant. Shall you stay there indefinitely? Must we wait till the middle of the winter to embrace each other?

I should like very much to read you Saint-Antoine, which is half done, then to stretch myself and to roar at your side.

Some one who knows that I love you and who admires you brought me a copy of le Gaulois in which there were parts of an article by you on the workmen, published in le Temps. How true it is! How just and well said! Sad! Sad! Poor France! And they accuse me of being skeptical.

But what do you think of Mademoiselle Papevoine, the incendiary, who, in the midst of a barricade, submitted to the assaults of eighteen citizens! That surpasses the end of l'Education sentimentale where they limit themselves to offering flowers.

But what goes beyond everything now, is the conservative party, which is not even going to vote, and which is still in a panic! You cannot imagine the alarm of the Parisians. "In six months, sir, the Commune will be established everywhere" is the answer or rather the universal groan.

I do not look forward to an imminent cataclysm because nothing that is foreseen happens. The International will perhaps triumph in the end, but not as it hopes, not as they dread. Ah! how tired I am of the ignoble workmen, the incompetent bourgeois, the stupid peasant and the odious ecclesiastic!

That is why I lose myself as much as I can in antiquity. Just now I am making all the gods talk in a state of agony. The subtitle of my book could be The Height of Insanity. And the printing of it withdraws further and further into my mind. Why publish? Who pray is bothering about art nowadays? I make literature for myself as a bourgeois turns napkin rings in his garret. You will tell me that I had better be useful. But how? How can I make people listen to me?

Tourgueneff has written me that he is going to stay in Paris all winter beginning with October. That will be some one to talk to. For I can't talk of anything whatever with anyone whatever.

I have been looking after the grave of my poor Bouilhet today; so tonight I have a twofold bitterness.

CXCV. TO GEORGE SAND

Croisset, 8 September, 1871

Ah! how sweet they are! What darlings! What fine little heads so serious and sweet! My mother was quite touched by it, and so was I. That is what I call a delicate attention, dear master, and I thank you very much for it. I envy Maurice, his existence is not arid as mine is. Our two letters crossed again. That proves beyond a doubt that we feel the same things at the same time in the same degree.

Why are you so said? Humanity offers nothing new. Its irremediable misery has filled me with sadness ever since my youth. And in addition I now have no disillusion. I believe that the crowd, the common herd will always be hateful. The only important thing is a little group of minds — always the same — which passed the torch from one to another.

As long as we do not bow to mandarins, as long as the Academy of Sciences does not replace the pope, politics as a whole and society, down to its very roots, will be nothing but collection of disheartening humbugs. We are floundering in the after-birth of the Revolution, which was an abortion, a failure, a misfire, "whatever they say." And the reason is that it proceeded from the Middle Ages and Christianity. The idea of equality (which is all the modern democracy) is an essentially Christian idea and opposed to that of justice. Observe how mercy predominates now. Sentiment is everything, justice is nothing.

People are now not even indignant against murderers, and the people who set fire to Paris are less punished than the calumniator of M. Favre.

In order for France to rise again, she must pass from inspiration to science, she must abandon all metaphysics, she must enter into criticism, that is to say into the examination of things.

I am persuaded that we shall seem extremely imbecile to posterity. The words republic and monarchy will make them laugh, as we on our part, laughed, at realism and nominalism. For I defy anyone to show me an essential difference between those two terms. A modern republic and a constitutional monarchy are identical. Never mind! They are squabbling about that, they are shouting, they are fighting!

As for the good people, "free and compulsory" education will do it. When every one is able to read le Petit Journal and le Figaro, they won't read anything else, because the bourgeois and the rich man read only these. The press is a school of demoralization, because it dispenses with thinking. Say that, you will be brave, and if you prevail, you will have rendered a fine service.

The first remedy will be to finish up with universal suffrage, the shame of the human mind. As it is constituted, one single element prevails to the detriment of all the others: numbers dominate over mind, education, race and even money, which is worth more than numbers.

But society (which always needs a good God, a Saviour), isn't it perhaps capable of taking care of itself? The conservative party has not even the instinct of the brute (for the brute at least knows how to fight for its lair and its living). It will be divided by the Internationals, the Jesuits of the future. But those of the past, who had neither country nor justice, have not succeeded and the International will founder because it is in the wrong. No ideas, nothing but greed!

Ah! dear, good master, if you only could hate! That is what you lack, hate. In spite of your great Sphinx eyes, you have seen the world through a golden color. That comes from the sun in your heart; but so many shadows have arisen that now you are not recognizing things any more. Come now! Cry out! Thunder! Take your great lyre and touch the brazen string: the monsters will flee. Bedew us with the drops of the blood of wounded Themis.

Why do you feel “the great bonds broken?” What is broken? Your bonds are indestructible, your sympathy can attach itself only to the Eternal.

Our ignorance of history makes us slander our own times. Man has always been like that. Several years of quiet deceived us. That is all. I too, I used to believe in the amelioration of manners. One must wipe out that mistake and think of oneself no more highly than they did in the time of Pericles or of Shakespeare, atrocious epochs in which fine things were done. Tell me that you are lifting your head and that you are thinking of your old troubadour, who cherishes you.

CXCVI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset
Nohant, 8 September, 1871

As usual our letters have crossed; you should receive today the portraits of my little grandchildren, not pretty at this period of their growth, but with such beautiful eyes that they can never be ugly.

You see that I am as disheartened as you are and indignant, alas! without being able to hate either the human race or our poor, dear country. But one feels too much one’s helplessness to pluck up one’s heart and spirit. One works all the same, even if only turning napkin rings, as you say: and, as for me, while serving the public, I think about it as little as possible. Le Temps has done me the service of making me rummage in my waste basket. I find there the prophecies that the conscience of each of us has inspired in him, and these little returns to the past ought to give us courage; but it is not at all so. The lessons of experience are of no use until too late.

I think that without subvention, the Odeon will be in no condition to put on well a literary play such as Aisse, and that you should not let them murder it. You had better wait and see what happens. As for the Berton company, I have no news of it; it is touring the provinces, and those who compose it will not be reengaged by Chilly, who is furious with them.

The Odeon has let Reynard go, an artist of the first rank, whom Montigny had the wit to engage. There really is no one left at the Odeon, as far as I know. Why don’t you consider the Theatre Francais?

Where is the Princess Mathilde? At Enghien, or in Paris, or in England? I am sending you a note which you must enclose in the first letter that you have occasion to write to her.

I cannot go to see you, dear old man, and yet I had earned one of those happy vacations; but I cannot leave the HOME, for all sorts of reasons too long to tell and of no interest, but inflexible. I do not know even if I shall go to Paris this winter. Here am I so old! I imagine that I can only bore others and that people cannot endure me anywhere except at home. You absolutely must come to see me with Tourgueneff, since you are planning to go away this winter; prepare him for this abduction. I embrace you, as I love, and my world does too.

CXCVII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

14 September, 1871, Nohant

[Footnote: Appeared in le Temps, 3 October, 1871, under the title,

Reponse a un ami, and published in Impressions et Souvenirs, p. 53.]

And what, you want me to stop loving? You want me to say that I have been mistaken all my life, that humanity is contemptible, hateful, that it has always been and always will be so? And you chide my anguish as a weakness, and puerile regret for a lost illusion? You assert that the people has always been ferocious, the priest always hypocritical, the bourgeois always cowardly, the soldier always brigand, the peasant always stupid? You say that you have known all that ever since your youth and you rejoice that you never have doubted it, because maturity has not brought you any disappointment; have you not been young then? Ah! We are entirely different, for I have never ceased to be young, if being young is always loving.

What, then, do you want me to do, so as to isolate myself from my kind, from my compatriots, from my race, from the great family in whose bosom my own family is only one ear of corn in the terrestrial field? And if only this ear could ripen in a sure place, if only one could, as you say, live for certain privileged persons and withdraw from all the others!

But it is impossible, and your steady reason puts up with the most unrealizable of Utopias. In what Eden, in what fantastic Eldorado will you hide your family, your little group of friends, your intimate happiness, so that the lacerations of the social state and the disasters of the country shall not reach them? If you want to be happy through certain people — those certain people, the favorites of your heart, must be happy in themselves. Can they be? Can you assure them the least security?

Will you find me a refuge in my old age which is drawing near to death? And what difference now does death or life make to me for myself? Let us suppose that we die absolutely, or that love does not follow into the other life, are we not up to our last breath tormented by the desire, by the imperious need of assuring those whom we leave behind all the happiness possible? Can we go peacefully to sleep when we feel the shaken earth ready to swallow up all those for whom we have lived? A continuous happy life with one's family in spite of all, is without doubt relatively a great good, the only consolation that one could and that one would enjoy. But even supposing external evil does not penetrate into our house, which is impossible, you know very well, I could not approve of acquiescing in indifference to what causes public unhappiness.

All that was foreseen. ... Yes, certainly, I had foreseen it as well as anyone! I saw the storm rising. I was aware, like all those who do not live without thinking, of the evident approach of the cataclysm. When one sees the patient writhing in agony is there any consolation in understanding his illness thoroughly? When lightning strikes, are we calm because we have heard the thunder rumble a long time before?

No, no, people do not isolate themselves, the ties of blood are not broken, people do not curse or scorn their kind. Humanity is not a vain word. Our life is composed of love, and not to love is to cease to live.

The people, you say! The people is yourself and myself. It would be useless to deny it. There are not two races, the distinction of classes only establishes relative and for the most part illusory inequalities. I do not know if your ancestors were high up in the bourgeoisie; for my part, on my mother's side my roots spring directly from the people, and I feel them continually alive in the depth of my being. We all have them, even if the origin is more or less effaced; the first men were hunters and shepherds, then farmers and soldiers. Brigandage crowned with success gave birth to the first social distinctions. There is perhaps not a title that was not acquired through the blood of men. We certainly have to endure our ancestors when we have any, but these first trophies of hatred and of violence, are they a glory in which a mind ever so little inclined to be philosophical, finds grounds for pride? THE PEOPLE ALWAYS FEROCIOUS, you say? As for me, I say, the nobility always savage!

And certainly, together with the peasants, the nobility is the class most hostile to progress, the least civilized in consequence. Thinkers should congratulate themselves on not being of it, but if we are bourgeois, if we have come from the serf, and from the class liable to forced labor, can we bend with love and respect before the sons of the oppressors of our fathers? Whoever denies the people cheapens himself, and gives to the world the shameful spectacle of apostasy. Bourgeoisie, if we want to raise ourselves again and become once more a class, we have only one thing to do, and that is to proclaim ourselves the people, and to fight to the death against those who claim to be our superiors by divine right. On account of having failed in the dignity of our revolutionary mandate, of having aped the nobility, of having usurped its insignia, of having taken possession of its playthings, of having been shamefully ridiculous and cowardly, we count for nothing; we are nothing any more: the people, which ought to unite with us, denies us, abandons us and seeks to oppress us.

The people ferocious? No, it is not imbecile either, its real trouble is in being ignorant and foolish. It is not the people of Paris that has massacred the prisoners, destroyed the monuments, and tried to burn the town. The people of Paris is all who stayed in Paris after the siege, since whoever had any means hastened to breathe the air of the provinces and to embrace their absent families after the physical and moral sufferings of the siege. Those who stayed in Paris were the merchant and the workman, those two agents of labor and of exchange, without whom Paris would exist no longer. Those are what constitutes positively the people of Paris; it is one and the same family, whose political blunders cannot restore their relationship and solidarity. It is now recognized that the oppressors of that torment were in the minority. Then the people of Paris was not disposed to fury, since the majority gave evidence only of weakness and fear. The movement was organized by men already enrolled in the ranks of the bourgeoisie, who belong no longer to the habits and needs of the proletariat. These men were moved by hatred, disappointed ambition, mistaken patriotism, fanaticism without an ideal, sentimental folly or natural maliciousness — there was all that in them — and even certain doctrinaire points of honor, unwilling to withdraw in the face of danger. They certainly did not lean on the middle class, which trembled, fled or hid itself. They were forced to put in action the real proletariat which had nothing to lose. Well, the proletariat even escaped them to a great degree, divided as it was by various shades of opinion, some wanting disorder to profit by it, others dreading the consequences of being drawn in, the most of them not reasoning at all, because the evil had become extreme and the lack of work forced them to go to war at thirty sous a day.

Why should you maintain that this proletariat which was shut up in Paris, and was at most eighty thousand soldiers of hunger and despair, represented the people of France? They do not even represent the people of Paris, unless you desire to maintain the distinction between the producer and the trader, which I reject.

But I want to follow you up and ask on what this distinction rests. Is it on more or less education? The limit is incomprehensible if you see at the top of the bourgeoisie, cultivated and learned people, if you see at the bottom of the proletariat, savages and brutes, you have none the less the crowd of intermediaries which will show to you, here intelligent and wise proletarians, there bourgeois who are neither wise nor intelligent. The great number of civilized citizens dates from yesterday and many of those who know how to read and write, have parents still living who can hardly sign their names.

Would it then be only more or less wealth that would classify men into two distinct parties? The question then is where the people begins and where it ends, for each day competencies shift, ruin lowers one, and fortune raises another; roles change, he who was a bourgeois this morning is going to become again a proletarian this evening, and the proletarian of just now, may turn into a bourgeois in a day, if he finds a purse, or inherits from an uncle.

You can well see that these denominations have become idle and that the work of classifying, whatever method one desired to use, would be impracticable.

Men are only over or under one another because of more or less reason or morality. Instruction which develops only egoistic sensuality is not as good as the ignorance of the proletarian, honest by instinct or by custom. This compulsory education which we all desire through respect for human rights, is not, however, a panacea whose miracles need to be exaggerated. Evil natures will find there only more ingenious and more hidden means to do evil. It will be as in all the things that man uses and abuses, both the poison and the antidote. It is an illusion that one can find an infallible remedy for our woes. We have to seek from day to day, all the means immediately possible, we must think of nothing else in practical life except the amelioration of habits and the reconciliation of interests. France is agonizing, that is certain; we are all sick, all corrupt, all ignorant, all discouraged: to say that it was WRITTEN, that it had to be so, that it has always been and will always be, is to begin again the fable of the pedagogue and the child who is drowning. You might as well say at once.

It is all the same to me; but if you add: That does not concern me, you are wrong. The deluge comes and death captures us. In vain you are prudent and withdraw, your refuge will be invaded in its turn, and in perishing with human civilization you will be no greater a philosopher for not having loved, than those who threw themselves into the flood to save some debris of humanity. The debris is not worth the effort, very good! They will perish none the less, that is possible. We shall perish with them, that is certain, but we shall die while in the fulness of life. I prefer that to a hibernation in the ice, to an anticipated death. And anyway, I could not do otherwise. Love does not reason. If I asked why you have the passion for study, you would not explain it to me any better than those who have a passion for idleness can explain their indolence.

Then you think me upset, since you preach detachment to me? You tell me that you have read in the papers some extracts from my articles which indicate a change of ideas, and these papers which quote me with good will, endeavor to believe that I am illuminated with a new light, while others which do not quote me believe that perhaps I am deserting the cause of the future. Let the politicians think and say what they want to. Let us leave them to their critical appreciations. I do not have to protest, I do not have to answer, the public has other interests to discuss than those of my personality. I wield a pen, I have an honorable position of free discussion in a great paper; if I have been wrongly interpreted, it is for me to explain myself better when the occasion presents itself. I am reluctant to seize this opportunity of talking of myself as an isolated individual; but if you judge me converted to false notions, I must say to you and to others who are interested in me: read me as a whole, and do not judge me by detached fragments; a spirit which is independent of party exactions, sees necessarily the pros and cons, and the sincere writer tells both without busying himself about the blame or the approbation of partizan readers. But every being who is not mad maintains a certain consistency, and I do not think that I have departed from mine. Reason and sentiment are always in accord in me to make me repulse whatever attempts to make me revert to childhood in politics, in religion, in philosophy, in art. My sentiment and my reason combat more than ever the idea of factitious distinctions, the inequality of conditions imposed as a right acquired by some, as a loss deserved by others. More than ever I feel the need of raising what is low, and of lifting again what has fallen. Until my heart is worn out it will be open to pity, it will take the part of the weak, it will rehabilitate the slandered. If today it is the people that is under foot, I shall hold out my hand to the people — if it is the oppressor and executioner, I shall tell it that it is cowardly and odious. What do I care for this or that group of men, these names which have become standards, these personalities which have become catchwords? I know only wise and foolish, innocent and guilty. I do not have to ask myself where are my friends or my enemies. They are where torment has thrown them. Those who have deserved my love, and who do not see through my eyes, are none the less dear to me. The thoughtless blame of those who leave me does not make me consider them as enemies. All friendship unjustly withdrawn remains intact in the heart that has not merited the outrage. That heart is above self-love, it knows how to wait for the awakening of justice and affection.

Such is the correct and easy role of a conscience that is not engaged in the party interests through any personal interest. Those who can not say that of themselves will certainly have success in their environment, if they have the talent to avoid all that can displease them, and the more they have of this talent, the more they will find the means to satisfy their passions. But do not summon them in history to witness the absolute truth. From the moment that they make a business of their opinion, their opinion has no value.

I know sweet, generous and timorous souls, who in this terrible moment of our history, reproach themselves for having loved and served the cause of the weak. They see only one point in space, they believe that the people whom they have loved and served exist no longer, because in their place a horde of bandits followed by a little army of bewildered men has occupied momentarily the theatre of the struggle.

These good souls have to make an effort to say to themselves that what good there was in the poor and what interest there was in the disinherited still exists, only it is no longer in evidence and the political disturbance has sidetracked it from the stage. When such dramas take place, those who rush in light-heartedly are the vain or the greedy members of the family, those who allow themselves to be pulled in are the idiots.

There is no doubt that there are greedy souls, idiots, and vain persons by the thousands in France; but there are as many and perhaps more in the other states. Let an opportunity present itself similar to too frequent opportunities which put our evil passions in play, and you will see whether other nations are any better than we are. Wait till the Germanic race gets to work, the race whose disciplinary aptitudes we admire, the race whose armies have just shown us brutal appetites in all their barbarous simplicity, and you will see what will be its license! The people of Paris will seem sober and virtuous by comparison.

That ought not to be what is called a crumb of comfort, we shall have to pity the German nation for its victories as much as ourselves for our defeats, because this is the first act of its moral dissolution. The drama of its degradation has begun, and as this is being worked out by its own hands it will move very quickly. All these great material organizations in which right, justice, and the respect for humanity are not recognized, are colossi of clay, as we have found to our cost. Well! the moral abasement of Germany is not the future safety of France, and if we are called upon to return to her the evil that has been done us, her collapse will not give us back our life. It is not in blood that races are re-invigorated and rejuvenated. Vital exhalations can issue still from the corpse of France, that of Germany will be the focus of the pestilence of Europe. A nation that has lost its ideals does not survive itself. Its death fertilizes nothing and those who breathe its fetid emanations are struck by the ill that killed it. Poor Germany! the cup of the wrath of the Eternal is poured out on you quite as much as on us, and while you rejoice and become intoxicated, the philosophic spirit is weeping over you and prepares your epitaph. This pale and bleeding, wounded thing that is called France, holds still in its tense hands, a fold of the starry mantle of the future, and you drape yourself in a soiled flag, which will be your winding sheet. Past grandeurs have no longer a place to take in the history of men. It is all over with kings who exploit the peoples; it is all over with exploited peoples who have consented to their own abasement.

That is why we are so sick and why my heart is broken.

But it is not in scorn of our misery that I regard the extent of it. I do not want to believe that this holy country, that this cherished race, all of whose chords I feel vibrate in me, both harmonious and discordant, — whose qualities and whose defects I love in spite of everything, all of whose good or bad responsibilities I consent to accept rather than to detach myself from them through disdain; no, I do not want to believe that my country and my race are struck to death, I feel it in my suffering, in my mourning, in my hours of pure dejection even, I love, therefore I live; let us love and live.

Frenchmen, let us love one another, my God! my God! let us love one another or we are lost. Let us destroy, let us deny, let us annihilate politics, since it divides us and arms us against one another; let us ask from no one what he was and what he wanted yesterday. Yesterday all the world was mistaken, let us know what we want today. If it is not liberty for all and fraternity towards all, do not let us attempt to solve the problem of humanity, we are not worthy of defining it, we are not capable of comprehending it. Equality is a thing that does not impose itself, it is a free plant that grows only on fertile lands, in salubrious air. It does not take root on barricades, we know that now! It is immediately trodden under the foot of the conqueror, whoever he may be. Let us desire to establish it in our customs, let us be eager to consecrate it in our ideas. Let us give it for a starting point, patriotic charity, love! It is the part of a madman to think that one issues from a battle with respect for human rights. All civil war has brought forth and will bring forth great crime....

Unfortunate International, is it true that you believe in the lie that strength is superior to right? If you are as numerous, as powerful as one fancies, is it possible that you profess destruction and hatred as a duty? No, your power is a phantom of death. A great number of men of every nationality would not, could not, deliberate and act in favor of an iniquitous principle. If you are the ferocious party of the European people, something like the Anabaptists of Munster, like them you will destroy yourself with your own hands. If, on the contrary, you are a great and legitimate fraternal association, your duty is to enlighten your adherents and to deny those who cheapen and compromise your principles. I hope still that you include in your bosom, humane and hard-working men in great numbers, and that they suffer and blush at seeing bandits take shelter under your name. In this case your silence is inept and cowardly. Have you not a single member capable of protesting against ignoble attacks, against idiotic principles, against furious madness? Your chosen chiefs, your governors, your inspirers, are they all brigands and idiots? No, it is impossible; there are no groups, there is no club, there are no crossroads where a voice of truth could not make itself heard. Speak then, justify yourself, proclaim your gospel. Dissolve yourself in order to make yourself over if the discord is in your own midst. Make an appeal to the future if you are not an ancient invasion of Barbarians. Tell those who still love the people what they ought to do for them, and if you have nothing to say, if you cannot speak a word of life, if the iniquities of your mysteries are sealed by fear, renounce noble sympathies, live on the scorn of honest folk, and struggle between the jailer and the police.

All France has heard the word of your destiny which might have been the word of hers. She has waited for it in vain. I too, simple, I waited. While blaming the means I did not want to prejudice the end. There has always been one in revolutions, and the revolutions that fail are not always those with the weakest basis. A patriotic fanaticism seems to have been the first sentiment of this struggle. These lost children of the democratic army were going perhaps to subscribe to an inevitable peace that they judged shameful: Paris had sworn to bury herself under her ruins.

The democratic people were going to force the bourgeois to keep their word. They took possession of the cannon, they were going to turn them on the Prussians, it was mad, but it was grand.... Not at all. The first act of the Commune is to consent to the peace, and in all the course of its management, it does not have an insult, not a threat for the enemy, it conceives and commits the remarkable cowardice of overturning under the eyes of the enemy the column that recalls his defeats and our victories. It is angry against the powers emanating from universal suffrage, and yet it invokes this suffrage in Paris to constitute itself. It is true that this was not favorable to it; it dispenses with the appearance of legality that it intended to give itself and functions by brute force, without invoking any other right than that of hate and scorn for all that is not itself. It proclaims POSITIVE SOCIAL SCIENCE of which it calls itself the sole depository, but about which it does not let a word escape in its deliberations and in its decrees. It declares that it is going to free man from his shackles and his prejudices, and at that very instant, it exercises a power without control and threatens with death whoever is not convinced of its infallibility. At the same time it pretends to take up the tradition of the Jacobins, it usurps the papal social authority and assumes the dictatorship. What sort of a republic is that? I see nothing vital in it, nothing rational, nothing constituted, nothing constitutable. It is an orgy of false reformers who have not one idea, not one principle, not the least serious organization, not the least solidarity with the nation, not the least outlook towards the future. Ignorance, cynicism and brutality, that is all that emanates from this false social revolution. Liberation of the lowest instincts, impotence of bold ambitions, scandal of shameless usurpations. That is the spectacle which we have just seen. Moreover, this Commune has inspired the most deadly disgust in the most ardent political men, men most devoted to the democracy. After useless essays, they have understood that there was no reconciliation possible where there were no principles; they withdrew from it with consternation, with sorrow, and, the next day, the Commune declared them traitors, and decreed their arrest. They would have been shot if they had remained in its hands.

And you, friend, you want me to see these things with a stoic indifference? You want me to say: man is made thus, crime is his expression, infamy is his nature?

No, a hundred times no. Humanity is outraged in me and with me. We must not dissimulate nor try to forget this indignation which is one of the most passionate forms of love. We must make great efforts in behalf of brotherhood to repair the ravages of hate. We must put an end to the scourge, wipe out infamy with scorn, and inaugurate by faith the resurrection of the country.

CXCVIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 16 September, 1871

Dear old friend,

I answered you day before yesterday, and my letter took such proportions that I sent it as an article to le Temps for my next fortnightly contribution; for I have promised to give them two articles a month. The letter a un ami does not indicate you by even an initial, for I do not want to argue against you in public. I tell you again in it my reasons for suffering and for hoping still. I shall send it to you and that will be talking with you again. You will see that my chagrin is a part of me, and that believing progress to be a dream does not depend on me. Without this hope no one is good for anything. The mandarins do not need knowledge and even the education of a limited number of people has no longer reason for existing unless there is hope of influence on the masses; philosophers have only to keep silent and those great minds on whom the need of your soul leans, Shakespeare, Moliere, Voltaire, etc. have no reason for existing and for expressing themselves.

Come, let me suffer! That is worth more than viewing INJUSTICE WITH A SERENE COUNTENANCE, as Shakespeare says. When I have drained my cup of bitterness, I shall feel better. I am a woman, I have affections, sympathies, and wrath. I shall never be a sage, nor a scholar.

I received a kind little note from the Princess Mathilde. Is she then again settled in Paris? Has she anything to live on from the effects of M. Demidoff, her late and I think unworthy husband? On the whole it is brave and good of her to return near to her friends, at the risk of new upsets.

I am glad that these little faces of children pleased you. I embrace you very much, you are so kind, I was sure of it. Although you are a mandarin, I do not think that you are like a Chinaman at all, and I love you with a full heart.

I am working like a convict.

CXCIX. TO GEORGE SAND

Dear master, I received your article yesterday, and I should answer it at length if I were not in the midst of preparations for my departure for Paris. I am going to try to finish up with Aisse.

The middle of your letter made me SHED A TEAR, without converting me, of course. I was moved, that was all, without being persuaded.

I look vainly in your article for one word: "justice," and all our ill comes from forgetting absolutely that first notion of morality, which to my way of thinking composes all morality. Humanitarianism, sentiment, the ideal, have played us sufficiently mean tricks for us to try righteousness and science.

If France does not pass in a short time to the crisis, I believe that she will be irrevocably lost. Free compulsory education will do nothing but augment the number of imbeciles. Renan has said that very well in the preface to his Questions contemporaines. What we need most of all, is a natural, that is to say, a legitimate aristocracy. No one can do anything without a head, and universal suffrage as it exists is more stupid than divine right. You will see remarkable things if they let it keep on! The masses, the numbers, are always idiotic. I have few convictions, but I have that one strongly. But the masses must be respected, however inept they may be, because they contain the germs of an incalculable fecundity. Give it liberty but not power.

I believe no more than you do in class distinction. Castes belong to archeology. But I believe that the poor hate the rich, and that the rich are afraid of the poor. It will be so forever. It is as useless to preach love to the one as to the other. The most important thing is to instruct the rich, who, on the whole, are the strongest. Enlighten the bourgeois first, for he knows nothing, absolutely nothing. The whole dream of democracy is to elevate the proletarian to the level of the imbecility of the bourgeois. The dream is partly accomplished. He reads the same papers and has the same passions.

The three degrees of education have shown within the last year what they can accomplish: (1) higher education made Prussia win; (2) secondary education, bourgeois, produced the men of the 4th of September; (3) primary education gave us the Commune. Its minister of public instruction was the great Valles, who boasted that he scorned Homer!

In three years every Frenchman can know how to read. Do you think that we shall be the better off? Imagine on the other hand that in each commune, there was ONE bourgeois, only one, who had read Bastiat, and that this bourgeois was respected, things would change.

However I am not discouraged as you are, and the present government pleases me, because it has no principle, no metaphysics, no humbug. I express myself very badly. Moreover you deserve a different response, but I am much hurried.

I hear today that the mass of the Parisians regrets Badinguet. A plebiscite would declare for him, I do not doubt it, universal suffrage is such a fine thing.

CC. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 10 October, 1871

I am answering your post scriptum, if I had answered Flaubert I should not have ... ANSWERED, knowing well that your heart does not always agree with your mind, a discordance into which we all moreover are continually compelled to fall. I answered a part of a letter of some friend whom no one knows, no one can recognize, since I address myself to a part of your reasoning that is not you entirely.

You are a troubadour all the same, and if I had to write to you PUBLICLY the character would be what it ought to be. But our real discussions ought to remain between ourselves, like caresses between lovers, and even sweeter, since friendship also has its mysteries without the storms of personality.

That letter that you wrote me in haste, is full of well expressed truths against which I do not protest. But the connection and agreement between your truths of reason and my truths of sentiment must be found. France, alas! is neither on your side nor my side; she is on the side of blindness, ignorance and folly. Oh! that I do not deny, it is exactly that over which I despair.

Is this a time to put on Aisse? You told me it was a thing of distinction, delicate like all that HE did, and I hear that the public of the theatres is more THICKHEADED than ever. You would do well to see two or three plays, no matter which, in order to appreciate the literary condition of the Parisian. The provinces will contribute less than in the past. The little fortunes are too much cut down to permit frequent trips to Paris.

If Paris offered, as in my youth, an intelligent and influential nucleus, a good play would perhaps not have a hundred performances, but a bad play would not have three hundred. But this nucleus has become imperceptible and its influence is swamped. Who then will fill the theatres? The shopkeepers of Paris, without a guide, and without good criticism? Well, you are not the master in the matter of Aisse. There is an heir who is impatient, probably. — They write me that Chilly is very; seriously ill, and that Pierre Berton is reengaged.

You must be very busy; I will not write a long letter to you.

I embrace you affectionately, my children love you and ask to be remembered to you.

G. Sand

CCI. TO GEORGE SAND

Never, dear good master, have you given such a proof of your inconceivable candor! Now, seriously, you think that you have offended me! The first page is almost like excuses! It made me laugh heartily! Besides, you can always say everything to me, to me! everything! Your blows will be caresses to me.

Now let us talk again! I continually repeat my insistence on justice! Do you see how they are denying it everywhere? Has not modern criticism abandoned art for history? The intrinsic value of a book is nothing in the school of Sainte-Beuve and Taine. They take everything into consideration there except talent. Thence, in the petty journals, the abuse of personality, the biographies, the diatribes. Conclusion: lack of respect on the part of the public.

In the theatre, the same thing. They don't bother about the play, but the lesson to be preached. Our friend Dumas dreams the glory of Lacordaire, or rather of Ravignan! To prevent the tucking up of petticoats has become with him obsession. We can not have progressed very far since all morality consists for women, in not committing adultery, and for men in abstaining from theft! In short, the first injustice is practised by literature; it has no interest in esthetics, which is only a higher justice. The romantics will have a fine account to render with their immoral sentimentality. Do you recall a bit of Victor Hugo in la Legende des siecles, where a sultan is saved because he had pity on a pig? it is always the story of the penitent thief blessed because he has repented! To repent is good, but not to do evil is better. The school of rehabilitations has led us to see no difference between a rascal and an honest man. I became enraged once before witnesses, against Sainte-Beuve, while begging him to have as much indulgence for Balzac as he had for Jules Lecomte. He answered me, calling me a dolt! That is where BREADTH OF VIEW leads you.

They have so lost all sense of proportion, that the war council at Versailles treats Pipe-en-Bois more harshly than M. Courbet, Maroteau is condemned to death like Rossel! It is madness! These gentlemen, however, interest me very little. I think that they should have condemned to the galleys all the Commune, and have forced these bloody imbeciles to clear up the ruins of Paris, with a chain on their necks, like ordinary convicts. But that would have wounded HUMANITY. They are kind to the mad dogs, and not at all to the people whom the dogs have bitten.

That will not change so long as universal suffrage is what it is. Every man (as I think), no matter how low he is, has a right to ONE voice, his own, but he is not the equal of his neighbor, who may be worth a hundred times more. In an industrial enterprise (Societe anonyme), each holder votes according to the value of his contribution. It ought to be so in the government of a nation. I am worth fully twenty electors of Croisset. Money, mind, and even race ought to be reckoned, in short every resource. But up to the present I only see one! numbers! Ah! dear master, you who have so authority, you ought to take the lead. Your articles in le Temps, which have had a great success, are widely read and who knows? You would perhaps do France a great service?

Aisse keeps me very busy, or rather provokes me. I have not seen Chilly, I have had to do with Duquesnel. They are depriving me definitely of the senior Berton and proposing his son. He is very nice, but he is not at all the type conceived by the author. The Theatre Francais perhaps would ask nothing better than to take Aisse! I am very perplexed, and it is going to be necessary for me to decide. As for waiting till a literary wind arises, as it will never arise in my lifetime, it is better to risk the thing at once.

These theatrical affairs disturb me greatly, for I was in great form. For the last month I was even in an exaltation bordering on madness!

I have met the unavoidable Harrisse, a man who knows everyone, and who is a judge of everything, theatre, novels, finances, politics, etc. What a race is that of enlightened men!!! I have seen Plessy, charming and always beautiful. She asked me to send you a thousand friendly messages.

For my part, I send you a hundred thousand affectionate greetings.
Your old friend

CCII. TO GEORGE SAND 14 November, 1871

Ouf! I have just finished MY GODS, that is to say the mythological part of my Saint-Antoine, on which I have been working since the beginning of June. How I want to read it to you, dear master of the good God!

Why did you resist your good impulse? Why didn't you come this autumn? You should not stay so long without seeing Paris. I shall be there day after tomorrow, and I shall have no amusement there at all this winter, what with Aisse, a volume of verse to be printed (I should like to show you the preface), and Heaven knows what else. A lot of things that are not at all diverting.

I did not receive the second article that was announced. Your old troubadour has an aching head. My longest nights these three months have not exceeded five hours. I have been grubbing in a frantic manner. Furthermore, I think I have brought my book to a pretty degree of insanity. The idea of the foolish things that it will make the bourgeois utter sustains me, or rather I don't need to be sustained, as such a situation pleases me naturally.

The good bourgeois is becoming more and more stupid! He does not even go to vote! The brute beasts surpass him in their instinct for self-preservation. Poor France! Poor us!

What do you think I am reading now to distract myself? Bichat and Cabanis, who amuse me enormously. They knew how to write books then.

Ah! how far our doctors of today are from those men!

We suffer from one thing only: Absurdity. But it is formidable and universal. When they talk of the brutishness of the plebe, they are saying an unjust, incomplete thing. Conclusion: the enlightened classes must be enlightened. Begin by the head, which is the sickest, the rest will follow.

You are not like me! You are full of compassion. There are days when I choke with wrath, I would like to drown my contemporaries in latrines, or at least deluge their cockscombs with torrents of abuse, cataracts of invectives. Why? I wonder myself.

What sort of archeology is Maurice busy with? Embrace your little girls warmly for me.

Your old friend

CCIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 23 November, 1871

I hear from Plauchut that you won't let yourself be abducted for our Christmas Eve REVELS. You say you have too much to do. That is so much the worse for us, who would have had such pleasure in seeing you. — You were at Ch. Edmond's successful play, you are well, you have a great deal to do, you still detest the silly bourgeois; and with all that, is Saint-Antoine finished and shall we read it soon?

I am giving you an easy commission to do, this is it: I have had to aid a respectable and interesting person [Footnote: Mademoiselle de Flaugergues.] to whom the Prussians have left for a bed and chair, only an old garden bench. I sent her 300 francs, she needed 600. I begged from kind souls. They sent me what was necessary, all except the Princess Mathilde, from whom I asked 200 francs. She answered me the 19th of this month: HOW SHALL I SEND THIS TO YOU?

I replied the same day; simply by mail. But I have received nothing. I do not insist, but I fear that the money may have been stolen or lost, and I am asking you to clear up the affair as quickly as possible.

With this, I embrace you, and Lolo, AURORE EMBRACES YOU TOO and all the family which loves you.

G. Sand

[The words 'Aurore embraces you too' were written by the little girl herself.]

CCIV. TO GEORGE SAND 1 December

Your letter which I have just found again, makes me remorseful, for I have not yet done your errand to the princess. I was several days without knowing where the princess was. She was to have come to get settled in Paris, and send me word of her arrival. Today at last I learn that she is at Saint-Gratien where I shall go on Sunday evening probably. Anyway your commission shall be done next week.

You must forgive me, for I have not had for the last two weeks ten minutes of freedom. The revival of Ruy Blas which was going to be put ahead of Aisse had to be PUT OFF (it was a hard job). Well, the rehearsals are to begin on Monday next. I read the play to the actors today, and the roles are to be verified tomorrow. I think it will go well. I have had Bouilhet's volume of verse printed, the preface of which I re-wrote. In short I am worn out! and sad! sad enough to croak. When I have to get into action I throw myself into it head first. But my heart is breaking in disgust. That is the truth.

I have seen none of our friends except Tourgueneff, whom I have found more charming than ever. Give a good kiss to Aurore for her sweet message, and let her kiss you for me.

The money was stolen, I did not receive it, and it can not be claimed, for the sender would be liable to a suit. Thank the princess just the same for me, and for poor Mademoiselle de Flaugergues whom by the way, the minister is aiding with 200 francs. Her pension is 800.

You are in the midst of rehearsals, I pity you, and yet I imagine that in working for a friend one puts more heart in it, more confidence and much more patience. Patience, there is everything in that, and that is acquired.

I love you and I embrace you, how I would like to have you at Christmas! You can not, so much the worse for us. We shall drink you a toast and many speeches [sic].

I want to embrace you at the first of the year and tell you that I love my old troubadour now and always, but I don't want you to answer me, you are in the thick of theatrical things, and you have not the time and the calmness to write. Here we called you at the stroke of midnight on Christmas, we called your name three times, did you hear it at all?

We are all getting on well, our little girls are growing, we speak of you often; my children embrace you also. May our affection bring you good luck!

CCVII. TO GEORGE SAND

Sunday, January, 1872

At last I have a moment of quiet and I can write to you. But I have so many things to chat with you about, that I hardly know where to begin: (1) Your little letter of the 4th of January, which came the very morning of the premiere of Aïssé, moved me to tears, dear well-beloved master. You are the only one who shows such delicacies of feeling.

The premiere was splendid, and then, that is all. The next night the theatre was almost empty. The press, in general, was stupid and base. They accused me of having wanted to advertise by INSERTING an incendiary tirade! I pass for a Red (sic). You see where we are!

The management of the Odeon has done nothing for the play! On the contrary. The day of the premiere it was I who brought with my own hands the properties for the first act! And on the third performance I led the supernumeraries.

Throughout the rehearsals they advertised in the papers the revival of Ruy Blas, etc., etc. They made me strangle la Baronne quite as Ruy Blas will strangle Aïssé. In short, Bouilhet's heir will get very little money. Honor is saved, that is all.

I have had Dernieres Chansons printed. You will receive this volume at the same time as Aisse and a letter of mine to the Conseil municipal de Rouen. This little production seemed too violent to le Nouvelliste de Rouen, which did not dare to print it; but it will appear on Wednesday in le Temps, then at Rouen, as a pamphlet.

What a foolish life I have been leading for two and a half months! How is it that I have not croaked with it? My longest nights have not been over five hours. What running about! What letters! and what anger! — repressed — unfortunately! At last, for three days I have slept all I wanted to, and I am stupefied by it.

I was present with Dumas at the premiere of Roi Carotte. You can not imagine such rot! It is sillier and emptier than the worst of the fairy plays of Clairville. The public agreed with me absolutely.

The good Offenbach has had another failure at the Opera-Comique with Fantasio. Shall one ever get to hating piffle? That would be a fine step on the right path.

Tourgueneff has been in Paris since the first of December. Every week we have an engagement to read Saint-Antoine and to dine together. But something always prevents and we never meet. I am harassed more than ever by life and am disgusted with everything, which does not prevent me from being in better health than ever. Explain that to me.

CCVIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 18 January, 1872

You must not be sick, you must not be a grumbler, my dear old troubadour. You must cough, blow your nose, get well, say that France is mad, humanity silly, and that we are crude animals; and you must love yourself, your kind, and your friends above all. I have some very sad hours. I look at MY FLOWERS, these two little ones who are always smiling, their charming mother and my wise hardworking son whom the end of the world will find hunting, cataloguing, doing his daily task, and gay withal AS PUNCH, in the RARE moments when he is resting.

He said to me this morning: "Tell Flaubert to come, I will take a vacation at once. I will play the marionettes for him, I will make him laugh."

Life in a crowd forbids reflection. You are too much alone. Come quickly to our house and let us love you.

G. Sand

CCIX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Friday, 19 January, 1872

I did not know about all that affair at Rouen and I now understand your anger. But you are too angry, that is to say too good, and too good for them. With a BITTER and vindictive man these louts would be less spiteful and less bold. You have always called them brutes, you and Bouilhet, now they are avenging themselves on the dead and on the living. Ah! well, it is indeed that and nothing else.

Yesterday I was preaching the calmness of disdain to you. I see that this is not the moment, but you are not wicked, strong men are not cruel! With a bad mob at their heels, these fine men of Rouen would not have dared what they have dared!

I have the Chansons, tomorrow I shall read your preface, from beginning to end.

I embrace you.

CCX. TO GEORGE SAND

You will receive very soon: Dernieres Chansons, Aisse and my Lettre au Conseil municipal de Rouen, which is to appear tomorrow in le Temps before appearing as a pamphlet.

I have forgotten to tell you something, dear master. I have used your name. I have COMPROMISED you in citing you among the illustrious people who have subscribed to the monument for Bouilhet. I found that it looked well in the sentence. An effect of style being a sacred thing with me, don't disavow it.

Today I am starting again my metaphysical readings for Saint-Antoine. Next Saturday, I shall read a hundred and thirty pages of it, all that is finished, to Tourgueneff. Why won't you be there!

I embrace you.

Your old friend

CCXI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 25 January, 1872

You were quite right to put me down and I want to CONTRIBUTE too. Put me down for the sum you would like and tell me so that I may have it sent to you.

I have read your preface in le Temps: the end of it is very beautiful and touching. But I see that this poor friend was, like you, one who DID NOT GET OVER HIS ANGER, and at your age I should like to see you less irritated, less worried with the folly of others. For me, it is lost time, like complaining about being bored with the rain and the flies. The public which is accused often of being silly, gets angry and only becomes sillier; for angry or irritated, one becomes sublime if one is intelligent, idiotic if one is silly.

After all, perhaps this chronic indignation is a need of your constitution; it would kill me. I have a great need to be calm so as to reflect and to think things over. At this moment I am doing THE USEFUL at the risk of your anathemas. I am trying to simplify a child's approach to culture, being persuaded that the first study makes its impression on all the others and that pedagogy teaches us to look for knots in bulrushes. In short, I am working over A PRIMER, do not EAT ME ALIVE.

I have ONLY ONE regret about Paris: it is not to be a third with Tourgueneff when you read your Saint-Antoine. For all the rest, Paris does not call me at all; my heart has affections there that I do not wish to hurt, by disagreement with their ideas. It is impossible not to be tired of this spirit of party or of sect which makes people no longer French, nor men, nor themselves. They have no country, they belong to a church. They do what they disapprove of, so as not to disobey the discipline of the school. I prefer to keep silent. They would find me cold or stupid; one might as well stay at home.

You don't tell me of your mother; is she in Paris with her grandchild? I hope that your silence means that they are well. Everything has gone wonderfully here this winter; the children are excellent and give us nothing but joy. After the dismal winter of '70 to '71, one ought to complain of nothing.

Can one live peaceably, you say, when the human race is so absurd? I submit, while saying to myself that perhaps I am as absurd as every one else and that it is time to turn my mind to correcting myself.

I embrace you for myself and for all mine.

G. Sand

CCXII. TO GEORGE SAND

No! dear master! it is not true. Bouilhet never injured the bourgeois of Rouen; no one was gentler to them, I add even more cowardly, to tell the truth. As for me, I kept apart from them, that is all my crime.

I find by chance just today in Nadar's Memoirs du Geant, a paragraph on me and the people of Rouen which is absolutely exact. Since you own this book, look at page 100.

If I had kept silent they would have accused me of being a coward. I protested naively, that is to say brutally. And I did well.

I think that one ought never begin the attack; but when one answers, one must try to kill cleanly one's enemy. Such is my system. Frankness is part of loyalty; why should it be less perfect in blame than in praise?

We are perishing from indulgence, from clemency, from COWISHNESS and (I return to my eternal refrain) from lack of JUSTICE!

Besides, I have never insulted any one, I have kept to generalities, — as for M. Decorde, my intentions are for open warfare; — but enough of that! I spent yesterday, a fine day, with Tourgueneff to whom I read the hundred and fifteen pages of Saint-Antoine that are finished. After which, I read to him almost half of the Dernieres Chansons. What a listener! What a critic! He dazzled me by the depth and the clearness of his judgment. Ah! if all those who attempt to judge books had been able to hear, what a lesson! Nothing escapes him. At the end of a passage of a hundred lines, he remembers a weak epithet! he gave me two or three suggestions of exquisite detail for Saint-Antoine.

Do you think me very silly since you believe I am going to blame you for your primer? I have enough philosophic spirit to know that such a thing is very serious work.

Method is the highest thing in criticism, since it gives the means of creating.

CCXIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 28 January, 1872

Your preface is splendid and the book [Footnote: Dernieres Chansons, by Louis Bouilhet.] is divine! Mercy! I have made a line of poetry without realizing it, God forgive me. Yes, you are right, he was not second rank, and ranks are not given by decree, above all in an age when criticism undoes everything and does nothing. All your heart is in this simple and discreet tale of his life. I see very well now, why he died so young; he died from having lived too extensively in the mind. I beg of you not to absorb yourself so much in literature and learning. Change your home, move about, have mistresses or wives, whichever you like, and during these phases, must change the end that one lights. At my advanced age I throw myself into torrents of far niente; the most infantile amusements, the silliest, are enough for me and I return more lucid from my attacks of imbecility.

It was a great loss to art, that premature death. In ten years there will not be one single poet. Your preface is beautiful and well done. Some pages are models, and it is very true that the bourgeois will read that and find nothing remarkable in it. Ah! if one did not have the little sanctuary, the interior little shrine, where, without saying anything to anyone, one takes refuge to contemplate and to dream the beautiful and the true, one would have to say: "What is the use?"

I embrace you warmly.

Your old troubadour.

CCXIV. TO GEORGE SAND

Dear good master,

Can you, for le Temps, write on Dernieres Chansons? It would oblige me greatly. Now you have it.

I was ill all last week. My throat was in a frightful state. But I have slept a great deal and I am again afloat. I have begun anew my reading for Saint-Antoine.

It seems to me that Dernieres Chansons could lend itself to a beautiful article, to a funeral oration on poetry. Poetry will not perish, but its eclipse will be long and we are entering into the shades.

Consider if you have a mind for it and answer by a line.

CCXV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, in Paris

Nohant, 17 February

My troubadour, I am thinking of what you asked me to do and I will do it; but this week I must rest. I played the fool too much at the carnival with my grandchildren and my great-nephews.

I embrace you for myself and for all my brood.

G. Sand

CCXVI. TO GEORGE SAND

What a long time it is since I have written to you, dear master. I have so many things to say to you that I don't know where to begin. Oh! how horrid it is to live so separated when we love each other.

Have you given Paris an eternal adieu? Am I never to see you again there? Are you coming to Croisset this summer to hear Saint-Antoine?

As for me, I can not go to Nohant, because my time, considering my straitened purse, is all counted; but I have still I a full month of readings and researches in Paris. After that I am going away with my mother: we are in search of a companion for her. It is not easy to find one. Then, towards Easter I shall be back at Croisset, and shall start to work again at the manuscript. I am beginning to want to write.

Just now, I am reading in the evening, Kant's Critique de la raison pure, translated by Barni, and I am freshening up my Spinoza. During the day I amuse myself by looking over bestiaries of the middle ages; looking up in the "authorities" all the most baroque animals. I am in the midst of fantastic monsters.

When I have almost exhausted the material I shall go to the Museum to muse before real monsters, and then the researches for the good Saint-Antoine will be finished.

In your letter before the last one you showed anxiety about my health; reassure yourself! I have never been more convinced that it was robust. The life that I have led this winter was enough to kill three rhinoceroses, but nevertheless I am well. The scabbard must be solid, for the blade is well sharpened; but everything is converted into sadness! Any action whatever disgusts me with life! I have followed your counsels, I have sought distractions! But that amuses me very little. Decidedly nothing but sacrosanct literature interests me.

My preface to the Dernieres Chansons has aroused in Madame Colet a pindaric fury. I have received an anonymous letter from her, in verse, in which she represents me as a charlatan who beats the drum on the tomb of his friend, a vulgar wretch who debases himself before criticism, after having “flattered Caesar”! “Sad example of the passions,” as Prudhomme would say.

A propos of Caesar, I can not believe, no matter what they say, in his near return. In spite of my pessimism, we have not come to that! However, if one consulted the God called Universal Suffrage, who knows?...Ah! we are very low, very low!

I saw Ruy Blas badly played except for Sarah. Melingue is a sleep-walking drain-man, and the others are as tiresome. As Victor Hugo had complained in a friendly way that I had not paid him a call, I thought I ought to do so and I found him ...charming! I repeat the word, not at all “the great man,” not at all a pontiff! This discovery greatly surprised me and did me worlds of good. For I have the bump of veneration and I like to love what I admire. That is a personal allusion to you, dear, kind master.

I have met Madame Viardot whom I found a very curious temperament.

It was Tourgueneff who took me to her house.

CCXVII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croissset Nohant, from the 28 to the 29 February 1872. Night of Wednesday to

Thursday, three o'clock in the morning.

Ah! my dear old friend, what a dreadful twelve days I have spent! Maurice has been very ill. Continually these terrible sore throats, which in the beginning seem nothing, but which are complicated with abscesses and tend to become membranous. He has not been in danger, but always IN DANGER OF DANGER, and he has had cruel suffering, loss of voice, he could not swallow; every anguish attached to the violent sore throat that you know well, since you have just had one. With him, this trouble continually tends to get worse, and his mucous membrane has been so often the seat of the same illness that it lacks energy to react. With that, little or no fever, almost always on his feet, and the moral depression of a man used to continual exercise of body and mind, whom the mind and body forbids to exercise. We have looked after him so well that he is now, I think, out of the woods, although, this morning, I was afraid again and sent for Doctor Favre, our USUAL savior.

Throughout the day I have been talking to him, to distract him, about your researches on monsters; he had his papers brought so as to hunt among them for what might be useful you; but he has found only the pure fantasies of his own invention. I found them so original and so funny that I have encouraged him to send them to you. They will be of no use to you except to make you burst out laughing in your hours recreation.

I hope that we are going to come to life again without new relapses. He is the soul and the life of the house. When he is depressed we are dead; mother, wife, and children. Aurore says that she would like to be very ill in her father's place We love each other passionately, we five, and the SACROSANCT LITERATURE as you call it, is only secondary in my life. I have always loved some one more than it and my family more than that some one.

Pray why is your poor little mother so irritable and desperate, in the very midst of an old age that when I last saw her was still so green and so gracious? Is her deafness sudden? Did she entirely lack philosophy and patience before these infirmities? I suffer with you because I understand what you are suffering.

Another old age which is worse, since it is becoming malicious, is that of Madame Colet. I used to think that all her hatred was directed against me, and that seemed to me a bit of madness; for I had never done or said anything against her, even after that vile book in which she poured out all her fury WITHOUT cause. What has she against you now that passion has become ancient history? Strange! strange! And, a propos of Bouilhet, she hated him then, him too this poor poet? She is mad.

You may well think that I was not able to write an iota for these twelve days. I am going, I hope, to start at work as soon as I have finished my novel which has remained with one foot in the air at the last pages. It is on the point of being published but has not yet been finished. I am up every night till dawn; but I have not had a sufficiently tranquil mind to be distracted from my patient.

Good night, dear good friend of my heart.

Heavens! don't work nor sit up too much, as you also have sore throats. They are terrible and treacherous illnesses. We all love you, and we embrace you. Aurore is charming; she learns all that we want her to, we don't know how, without seeming to notice it.

What kind of a woman do you want as a companion for your mother? Perhaps I know of such a one. Must she converse and read aloud? It seems to me that the deafness is a barrier to that. Isn't it a question of material care and continual diligence? What are the stipulations and what is the compensation?

Tell me how and why father Hugo did not have one single visit after Ruy Blas? Did Gautier, Saint-Victor, his faithful ones, neglect him? Have they quarreled about politics?

CCXVIII. TO GEORGE SAND

March, 1872

Dear master,

I have received the fantastic drawings, which have diverted me. Is there perhaps profound symbolism hidden in Maurice's work? But I did not find it. ... Revery!

There are two very pretty monsters: (1) an embryo in the form of a balloon on four feet; (2) a death's head emanating from an intestinal worm.

We have not found a companion yet. It seems difficult to me, we must have someone who can read aloud and who is very gentle; we should also give her some charge of the household. She would not have much bodily care to give, as my mother would keep her maid.

We must have someone who is kind above all, and perfectly honest. Religious principles are not objected to! The rest is left to your perspicacity, dear master! That is all.

I am uneasy about Theo. I think that he is getting strangely old. He must be very ill, doubtless with heart trouble, don't you think so? Still another who is preparing to leave me.

No! literature is not what I love most in the world, I explained myself badly (in my last letter). I spoke to you of distractions and of nothing more. I am not such a pedant as to prefer phrases to living beings. The further I go the more my sensibility is exasperated. But the basis is solid and the thing goes on. And then, after the Prussian war there is no further great annoyance possible.

And the Critique de la raison pure of the previously mentioned Kant, translated by Barni, is heavier reading than the Vie Parisienne of Marcelin; never mind! I shall end by understanding it.

I have almost finished the scenario of the last part of Saint Antoine. I am in a hurry to start writing. It is too long since I have written. I am bored with style!

And tell me more about you, dear master! Give me at once news of Maurice, and tell me if you think that the lady you know would suit us.

And thereupon I embrace you with both arms.

Your old troubadour always agitated, always as wrathful as Saint Polycarp.

CCXIX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT 17 March, 1872

No, dear friend, Maurice is almost well again but I have been tired, worn out with URGENT work: finishing my novel, and correcting a mass of proof from the beginning. And then unanswered letters, business, no time to breathe! That is why I have not been able to write the article on Bouilhet, and as Nanon has begun, as they are publishing five numbers a week in le Temps, I don't see where I shall publish that article very soon.

In the Revue des Deux Mondes, they don't want me to write criticism; whoever is not, or was not of their circle, has no talent, and they do not give me the right to say the contrary.

There is, to be sure, a new review wide open to me, which is published by very fine people, but it is more widely read in other countries than in France, and you will find perhaps that an article in that would not excite comment. It is the Revue universelle directed by Amedee Marteau. Discuss that with Charles Edmond. Ask him if, in spite of the fact that Nanon is being published, he could find me a little corner in the body of the paper.

As for the companion, you may rest assured that I am looking for her. The one whom I had in view is not suitable, for she could not read aloud, and I am not sure enough of the others to propose them. I thought that your poor mother was too deaf to listen to reading, and to converse, and that it would be enough for her to have some one very gentle, and charming, to care for her, and to stay with her.

That is all, my dear old friend, it is not my fault, I embrace you with all my heart. For the moment that is the only thing that is functioning.

My brain is too stupefied.

G. Sand

CCXX. TO GEORGE SAND

Croisset

Here I am, back again here, dear master, and not very happy; my mother worries me. Her decline increases from day to day, and almost from hour to hour. She wanted me to come home although the painters have not finished their work, and we are very inconveniently housed. At the end of next week, she will have a companion who will relieve me in this foolish business of housekeeping.

As for me, I have quite decided not to make the presses groan for many years, solely not to have “business” to look after, to avoid all connection with publishers, editors and papers, and above all not to hear of money.

My incapacity, in that direction, has developed to frightful proportions. Why should the sight of a bill put me in a rage? It verges on madness. Aisse has not made money. Dernieres Chansons has almost gotten me into a lawsuit. The story of la Fontaine is not ended. I am tired, profoundly tired, of everything.

If only I do not make a failure also of Saint-Antoine. I am going to start working on it again in a week, when I have finished with Kant and Hegel. These two great men are helping to stupefy me, and when I leave them I fall with eagerness upon my old and thrice great Spinoza. What genius, how fine a work the Ethics is!

CCXXI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset 9 April, 1872

I am with you all day and all night, and at every instant, my poor dear friend. I am thinking of all the sorrow that you are in the midst of. I would like to be near you. The misfortune of being tied here distresses me. I would like a word so as to know if you have the courage that you need. The end of that noble and dear life has been sad and long; for from the day that she became feeble, she declined and you could not distract her and console her. Now, alas! the incessant and cruel task is ended, as the things of this world end, anguish after struggle! What a bitter achievement of rest! and you are going to miss this anxiety, I am sure of that. I know the sort of dismay that follows the combat with death.

In short, my poor child, I can only open a maternal heart to you which will replace nothing, but which is suffering with yours, and very keenly in each one of your troubles.

G. Sand

CCXXII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 14 April, 1872

My daughter-in-law has been staying several days with our friends, at Nîmes, to stop a bad case of WHOOPING-COUGH that Gabrielle was suffering with, to separate her from Aurore, from fear of contagion, and to recuperate, for she has not been well for some time. As for me, I am well again. That little illness and this departure suddenly resolved upon and accomplished, have upset my plans somewhat. I had to look after Aurore so that she might be reconciled to it, and I have not had a moment to answer you. I am wondering too if you don't like it better to be left to yourself these first few days. But I beguile the need I feel of being near you at this sad time, by telling you over and over again, my poor, dear friend, how much I love you. Perhaps, too, your family has taken you to Rouen or to Dieppe, so as not to let you go back at once into that sad house. I don't know anything about your plans, in case those which you made to absorb yourself in work are changed. If you have any inclination to travel, and the sinews of war are lacking, I have ready for you a few sous that I have just earned, and I put them at your disposal. Don't feel constrained with me any more than I would with you, dear child. They are going to pay me for my novel in five or six days at the office of le Temps; you need only to write me a line and I shall see that you get it in Paris. A word when you can, I embrace you, and so does Maurice, very tenderly.

CCXXIII. TO GEORGE SAND

Tuesday, 16 April, 1872

Dear good master,

I should have answered at once your first, very kind letter. But I was too sad. I lacked physical strength.

At last, today, I am beginning to hear the birds singing and to see the leaves growing green. The sun irritates me no longer, which is a good sign. If I could feel like working again I should be all right.

Your second letter (that of yesterday) moved me to tears! You are so good! What a splendid creature you are! I do not need money now, thank you. But if I did need any, I should certainly ask you for it.

My mother has left Croisset to Caroline with the condition that I should keep my apartments there. So, until the estate is completely settled, I stay here. Before deciding on the future, I must know what I have to live on, after that we shall see.

Shall I have the strength to live absolutely alone in solitude? I doubt it, I am growing old. Caroline cannot live here now. She has two dwellings already, and the house at Croisset is expensive. I think I shall give up my Paris lodging. Nothing calls me to Paris any longer. All my friends are dead, and the last one, poor Theo, is not for long, I fear. Ah! it is hard to grow a new skin at fifty years of age!

I realized, during the last two weeks, that my poor dear, good mother was the being that I have loved the most! It is as if someone had torn out a part of my vitals.

CCXXIV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 28 April, 1872

I hold my poor Aurore, who has a terrible case of whooping-cough, day and night in my arms. I have an important piece of work that I must finish, and which I shall finish in spite of everything. If I have not already done the article on Bouilhet, rest assured it is because it is IMPOSSIBLE. I shall do it at the same time as that on l'Annee terrible. I shall go to Paris between the 20th and 25th of May, at the latest. Perhaps sooner, if Maurice takes Aurore to Nimes where Lina and the littlest one are. I shall write to you, you must come to see me in Paris, or I will go to see you.

I thirst too to embrace you, to console you — no, but to tell you that your sorrows are mine. Good-bye till then, a line to tell me if your affairs are getting settled, and if you are coming out on top.

Your old G. Sand

CCXXV. TO GEORGE SAND

What good news, dear master! In a month and even before a month, I shall see you at last!

Try not to be too hurried in Paris, so that we may have the time to talk. What would be very nice, would be, if you came back here with me to spend several days. We should be quieter than there; “my poor old mother” loved you very much, would be sweet to see you in her house, when she has been gone only such a short time.

I have started work again, for existence is only tolerable when one forgets one’s miserable self.

It will be a long time before I know what I have to live on. For all the fortune that is left to us is in meadowland, and in order to divide it, we have to sell it all.

Whatever happens, I shall keep my apartments at Croisset. That will be my refuge, and perhaps even my only habitation. Paris hardly attracts me any longer. In a little while I shall have no more friends there. The human being (the eternal feminine included) amuses me less and less.

Do you know that my poor Theo is very ill? He is dying from boredom and misery. No one speaks his language anymore! We are like fossils who subsist astray in a new world.

CCXXVI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 18 May, 1872

Dear friend of my heart, your inability does not disturb me at all, on the contrary. I have the grippe and the prostration that follows it. I cannot go to Paris for a week yet, and shall be there during the first part of June. My little ones are both in the sheepfold. I have taken good care of and cured the eldest, who is strong. The other is very tired, and the trip did not prevent the whooping- cough. For my part, I have worked very hard in caring for my dear one, and as soon as my task was over, as soon as I saw my dear world reunited and well again, I collapsed. It will be nothing, but I have not the strength to write. I embrace you, and I count on seeing you soon.

G. Sand

CCXXVII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Paris, Monday, 3 June, 1872, Rue Gay Lussac, 5

I am in Paris, and for all this week, in the horror of personal business. But next week will you come? I should like to go to see you in Croisset, but I do not know if I can. I have taken Aurore's whooping-cough, and, at my age, it is severe. I am, however, better, but hardly able to go about. Write me a line, so I can reserve the hours that you can give me. I embrace you, as I love you, with a full heart.

G. Sand

CCXXVIII. TO GEORGE SAND 1872

The hours that I could give you, dear Master! Why, all the hours, now, by and by, and forever.

I am planning to go to Paris at the end of next week, the 14th or the 16th. Shall you be there still? If not, I shall go earlier.

But I should like it much better if you came here. We should be quieter, without callers or intruders! More than ever, I should like to have you now in my poor Croisset.

It seems to me that we have enough to talk about without stopping for twenty-four hours. Then I would read you Saint-Antoine, which lacks only about fifteen pages of being finished. However, don't come if your cough continues. I should be afraid that the dampness would hurt you.

The mayor of Vendome has asked me "to honor with my presence" the dedication of the statue of Ronsard, which occurs the 23rd of this month: I shall go. And I should even like to deliver an address there which would be a protest against the universal modern flap- doodle. The occasion is good. But for the production of a really appropriate little gem, I lack the snap and vivacity.

Hoping to see you soon, dear master, your old troubadour who embraces you.

CCXXIX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT 7 June, 1872

Dear friend,

Your old troubadour has such a bad cough that a little bit more would be the last straw. On the other hand, they cannot get on without me at our house, and I cannot stay longer than next week, that is to say, the 15th or the 16th. If you could come next Thursday, the 13th, I should reserve the 13th, the 14th, even the 15th, to be with you at my house for the day for dinner, for the evening, in short, just as if we were in the country, where we could read and converse. I would be supposed to have gone away.

A word at once, I embrace you as I love you.

G. Sand

CCXXX. TO GEORGE SAND

Dear master,

Have you promised your support to the candidacy of Duquesnel? if not, I should like to beg you to use to the utmost your influence to support my friend, Raymond Deslandes, as if he were

Your old troubadour,

G. Flaubert

Thursday, three o'clock, 13 June, 1872.

Answer me categorically, so that we may know what you will do.

CCXXXI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croissset

..Nohant, 5 July, 1872

I must write to you today. Sixty-eight years old. Perfect health in spite of the cough, which lets me sleep now that I am plunging daily in a furious little torrent, cold as ice. It boils around the stones, the flowers, the great grasses in a delicious shade. It is an ideal place to bathe.

We have had some terrible storms: lightning struck in our garden; and our stream, the Indre, has become like a torrent in the Pyrenees. It is not unpleasant. What a fine summer! The grain is seven feet high, the wheat fields are sheets of flowers. The peasant thinks that there are too many; but I let him talk, it is so lovely! I go on foot to the stream, I jump, all boiling hot, into the icy water. The doctor says that is madness. I let him talk, too; I am curing myself while his patients look after themselves and croak. I am like the grass of the fields: water and sun, that is all I need.

Are you off for the Pyrenees? Ah! I envy you, I love them so! I have taken frantic trips there; but I don't know Luchon. Is it lovely, too? You won't go there without seeing the Cirque of Gavarnie, and the road that leads there, will you? And Cauterets and the lake of Gaube? And the route of Saint-Sauveur? Heavens! How lucky one is to travel and to see the mountains, the flowers, the cliffs! Does all that bore you?

Do you remember the editors, the theatrical managers, the readers and the public when you are running about the country! As for me, I forget everything as I do when Pauline Viardot is singing.

The other day we discovered, about three leagues from here, a wilderness, an absolute wilderness of woods in a great expanse of country, where not one hut could be seen, not a human being, not a sheep, not a fowl, nothing but flowers, butterflies and birds all day. But where will my letter find you? I shall wait to send it to you till you give me an address!

CCXXXII. TO GEORGE SAND

Bagneres de Luchon, 12th July, 1872

I have been here since Sunday evening, dear master, and no happier than at Croisset, even a little less so, for I am very idle. They make so much noise in the house where we are that it is impossible to work. Moreover, the sight of the bourgeois who surround us is unendurable. I am not made for travelling. The least inconvenience disturbs me. Your old troubadour is very old, decidedly! Doctor Lambron, the physician of this place, attributes my nervous tendencies to the excessive use of tobacco. To be agreeable I am going to smoke less; but I doubt very much if my virtue will cure me!

I have just read Dickens's Pickwick. Do you know that? There are superb passages in it; but what defective composition! All English writers are the same; Walter Scott excepted, all lack a plot. That is unendurable for us Latins.

Mister ***** is certainly nominated, as it seems. All the people who have had to do with the Odeon, beginning with you, dear master, will repent of the support that they have given him. As for me, who, thank Heaven, have no more connection with that establishment, I don't give a whoop.

As I am going to begin a book which will exact much reading, and since I don't want to ruin myself in books, do you know of any dealer in Paris who would rent me all the books that I designated?

What are you doing now? We saw each other so little and so inconveniently the last time.

This letter is stupid. But they are making such a noise over my head that it is not clear (my head).

In the midst of my bewilderment, I embrace you and yours also. Your old blockhead who loves you.

CCXXXIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 19 July, 1872

Dear old troubadour,

We too are going away, but without knowing yet where we are going; it doesn't make any difference to me. I wanted to take my brood to Switzerland; they would rather go in the opposite direction, to the Ocean; the Ocean will do! If only we travel and bathe, I shall be out of my mind with joy. Decidedly our two old troubadourships are two opposites. What bores you, amuses me; I love movement and noise, and even the tiresome things about travelling find favor in my eyes, provided they are a part of travelling. I am much more sensible to what disturbs the calm of sedentary life, than to that which is a normal and necessary disturbance in the life of motion.

I am absolutely like my grandchildren, who are intoxicated beforehand without knowing why. But it is curious to see how children, while loving the change, want to take with them their surroundings, their accustomed playthings, when they go out into the world. Aurore is packing her dolls' trunk, and Gabrielle, who likes animals better, intends to take her rabbits, her little dog, and a little pig that she is taking care of until she eats it. SUCH IS LIFE [sic].

I believe that, in spite of your bad temper, this trip will do you good. It will make you rest your brain, and if you have to smoke less, so much the better! Health above all. I hope that your niece will make you move around a bit; she is your child; she ought to have some authority over you, or the world would be turned upside down.

I cannot refer you to the bookshop that you need for borrowing books. I send for such things to Mario Proth, and I don't know where he finds them. When you get back to Paris, tell him from me to inform you. He is a devoted fellow, as obliging as possible. He lives at 2 rue Visconti. It occurs to me that Charles Edmond, too, might give you very good information; Troubat, [Footnote: Sainte-Beuve's secretary.] also.

You are surprised that spoken words are not contracts; you are very simple; in business nothing holds except written documents. We are Don Quixotes, my old troubadour; we must resign ourselves to being trimmed by the innkeepers. Life is like that, and he who does not want to be deceived must go to live in a desert. It is not living to keep away from all the evil of this nether-world. One must swallow the bitter with the sweet.

As to your Saint-Antoine, if you let me, I shall see about finding you a publisher or a review on my next trip to Paris, but we ought to talk about it together and you ought to read it to me. Why shouldn't you come to us in September? I shall be at home until winter.

You ask me what I am doing now: I have done, since I left Paris, an article on Mademoiselle de Flaugergues, which will appear in l'Opinion nationale with a work by her; an article for le Temps on Victor Hugo, Bouilhet, Leconte de Lisle and Pauline Viardot. I hope that you will be pleased with what I said about your friend; I have done a second fantastic tale for the Revue des Deux Mondes, a tale for children. I have written about a hundred letters, for the most part to make up for the folly or to soften the misery of imbeciles of my acquaintance. Idleness is the plague of this age, and life is passed in working for those who do not work. I do not complain. I am well! every day I plunge into the Indre and into its icy cascades, my sixty-eight years and my whooping-cough. When I am no longer useful nor agreeable to others, I want to go away quietly without saying OUF! or at least, not saying anything except that against poor mankind, which is not worth much, but of which I am part, not being worth perhaps very much myself.

I love you and I embrace you. My family does too, Plauchut included.

He is going to travel with us.

When we are SOMEWHERE FOR SEVERAL DAYS I shall write to you for news.

G. Sand

CCXXXIV. TO GEORGE SAND

Croisset, Thursday

Dear master,

In the letter I received from you at Luchon a month ago, you told me that you were packing up, and then that was all. No more news! I have permitted myself to assume, as the good Brantome would say, that you were at Cabourg! When do you return? Where do you go then? To Paris or to Nohant? A question.

As for me, I am not leaving Croisset. From the 1st to the 20th or 25th of September I shall have to go about a bit on business. I shall go to Paris. Write then to rue Murillo.

I should like very much to see you: (1) to see you; (2) to read you Saint-Antoine, then to talk to you about another more important book, etc., and to talk about a hundred other things privately.

CCXXXV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 31 August, 1872

My old troubadour,

Here we are back again at home, after a month passed, just as you said, at Cabourg, where chance more than intention placed us. We all took wonderful sea baths, Plauchut, too. We often talked of you with Madame Pasca who was our neighbor at table, and had the room next us. We have returned in splendid health, and we are glad to see our old Nohant again, after having been glad to leave it for a little change of air.

I have resumed my usual work, and I continue my river baths, but no one will accompany me, it is too cold. As for me, I found fault with the sea for being too warm. Who would think that, with my appearance and my tranquil old age, I would still love EXCESS? My dominant passion on the whole is my Aurore. My life depends on hers. She was so lovely on the trip, so gay, so appreciative of the amusements that we gave her, so attentive to what she saw, and curious about everything with so much intelligence, that she is real and sympathetic company at every hour. Ah! how UNLITERARY I am! Scorn me but still love me.

I don't know if I shall find you in Paris when I go there for my play. I have not arranged with the Odeon for the date of its performance. I am waiting for Duquesnel for the final reading. — And then I expect Pauline Viardot about the 20th of September, and I hope Tourgueneff too, won't you come also? it would be so nice and so complete!

In this hope which I will not give up, I love you and I embrace you with all my soul, and my children join me in loving you and summoning you.

G. Sand

CCXXXVI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Paris

Nohant, 25 October, 1872

Your letters fall on me like a rain that refreshes, and develops at once all that is germinating in the soil; they make me want to answer your reasons, because your reasons are powerful and inspire a reply.

I do not assume that my replies will be strong too; they are sincere, they issue from the roots of my being, like the plants aforesaid. That is why I have just written a paper on the subject that you raise, addressing myself this time TO A WOMAN FRIEND, who has written me also in your vein, but less well than you, of course, and a little from an aristocratically intellectual point of view, to which she has not ALL THE RIGHTS SHE DESIRES.

My roots, one can't extirpate them, and I am astonished that you ask me to make tulips come from them when they can answer you by producing only potatoes. Since the beginning of my intellectual blooming, when, studying quite alone at the bedside of my paralyzed grandmother, or in the fields at the times when I entrusted her to Deschartres, I asked myself the most elementary questions about society; I was no more advanced at seventeen than a child of six, not as much! thanks to Deschartres, my father's teacher, who was a contradiction from his head to his feet, much learning and little sense; thanks to the convent, into which they stuck me, God knows why, as they believed in nothing; thanks also to a purely Restoration surrounding in which my grandmother, a philosopher, but dying, breathed her last without resisting further the monarchical current.

Then I read Chateaubriand, and Rousseau; I passed from the Gospels to the Contrat social. I read the history of the Revolution written by the pious, the history of France, written by philosophers; and, one fine day, I made all that agree like light proceeding from two lamps, and I had PRINCIPLES. Don't laugh, very candid, childish principles which have remained with me through all, through Lelia and the romantic epoch, through love and doubt, enthusiasm and disenchantments. To love, to make sacrifices, only to reconsider when the sacrifice is harmful to those who are the object of it, and to sacrifice oneself again in the hope of serving a real cause, love.

I am not speaking here of personal passion, but of love of race, of the widening sentiment of self-love, of the horror of THE ISOLATED MOI. And that ideal of JUSTICE of which you speak, I have never seen it apart from love, since the first law on which the existence of a natural society depends, is that we shall serve each other mutually, like the bees and the ants. This concurrence of all to the same end, we have agreed to call instinct among beasts, and it does not matter, but among men, the instinct is love; he who withdraws himself from love, withdraws himself from truth, from justice.

I have experienced revolutions, and I have seen the principal actors near to; I have seen the depth of their souls, I should say the bottom of their bag: NO PRINCIPLES! and no real intelligence, no force, nor endurance. Nothing but means and a personal end. Only one had principles, not all of them good, but in comparison with their integrity, he counted his personality for nothing: Barbes.

Among artists and literary men, I have found no depth. You are the only one with whom I have been able to exchange other ideas than those of the profession. I don't know if you were at Magny's one day when I said to them that they were all GENTLEMEN. They said that one should not write for ignoramuses. They spurned me because I wanted to write only for them, as they are the only ones who need anything. The masters are provided for, are rich, satisfied. Imbeciles lack everything, I am sorry for them. Loving and pitying are not to be separated. And there you have the uncomplicated mechanism of my thought.

I have the passion for goodness and not at all for prejudiced sentimentality. I spit with all my might upon him who pretends to hold my principles and acts contrary to them. I do not pity the incendiary and the assassin who fall under the hand of the law; I do pity profoundly the class which a brutal, degenerate life without upward trend and without aid, brings to the point of producing such monsters. I pity humanity, I wish it were good, because I cannot separate myself from it; because it is myself; because the evil it does strikes me to the heart; because its shame makes me blush; because its crimes gnaw at my vitals, because I cannot understand paradise in heaven nor on earth for myself alone.

You ought to understand me, you who are goodness from head to foot.

Are you still in Paris? It has been such fine weather that I have been tempted to go there to embrace you, but I don't dare to spend the money, however little it may be, when there is so much poverty. I am miserly because I know that I am extravagant when I forget, and I continually forget. And then I have so much to do!...I don't know anything and I don't learn anything, for I am always forced to learn it over again. I do very much need, however, to see you again, for a little bit; it is a part of myself which I miss.

My Aurore keeps me very busy. She understands too quickly and we have to take her at a hard gallop. To understand fascinates her, to know repels her. She is as lazy as monsieur, her father, was. He has gotten over it so well that I am not impatient. She promises me to write you a letter soon. You see that she does not forget you. Titite's Punch has lost his head, literally, because he has been so embraced and caressed. He is loved as much without his head; what an example of fidelity in misfortune! His stomach has become a receptacle where playthings are put.

Maurice is deep in his archeological studies, Lina is always adorable, and all goes well except that the maids are not clean. What a road the creatures have still to travel who do not keep themselves clean!

I embrace you. Tell me how you are getting on with Aisse, the Odeon and all that stuff you are busy about. I love you; that is the end of all my discourses.

G. Sand

CCXXXVII. TO GEORGE SAND

Dear master,

In your last letter, among the nice things that you say to me, you praise me for not being "haughty"; one is not haughty with what is high. Therefore, in this aspect, you cannot know me. I object.

Although I consider myself a good man, I am not always an agreeable gentleman, witness what happened to me Thursday last.

After having lunched with a lady whom I had called “imbecile,” I went to call on another whom I had said was “ninny”; such is my ancient French gallantry. The first one had bored me to death with her spiritualistic discourses and her pretensions to ideality; the second outraged me by telling me that Renan was a rascal. Observe that she confessed to me that she had not read his books. There are some subjects about which I lose patience, and, when a friend is slandered before my very face, the savage in my blood returns, I see red. Nothing more foolish! for it serves no purpose and hurts me frightfully.

This vice, by the way, BETRAYING ONE’S FRIENDS IN PUBLIC, seems to me to be taking gigantic proportions!

CCXXXVIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 26 October, 1872

Dear friend,

Here is another chagrin for you; a sorrow foreseen, but none the less distressing. Poor Theo! I pity him deeply, not because he is dead, but because he has not been really living for twenty years; and if he had consented to live, to exist, to act, to forget a bit his intellectual personality so as to conserve his material personality, he could have lived a long time yet, and have renewed his resources which he was too much inclined to make a sterile treasure. They say that he suffered greatly from hardship during the siege. I understand it, but afterward? why and how?

I am worried at not having had news from you for a long time. Are you at Croisset? You must have been in Paris for the funeral of this poor friend. What cruel and repeated separations! I am angry with you for becoming savage and discontented with life. It seems to me that you regard happiness too much as a possible thing, and that the absence of happiness which is our chronic state, angers you and astonishes you too much. You shun friends, you plunge into work, and reckon ass lost the time you might employ in loving or in being loved. Why didn’t you come to us with Madame Viardot and Tourgueneff? You like them, you admire them, you know that you are adored here, and you run away to be alone. Well, how about getting married? Being alone is odious, it is deadly, and it is cruel also for those who love you. All your letters are unhappy and grip my heart. Haven’t you any woman whom you love or by whom you would be loved with pleasure? Take her to live with you. Isn't there anywhere a little urchin whose father you can believe you are? Bring him up. Make yourself his slave, forget yourself in him.

What do I know? To live in oneself is bad. There is intellectual pleasure only in the possibility of returning to it when one has been out for a long time; but to live always in this Moi which is the most tyrannical, the most exacting, the most fantastic of companions, no, one must not. — I beg you, listen to me! You are shutting up an exuberant nature in a jail, you are making out of a tender and indulgent heart, a deliberate misanthrope, — and you will not make a success of it. In short, I am worried about you, and I am saying perhaps some foolishness to you; but we live in cruel times and we must not undergo them with curses. We must rise above them with pity. That's it! I love you, write to me.

I shall not go to Paris until after a month's time to put on Mademoiselle La Quintinie. Where shall you be?

CCXXXIX. TO GEORGE SAND

Monday night, 28 October, 1872

You have guessed rightly, dear master, that I had an increase of sorrow, and you have written me a very tender, good letter, thanks; I embrace you even more warmly than usual.

Although expected, the death of poor Theo has distressed me. He is the last of my intimates to go. He closes the list. Whom shall I see now when I go to Paris? With whom shall I talk of what interests me? I know some thinkers (at least people who are called so), but an artist, where is there any? For my part, I tell you he died from the "putrescence of modern times." That is his word, and he repeated it to me this winter several times: "I am dying of the Commune," etc.

The 4th of September has inaugurated an order of things in which people like him have nothing more in the world to do. One must not demand apples of orange trees. Artisans in luxury are useless in a society dominated by plebeians. How I regret him! He and Bouilhet have left an absolute void in me, and nothing can take their place. Besides he was always so good, and no matter what they say, so simple. People will recognize later (if they ever return seriously to literature), that he was a great poet. Meanwhile he is an absolutely unknown author. So indeed is Pierre Corneille.

He hated two things: the hate of the Philistines in his youth, that gave him his talent; the hate of the blackguards in his riper years, this last killed him. He died of suppressed fury, of wrath at not being able to say what he thought. He was OPPRESSED by Girardin, by Fould, by Dalloz, and by the first Republic. I tell you that, because I HAVE SEEN abominable things and I am the only man perhaps to whom he made absolute confidences. He lacked what was the most important thing in life for him and for others: CHARACTER. That he failed of the Academy was to him a dreadful chagrin. What weakness! and how little he must have esteemed himself! To seek an honor no matter what, seems to me, besides, an act of incomprehensible modesty.

I was not at his funeral owing to the mistake of Catulle Mendès, who sent me a telegram too late. There was a crowd. A lot of scoundrels and buffoons came to advertise themselves as usual, and today, Monday, the day of the theatrical paper, there must be bits in the bulletins, THAT WILL MAKE COPY. To resume, I do not pity him, I ENVY HIM. For, frankly, life is not amusing.

No, I don't think that HAPPINESS IS POSSIBLE, but certainly tranquillity. That is why I get away from what irritates me. A trip to Paris is for me now, a great business. As soon as I shake the vessel, the dregs mount and permeate all. The least conversation with anyone at all exasperates me because I find everyone idiotic. My feeling of justice is continually revolted. They talk ONLY of politics and in what a fashion! Where is there a sign of an idea? What can one get hold of? What shall one get excited about?

I don't think, however, that I am a monster of egoism. My Moi scatters itself in books so that I pass whole days without noticing it. I have bad moments, it is true, but I pull myself together by this reflection: "No one at least bothers me." After that, I regain my balance. So I think that I am going on in my natural path; am I right?

As for living with a woman, marrying as you advise me to do that is a prospect that I find fantastic. Why? I don't know. But it is so. Explain the riddle. The feminine being has never been included in my life; and then, I am not rich enough, and then, and then — ...I am too old, and too decent to inflict forever my person on another. There is in me an element of the ecclesiastical that people don't know. We shall talk about that better than we can write of it.

I shall see you in Paris in December, but in Paris one is disturbed by others. I wish you three hundred performances for Mademoiselle La Quintinie. But you will have a lot of bother with the Odeon. It is an institution where I suffered horribly last winter. Every time that I attempted to do anything they dished me. So, enough! enough! "Hide thy life," maxim of Epictetus. My whole ambition now is to flee from bother, and I am sure by that means never to cause any to others, that is much.

I am working like a madman, I am reading medicine, metaphysics, politics, everything. For I have undertaken a work of great scope, which will require a lot of time, a prospect that pleases me.

Ever since a month ago, I have been expecting Tourgueneff from week to week. The gout is delaying him still.

CCXL. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croissset
Nohant, 22 November, 1872

I don't think that I shall go to Paris before February. My play is postponed on account of the difficulty of finding the chief actor. I am content about it, for the idea of leaving Nohant, my occupations, and the walks that are so lovely in this weather, didn't look good to me at all; what a warm autumn and how good for old people! Two hours distant from here, we have a real wilderness, where, the next day after a rain, it is as dry as in a room, and where there are still flowers for me, and insects for Maurice. The little children run like rabbits in the heather which is higher than they are. Heavens! how good it is to be alive when all one loves is living and scurrying around one. You are the only BLACK SPOT in my heart-life, because you are sad and don't want to look at the sun. As for those about whom I don't care, I don't care either about the evils or the follies they can commit against me or against themselves. They will pass as the rain passes. The eternal thing is the feeling of beauty in a good heart. You have both, confound it! you have no right not to be happy. — Perhaps you ought to have had in your life the INCLUSION OF THE FEMININE SENTIMENT which you say you have defied. — I know that the feminine is worth nothing; but, perhaps, in order to be happy, one must have been unhappy.

I have been, and I know enough about it; but I forget so well. Well, sad or gay, I love you and I am still waiting for you, although you never speak of coming to see us, and you cast aside the opportunity emphatically; we love you here just the same, we are not literary enough for you here, I know that, but we love, and that gives life occupation.

Is Saint-Antoine finished, that you are talking of a work of great scope? or is it Saint-Antoine that is going to spread its wings over the entire universe? It could, the subject is immense. I embrace you, shall I say again, my old troubadour, since you have resolved to turn into an old Benedictine? I shall remain a troubadour, naturally.

G. Sand

I am sending you two novels for your collection of my writings: you are not OBLIGED to read them immediately, if you are deep in serious things.

CCXLI. TO GEORGE SAND

Monday evening, eleven o'clock, 25 November, 1872

The postman just now, at five o'clock, has brought your two volumes to me. I am going to begin Nanon at once, for I am very curious about it.

Don't worry any more about your old troubadour (who is becoming a silly animal, frankly), but I hope to recover. I have gone through, several times, melancholy periods, and I have come out all right. Everything wears out, boredom with the rest.

I expressed myself badly: I did not mean that I scorned "the feminine sentiment." But that woman, materially speaking, had never been one of my habits, which is quite different. I have LOVED more than anyone, a presumptuous phrase which means "quite like others," and perhaps even more than average person. Every affection is known to me, "the storms of the heart" have "poured out their rain" on me. And then chance, force of circumstances, causes solitude to increase little by little around me, and now I am alone, absolutely alone.

I have not sufficient income to take unto myself a wife, nor even to live in Paris for six months of the year: so it is impossible for me to change my way of living.

Do you mean to say that I did not tell you that Saint-Antoine had been finished since last June? What I am dreaming of just now, is something of greater scope, which will aim to be comic. It would take too long to explain to you with a pen. We shall talk of it when we meet.

Adieu, dear good, adorable master, yours with his best affection,
Your old friend.

Always as indignant as Saint Polycarp.

Do you know, in all history, including that of the Botocudos, anything more imbecile than the Right of the National Assembly? These gentlemen who do not want the simple and frivolous word Republic, who find Thiers too advanced!!! O profoundness! problem, revery!

CCXLII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 27 November, 1872

Maurice is quite happy and very proud of the letter you wrote him; there is no one who could give him as much pleasure and whose encouragement counts more with him. I thank you too, for my part; for I agree with him.

What! you have finished Saint-Antoine? Well, should I find a publisher, since you are not doing so? You cannot keep it in your portfolio. You don't like Levy, but there are others; say the word, and I will act as if it were for myself.

You promise me to get well later, but in the mean time you don't want to do anything to jolt yourself. Come, then, to read Saint-Antoine to me, and we will talk of publishing it. What is coming here from Croisset, for a man? If you won't come when we are gay and having a holiday, come while it is quiet and I am alone. All the family embraces you.

Your old troubadour
G. Sand

CCXLIII. TO GEORGE SAND

Dear master,

Here it is a night and a day that I have spent with you. I had finished Nanon at four o'clock in the morning, and Francia at three o'clock in the afternoon. All of it is still dancing around in my head. I am going to try to gather my ideas together to talk about these excellent books to you. They have done me good. So thank you, dear, good master. Yes, they were like a great whiff of air, and, after having been moved, I feel refreshed.

In Nanon, in the first place I was charmed with the style, with a thousand simple and strong things which are included in the web of the work, and which make it what it is; for instance: "as the burden seemed to me enormous, the beast seemed to me beautiful." But I did not pay any attention to any thing, I was carried away, like the commonest reader. (I don't think that the common reader could admire it as much as I do.) The life of the monks, the first relations between Emilien and Nanon, the fear caused by the brigands and the imprisonment of Pere Fructueux which could be commonplace and which it is not at all. What a fine page is 113! and how difficult it was to stay within bounds! "Beginning with this day, I felt happiness in everything, and, as it were, a joy to be in the world."

La Roche aux Fades is an exquisite idyll. One would like to share the life of those three fine people.

I think that the interest slackens a little when Nanon gets the idea of becoming rich. She becomes too strongminded, too intelligent! I don't like the episode of the robbers either. The reappearance of Emilien with his arm cut off, stirred me again, and I shed a tear at the last page over the portrait of the Marquise de Francqueville in her old age.

I submit to you the following queries: Emilien seems to me very much up in political philosophy; at that period did people see as far ahead as he? The same objection applies to the prior, whom I think otherwise charming, in the middle of the book especially. But how well all that is brought in, how well sustained, how fascinating, how charming! What a creature you are! What power you have!

I give you on your two cheeks, two little nurse's kisses, and I pass to Francia! Quite another style, but none the less good. And in the first place I admire enormously your Dodore. This is the first time that anyone has made a Paris gamin real; he is not too generous, nor too intemperate, nor too much of a vaudevillist. The dialogue with his sister, when he consents to her becoming a kept woman, is a feat. Your Madame de Thievre, with her shawl which she slips up and down over her fat shoulders, isn't she decidedly of the Restoration! And the uncle who wants to confiscate his nephew's grisette! And Antoine, the good fat tinsmith so polite at the theatre! The Russian is a simple-minded, natural man, a character that is not easy to do.

When I saw Francia plunge the poignard into his heart, I frowned first, fearing that it might be a classic vengeance that would spoil the charming character of that good girl. But not at all! I was mistaken, that unconscious murder completed your heroine.

What strikes me the most in the book is that it is very intelligent and exact. One is completely in the period.

I thank you from the bottom of my heart for this twofold reading. It has relaxed me. Everything then is not dead. There is still something beautiful and good in the world.

CCXLIV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 29 November, 1872

You spoil me! I did not dare to send you the novels, which were wrapped up addressed to you for a week. I was afraid of interrupting your train of thought and of boring you. You stopped everything to read Maurice first, and then me. We should be remorseful if we were not egoists, very happy to have a reader who is worth ten thousand others! That helps a great deal; for Maurice and I work in a desert, never knowing, except from each other, if a thing is a success or a mess, exchanging our criticisms, and never having relations with accredited JUDGES.

Michel never tells us until after a year or two if a book has SOLD. As for Buloz, if it is with him we have to do, he tells us invariably that the thing is bad or poor. It is only Charles Edmond who encourages us by asking us for copy. We write without consideration for the public; that is perhaps not a bad idea, but we carry it too far. And praise from you gives us the courage which does not depart from us, but which is often a sad courage, while you make it sparkling and gay, and healthful for us to breathe.

I was right then in not throwing Nanon into the fire, as I was ready to do, when Charles Edmond came to tell me that it was very well done, and that he wanted it for his paper. I thank you then, and I send you back your good kisses, for Francia especially, which Buloz only put in with a sour face and for lack of something better: you see that I am not spoiled, but I never get angry at all that and I don't talk about it. That is how it is, and it is very simple. As soon as literature is a merchandise, the salesman who exploits it, appreciates only the client who buys it, and if the client depreciates the object, the salesman declares to the author that his merchandise is not pleasing. The republic of letters is only a market in which one sells books. Not making concession to the publisher is our only virtue; let us keep that and let us live in peace, even with him when he is peevish, and let us recognize, too, that he is not the guilty one. He would have taste if the public had it.

Now I've emptied my bag, and don't let us talk of it again except to advise about Saint-Antoine, meanwhile telling ourselves that the editors will be brutes. Levy, however, is not, but you are angry with him. I should like to talk of all that with you; will you come? or wait until my trip to Paris? But when shall I go? I don't know.

I am a little afraid of bronchitis in the winter, and I do not leave home unless I absolutely have to for business reasons.

I don't think that they will play Mademoiselle La Quintinie. The censors have declared that it is a MASTERPIECE OF THE MOST ELEVATED AND HEALTHIEST MORALITY, but that they could not TAKE UPON THEMSELVES to authorize the performance. IT WILL HAVE TO BE TAKEN TO HIGHER AUTHORITIES, that is to say, to the minister who will send it to General Ladmiraunt; it is enough to make you die laughing. But I don't agree to all that, and I prefer to keep quiet till the new administration. If the NEW administration is the clerical monarchy, we shall see strange things. As for me, I don't care if they stand in my way, but how about the future of our generation?...

CCXLV. TO GEORGE SAND

Wednesday, 4th December, 1872

Dear master,

I notice a phrase in your last letter: "The publisher would have taste if the public had it...or if the public forced him to have it." But that is asking the impossible. They have LITERARY IDEAS, rest assured, and so have messieurs the managers of the theatre. Both insist that they are JUDGES IN THAT RESPECT, and their estheticism mingling with their commercialism makes a pretty result.

According to the publishers, one's last book is always inferior to the preceding one. May I be hung if that is not true. Why does Levy admire Ponsard and Octave Feuillet more than father Dumas and you? Levy is academic. I have made more money for him than Cuvillier-Fleury has, haven't I? Well, draw a parallel between us two, and you will see how you will be received. You know that he did not want to sell more than 1200 copies of the Dernieres Chansons, and the 800 which were left over, are in my niece's garret, rue de Clichy! That is very narrow of me, I agree to that; but I confess that the proceeding has simply enraged me. It seems to me that my prose might have been more respected by a man for whom I have turned a penny or two.

Why publish, in these abominable times? Is it to get money? What mockery! As if money were the recompense for work, or could be! That will be when one has destroyed speculation, till then, no! And then how measure work, how estimate the effort? The commercial value of the work remains. For that one would be obliged to suppress all intermediaries between the producer and the purchaser, and even then, that question in itself permits of no solution. For I write (I speak of an author who respects himself) not for the reader of today, but for all the readers who can present themselves as long as the language lives. My merchandise, therefore, cannot be consumed, for it is not made exclusively for my contemporaries. My service remains therefore indefinite, and in consequence, unpayable.

Why publish then? Is it to be understood, applauded? But yourself, YOU, great George Sand, you confess your solitude. Is there at this time, I don't say, admiration or sympathy, but the appearance of a little attention to works of art? Who is the critic who reads the book that he has to criticise? In ten years they won't know, perhaps, how to make a pair of shoes, they are becoming so frightfully stupid! All that is to tell you that, until better times (in which I do not believe), I shall keep Saint-Antoine in the bottom of a closet.

If I publish it, I would rather that it should be at the same time as another entirely different book. I am working now on one which will go with it. Conclusion: the wisest thing is to keep calm.

Why does not Duquesnel go to find General Ladmirault, Jules

Simon, Thiers? I think that the proceeding concerns him. What a fine thing the censorship is! Let us be reassured, it will always exist, for it always has! Our friend Alexandre Dumas fils, to make an agreeable paradox, has boasted of its advantages in the preface to the Dame aux Camélias, hasn't he?

And you want me not to be sad! I think that we shall soon see abominable things, thanks to the inept stubbornness of the Right. The good Normans, who are the most conservative people in the world, incline towards the Left very strongly.

If they consulted the bourgeoisie now, it would make father Thiers king of France. If Thiers were taken away, it would throw itself in the arms of Gambetta, and I am afraid it will do that soon! I console myself by thinking that Thursday next I shall be fifty-one years old.

If you are not to come to Paris in February, I shall go to see you at the end of January, before going back to the Pan Monceau; I promise.

The princess has written me to ask if you were at Nohant. She wants to write to you.

My niece Caroline, to whom I have just given Nanon to read, is enchanted with it. What struck her was the "youth" of the book. The criticism seems true to me. It is a real BOOK while Francia, although more simple, is perhaps more finished; more irreproachable as a work.

I read last week the Illustre Docteur Matheus, by Erckmann-Chatrian.

How very boorish! There are two nuts, who have very plebeian souls.

Adieu, dear good master. Your old troubadour embraces you,
I am always thinking of Theo. I am not consoled for his loss.

CCXLVI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croissset

Nohant, 8 December, 1872

Oh! well, then, if you are in the realm of the ideal about this, if you have a future book in your mind, if you are accomplishing a task of confidence and conviction, no more anger and no more sadness, let us be logical.

I myself arrived at a philosophical state of very satisfactory serenity, and I did not OVERSTATE the matter when I said to you that all the ill any one can do me, or all the indifference that any one can show me, does not affect me really any more and does not prevent me, not only from being happy outside of literature, but also from being literary with pleasure, and from working with joy.

You were pleased with my two novels? I am repaid, I think that they are SATISFACTORY, and the silence which has invaded my life (it must be said that I have sought it) is full of a good voice that talks to me and is sufficient to me. I have not mounted as high as you in my ambition. You want to write for the ages. As for me, I think that in fifty years, I shall be absolutely forgotten and perhaps unkindly ignored. Such is the law of things that are not of first rank, and I have never thought myself in the first rank. My idea has been rather to act upon my contemporaries, even if only on a few, and to share with them my ideal of sweetness and poetry. I have attained this end up to a certain point; I have at least done my best towards it, I do still, and my reward is to approach it continually a little nearer.

That is enough for myself, but, as for you, your aim is greater, I see that clearly, and success is further off. Then you ought to put yourself more in accord with yourself, by being still calmer and more content than I am. Your momentary angers are good. They are the result of a generous temperament, and, as they are neither malicious nor hateful, I like them, but your sadness, your weeks of spleen, I do not understand them, and I reproach you for them. I have believed, I do still, that there is such a thing as too great isolation, too great detachment from the bonds of life. You have powerful reasons to answer me with, so powerful that they ought to give you the victory.

Search your heart, think it over, and answer me, even if only to dispel the fears that I have often on your account; I don't want you to exhaust yourself. You are fifty years old, my son is the same or nearly. He is in the prime of his strength, in his best development, you are too, if you don't heat the oven of your ideas too hot. Why do you say often that you wish you were dead? Don't you believe then in your own work? Do let yourself be influenced then by this or that temporary thing? It is possible, we are not gods, and something in us, something weak and unimportant sometimes, disturbs our theodicy. But the victory every day becomes easier, when one is sure of loving logic and truth. It gets to the point even of forestalling, of overcoming in advance, the subject of ill humor, of contempt or of discouragement.

All that seems easy to me, when it is a question of self control: the subjects of great sadness are elsewhere, in the spectacle of the history that is unrolling around us; that eternal struggle of barbarity against civilization is a great bitterness for those who have cast off the element of barbarity and find themselves in advance of their epoch. But, in that great sorrow, in these secret angers, there is a great stimulant which rightly raises us up, by inspiring in us the need of reaction. Without that, I confess, for my part, that I would abandon everything.

I have had a good many compliments in my life, in the time when people were interested in literature. I have always dreaded them when they came to me from unknown people; they made me doubt myself too much. I have made enough money to be rich. If I am not, it is because I did not care to be; I have enough with what Levy makes for me. What I should prefer, would be to abandon myself entirely to botany, it would be for me a Paradise on earth. But it must not be, that would be useful only to myself, and, if chagrin is good for anything it is for keeping us from egoism, one must not curse nor scorn life. One must not use it up voluntarily; you are enamoured of JUSTICE, begin by being just to yourself, you owe it to yourself to conserve and to develop yourself.

Listen to me; I love you tenderly, I think of you every day and on every occasion: when working I think of you. I have gained certain intellectual benefits which you deserve more than I do, and of which you ought to make a longer use. Consider too, that my spirit is often near to yours, and that it wishes you a long life and a fertile inspiration in true joys.

You promise to come; that is a joy and a feast day for my heart, and in my family.

Your old troubadour

CCXLVII. TO GEORGE SAND 12 December 1872

Dear good master,

Don't take seriously the exaggerations about my IRE. Don't believe that I am counting "on posterity, to avenge me for the indifference of my contemporaries." I meant to say only this: if one does not address the crowd, it is right that the crowd should not pay one. It is political economy. But, I maintain that a work of art (worthy of that name and conscientiously done) is beyond appraisal, has no commercial value, cannot be paid for. Conclusion: if the artist has no income, he must starve! They think that the writer, because he no longer receives a pension from the great, is very much freer, and nobler. All his social nobility now consists in being the equal of a grocer. What progress! As for me, you say to me "Let us be logical"; but that's just the difficulty.

I am not sure at all of writing good things, nor that the book of which I am dreaming now can be well done, which does not prevent me from undertaking it. I think that the idea of it is original, nothing more. And then, as I hope to spit into it the gall that is choking me, that is to say, to emit some truths, I hope by this means to PURGE MYSELF, and to be henceforward more Olympian, a quality that I lack entirely. Ah! how I should like to admire myself!

Mourning once more: I headed the procession at the burial of father Pouchet last Monday. That gentle fellow's life was very beautiful, and I mourned him.

I enter today upon my fifty-second year, and I insist on embracing you today: I do it affectionately, since you love me so well.

CCXLVIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 8 January, 1873

Yes, yes, my old friend, you must come to see me. I am not thinking of going to Paris before the end of the winter, and it is so hard to see people in Paris. Bring me Saint-Antoine. I want to hear it, I want to live in it with you. I want to embrace you with all my soul, and Maurice does too.

Lina loves you too, and our little ones have not forgotten you. I want you to see how interesting and lovely my Aurore has become. I shall not tell you anything new about myself. I live so little in myself. This will be a good reason for you to talk about what interests me more, that is to say, about yourself. Tell me ahead so that I can spare you that horrid coach from Chateauroux to Nohant. If you could bring Tourgueneff, we should be happy, and you would have the most perfect travelling companion. Have you read Peres et Enfants? How good it is!

Now, I hope for you really this time, and I think that our air will do you good. It is so lovely here!

Your old comrade who loves you,

G. SAND

I embrace you six times for the New Year.

CCXLIX. TO GEORGE SAND

Monday evening, 3 February, 1873

Dear master,

Do I seem to have forgotten you and not to want to make the journey to Nohant? Not at all! But, for the last month, every time I go out, I am seized anew with the grippe which gets worse each time. I cough abominably, and I ruin innumerable pocket-handkerchiefs! When will it be over?

I have sworn not to step beyond my doorsill till I am completely well again, and I am still awaiting the good will of the members of the commission for the Bouilhet fountain! For nearly two months, I have not been able to get together in Rouen six citizens of Rouen! That is the way friends are! Everything is difficult, the least undertaking demands great efforts.

I am reading chemistry now (which I don't understand a bit), and the Raspail theory of medicine, not to mention the Potager moderne of Gressent and the Agriculture of Gasparin. In this connection, Maurice would be very kind, to compile his agronomical recollections, so that I may know what mistakes he made and why he made them.

What sorts of information don't I need, for the book that I am undertaking? I have come to Paris this winter with the idea of collecting some; but if my horrible cold continues, my stay here will be useless! Am I going to become like the canon of Poitiers, of whom Montaigne speaks, who for thirty years did not leave his room "because of his melancholic infirmity," but who, however, was very well "except for a cold which had settled on his stomach." This is to tell you that I am seeing very few people. Moreover whom could I see? The war has opened many abysses. I have not been able to get your article on Badinguet. I am planning to read it at your house.

As regards reading, I have just swallowed ALL the odious Joseph de Maistre. They have saddled us enough with this gentleman! And the modern socialists who have praised him beginning with the saint-simonians and ending with A. Comte. France is drunk with authority, no matter what they say. Here is a beautiful idea that I find in Raspail, THE PHYSICIANS OUGHT to be MAGISTRATES, so they could force, etc.

Your romantic and liberal old dunce embraces you tenderly.

CCL. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 5 February, 1873

I wrote to you yesterday to Croisset, Lina thinking that you had returned there. I asked you the little favor which you have already rendered me, namely, to ask your brother to give his patronage to my friend Despruneaux in his suit which is going to be appealed. My letter will probably be forwarded to you in Paris, and reach you as quickly as this one. It is only a question of writing a line to your brother, if that does not bother you.

Pray, what is this obstinate cough? There is only one remedy, a minimum dose, a half-centigram of acetate of morphine taken every evening after digesting your dinner, for a week at least. I do nothing else and I always get over it, I cure all my family the same way, it is so easy to do and so quickly done! At the end of two or three days one feels the good effect. I am awaiting your cure with impatience, for your sake first, and second for myself, because you will come and because I am hungry and thirsty to see you.

Maurice is at a loss to know how to answer your question. He has not made any mistake in his experiments, and knows indeed those that others make or could make; but he says that they vary infinitely and that each mistake is a special one for the conditions in which one works. When you are here and he understands really what you want, he can answer you for everything that concerns the center of France, and the general geology of the planet, if there is any opportunity to generalize. His reasoning has been this: not to make innovations, but to push to its greatest development what exists, in making use always of the method established by experience. Experience can never deceive, it may be incomplete, but never mendacious. With this I embrace you, I summon you, I await you, I hope for you, but will not however torment you.

But we love you, that is certain; and we would like to infuse in you a little of our Berrichon patience about the things in this world which are not amusing, we know that very well! But why are we in this world if it is not to learn patience.

Your obstinate troubadour who loves you.

G. Sand

CCLI. TO GEORGE SAND

Tuesday, March 12, 1873

Dear master,

If I am not at your house, it is the fault of the big Tourgueneff. I was getting ready to go to Nohant, when he said to me: "Wait, I'll go with you the first of April." That is two weeks off. I shall see him tomorrow at Madame Viardot's and I shall beg him to go earlier, as I am beginning to be impatient. I am feeling the NEED of seeing you, of embracing you, and of talking with you. That is the truth.

I am beginning to regain my equilibrium again. What is it that I have had for the past four months? What trouble was going on in the depths of my being? I don't know. What is certain, is, that I was very ill in an indefinable way. But now I am better. Since the end of January, Madame Bovary and Salamambo have belonged to me and I can sell them. I am doing nothing about it, preferring to do without the money other than to exasperate my nerves. Such is your old troubadour.

I am reading all sorts of books and I am taking notes for my big book which will take five or six years to write, and I am thinking of two or three others. There will be dreams for a long time, which is the principal thing.

Art continues to be "in the marasmus," as M. Prudhomme says, and there is no longer any place in this world for people with taste. One must, like the rhinoceros, retire into solitude and await one's death.

CCLII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, in Paris
Nohant, 15 March, 1873

Well, my old troubadour, we can hope for you very soon. I was worried about you. I am always worried about you. To tell the truth, I am not happy over your ill tempers, and your PREJUDICES. They last too long, and in effect they are like an illness, you recognize it yourself. Now, forget; don't you know how to forget? You live too much in yourself and get to consider everything in relation to yourself. If you were an egoist, and a conceited person, I would say that it was your normal condition; but with you who are so good and so generous, it is an anomaly, an evil that must be combated. Rest assured that life is badly arranged, painful, irritating for everyone, but do not neglect the immense compensations which it is ungrateful to forget.

That you get angry with this or that person, is of little importance if it is a comfort to you; but that you remain furious, indignant for weeks, months, almost years, is unjust and cruel to those who love you, and who would like to spare you all anxiety and all deception.

You see that I am scolding you; but while embracing you, I shall think only of the joy and the hope of seeing you flourishing again. We are waiting for you with impatience, and we are counting on Tourgueneff whom we adore also.

I have been suffering a good deal lately with a series of very painful hemorrhages; but they have not prevented me from amusing myself writing tales and from playing with my LITTLE CHILDREN. They are so dear, and my big children are so good to me, that I shall die, I believe, smiling at them. What difference does it make whether one has a hundred thousand enemies if one is loved by two or three good souls? Don't you love me too, and wouldn't you reproach me for thinking that of no account? When I lost Rollinat, didn't you write to me to love the more those who were left? Come, so that I may OVERWHELM you with reproaches; for you are not doing what you told me to do.

We are expecting you, we are preparing a mid-Lent fantasy; try to take part. Laughter is a splendid medicine. We shall give you a costume; they tell me that you were very good as a pastry cook at Pauline's! If you are better, be certain it is because you have gotten out of your rut and have distracted yourself a little. Paris is good for you, you are too much alone yonder in your lovely house. Come and work, at our house; how perfectly easy to send on a box of books!

Send word when you are coming so that I can have a carriage at the station at Chateauroux.

CCLIII. TO GEORGE SAND

Thursday, 20 March, 1873

Dear master,

The gigantic Tourgueneff is at this moment leaving here and we have just sworn a solemn oath. You will have us at dinner the 12th of April, Easter Eve.

It has not been a small job to get to that point, it is so difficult to succeed in anything, no matter what.

For my part nothing would prevent me from going tomorrow But our friend seems to me to enjoy very little liberty and I myself have engagements the first week in April.

I am going this evening to two costume balls! Tell me after that that I am not young.

A thousand affectionate greetings from your old troubadour who embraces you.

Read as an example of modern fetidness, in the last number of the Vie Parisienne, the article on Marion Delorme. It ought to be framed, if, however, anything fetid can be framed. But nowadays people don't look so closely.

CCLIV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 23 March, 1873

No, that giant does not do as he likes, I have noticed that. But he is one of the class that finds its happiness in being ruled and I can understand it, on the whole. Provided one is in good hands, — and he is.

Well, we are hoping still, but we are not absolutely counting on anyone but you. You can not give me a greater pleasure than by telling me that you are going out among people, that you are getting out of a rut and distracting yourself, absolutely necessary, in these muddled days.

On the day when a little intoxication is no longer necessary for self-preservation, the world will be getting on very well. We haven't come to that yet.

That FETID thing is not worth the trouble of reading, I didn't finish it, one turns away from such things, one does not spoil one's sense of smell by breathing them. But I do not think that the man to whom one offers that in a censer would be satisfied with it.

Do come with the swallows and bring Saint-Antoine. It is Maurice who is going to be interested in that! He is more of a scholar than I am, I who will appreciate, thanks to my ignorance about many things, only the poetic and great side of it. I am sure of it, I know already that it is there.

Keep on going about, you must, and above all continue to love us as we love you.

Your old troubadour,
G. Sand

CCLV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 7th April, 1873

I am writing to my friend General Ferri Pisani, whom you know, who HAS CHARGE at Chateauroux, to reserve you a carriage which will be waiting for you on the 12th, at the station, at twenty minutes past three. You must leave Paris at ten minutes past nine o'clock by the EXPRESS. Otherwise the trip is too long and stupid. I hope that the general will come with you, if there is any decision contrary to your promise send him a telegram to Chateauroux so that he shall not wait for you. He usually comes on horseback.

We are looking forward IMPATIENTLY to seeing you.

Your old troubadour

G. Sand

CCLVI. TO GEORGE SAND 23 April, 1873

It is only five days since we parted, and I am missing you like the devil. I miss Aurore and all the household down to Fadette. Yes, that is the way it is, one is so happy at your house! you are so good and so interesting.

Why can't we live together, why is life always so badly arranged? Maurice seems to me to be the type of human happiness. What does he lack? Certainly, he is no more envied by anyone than by me.

Your two friends, Tourgueneff and Cruchard philosophized about that from Nohant to Chateauroux, very comfortably borne along in your carriage at a smart pace by two horses. Hurrah for the postillions of La Chatre! But the rest of the trip was horrid because of the company we had in our car. I was consoled for it by strong drink, as the Muscovite had a flask full of excellent brandy with him. We both felt a little heavy hearted. We did not talk, we did not sleep.

We found here the barodetien folly in full flower again. On the heels of this affair has developed during the last three days, Stoppfel! another bitter narcotic! Oh! Heavens! Heavens! what a bore to live in such times! How wise you are live so far from Paris!

I have begun my readings again, and, in a week I shall begin my excursions hereabouts to discover a countryside that may serve for my two good men. After which, about the 12th or the 15th, I shall return to my house at the water-side. I want very much, this summer, to go to Saint Gervais, to bleach my nose and to strengthen my nerves. For ten years I have been finding a pretext for doing without it. But it is high time to beautify myself, not that I have any pretensions at pleasing and seducing by my physical graces, but I hate myself too much when I look in my mirror. The older one grows, the more care one should take of oneself.

I shall see Madame Viardot this evening, I shall go early and we will talk of you.

When shall we meet again, now? How far Nohant is from Croisset!

Yours, dear good master, all my affection.

Gustave Flaubert

otherwise called the R. P. Cruchard of the Barnabites, director of the Ladies of Disillusion.

CCLVII. TO GEORGE SAND

Dear master,

Cruchard should have thanked you sooner for sending him your last book; but his reverence is working like ten thousand negroes, that is his excuse. But it did not hinder him from reading "Impressions et Souvenirs." I already knew some of it, from having read it in le Temps (a pun). [Footnote: "Dans de temps" means also, "some time ago."]

This is what was new to me and what struck me: (1) the first fragment; (2) the second in which there is a charming and just page on the Empress. How true is what you say of the proletariat! Let us hope that its reign will pass like that of the bourgeois, and for the same causes, as a punishment for the same folly and a similar egoism.

The "Reponse a un ami" I knew, as it was addressed to me.

The "Dialogue avec Delacroix" is instructive; two curious pages on what he thought of father Ingres.

I am not entirely of your opinion as regards the punctuation. That is to say that I would shock you by my exaggeration in that respect; but I do not lack, naturally, good reasons to defend my point of view.

"J'allume le fagot," etc., all of this long article charmed me.

In the "Idees d'un maitre d'ecole," I admire your pedagogic spirit, dear master, there are many pretty a b c phrases.

Thank you for what you say of my poor Bouilhet!

I adore your "Pierre Bonin." I have known people like him, and as these pages are dedicated to Tourgueneff it is the moment to ask you if you have read "l'Abandonnee"? For my part, I find it simply sublime. This Scythian is an immense old fellow.

I am not at such high-toned literature now. Far from it! I am hacking and re-hacking "le Sexe faible." I wrote the first act in a week.

It is true that my days are long. I spent, last week, one of eighteen hours, and Cruchard is as fresh as a young girl, not tired, no headache. In short, I think that I shall be through that work in three weeks. After that, God knows what!

It would be funny if Carvalho's fantasticality was crowned with success!

I am afraid that Maurice has lost his wager, for I want to replace the three theological virtues by the face of Christ appearing in the sun. What do you think about it? When the correction is made and I have strengthened the massacre at Alexandria and clarified the symbolism of the fantastic beasts, "Saint-Antoine" will be finished forever, and I shall start at my two good fellows who were set aside for the comedy.

What a horrid way of writing is required for the stage! The ellipses, the delays, the questions and the repetitions have to be lavish, if movement is desired, and all that in itself is very ugly.

I am perhaps blinding myself, but I think that I am now writing something very quick and easy to play. We shall see.

Adieu, dear master, embrace all yours for me.

Your old good-for-nothing Cruchard, friend of Chalmers. Note that name. It is a gigantic story, but it requires one to toe the mark to tell it suitably.

CCLVIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 4 July, 1873

I don't know where you are at present, Cruchard of my heart. I am addressing this to Paris whence I suppose it will be forwarded to you. I have been ill, your reverence, nothing except a stupid anemia, no legs, no appetite, continual sweat on the forehead and my heart as jumpy as a pregnant woman; it is unfair, that condition, when one gets to the seventies, I begin my seventieth spring tomorrow, cured after a half score of river baths. But I find it so comfortable to rest that I have not yet done an iota of work since I returned from Paris, and until I opened my ink-well again to write to you today. We reread your letter this morning in which you said that Maurice had lost his wager. He insists that he has won it as you are taking out the vertus theologales.

As for me, bet or no bet, I want you to keep the new version which is quite in the atmosphere, while the theological virtues are not. —

Have you any news of Tourgueneff? I am worried about him. Madame Viardot wrote me, several days ago, that he had fallen and hurt his leg. — Yes, I have read l'Abandonnee, it is very beautiful as is all that he does. I hope that his injury is not serious! such a thing is always serious with gout.

So you are still working frantically? Unhappy one! you don't know the ineffable pleasure of doing nothing! And how good work will seem to me after it! I shall delay it however as long as possible. I am getting more and more of the opinion that nothing is worth the trouble of being said!

Don't believe a word of that, do write lovely things, and love your old troubadour who always cherishes you.

G. Sand

Love from all Nohant.

CCLIX. TO GEORGE SAND

Thursday

Why do you leave me so long without any news of yourself, dear good master? I am cross with you, there!

I am all through with the dramatic art. Carvalho came here last Saturday to hear the reading of le Sexe faible, and seemed to me to be satisfied with it. He thinks it will be a success. But I put so little confidence in the intelligence of all those rascals, that for my part, I doubt it.

I am exhausted, and I am now sleeping ten hours a night, not to mention two hours a day. That is resting my poor brain.

I am going to resume my readings for my wretched book, which I shall not begin for a full year.

Do you know where the great Tourgueneff is now?

A thousand affectionate greetings to all and to you the best of everything from your old friend.

CCLX. TO GEORGE SAND

Sunday ...

I am not like M. de Vigny, I do not like the "sound of the horn in the depth of the woods." For the last two hours now an imbecile stationed on the island in front of me has been murdering me with his instrument. That wretched creature spoils my sunlight and deprives me of the pleasure of enjoying the summer. For it is lovely weather, but I am bursting with anger. I should like, however, to talk a bit with you, dear master.

In the first place, congratulations on your seventieth year, which seems more robust to me than the twentieth of a good many others! What a Herculean constitution you have! Bathing in an icy stream is a proof of strength that bewilders me, and is a mark of a “reserve force” that is reassuring to your friends. May you live long. Take care of yourself for your dear grandchildren, for the good Maurice, for me too, for all the world, and I should add: for literature, if I were not afraid of your superb disdain.

Ha! good! again the hunting horn! The man is mad. I want to go and find the rural guard.

As for me, I do not share your disdain, and I am absolutely ignorant of, as you say, “the pleasure of doing nothing.” As soon as I no longer hold a book, or am not dreaming of writing one, A LAMENTABLE boredom seizes upon me. Life, in short seems tolerable to me only by legerdemain. Or else one must give oneself up to disordered pleasure ... and even then!

Well, I have finished with le Sexe faible, which will be played, at least so Carvalho promises, in January, if Sardou’s l’Oncle Sam is permitted by the censorship; if otherwise, it will be in November.

As I have been accustomed during the last six weeks to seeing things from a theatrical point of view, to thinking in dialogue, here I am starting to build the plot of another play! It will be called le Candidat. My written plot is twenty pages long. But I haven’t anyone to show it to. Alas! I shall therefore leave it in a drawer and start at my old book. I am reading l’Histoire de la Medecine by Daremberg, which amuses me a great deal, and I have finished l’Essai sur les facultes de l’entendement by Gamier, which I think very silly. There you have my occupations. THINGS seem to be getting quieter. I breathe again.

I don’t know whether they talk as much of the Shah in Nohant as they do around here. The enthusiasm has been immense. A little more and they would have proclaimed him Emperor. His sojourn in Paris has had, on the commercial shop-keeping and artisan class, a monarchical effect which you would not have suspected, and the clerical gentlemen are doing very well, very well indeed!

On the other side of the horizon, what horrors they are committing in Spain! So that the generality of humanity continues to be charming.

CCLXI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croissset

Nohant, 30 August, 1873

Where are you to be found now? where are you nestled? As for me, I have just come from Auvergne with my whole household, Plauchut included. Auvergne is beautiful, above all it is pretty. The flora is always rich and interesting, the walking rough, the living accommodations poor. I got through it all very well, except for the elevation of two thousand meters at Sancy, which combining an icy wind with a burning sun, laid me flat for four days with a fever. After that I got into the running again, and I am returning here to resume my river baths till the frost.

There was no more question of any work, of any literature at all, than if none of us had ever learned to read. The LOCAL POETS pursued me with books and bouquets. I pretended to be dead and was left in peace. I am square with them now that I am home, by sending a copy of something of mine, it doesn't matter what, in exchange. Ah! what lovely places I have seen and what strange volcanic combinations, where we ought to have heard your Saint-Antoine in a SETTING worthy of the subject! Of what use are these pleasures of vision, and how are these impressions transformed later? One does not know ahead, and, with time and the easy ways of life, everything is met with again and preserved.

What news of your play? Have you begun your book? Have you chosen a place to study? Do tell me what is becoming of my Cruchard, the Cruchard of my heart. Write to me even if only a word! Tell me that you still love us as I love you and as all of us here love you.

G. Sand

CCLXII. TO GEORGE SAND

Croissset, Friday, 5th September, 1873

On arriving here yesterday, I found your letter, dear good master. All is well with you then, God be praised!

I spent the month of August in wandering about, for I was in Dieppe, in Paris, in Saint-Gratien, in Brie, and in Beauce, hunting for a certain country that I had in mind, and I think that I have found it at last in the neighborhood of Houdan. But, before starting at my terrifying book, I shall make a last search on the road that goes from Loupe to Laigle. After that, good night.

The Vaudeville begins well. Carvalho up to now has been charming.

His enthusiasm is so strong even that I am not without anxieties.

One must remember the good Frenchmen who cried "On to Berlin," and then received such a fine drubbing.

Not only is the aforesaid Carvalho content with the le Sexe faible, but he wants me to write at once another comedy, the scenario of which I have shown him, and which he would like to produce a year from now. I don't think the thing is quite ready to be put into words. But on the other hand, I should like to be through with it before undertaking the story of my good men. Meanwhile, I am keeping on with my reading and note-taking.

You are not aware, doubtless, that they have forbidden Coetlogon's play formally, BECAUSE IT CRITICISED THE EMPIRE. That is the censorship's answer. As I have in the le Sexe faible a rather ridiculous general, I am not without forebodings. What a fine thing is Censorship! Axiom: All governments curse literature, power does not like another power.

When they forbade the playing of Mademoiselle La Quintinie, you were too stoical, dear master, or too indifferent. You should always protest against injustice and folly, you should bawl, froth at the mouth, and smash when you can. If I had been in your place with your authority, I should have made a grand row. I think too that Father Hugo was wrong in keeping quiet about le Roi s'amuse. He often asserts his personality on less legitimate occasions.

At Rouen they are having processions, but the effect is completely spoiled, and the result of it is deplorable for fusion! What a misfortune! Among the imbecilities of our times, that (fusion) is perhaps the greatest. I should not be surprised if we should see little Father Thiers again! On the other hand many Reds, from fear of the clerical reaction, have gone over to Bonapartism. One needs a fine dose of simplicity to keep any political faith.

Have you read the Antichrist? I find that indeed a beautiful book, aside from some faults of taste, some modern expressions applied to ancient things. Renan seems to me on the whole to have progressed. I passed all one evening recently with him and I thought him adorable.

CCLXIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croissset
Nohant, 3d October, 1873

The existence of Cruchard is a beautiful poem, so much in keeping, that I don't know if it is a fictitious biography or the copy for a real article done in good faith. I had to laugh a bit after the departure of all the Viardots (except Viardot) and the big Muscovite, who was charming although very much indisposed from time to time. He left very well and very gay, but regretting not to have been to see you. The truth is that he was ill just then. He has had a disordered stomach, like me, for some time. I get well by being moderate, and he does not! I excuse him; after these crises one is famished, and if it is because of an empty stomach that one has to fill up, he must be terribly famished. What a kind, excellent and worthy man! And what modest talent! Everyone adores him here and I give them the example. We adore you too, Cruchard of my heart. But you love your work better than your friends, and in that you are inferior to the real Cruchard, who at least adored our holy religion.

By the way, I think that we shall have Henry V. They tell me that I am seeing the dark side of things; I don't see anything, but I perceive the odor of sacristies that increases. If that should not last a long time, I should like our clerical bourgeois to undergo the scorn of those whose lands they have bought and whose titles they have taken. It would be a good thing.

What lovely weather in our country! I still go every day to dip into the cold rush of my little river and I feel better. I hope to resume tomorrow my work that has been absolutely abandoned for six months. Ordinarily, I take shorter holidays; but the flowering of the meadow saffron always warns me that it is time to begin grubbing again. Here it is, let us grub. Love me as I love you.

My Aurore, whom I have not neglected, and who is world: well, sends you a big kiss. Lina, Maurice send affection.

G. Sand

CCLXIV. TO GEORGE SAND

Croisset, Thursday

Whatever happens, Catholicism will receive a terrible blow, and if I were a devotee, I should spend my time before a crucifix saying: "Maintain the Republic for us, O my God!"

But THEY ARE AFRAID of the monarchy. Because of itself and because of the reaction which would follow. Public opinion is absolutely against it. The reports of messieurs the prefects are disquieting; the army is divided into Bonapartists and Republicans; the body of big business in Paris has pronounced against Henry V. Those are the bits of information that I bring back from Paris, where I have spent ten days. In a word, dear master, I think now that THEY will be swamped! Amen!

I advise you to read the pamphlet by Cathelineau and the one by Segur also. It is curious! The basis is clearly to be seen. Those people think they are in the XIIth century.

As for Cruchard, Carvalho asked him for some changes which he refused. (You know that sometimes Cruchard is not easy.) The aforesaid Carvalho finally realized that it was impossible to change anything in le Sexe faible without distorting the real idea of the play. But he is asking to play le Candidat first, it is not finished but it delights him — naturally. Then when the thing is finished, reviewed and corrected, perhaps he won't want it. In short, if after l'Oncle Sam, le Candidat is finished, it will be played. If not, it will be le Sexe faible.

However, I don't care, I am so eager to start my novel which will take me several years. And moreover, the theatrical style is beginning to exasperate me. Those little curt phrases, this continual scintillation irritates like seltzer water, which is pleasing at first but shortly seems like nasty water. Between now and January I am going to compose dialogues in the best manner possible, after that I am coming back to serious things.

I am glad to have diverted you a little with the biography of Cruchard. But I find it is hybrid and the character of Cruchard is not consistent! A man with such an executive ability does not have so many literary preoccupations. The archeology is superfluous. It belongs to another kind of ecclesiastics. Perhaps there is a transition that is lacking. Such is my humble criticism.

They had said in a theatrical bulletin that you were in Paris; I had a mistaken joy about it, dear good master whom I adore and whom I embrace.

CCLXV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Your poor old troubadour, just getting well from a cruel attack of rheumatism, during which he could not lie down, nor eat, nor dress without aid, is at last up again. He suffered liver trouble, jaundice, rash, fever, in short he was fit to be thrown out on a pile of rubbish.

Here he is up again, very feeble, but able to write a few lines and to say with you AMEN to the buried catholic dictatorships; it is not even Catholics that they should be called, those people are not. They are only clericals.

I note today in the papers that they have played l'Oncle Sam. I hear that it is bad, but it may very well be a success all the same. I think that your play is surely postponed and Carvalho seems as capricious too, to me, as hard to put your finger on as other theatrical managers.

All Nohant embraces you and I embrace you even more, but I cannot write any more.

G. Sand Monday

Hard work? When indeed can I start at it? I am NO GOOD.

CCLXVI. TO GEORGE SAND*January, 1874

As I have a quiet moment, I am going to profit by it by talking a little with you, dear good master! And first of all, embrace for me all your family and accept all my wishes for a Happy New Year!

This is what is happening now to your Father Cruchard.

Cruchard is very busy, but serene and very calm, which surprises everybody. Yes, that's the way it is. No indignations, no boiling over. The rehearsals of le Candidat have begun, and the thing will be on the boards the first of February. Carvalho seems to me very satisfied with it! Nevertheless he has insisted on my combining two acts in one, which makes the first act inordinately long.

I did this work in two days, and Cruchard has been splendid! He slept seven hours in all, from Thursday morning (Christmas Day) to Saturday, and he is only the better for it.

Do you know what I am going to do to complete my ecclesiastical character? I am going to be a godfather. Madame Charpentier in her enthusiasm for Saint-Antoine came to beg me to give the name Antoine to the child that she is expecting! I refused to inflict on this young Christian the name of such an agitated man, but I had to accept the honor that was done me. Can you see my old top-knot by the baptismal font, beside the chubby-cheeked baby, the nurse and the relatives? O civilization, such are your blows! Good manners, such are your exactions!

I went on Sunday to the civic funeral of Francois-Victor Hugo. What a crowd! and not a cry, not the least bit of disorder! Days like that are bad for Catholicism. Poor father Hugo (whom I could not help embracing) was very broken, but stoical.

What do you think of le Figaro, which reproached him for wearing at his son's funeral, "a soft hat"?

As for politics, a dead calm. The Bazaine trial is ancient history. Nothing shows better the contemporary demoralization than the pardon granted to this wretched creature! Besides, the right of pardon if one departs from theology is a denial of justice. By what right can a man prevent the accomplishment of the law?

The Bonapartists should have let this alone; but not at all: they defended him bitterly, out of hatred for the 4th of September. Why do all the parties regard themselves as having joint interests with the rascals who exploit them? It is because all parties are execrable, imbecile, unjust, blind! An example: the history of Azor (what a name!). He robbed the ecclesiastics. Never mind! the clericals consider themselves attacked.

As regards the church. I have read in full (which I never did before) Lamennais' Essai sur l'indifference. I know now, and thoroughly, all the great buffoons who had a disastrous influence on the XIXth century. To establish common sense or the prevailing mode and custom as the criterion of certitude, that is preparing the way for universal suffrage, which is, to my way of thinking, the shame of human kind.

I have just read also, la Chretienne by the Abbe Bautain. A curious book for a novelist. It smacks of its period of modern Paris. I gulped a volume by Garcin de Tassy on Hindustani literature, to get clean. One can breathe, at least, in that.

You see that your Father Cruchard is not entirely stupefied by the theatre. However, I haven't anything to complain of in the Vaudeville. Everyone there is polite and exact! How different from the Odeon!

Our friend Chennevieres is now our superior, since the theatres are in his division. The theatrical people are enchanted.

I see the Muscovite every Sunday. He is very well and like him better and better.

Saint-Antoine will be in galley proof at the end of January.

Adieu, dear master! When shall we meet? Nohant is very far away!
and

I am going to be, all this winter, very busy.

CCLXVII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

January, 1874

I am seized with a headache, but, although perfectly imbecile, I want to embrace you and thank you for having written to me on New Year's day. All Nohant loves you and smacks you, as they say in the country.

We wish you a magnificent success and we are glad that it is not to be at the cost of annoyances. However, that is hardly the way of the actors whom I have known, and at the Vaudeville I have found only those who were good natured. Have you a part for my friend Parade? And for Saint-Germain, who seemed to you idiotic one day when perhaps he had lunched too well, but who nevertheless is a fine addlepatte, full of sympathy and spirit. And with real talent!

I am not reading all these horrid things that you feed on so as to sense better apparently the good things with which you sandwich them. I have stopped laughing at human folly, I flee it and try to forget it. As for admiration, I am always ready, it is the healthiest regime by far, and too, I am glad to know that I shall soon read Saint-Antoine again.

Keep in touch with your play and don't get ill this hateful winter.

Your old troubadour who loves you.

G. Sand

CCLXVIII. TO GEORGE SAND

Saturday evening, 7th February, 1874

I have at last a moment to myself, dear master; now let us talk a little.

I knew through Tourgueneff that you were doing very well. That is the main thing. Now I am going to give you some news about that excellent Father Cruchard.

Yesterday I signed the final proof for Saint-Antoine. ...But the aforesaid old book will not be published until the first of April (like an April fool trick?) because of the translations. It is finished, I am not thinking any more about it! Saint-Antoine is relegated, as far as I am concerned, to the condition of a memory! However I do not conceal from you that I had a moment of great sadness when I looked at the first proof. It is hard to separate oneself from an old companion!

As for le Candidat, it will be played, I think, between the 20th and the 25th of this month. As that play gave me very little trouble and as I do not attach great importance to it, I am rather calm about the results of it.

Carvalho's leaving irritated and disturbed me for several days. But his successor Cormon is full of zeal. Up to now I have nothing but praise for him, as for all the others in fact. The people at the Vaudeville are charming. Your old troubadour, whom you picture agitated and always angry, is gentle as a lamb and even good natured! First I made all the changes that THEY wanted, and then THEY put back the original text. But of my own accord I have cut out what seemed to me too long, and it goes well, very well. Delannoy and Saint-Germain have excellent wigs and play like angels. I think it will be all right.

One thing vexes me. The censorship has ruined the role of a little legitimist ragamuffin, so that the play, conceived in the spirit of strict unpartisanship, has now to flatter the reactionaries: a result that distresses me. For I don't want to please the political passions of anyone, no matter who it may be, having, as you know, an essential hatred of all dogmatism, of all parties.

Well, the good Alexander Dumas has made the plunge! Here he is an Academician! I think him very modest. He must be to think himself honored by honors.

CCLXIX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 15 February, 1874

Everything is going well, and you are satisfied, my troubadour. Then we are happy here over your satisfaction and we are praying for success, and we are waiting impatiently Saint-Antoine so as to read it again. Maurice has had a cold which attacks him every other day. Lina and I are well, little girls superlatively so. Aurore learns everything with admirable facility and docility; that child is my life and ideal. I no longer enjoy anything except her progress. All my past, all that I have been able to acquire or to produce, has no value in my eyes unless it can profit her. If a certain portion of intelligence and goodness was granted to me, it is so that she may have a greater share. You have no children, be therefore a litterateur, an artist, a master; that is logical, that is your compensation, your happiness, and your strength. And do tell us that you are getting on, that seems to us the main thing in life. — And keep well, I think that these rehearsals which make you go to and fro are good for you.

We all embrace you fondly.

G. Sand

CCLXX. TO GEORGE SAND

Saturday evening, 28 February, 1874

Dear master,

The first performance of le Candidat is set for next Friday, unless it is Saturday, or perhaps Monday the 9th? It has been postponed by Delannoy's illness and by l'Oncle Sam, for we had to wait until the said Sam had come down to under fifteen hundred francs.

I think that my play will be very well given, that is all. For I have no idea about the rest of it, and I am very calm about the result, a state of indifference that surprises me greatly. If I were not harassed by people who ask me for seats, I should forget absolutely that I am soon to appear on the boards, and to expose myself, in spite of my great age, to the derision of the populace. Is it stoicism or fatigue?

I have been having and still have the grippe, the result of it for your Cruchard, is a general lassitude accompanied by a violent (or rather a profound) melancholy. While spitting and coughing beside my fire, I muse over my youth. I dream of all my dead friends, I wallow in blackness! Is it the result of a too great activity for the past eight months, or the radical absence of the feminine element in my life? But I have never felt more abandoned, more empty, more bruised. What you said to me (in your last letter) about your dear little girls moved me to the depths of my soul! Why haven't I that? I was born with all the affections, however! But one does not make one's destiny, one submits to it. I was cowardly in my youth, I had a fear of life! One pays for everything.

Let us speak of other things, it will be gayer.

H. M. the Emperor of all the Russias does not like the Muses. The censorship of the "autocrat of the north" had formally forbidden the transportation of Saint-Antoine, and the proofs were returned me from Saint Petersburg, last Sunday; the French edition even will be prohibited. That is quite a serious money loss to me. It would have taken very little for the French censorship to forbid my play. Our friend Chennevieres gave me a good boost. Except for him I should not be played. Cruchard does not please the temporal powers. Isn't it funny, this simple hatred of authority, of all government whatever, for art!

I am reading now books on hygiene. Oh! but they are comic! What assurance physicians have! what effrontery! what asses for the most part! I have just finished the Gaule poetique of Marchangy (the enemy of Beranger). This book gave me hysterics.

So as to retemper myself in something stronger, I reread the great, the most holy, the incomparable Aristophanes. There is a man, that fellow! What a world in which such work were produced!

CCLXXI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, March, 1874

Our two little girls cruelly ill with the grippe have taken up all my time, but I am following, in the papers, the course of your play. I would go to applaud it, my cherished Cruchard, if I could leave these dear little invalids. So it is on Wednesday that they are going to judge it. The jury may be good or stupid, one never knows!

I have started grubbing again after having rested from the long and successful novel published by the Revue. I shall send it to you when it is published in book form.

Don't you delay to give me the news on Thursday, I don't need to tell you that success and the lack of it prove nothing, and that it is a ticket in a lottery. It is agreeable to succeed; to a philosophical spirit it ought not to be very distressing to fail. As for me, without knowing the play, I predict a success on the first day. As for its continuance, that is always unknown and unforeseen from day to day.

We all embrace you very affectionately.

G. Sand

CCLXXII. TO GEORGE SAND

Thursday, one o'clock, 12 March, 1874

Speaking of FROSTS, this is one! People who want to flatter me insist that the play will do better before the real public, but I don't think so! I know the defects of my play better than anyone. If Carvalho had not, for a month, bored me to death with corrections that I have cut out, I would have made re-touches or perhaps changes which would perhaps have modified the final issue. But I was so disgusted with it that I would not have changed a line for a million francs. In a word, I am dished.

It must be said too that the hall was detestable, all fops and students who did not understand the material sense of the words. They made jokes of the poetical things. A poet says: "I am of 1830, I learned to read in Hernani, and I wanted to be Lara." Thereupon a burst of ironical laughter, etc.

And moreover I have fooled the public in regard to the title. They expected another Rabagas! The conservatives have been vexed because I did not attack the republicans. Similarly the communists would have liked some insults against the legitimists.

My actors played superbly, Saint-Germain among others; Delannoy who carries all the play, is distressed, and I don't know what to do to soften his grief. As for Cruchard, he is calm, very calm! He had dined very well before the performance, and after it he supped even better. Menu: two dozen oysters from Ostend, a bottle of champagne frappe, three slices of roast beef, a truffle salad, coffee and a chaser. Religion and the stomach sustain Cruchard.

I confess that I should have liked to make some money, but as my fall involves neither art nor sentiment I am profoundly unconcerned.

I tell myself: "well, it's over!" and I experience a feeling of freedom. The worst of it all is the scandal about the tickets. Observe that I had twelve orchestra seats and a box! (Le Figaro had eighteen orchestra seats and three boxes.) I did not even see the chief of the claque. One would say that the management of the Vaudeville had arranged for me to fail. Its dream is fulfilled.

I did not give away a quarter of the seats that I needed and I bought a great many for people who slandered me eloquently in the lobbies. The "bravos" of a devoted few were drowned at once by the "hushes." When they mentioned my name at the end, there was applause (for the man but not for the work) accompanied by two beautiful cat-calls from the gallery gods. That is the truth.

La Petite Presse of this morning is polite. I can ask no more of it. Farewell, dear good master, do not pity me, for I don't feel pitiable.

P. S. — A nice bit from my servant when he handed me your letter this morning. Knowing your handwriting, he said sighing: "Ah! the best one was not there last evening!" That is just what I think.

CCLXXIII TO GEORGE SAND

Wednesday, April, 1874

Thank you for your long letter about le Candidat. Now here are the criticisms that I add to yours: we ought to have: (1) lowered the curtain after the electoral meeting and put the entire half of the third act into the beginning of the fourth; (2) cut out the anonymous letter, which is unnecessary, since Arabelle informs Rousselin that his wife has a lover; (3) inverted the order of the scenes in the fourth act, that is to say, beginning with the announcement of the tryst between Madame Rousselin and Julien and, making Rousselin a little more jealous. The anxieties of his election turn him aside from his desire to go to entrap his wife. Not enough is made of the exploiters. There should be ten instead of three. Then, he gives his daughter. The end was there, and at the instant that he notices the blackguardism, he is elected. Then his dream is accomplished, but he feels no joy over it. In that manner there would have been moral progress.

I think, whatever you say about it, that the subject was good, but that I have spoiled it. Not one of the critics has shown me in what. But I know, and that consoles me. What do you think of La Rounat, who in his page implores me, "in the name of our old friendship," not to have my play printed, he thinks it so "silly and badly written"! A parallel between me and Gondinet follows.

The theatrical mystery is one of the funniest things of this age. One would say that the art of the theatre goes beyond the limits of human intelligence, and that it is a secret reserved for those who write like cab drivers. The QUESTION OF IMMEDIATE SUCCESS leads all others. It is the school of demoralization. If my play had been sustained by the management, it could have made money like another. Would it have been the better for that?

The Tentation is not doing badly. The first edition of two thousand copies is exhausted. Tomorrow the second will be published. I have been torn in pieces by the petty journals and praised highly by two or three persons. On the whole nothing serious has appeared yet, nor will appear, I think. Renan does not write any more (he says) in the Debats, and Taine is busy getting settled at Annecy.

I have been EXECRATED by the Messrs. Villemessant and Buloz, who will do all they can to be disagreeable to me. Villemessant reproaches me for not “having been killed by the Prussians.” All that is nauseous!

And you beg me not to notice human folly, and to deprive myself of the pleasure of depicting it! But the comic is the only consolation of virtue. There is, moreover, a manner of taking it which is elevated; that is what I am aiming at with two good people. Don’t fear that they are too realistic! I am afraid, on the contrary, that it may seem beyond the bounds of possibility, for I shall push the idea to the limit. This little work that I shall start in six weeks will keep me busy for four or five years!

CCLXXIV. TO GEORGE SAND

April, 1874

As it would have necessitated a STRUGGLE, and as Cruchard has lawsuits in horror, I have withdrawn my play on the payment of five thousand francs, so much the worse! I will not have my actors hissed! The night of the second performance when I saw Delannoy come back into the wings with his eyes wet, I felt myself a criminal and said to myself: “Enough.” (Three persons affect me: Delannoy, Tourgueneff and my servant!) In short, it is over. I am printing my play, you will get it towards the end of the week.

I am jumped on on all sides! le Figaro and le Rappel; it is complete! Those people to whom I lent money or for whom I did favors call me an idiot. I have never had less nerves. My stoicism (or pride) surprises myself even, and when I look for the causes, I ask myself, dear master, if you are not one of them.

I recall the first night of Villemer, which was a triumph, and the first night of Don Juan de Village, which was a failure. You do not know how much I admired you on those two occasions! The dignity of your character (a thing rarer still than genius) edified me! and I formulated within myself this prayer: “Oh! how I wish I could be like her, on a similar occasion.” Who knows, perhaps your example has sustained me? Forgive the comparison! Well, I don’t bat an eye-lid. That is the truth.

But I confess to regretting the THOUSANDS OF FRANCS which I should have made. My little milk-jug is broken. I should have liked to renew the furniture at Croisset, fooled again!

My dress rehearsal was deadly! Every reporter in Paris! They made fun of it all. I shall underline in your copy, all the passages that they seized on. Yesterday and the day before they did not seize on them any more. Oh! well, so much the worse! It is too late. Perhaps the PRIDE of Cruchard has killed it.

And they have written articles on MY dwellings, my SLIPPERS, my DOG. The chroniclers have described my apartment where they saw "on the walls, pictures and bronzes." But there is nothing at all on the walls! I know that one critic was enraged because I did not go to see him; and a third person came to tell me so this morning, adding: "What do you want me to tell him?...But Messieurs Dumas, Sardou and even Victor Hugo are not like you. — Oh! I know it! — Then you are not surprised, etc."

Farewell, dear good adored master, friendly regards to yours.
Kisses to the dear little girls, and all my love to you.

P.S. Could you give me a copy or the original of Cruchard's biography; I have no draft of it and I want to reread it to freshen up MY IDEAL.

CCLXXV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croissset Nohant, 10 April, 1874

Those who say that I do not think Saint-Antoine beautiful! and excellent, lie about it, I do not need to tell you. Let me ask you how I could have confided in the Levy clerks whom I do not know! I remember, as for Levy himself, saying to him last summer, that I found the thing superb and first class.

I would have done an article for you if I had not already refused Maurice recently, to do one about Hugo's Quatre-vingt-treize. I said that I was ill. The fact is, that I do not know how to DO ARTICLES, and I have done so many of them for Hugo that I have exhausted my subject. I wonder why he has never done any for me; for, really, I am no more of a journalist than he is, and I need his support much more than he needs mine.

On the whole, articles are not of any use, now, no more than are friends at the theatre. I have told you that it is the struggle of one against all, and the mystery, if there is one, is to turn on an electric current. The subject then is very important in the theatre. In a novel, one has time to win the reader over. What a difference! I do not say as you do that there is nothing mysterious in that. Yes, indeed, there is something very mysterious in one respect: namely that one can not judge of one's effect beforehand, and that the shrewdest are mistaken ten times out of fifteen. You say yourself that you have been mistaken. I am at work now on a play; it is not possible to know if I am mistaken or not. And when shall I know? The day after the first performance, if I have it performed, which is not certain. There is no fun in anything except work that has not been read to any one. All the rest is drudgery and PROFESSIONAL BUSINESS, a horrible thing. So make fun of all this GOSSIP; the guiltiest ones are those who report it to you. I think it is very odd that they say so much against you to your friends. No one indeed ever says anything to me: they know that I would not allow it. Be valiant and CONTENT since Saint-Antoine is doing well and selling better. What difference does it make if they cut you up in this or that paper? In former times it meant something; in these days, nothing. The public is not the public of other days, and journalism has not the least literary influence. Every one is a critic and forms his own opinions. They never write articles about my novels. That doesn't make any difference to me.

I embrace you and we love you.

Your old troubadour.

CCLXXVI. TO GEORGE SAND

Friday evening, 1st May, 1874

Things are progressing, dear master, insults are accumulating! It is a concerto, a symphony in which each one is intent on his own instrument. I have been cut up beginning le Figaro up to la Revue des Deux Mondes, including la Gazette de France and le Constitutionnel. And THEY have not finished yet! Barbey d'Aurevilly has insulted me personally, and the good Saint-Rene Taillandier, who declares me "unreadable," attributes ridiculous words to me. So much for printing. As for speech, it is in accord. Saint-Victor (is it servility towards Michel Levy) rends me at the Brabant dinner, as does that excellent Charles Edmond, etc. On the other hand I am admired by the professors of the Faculty of Theology at Strasbourg, by Renan, and by the cashier at my butcher's! not to mention some others. There is the truth.

What surprises me, is that under several of these criticisms there is a HATRED against me, against me personally, a deliberate slandering, the cause of which I am seeking. I do not feel hurt, but this avalanche of foolishness saddens me. One prefers inspiring good feelings to bad ones. As for the rest, I am not thinking any more about Saint-Antoine. That is over with!

I shall start, this summer, another book of about the same calibre; after that I shall return to the novel pure and simple. I have in my head two or three to write before I die. Just now I am spending my days at the Library, where I am accumulating notes. In a fortnight, I shall return to my house in the fields. In July I shall go to get rid of my congestion on the top of a Swiss mountain, obeying the advice of Doctor Hardy, the man who called me “a hysterical woman,” a saying that I consider profound.

The good Tourgueneff is leaving next week for Russia, his trip will forcibly interrupt his frenzy for pictures, for our friend never leaves the auction rooms now! He is a man with a passion, so much the better for him!

I missed you very much at Madame Viardot’s a fortnight ago. She sang Iphigenie en Aulide. I can not tell you how beautiful it was, how transporting, in short how sublime. What an artist that woman is! What an artist! Such emotions console one for life.

Well! and you, dear good master, that play that they talk about, is it finished? You are going to fall back into the theatre! I pity you! After having put dogs on the boards at the Odeon, perhaps they are going to ask you to put on horses! That is where we are now!

And all the household, from Maurice to Fadet, how is it?

Kiss the dear little girls for me and let them return it to you from me.

Your old friend.

CCLXXVII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 4th May, 1874

Let them say what they like, Saint-Antoine is a masterpiece, a magnificent book. Ridicule the critics, they are blockheads. The present century does not like lyricism. Let us wait for the reaction, it will come for you, and a splendid one. Rejoice in your insults, they are great promises for the future.

I am working still on my play, I don't at all know if it is worth anything and don't worry about it. I shall be told that when it is finished, and if it does not seem interesting I shall lock it up. It will have amused me for six weeks, that is the most certain thing for us about our profession.

Plauchut is the joy of the salons! happy old man! always content with himself and with others; that makes him as good as an angel, I forgive him all his graces.

You were happy at hearing the Diva Paulita, we had her, with Iphigenie, for two weeks in Nohant last autumn. Ah! yes, there is beauty and grandeur! Try to come to see us before going to Croisset, you would make us happy.

We all love you and all my dear world embraces you with a GREAT GOOD

HEART.

Your old troubadour always,

G. Sand

CCLXXVIII. TO GEORGE SAND

Croisset, Tuesday, 26th March, 1874

Dear good master,

Here I am back again in my solitude! But I shall not remain in it long, for, in a short month, I shall go to spend three weeks on the Righi, so as to breathe a bit, to relax myself, to deneurasthenize myself! It is a long time since I took the air, I am tired. I need a little rest. After that I shall start at my big book which will take at least four years. It will have that good quality!

Le Sexe faible which was accepted at the Vaudeville Carvalho, was returned to me by the said Vaudeville and returned also by Perrin, who thinks the play off-color and unconventional. "Putting a cradle and a nurse on the French stage!" Think of it! Then, I took the thing to Duquesnel who has not yet (naturally) given me any answer. How far the demoralization which the theatres bring about extends! The bourgeois of Rouen, my brother included, have been talking to me of the failure of le Candidat in hushed voices (sic) and with a contrite air, as if I had been taken to the assizes under an accusation of forgery. NOT TO SUCCEED IS A CRIME and success is the criterion of well doing. I think that is grotesque in a supreme degree.

Now explain to me why they put mattresses under certain falls and thorns under others? Ah! the world is funny, and it seems chimerical to me to want to regulate oneself according to its opinion.

The good Tourgueneff must be now in Saint Petersburg; he sent me a favorable article on Saint-Antoine from Berlin. It is not the article, but he, that has given me pleasure. I saw him a great deal this winter, and I love him more and more. I saw a good deal of father Hugo who is (when the political gallery is absent) a charming, good fellow.

Was not the fall of the Broglie ministry pleasing to you? Very much so to me! but the next! I am still young enough to hope that the next Chamber will bring us a change for the better. However?

Ah, confound it! how I want to see you and talk a long time with you! Everything is poorly arranged in this world. Why not live with those one loves? The Abbey of Theleme [Footnote: Cf. Rabelais' Gargantua.] is a fine dream, but nothing but a dream. Embrace warmly the dear little girls for me, and entirely yours.

R. P. Cruchard

More Cruchard than ever. I feel like a good-for-nothing, a cow, damned, antique, deliquescent, in short calm and moderate, which is the last term in decadence.

CCLXXIX. TO GEORGE SAND

Kalt-Bad. Righi. Friday, 3d July, 1874

Is it true, dear master, that last week you came to Paris? I went through it to go to Switzerland, and I read "in a sheet" that you had been to see les Deux Orphelines, had taken a walk in the Bois de Boulogne, had dined at Magny's, etc.; all of which goes to prove that, thanks to the freedom of the Press, one is not master of one's own actions. Whence it results that Father Cruchard is wrathful with you for not having advised him of your presence in the "new Athens." It seems to me that people are sillier and flatter there than usual. The state of politics has become drivel! They have tickled my ears with the return of the Empire. I don't believe in it! However... We should have to expatriate ourselves then. But how and where?

Is it for a play that you came? I pity you for having anything to do with Duquesnel! He had the manuscript of le Sexe faible returned to me by an agent of the theatrical management, without a word of explanation, and in the ministerial envelope was a letter from an underclerk, which is a gem! I will show it to you. It is a masterpiece of impertinence! People do not write in that way to a Carpentras urchin, offering a skit to the Beaumarchais theatre.

It is that very play le Sexe faible that, last year, Carvalho was so enthusiastic about! Now no one wants it any more for Perrin thinks it unconventional to put on the boards of the Theatre Francais, a nurse and a cradle. Not knowing what to do with it, I have taken it to the Cluny Theatre.

Ah! my poor Bouilhet did well to die! But I think that the Odeon could show more respect for his posthumous work.

Without believing in an Holbachic conspiracy, I think that they have been knocking me a bit too much of late; and they are so indulgent towards certain others.

The American HARRISSE maintained to me the other day that Saint-Simon wrote badly. At that I burst out and talked to him in such a way that he will never more before me belch his idiocy. It was at dinner at the Princess's; my violence cast a chill.

You see that your Cruchard continues not to listen to jokes on religion! He does not become calm! quite the contrary!

I have just read la Creation naturelle by Haeckel, a pretty book, pretty book! Darwinism seems to me to be better expounded there than in the books of Darwin himself.

The good Tourgueneff has sent me news from the depths of Scythia. He has found the information he wanted for a book that he is going to do. The tone of his letter is frivolous, from which I conclude that he is well. He will return to Paris in a month.

A fortnight ago I made a little trip to Lower Normandy, where I have found at last a neighborhood suitable to place my two good men. It will be between the valley of the Orne and the valley of the Auge. I shall have to return there several times.

Beginning with September, then, I shall start that hard task! it makes me afraid, and I am overwhelmed by it in advance.

As you know Switzerland, it is useless for me to talk to you of it, and you would scorn me if I were to tell you that I am bored to extinction here. I came here obediently because they ordered me to, for the purpose of bleaching my face and calming my nerves! I don't think that the remedy will be efficacious; anyhow it has been deadly boring to me. I am not a man of nature, and I do not understand anything in a country where there is no history. I would give all these glaciers for the Vatican Museum. One can dream there. Well, in three weeks I shall be glued to my green table! in a humble refuge, where it seems to me you never want to come!

CCLXXX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 6th July, 1874 (Yesterday, seventy years.)

I was in Paris from the 30th of May to the 10th of June, you were not there. Since my return here, I have been ill with the grippe, rheumatic, and often absolutely deprived of the use of my right arm. I have not the courage to stay in bed: I spend the evening with my children and I forget my little miseries which will pass; everything passes. That is why I was not able to write to you, even to thank you for the good letter which you wrote to me about my novel. In Paris I was overwhelmed by fatigue. That is the way I am growing old, and now I am beginning to feel it; I am not more often ill, now, illness PROSTRATES me more. That is nothing, I have not the right to complain, being well loved and well cared for in my nest. I urge Maurice to go about without me, since my strength is not equal to going with him. He leaves tomorrow for Cantal with a servant, a tent, a lamp, and a quantity of utensils to examine the MICROS of his entomological DIVISION I am telling him that you are bored on the Righi. He cannot understand it.

The 7th

I am taking up my letter again, begun yesterday; I still find it very hard to move my pen, and even at this moment, I have a pain in my side, and I cannot...

Till tomorrow.

The 8th

At last, I shall be able perhaps today: for I am furious to think that perhaps you are accusing me of forgetting you, when I am prevented by weakness that is entirely physical, in which my affections count for nothing. You tell me that they KNOCK you too much. I read only le Temps and it is a good deal for me even to open a paper to see about what it is talking. You ought to do as I do and IGNORE criticism when it is not serious, and even when it is. I have never been able to see what good it is to the author criticised. Criticism always starts from a personal point of view, the authority of which the artist does not recognize. It is because of that usurpation of powers in the intellectual order of things, that people get to discussing the Sun and the Moon; but that does not prevent them in the least from showing us their good tranquil faces.

You do not want to be a man of nature, so much the worse for you! therefore you attach too much importance to the details of human things, and you do not tell yourself that there is in you a NATURAL force that defies the IFS and the BUTS of human prattle. We are of nature, in nature, by nature, and for nature. Talent, will, genius, are natural phenomena like the lake, the volcano, the mountain, the wind, the star, the cloud. What man dabbles in is pretty or ugly, ingenious or stupid; what he gets from nature is good or bad; but it is, it exists and subsists. One should not ask from the jumble of appreciation called CRITICISM, what one has done and what one wants to do. Criticism does not know anything about it; its business is to gossip.

Nature alone knows how to speak to the intelligence in a language that is imperishable, always the same, because it does not depart from the eternally true, the absolutely beautiful. The hard thing, when one travels, is to find nature, because man has arranged it everywhere and has almost spoiled it everywhere; probably it is because of that that you are bored, it is because it is disguised and travestied everywhere. However, the glaciers are still intact, I presume.

But I cannot write further, I must tell you quickly that I love you, that I embrace you affectionately. Give me news of yourself. I hope to be on my feet in a few days. Maurice is waiting until I am robust before he goes: I am hurrying as much as I can! My little girls embrace you, they are superb. Aurore is devoted to mythology (George Cox, Baudry translation). You know that? An adorable work for children and parents. Enough, I can no more. I love you; don't have black ideas, and resign yourself to being bored if the air is good there.

CCLXXXI. TO GEORGE SAND

Righi, 14 July, 1874;

What? ill? poor, dear master! If it is rheumatism, do as my brother does, who in his character of physician, scarcely believes in medicine. Last year he went to the baths at Aix in Savoy, and in two weeks he was cured of the pains that had tormented him for six years. But to do that you would have to move, to resign your habits, Nohant and the dear little girls. You will remain at home and YOU WILL BE WRONG. You ought to take care of yourself ... for those who love you.

And as regard this, you send me, in your last letter, a horrid thing. Could I, for my part, suspect you of forgetting Cruchard! Come now, I have, first of all, too much vanity and next, too much faith in you.

You don't tell me how your play is getting on at the Odeon.

Speaking of plays, I am going again to expose myself to insults of the populace and the penny-a-liners. The manager of the Cluny Theatre, to whom I took le Sexe faible, has written me an admiring letter and is disposed to put on that play in October. He is reckoning on a great money success. Well, so be it! But I am recalling the enthusiasm of Carvalho, followed by an absolute chill! and all that increases my scorn for the so-called shrewd people who pretend to know all about things. For, in short, there is a dramatic work, declared by the managers of the Vaudeville and the Cluny "perfect," by the Theatre Francais "unplayable," and by the manager of the Odeon "in need of rewriting from one end to the other." Draw a conclusion now! and listen to their advice! Never mind, as these four gentlemen are the masters of your destinies because they have the money, and as they have more mind than you, never having written a line, you must believe them and submit to them.

It is a strange thing how much pleasure imbeciles find in floundering about in the work of another! in cutting it, correcting it, playing the pedagogue! Did I tell you that I was, because of that, very much at odds with a certain *****. He wanted to make over, sometime ago, a novel that I had recommended to him, which was not very good, but of which he is incapable of turning the least phrase. And I did not hide from him my opinion about him; inde irae. However, it is impossible for me to be so modest as to think that that good Pole is better than I am in French prose. And you want me to remain calm! dear master! I have not your temperament! I am not like you, always soaring above the miseries of this world. Your Cruchard is as sensitive as if he were divested of skin. And imbecility, self-sufficiency, injustice exasperate him more and more. Thus the ugliness of the Germans who surround me shuts off the view of the Righi!!! Zounds! What mugs!

God be thanked, “of my horrible sight I purge their States.”

CCLXXXII. TO GEORGE SAND

Saturday, 26 September, 1874

Then, after having been bored like an ass on the top of the Righi, I returned home the first of August and started my book. The beginning was not easy, it was even “direful,” and “methought” I should die of despair; but now things are going, I am all right, come what may! But one needs to be absolutely mad to undertake such a book. I fear that, by its very conception, it is radically impossible. We shall see, Ah! supposing I should carry it out well ... what a dream.

You doubtless know that once more I am exposing myself to the storms of the footlights (pretty metaphor) and that “braving the publicity of the theatre” I shall appear upon the boards of Cluny, probably, towards the end of December. The manager of that “little theatre” is enchanted with le Sexe faible. But so was Carvalho, which did not prevent him ... You know the rest.

Of course every one blames me for letting my play be given in such a joint. But since the others do not want that play and since I insist that it shall be presented to make a few sous for the Bouilhet heirs, I am forced to pass that over. I am keeping two or three pretty anecdotes about this to tell you when we meet. Why is the theatre such a general cause of delirium? Once one is on that ground, ordinary conditions are changed. If one has had the misfortune (slight) not to succeed, friends turn from one. They are very inconsiderate of one. They never salute one! I swear to you on my word of honor that that happened to me on account of le Candida. I do not believe in Holbachic conspiracies, but all that they have done to me since March amazes me. But, I decidedly don't bat an optic, and the fate of le Sexe faible disturbs me less than the least of the phrases of my novel.

Public intelligence seems to me to get lower and lower! To what depth of imbecility shall we descend? Belot's last book sold eight thousand copies in two weeks. Zola's Conquete de Plassans, seventeen hundred in six months, and there was an article about it. All the Monday-morning idiots have just been swooning away about M. Scribe's Une Chaine. France is ill, very ill, whatever they say; and my thoughts are more and more the color of ebony.

However, there are some pretty comic elements: (1) the Bazaine escape with the episode of the sentinel; (2) l'Histoire d'un Diamant by Paul de Musset (see the Revue des Deux Mondes for September); (3) the vestibule of the former establishment of Nadar near Old England [sic], where one can contemplate a life-size photograph of Alexander Dumas.

I am sure that you are finding me grouchy and that you are going to answer me: "What difference does all that make?" But everything makes a difference, and we are dying of humbug, of ignorance, of self-confidence, of scorn of grandeur, of love of banality, and imbecile babble.

"Europe which hates us, looks at us and laughs," said Ruy Blas. My Heavens, she has a right to laugh.

CCLXXXIII TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 5th November, 1874

What, my Cruchard, you have been ill? That is what I feared, I who live in the woes of indigestion and yet hardly work at all, I am disquieted at your kind of life, the excess of intellectual expenditure and the seclusion. In spite of the charm that I have proved and appreciated at Croisset, I fear for you that solitude where you have no longer anyone to remind you that you must eat, drink and sleep, and above all walk. Your rainy climate makes you keep to the house. Here, where it does not rain enough, we are at least hustled out of doors by the beautiful warm sun and that Phoebus invigorates us, while our Phoebus-Apollo murders us.

But I am always talking to you as to a Cruchard philosophic and detached from his personality, to a Cruchard fanatical about literature and drunk with production. When, then, shall you be able to say to yourself: Lo! this is the time for rest, let us taste the innocent pleasure of living for life's sake, of watching with amazement the agitations of others and of not giving to them anything except the excess of our overflow. It does one good to ruminate over what one has assimilated in life, sometimes without attention and without discrimination.

Old friendships sustain us and all at once they distress us. I have just lost my poor blind Duvernet, whom you have seen at our house. He expired very quietly without suspecting it and without suffering. There is another great void about us and my nephew, the substitute, has been nominated for Chateauroux. His mother has followed him.

So we are all alone. Happily we love one another so much that we can live like that, but not without regret for the absent ones. Plauchut left us yesterday to return at Christmas. Maurice is already at work preparing a splendid performance of marionettes for us. And you, if you are in Paris, won't you come to keep the Christmas Eve revels with us? You will have finished your rehearsals, you will have had a success, perhaps you will be in the mood to return to material life, eating truffles?

Tell us about yourself, do not be ill, always love your old troubadour and his people who love you too.

CCLXXXIV. TO GEORGE SAND

Wednesday, 2nd December, 1874

I am having remorse about you. It is a crime to let so long a time elapse without answering such a letter as your last. I was waiting to write to you until I had something definite to tell you about le Sexe faible. What is definite is that I took it away from the Cluny a week ago. The cast that Weinschenk proposed to me was odiously stupid and he did not keep the promises that he made. But, God be thanked, I withdrew in time. At present my play has been offered to the Gymnase. No news up to now from Montigny.

I am worrying like five hundred devils about my book, asking myself sometimes if I am not mad to have undertaken it. But, like Thomas Diafoirus, I am stiffening myself against the difficulties of execution which are frightful. I need to learn a heap of things about which I am ignorant. In a month I hope to finish with the agriculture and the gardening, and I shall only then be at the second third of my first chapter.

Speaking of books, do read Fromont et Risler, by my friend Daudet, and les Diaboliques, by my enemy Barbey d'Aurevilly. You will writhe with laughter. It is perhaps owing to the perversity of my mind, which likes unhealthy things, but the latter work seemed to me extremely amusing; it is the last word in the involuntary grotesque. In other respects, dead calm, France is sinking gently like a rotten hulk, and the hope of salvage, even for the staunchest, seems chimerical. You need to be here, in Paris, to have an idea of the universal depression, of the stupidity, of the decrepitude in which we are floundering.

The sentiment of that agony penetrates me and I am sad enough to die. When I am not torturing myself about my work, I am groaning about myself. That is the truth. In my leisure moments, all I do is to think of the dead, and I am going to say a very pretentious thing to you. No one understands me; I belong to another world. The men of my profession are so little of my profession! There is hardly anyone except Victor Hugo with whom I can talk of what interests me. Day before yesterday he recited by heart to me from Boileau and from Tacitus. That was like a gift to me, the thing is so rare. Moreover, the days when there are not politicians at his house, he is an adorable man.

CCLXXXV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croissset Nohant, 8th December, 1874

Poor dear friend,

I love you all the more because you are growing more unhappy. How you torment yourself, and how you disturb yourself about life! for all of which you complain, is life; it has never been better for anyone or in any time. One feels it more or less, one understands it more or less, one suffers with it more or less, and the more one is in advance of the age one lives in, the more one suffers. We pass like shadows on a background of clouds which the sun seldom pierces, and we cry ceaselessly for the sun which can do no more for us. It is for us to clear away our clouds.

You love literature too much; it will destroy you and you will not destroy the imbecility of the human race. Poor dear! imbecility, that, for my part, I do not hate, that I regard with maternal eyes: for it is a childhood and all childhood is sacred. What hatred you have devoted to it! what warfare you wage on it!

You have too much knowledge and intelligence, you forget that there is something above art: namely, wisdom, of which art at its apogee is only the expression. Wisdom comprehends all: beauty, truth, goodness, enthusiasm, in consequence. It teaches us to see outside of ourselves, something more elevated than is in ourselves, and to assimilate it little by little, through contemplation and admiration.

But I shall not succeed in changing you. I shall not even succeed in making you understand how I envisage and how I lay hold upon HAPPINESS, that is to say, the acceptance of life whatever it may be! There is one person who could change you and save you, that is father Hugo; for he has one side on which he is a great philosopher, while at the same time he is the great artist that you require and that I am not. You must see him often. I believe that he will quiet you: I have not enough tempest in me now for you to understand me. As for him, I think that he has kept his thunderbolts and that he has all the same acquired the gentleness and the compassion of age.

See him, see him often and tell him your troubles, which are great, I see that, and which turn too much to spleen. You think too much of the dead, you think that they have too soon reached their rest. They have not. They are like us, they are searching. They labor in the search.

Every one is well, and embraces you. As for me, I do not get well, but I have hopes, well or not, to keep on still so as to bring up my grandchildren, and to love you as long as I have a breath left.

G. Sand

1875

CCLXXXVI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset
Nohant, 16th January, 1875

I too, dear Cruchard, embrace you at the New Year, and wish that you may have a tolerable one, since you do not care to hear the myth happiness spoken of. You admire my serenity; it does not come from my depths, it comes from my necessity of thinking only of others. There is but a little time left, old age creeps on and death is pushing me by the shoulders.

I am as yet, if not necessary, at least extremely useful, and I shall go on as long as I have a breath, thinking, talking, working for them.

Duty is the master of masters, it is the real Zeus of modern times, the son of Time, and has become his master. It is that which lives and acts outside of all the agitations of the world. It does not reason, does not discuss. It examines without fear, it walks without looking behind it; Cronos, the stupid, swallowed stones, Zeus breaks them with the lightning, and the lightning is the will. I am not a philosopher, I am a servant of Zeus, who takes away half of their souls from slaves, but who leaves them entire to the brave.

I have no more leisure to think of myself, to dream of discouraging things, to despair of human-kind, to look at my past sorrows and joys and to summon death.

Mercy! If one were an egoist, one would see it approach with joy; it is so easy to sleep in nothingness, or to awaken in a better life! for it opens these two hypotheses, or to express it better, this antithesis.

But, for the one who must continue working, death must not be summoned before the hour when exhaustion opens the doors of liberty. You have had no children. It is the punishment of those who wish to be too independent; but that suffering is nevertheless a glory for those who vow themselves to Apollo. Then do not complain for having to grub, and describe your martyrdom to us; there is a fine book to be written about that.

You say that Renan is despairing; for my part, I don't believe that: I believe that he is suffering as are all those who look high and far ahead; but he ought to have strength in proportion to his vision. Napoleon shares his ideas, he does well if he shares them all. He has written me a very wise and good letter. He now sees relative safety in a wise republic, and I, too, think it still possible. It will be very bourgeois and not very ideal, but one has to begin at the beginning. We artists have no patience at all. We want the Abbey of Theleme at once; but before saying, "Do what you want!" one must go through with "Do what you can!" I love you and I embrace you with all my heart, my dear Polycarp. My children large and small join with me.

Come now, no weakness! We all ought to be examples to our friends, our neighbors, our fellow citizens. And how about me, don't you think that I need help and support in my long task that is not yet finished? Don't you love anyone, not even your old troubadour, who still sings, and often weeps, but who conceals himself when he weeps, as cats do when they die?

CCLXXXVII. TO GEORGE SAND

Paris, Saturday evening

Dear master,

I curse once more THE DRAMATIC MANIA and the pleasure that certain people have in announcing remarkable news! Someone had told me that you were VERY ill. Your good handwriting came to reassure me yesterday morning, and this morning I have received the letter from Maurice, so the Lord be praised!

What to tell you about myself? I am not stiff, I have ... I don't know what. Bromide of potassium has calmed me and given me eczema on the middle of my forehead.

Abnormal things are going on inside me. My psychic depression must relate to some hidden cause. I feel old, used up, disgusted with everything, and others bore me as I do myself.

However, I am working, but without enthusiasm: as one does a stint, and perhaps it is the work that makes me ill, for I have undertaken a senseless book.

I lose myself in the recollections of my childhood like an old man ... I do not expect anything further in life than a succession of sheets of paper to besmear with black. It seems to me that I am crossing an endless solitude to go I don't know where. And it is I who am at the same time the desert, the traveller, and the camel.

I spent the afternoon today at the funeral of Amedee Achard. The Protestant ceremonies were as inane as if they had been Catholic. ALL PARIS and the reporters were there in force!

Your friend, Paul Meurice, came a week ago to ask me to "do the Salon" in le Rappel. I declined the honor, for I do not admit that anyone can criticise an art of which he does not know the technique!

And then, what use is so much criticism!

I am reasonable. I go out every day, I exercise, and I come home tired, and still more irritated, that is the good I get out of it. In short, your troubadour (not very troubadourish) has become a sad bonehead.

It is in order not to bore you with my complaints that I write so rarely to you now, for no one has a livelier sense than I of my unbearableness.

Send me Flammarande; that will give me a little air.

I embrace you all, and especially you, dear master, so great, so strong, and so gentle. Your Cruchard, who is more and more cracked, if cracked is the right word, for I perceive that the contents are escaping.

CCLXXXVIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT 20th February

Then you are quite ill, dear old fellow? I am not worried about it, since it concerns only nerves and rheumatisms, and I have lived seventy years with all that nuisance in my body, and I am still healthy. But I am sad to know that you are bored, suffering, and your spirit turned to darkness as it necessarily is when one is ill.

I was sure that a moment would come when someone would prescribe walking to you. All your illness comes from the lack of exercise, a man of your strength and your complexion ought to have lived an athletic life.

Don't sulk then about the very wise order that condemns you to an hour's walk each day.

You fancy that the work of the spirit is only in the brain, you are very much mistaken, it is also in the legs.

Tell me that two weeks of this regime has cured you. It will happen, I am sure of it.

I love you, and I embrace you, as does every one of my brood.
Your old troubadour

CCLXXXIX. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 25th March, 1875

Don't be worried about me, my Polycarp. I have nothing serious, a little grippe, and this right arm which hardly moves but which electricity will cure. One thinks that it is an effort.

I am much more worried about you, although you are ten times as strong as I am, but your morale is affected whereas mine takes what comes, in a cowardly way, if you like, but there is perhaps a philosophy in knowing how to be cowardly rather than angry.

Do write to me, tell me that you are going out of doors, that you are walking, that you are better. — I have finished going over the proofs of Flamarande. That is the most boring part of the task.

I shall send you the book when it is published. I know that you do not like to read bit by bit.

I am a little tired; however, I want to begin something else. Since it is not warm enough to go out, I get bored with not having anything on the stocks. Everything is going well in the nest, except for a few colds. Spring is so peevish this year! At last the pale sun will become the dear Phoebus-Appolo with the shining hair, and all will go well.

Aurore is getting so big that one is surprised to hear her laugh and play like a child, always good, and tender, the other is always very funny and facetious.

Tell us of yourself and always love us as we love you.

Your old troubadour

CCXC. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 7th May, 1875

You leave me without news of you? You say that you prefer to be forgotten, rather than to complain ceaselessly, as it is very useless and since you will not be forgotten; complain then, but tell us that you are alive and that you still love us.

As you are much nicer, the more surly you are, I know that you are not rejoicing over the death of poor Michel. For me, it is a great loss in every way, for he was absolutely devoted to me and proved it all the time by his care and services without number.

We are all well here. I am better since it is not cold any more, and I am working a great deal. I am also doing many water colors, I am reading the Iliad with Aurore, who does not like any translation except Leconte de Lisle's, insisting that Homer is spoiled by approximate renderings.

The child is a singular mixture of precocity and childishness. She is nine years old and so large that one would think her twelve. She plays dolls with passion, and she is as LITERARY as you or I, meanwhile learning her own language which she does not yet know.

Are you still in Paris in this lovely weather? Nohant is now STREAMING with flowers, from the tips of the trees to the turf; Croisset must be even prettier, for it is cool, and we are struggling with a drought that has now become chronic in Berry. But if you are still in Paris, you have that beautiful Pare Monceau under your eyes where you are walking, I hope, since you have to. Life is at the price of walking!

Won't you come to see us? Whether you are sad or gay, we love you the same here, and we wish that affection meant something to you, but we shall give it to you, and we give it to you without conditions.

I am thinking of going to Paris next month, shall you be there?

G. Sand

CCXCI. TO GEORGE SAND

Croisset, 10th May, 1875

A wandering gout, pains that go all over me, an invincible melancholy, the feeling of "universal uselessness" and grave doubts about the book that I am writing, that is what is the matter with me, dear and valiant master. Add to that worries about money with melancholic recollections of the past, that is my condition, and I assure you that I make great efforts to get out of it. But my will is tired. I cannot decide about anything effective! Ah! I have eaten my white bread first, and old age is not announcing itself under gay colors. Since I have begun hydrotherapy, however, I feel a little less like a COW, and this evening I am going to begin work without looking behind me.

I have left my apartment in the rue Murillo, and I have taken a larger one which is next to the one that my niece has just reserved on the Boulevard Reine Hortense. I shall be less alone next winter, for I cannot endure solitude.

Tourgueneff seemed to me, however, to be very well pleased with the two first chapters of my frightful book. But Tourgueneff loves me too much, perhaps to judge impartially. I am not going to leave my house for a long time now, for I WILL get ahead in my task, which weighs on my chest like a burden of a million pounds. My niece will come to spend all the month of June here. When she has gone away, I shall make a little archeological and geological excursion in Calvados, and that will be all.

No, I do not rejoice at Michel Levy's death, and I even envy him that death so quiet. Just the same, that man did me a great deal of harm. He wounded me deeply. It is true that I am endowed with an absurd sensitiveness; what scratches others tears me to pieces. Why am I not organized for enjoyment as I am for suffering!

The bit you sent me about Aurore who is reading Homer, did me good. That is what I miss: a little girl like that! But one does not arrange one's own destiny, one submits to it. I have always lived from day to day, without plans for the future and pursuing my end (one alone, literature) without looking to the right or to the left. Everything that was around me has disappeared, and now I find I am in a desert. In short, the element of distraction is absolutely lacking to me. One needs a certain vivacity to write good things! What can one do to get it again? How can one proceed, to avoid thinking continually about one's miserable person? The sickest thing in me is my humor: the rest doubtless would go well. You see, dear, good master, that I am right to spare you my letters. Nothing is as imbecile as the whiners.

CCXCII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Thursday morning, 10th June, 1875

We are leaving, Lina and I, on Saturday morning, and up to then we shall be on the move. If you wanted to come to dine with us Friday at Magny's at six o'clock, at least we could say farewell. You should be free at nine o'clock, for we go to bed with the chickens in order to leave early the next day. What do you say?

I love you with all my heart.

CCXCIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Friend, I shall come at your call as soon as you say to me, "I have finished."

I love you, and I embrace you.

G. Sand

CCXCIV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 15 August

My poor, dear, old fellow,

I learn only today in a letter from that dear, lazy soul of a Tourgueneff, about the misfortune which has come to your niece. Is it then irreparable? Her husband is very young and intelligent, can't he begin over again, or take a position that will give him a living? They have no children, they do not need millions to live on, young and well as they both are. Tourgueneff tells me that your property has been affected by this failure. If it is AFFECTED MERELY you will bear this serious annoyance philosophically. You have no vices to satisfy, nor ambitions to appease. I am sure that you will accommodate your life to your resources. The hardest thing for you to bear, is the chagrin of that young woman who is as a daughter to you. But you will give her courage and consolation, it is the moment to be above your own worries, in order to assuage those of others. I am sure that as I write, you have calmed her mind and soothed her heart. Perhaps, too, the disaster is not what it seems at the first moment. There will be a change for the better, a new way will be found, for it is always so, and the worth of men is measured according to their energy, to the hopes which are always a sign of their force and intelligence. More than one has risen again bravely. Be sure that better days will come and tell them so continually, for it is true. Your moral and physical welfare must not be shaken by this rebuff. Think of healing those whom you love, and forget yourself. We shall be thinking of you, and we shall be suffering for you; for I am keenly affected at seeing that you have a new subject of sadness amidst your spleen.

Come, dear splendid old fellow, cheer up, do us a new successful novel, and think of those who love you, and whose hearts are saddened and torn by your discouragements. Love them, love us, and you will find once more your strength and your enthusiasm.

We all embrace you very tenderly. Do not write if it bores you, say to us only, "I am well, and I love you."

G. Sand

CCXCV. TO GEORGE SAND

Wednesday

Will you forgive my long delay, dear master? But I think that I must bore you with my eternal jeremiads. I repeat myself like a dotard! I am becoming too stupid! I am boring everybody. In short, your Cruchard has become an intolerable old codger, because he has been intolerant. And as I cannot do anything that I ought to do, I must, out of consideration for others, spare them the overflow of my bile.

For the last six months, especially, I don't know what has been the trouble with me, but I feel dreadfully ill, without being able to get to the root of the matter, and I know many people are in the same condition. Why? Perhaps we are suffering from the illness of France; here in Paris, where her heart beats, people feel better than at her extremities, in the provinces.

I assure you that every one now is suffering with some incomprehensible trouble. Our friend Renan is one of the most desperate, and Prince Napoleon feels exactly the way he does. But they have strong nerves. But, as for me, I am attacked by a well defined melancholia. I should be resigned to it, and I am not.

I work all the more, so as not to think about myself. But since I have undertaken a book that has absurd difficulties in its execution, the feeling of my powerlessness adds to my chagrin.

Don't tell me again that imbecility is sacred like childhood, for imbecility contains no germ. Let me believe that the dead do not "search any more," and that they are at rest. We are sufficiently tormented on earth to be at rest when we are beneath it! Ah! How I envy you, how I long to have your serenity! To say nothing of the rest! and your two dear little girls, whom I embrace as tenderly as I do — you.

CCXCVI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croissset

Nohant, 7th September, 1875

You are distressed, you are discouraged, you distress me too. That is all right, I would rather have you complain than keep silent, dear friend. And I don't want you to stop writing to me.

I also have great and frequent sorrows. My old friends are dying before I do. One of the dearest, the one who brought up Maurice and whom I was expecting to help me to bring up my grandchildren, has just died, almost in an instant. That is a deep sorrow. Life is a succession of blows at one's heart. But duty is there: we must go on and do our tasks without saddening those who suffer with us.

I ask you absolutely to WILL, and not to be indifferent to the griefs which we are sharing with you. Tell us that calm has come and that the horizon has cleared.

We love you, sad or gay.

Give us news of yourself.

G. Sand

CCXCVII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 8th October, 1875

Well, well, your health has come back in spite of you, since you are sleeping all night. The sea air forces you to live and you have made progress, you have given up a work that would not have made a success. Do something more of earth earthy, which would reach everybody. Tell me what price they would sell Croisset for if they are obliged to sell it. Is it a house and garden, or is there a farm and grounds! If it is not beyond my means I might buy it and you should spend the rest of your life there. I have no money, but I should try to shift a little capital. Answer me seriously, I beg of you; if I can do it, it shall be done.

I have been ill all the summer, that is to say, that I have suffered continually, but I have worked all the more not to think of it. In fact they are to put on Villemer and Victorine at the Theatre Francais again. But there is nothing now in preparation. I do not know at what time in the autumn or winter I shall have to go to Paris. I shall find you there ready and courageous, shan't I? If you have made, through goodness and devotion, as I think, a great sacrifice for your niece, who, in truth, is your real daughter, you will forget all about it and will begin your life again as a young man. Is one old when one does not choose to be? Stay at the seaside as long as you can. The important thing is to patch up the physical machine. Here with us it is as warm as in midsummer. I hope that you still have the sun down there. Study the life of the mollusc! They are creatures better endowed than one thinks, and, for my part, I should love to take a walk with Georges Pouchet! Natural history is the inexhaustible source of agreeable occupations for even those who seek only amusement in it, and if you actually attacked it you would be saved. But you must by all means save yourself, for you are somebody, and you cannot drop out of the running, as can a mere ruined grocer. We all embrace you with our best love.

G. Sand

CCXCVIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, in Paris

Nohant, 15 November, 1875

So you are there in Paris, and have you left your apartment at the rue Murillo? You are working? Good luck and good courage! The old man is coming to the top again! I know that they are rehearsing Victorine at the Theatre Francais; but I don't know whether I shall go to see that revival. I have been so ill all the summer and I am still suffering so much with intestinal trouble, that I do not know if I shall ever be strong enough to move in winter. Well, we shall see. The hope of finding you there will give me courage; that is not what will be lacking, but, since I passed my seventieth birthday, I have been very much upset, and I do not yet know if I shall get over it. I cannot walk any more, I who used to love to be on my feet so much, without risking atrocious pains. I am patient with these miseries, I work all the more, and I do water-colors in my hours of recreation.

Aurore consoles and charms me; I should like to live long enough to get her married. But God disposes, and one must take death and life as He wills.

Well, this is just to say to you that I shall go to embrace you unless the thing is ABSOLUTELY impossible. You shall read me what you have begun. Meanwhile, give me news of yourself; for I shall not stir until the last rehearsals. I know my cast, I know that they will all do well, according to their capabilities, and, besides, that Perrin will look after them.

We all KISS you very tenderly, and we love you, Cruchard or not.

G. Sand

CCXCIX. TO GEORGE SAND

Paris, 11 December, 1875

Things are going a little better, and I am profiting by the occasion to write to you, dear, good, adorable master.

You know that I have abandoned my big novel in order to write a little MEDIEVAL bit of nonsense, which won't run to more than thirty pages. It puts me in a more decent setting than that of modern times, and does me good. Then I am hunting for a contemporary novel, but I am hesitating among several embryonic ideas; I should like to do something concise and violent. The string of the necklace (that is to say, the main idea) is still to seek.

Externally my life is scarcely changed: I see the same people, I receive the same visits. My faithful ones on Sunday are first of all, the big Tourgueneff, who is nicer than ever, Zola, Alphonse Daudet, and Goncourt. You have never spoken to me of the first two. What do you think of their books?

I am not reading anything at all, except Shakespeare, whom am going through from beginning to end. That tones you up and puts new air into your lungs, just as if you were on a high mountain. Everything appears mediocre beside that prodigious fellow.

As I go out very little, I have not yet seen Victor Hugo. However, this evening I am going to resign myself to putting on my boots, so that I can go to present my compliments to him. His personality pleases me infinitely, but his court! ... mercy!

The senatorial elections are a subject of diversion to the public of which I am a part. There must have occurred, in the corridors of the Assembly, dialogues incredibly grotesque and base. The XIXth century is destined to see all religions perish. Amen! I do not mourn any of them.

At the Odeon, a live bear is going to appear on the boards. That is all that I know about literature.

CCC. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, in Paris

Nohant, 18th and 19th December, 1875

At last I discover my old troubadour who was a subject of chagrin and serious worry to me. Here you are yourself again, trusting in the very natural luck of external events, and discovering in yourself the strength to control them, whatever they may be, by effort. What is it that you call some one in HIGH FINANCE? For my part, I don't know; I am in relations with Victor Borie. He will do me a favor if he sees it to his interest. Must I write him?

Then you are going to start grubbing again? So am I; for since Flamarande I have done nothing but mark time, while waiting for something better. I was so ill all summer! but my strange and excellent friend Favre has cured me wonderfully, and I am taking a new lease on life.

What's our next move? For you, of course, DESOLATION, and, for me, consolation. I do not know on what our destinies depend; you see them pass, you criticise them, you abstain from a literary appreciation of them, you limit yourself to depicting them, with deliberate meticulous concealment of your personal feelings. However, one sees them very clearly through your narrative, and you make the people sadder who read you. As for me, I should like to make them less sad. I cannot forget that my personal victory over despair was the work of my will and of a new way of understanding which is entirely opposed to what I had before.

I know that you criticise the intervention of the personal doctrine in literature. Are you right? Isn't it rather a lack of conviction than a principle of esthetics? One cannot have a philosophy in one's soul without its appearing. I have no literary advice to give you, I have no judgment to formulate on the author friends of whom you speak. I, myself have told the Goncourts all my thought; as for the others, I firmly believe that they have more education and more talent than I have. Only I think that they, and you especially, lack a definite and extended vision of life. Art is not merely painting. True painting, moreover, is full of the soul that wields the brush. Art is not merely criticism and satire: criticism and satire depict only one side of the truth.

I want to see a man as he is, he is not good or bad, he is good and bad. But he is something more ... nuance. Nuance which is for me the purpose of art, being good and bad, he has an internal force which leads him to be very bad and slightly good, — or very good and slightly bad.

I think that your school is not concerned with the substance, and that it dwells too much on the surface. By virtue of seeking the form, it makes the substance too cheap! it addresses itself to the men of letters. But there are no men of letters, properly speaking. Before everything, one is a man. One wants to find man at the basis of every story and every deed. That was the defect of l'Education sentimentale, about which I have so often reflected since, asking myself why there was so general a dislike of a work that was so well done and so solid. This defect was the absence of ACTION of the characters on themselves. They submitted to the event and never mastered it. Well, I think that the chief interest in a story is what you did not want to do. If I were you, I would try the opposite; you are feeding on Shakespeare just now, and you are doing well! He is the author who puts men at grips with events; observe that by them, whether for good or for ill, the event is always conquered. In his works, it is crushed underfoot.

Politics is a comedy just now. We have had tragedy, shall we end with the opera or with the operetta? I read my paper conscientiously every morning; but aside from that moment, it is impossible for me to think of it or to be interested in it. All of it is absolutely void of any ideal whatsoever, and therefore I cannot get up any interest in any of the persons concerned in that scullery. All of them are slaves of fact because they have been born slaves of themselves.

My dear little girls are well. Aurore is a well-set-up girl, a beautiful upright soul in a strong body. The other one is grace and sweetness. I am always an assiduous and a patient teacher, and very little time is left to me to write PROFESSIONALLY, seeing that I cannot keep awake after midnight and that I want to spend all my evening with my family; but this lack of time stimulates me and makes me find a true pleasure in digging away; it is like a forbidden fruit that I taste in secret.

All my dear world embraces you and rejoices to hear that you are better. Did I send you Flamarande and the pictures of my little girls? If not, send me a line, and I send you both.

Your old troubadour who loves you,

G. Sand

Embrace your charming niece for me. What a good and lovely letter she wrote me! Tell her that I beg her to take care of herself and to please get well quickly.

What do you mean! Littré a senator? It is impossible to believe it when one knows what the Chamber is. All the same it must be congratulated for this attempt at self-respect.

CCCI. TO GEORGE SAND

December, 1875

Your good letter of the 18th, so maternally tender, has made me reflect a great deal. I have reread it ten times, and I shall confess to you that I am not sure that I understand it. Briefly, what do you want me to do? Make your instructions exact.

I am constantly doing all that I can to enlarge my brain, and I work in the sincerity of my heart. The rest does not depend on me.

I do not enjoy making “desolation,” believe me, but I cannot change my eyes! As for my “lack of convictions,” alas! I choke with convictions. I am bursting with anger and restrained indignation. But according to the ideal of art that I have, I think that the artist should not manifest anything of his own feelings, and that the artist should not appear any more in his work than God in nature. The man is nothing, the work is everything! This method, perhaps mistakenly conceived, is not easy to follow. And for me, at least, it is a sort of permanent sacrifice that I am making to good taste. It would be agreeable to me to say what I think and to relieve Mister Gustave Flaubert by words, but of what importance is the said gentleman?

I think as you do, dear master, that art is not merely criticism and satire; moreover, I have never tried to do intentionally the one nor the other. I have always tried to go into the soul of things and to stick to the greatest generalities, and I have purposely turned aside from the accidental and the dramatic. No monsters and no heroes!

You say to me: “I have no literary advice to give you; I have no judgments to formulate on the authors, your friends, etc.” Well? indeed! but I implore advice, and I am waiting for your judgments. Who, pray, should give them, and who, pray, should formulate them, if not you?

Speaking of my friends, you add “my school.” But I am ruining my temperament in trying not to have a school! A priori, I spurn them, every one. The people whom I see often and whom you designate cultivate all that I scorn and are indifferently disturbed about what torments me. I regard as very secondary, technical detail, local exactness, in short the historical and precise side of things. I am seeking above all for beauty, which my companions pursue but languidly. I see them insensible when I am ravaged with admiration or horror. Phrases make me swoon with pleasure which seem very ordinary to them. Goncourt is very happy when he has seized upon a word in the street that he can stick in a book, and I am well satisfied when I have written a page without assonances or repetitions. I would give all the legends of Gavarni for certain expressions and master strokes, such as "the shade was NUPTIAL, august and solemn!" from Victor Hugo, or this from Montesquieu: "the vices of Alexander were extreme like his virtues. He was terrible in his wrath. It made him cruel."

In short, I try to think well, IN ORDER TO write well. But writing well is my aim, I do not deny it.

"I lack a well-defined and extended vision of life." You are right a thousand times over, but by what means could it be otherwise? I ask you that. You do not enlighten my darkness with metaphysics, neither mine nor that of others. The words religion or Catholicism on the one hand; progress, fraternity, democracy on the other, do not correspond to the spiritual needs of the moment. The entirely new dogma of equality which radicalism praises is experimentally denied by physiology and history. I do not see the means of establishing today a new principle, any more than of respecting the old ones. Therefore I am hunting, without finding it, that idea on which all the rest should depend.

Meanwhile I repeat to myself what Littré said to me one day: "Ah! my friend, man is an unstable compound, and the earth an inferior planet."

Nothing sustains me better than the hope of leaving it soon, and of not going to another which might be worse. "I would rather not die," as Marat said. Ah! no! enough, enough weariness!

I am writing now a little silly story, which a mother can permit her child to read. The whole will be about thirty pages, I shall have two months more at it. Such is my energy, I shall send it to you as soon as it appears (not my energy, but the little story).

CCCII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, in Paris*Nohant, 12th January, 1876

My cherished Cruchard,

I want to write to you every day; time is lacking absolutely. At last here is a free moment; we are buried under the snow; it is the sort of weather that I adore: this whiteness is like general purification, and the amusements of the house seem more intimate and sweeter. Can anyone hate the winter in the country? The snow is one of the most beautiful sights of the year!

It appears that I am not clear in my sermons; I have that much in common with the orthodox, but I am not of them; neither in my idea of equality, nor of authority, have I any fixed plan. You seem to think that I want to convert you to a doctrine. Not at all, I don't think of such a thing. Everyone sets off from a point of view, the free choice of which I respect. In a few words, I can give a resume of mine: not to place oneself behind an opaque glass through which one can see only the reflection of one's own nose. To see as far as possible the good, the bad, about, around, yonder, everywhere; to perceive the continual gravitation of all tangible and intangible things towards the necessity of the decent, the good, the true, the beautiful.

I don't say that humanity is on the way to the heights. I believe it in spite of everything; but I do not argue about it, it is useless because each one judges according to his own personal vision, and the general aspect is for the moment poor and ugly. Besides, I do not need to be sure of the safety of the planet and its inhabitants in order to believe in the necessity of the good and the beautiful; if the planet departs from that law it will perish; if the inhabitants discard it they will be destroyed. Other stars, other souls will pass over their bodies, so much the worse! But, as for me, I want to gravitate up to my last breath, not with the certitude nor the need of finding elsewhere a GOOD PLACE, but because my sole joy is in keeping myself with my family on an upward road.

In other words, I am fleeing the sewer, and I am seeking the dry and the clean, certain that it is the law of my existence. Being a man amounts to little; we are still near the monkey from which they say we proceed. Very well! a further reason for separating ourselves still more from it and for being at least at the height of the relative truth that our race has been admitted to comprehend; a very poor truth, very limited, very humble! well, let us possess it as much as we can and not permit anyone to take it from us. We are, I think, quite agreed; but I practice this simple religion and you do not practice it, since you let yourself become discouraged; your heart has not been penetrated with it, since you curse life and desire death like a Catholic who yearns for compensation, were it only the rest eternal. You are no surer than another of this compensation. Life is perhaps eternal, and therefore work is eternal. If this is so, let us do our day's work bravely. If it is otherwise, if the MOI perishes entirely, let us have the honor of having done our stated task, it is our duty; for we have evident duties only toward ourselves and our equals. What we destroy in ourselves, we destroy in them. Our abasement lowers them, our falls drag them down; we owe it to them to remain erect so that they shall not fall. The desire for an early death, as that for a long life, is therefore a weakness, and I do not want you to admit any longer that it is a right. I thought that had it once; I believed, however, what I believe today; but I lacked strength, and like you I said: "I cannot help it." I lied to myself. One can help everything. One has the strength that one thinks one has not, when one desires ardently to GRAVITATE, to mount a step each day, to say to oneself: "The Flaubert of tomorrow must be superior to the one of yesterday, and the one of day after tomorrow more steady and more lucid still."

When you feel you are on the ladder, you will mount very quickly. You are about to enter gradually upon the happiest and most favorable time of life: old age. It is then that art reveals itself in its sweetness; as long as one is young, it manifests itself with anguish. You prefer a well-turned phrase to all metaphysics. I also, I love to see condensed into a few words what elsewhere fills volumes; but these volumes, one must have understood them completely (either to admit them or to reject them) in order to find the sublime resume which becomes literary art in its fullest expression; that is why one should not scorn the efforts of the human mind to arrive at the truth.

I tell you that, because you have excessive prejudices AS TO WORDS. In truth, you read, you dig, you work much more than I and a crowd of others do. You have acquired learning that I shall never attain. Therefore you are a hundred times richer than all of us; you are a rich man, and you complain like a poor man. Be charitable to a beggar who has his mattress full of gold, but who wants to be nourished only on well-turned phrases and choice words. But brute, ransack your own mattress and eat your gold. Nourish yourself with the ideas and feelings accumulated in your head and your heart; the words and the phrases, THE FORM to which you attach so much importance, will issue by itself from your digestion. You consider it as an end, it is only an effect. Happy manifestations proceed only from an emotion, and an emotion proceeds only from a conviction. One is not moved at all by the things that one does not believe with all one's heart.

I do not say that you do not believe: on the contrary, all your life of affection, of protection, and of charming and simple goodness, proves that you are the most convinced individual in the world. But, as soon as you handle literature, you want, I don't know why, to be another man, one who should disappear, one who destroys himself, who does not exist! What an absurd mania! what a false rule of GOOD TASTE! Our work is worth only what we are worth.

Who is talking about putting yourself on the stage? That, in truth, is of no use, unless it is done frankly by way of a chronicle. But to withdraw one's soul from what one does, what is that unhealthy fancy? To hide one's own opinion about the characters that one puts on the stage, to leave the reader therefore uncertain about the opinion that he should have of them, that is to desire not to be understood, and from that moment, the reader leaves you; for if he wants to understand the story that you are telling him, it is on the condition that you should show him plainly that this one is a strong character and that one weak.

L'Education sentimentale has been a misunderstood book, as I have told you repeatedly, but you have not listened to me. There should have been a short preface, or, at a good opportunity, an expression of blame, even if only a happy epithet to condemn the evil, to characterize the defect, to signalize the effort. All the characters in that book are feeble and come to nothing, except those with bad instincts; that is what you are reproached with, because people did not understand that you wanted precisely to depict a deplorable state of society that encourages these bad instincts and ruins noble efforts; when people do not understand us it is always our fault. What the reader wants, first of all, is to penetrate into our thought, and that is what you deny him, arrogantly. He thinks that you scorn him and that you want to ridicule him. For my part, I understood you, for I knew you. If anyone had brought me your book without its being signed, I should have thought it beautiful, but strange, and I should have asked myself if you were immoral, skeptical, indifferent or heart-broken. You say that it ought to be like that, and that M. Flaubert will violate the rules of good taste if he shows his thought and the aim of his literary enterprise. It is false in the highest degree. When M. Flaubert writes well and seriously, one attaches oneself to his personality. One wants to sink or swim with him. If he leaves you in doubt, you lose interest in his work, you neglect it, or you give it up.

I have already combated your favorite heresy, which is that one writes for twenty intelligent people and does not care a fig for the rest. It is not true, since the lack of success irritates you and troubles you. Besides, there have not been twenty critics favorable to this book which was so well written and so important. So one must not write for twenty persons any more than for three, or for a hundred thousand.

One must write for all those who have a thirst to read and who can profit by good reading. Then one must go straight to the most elevated morality within oneself, and not make a mystery of the moral and profitable meaning of one's book. People found that with Madame Bovary. If one part of the public cried scandal, the healthiest and the broadest part saw in it a severe and striking lesson given to a woman without conscience and without faith, to vanity, to ambition, to irrationality. They pitied her; art required that, but the lesson was clear, and it would have been more so, it would have been so for everybody, if you had wished it, if you had shown more clearly the opinion that you had, and that the public ought to have had, about the heroine, her husband, and her lovers.

That desire to depict things as they are, the adventures of life as they present themselves to the eye, is not well thought out, in my opinion. Depict inert things as a realist, as a poet, it's all the same to me, but, when one touches on the emotions of the human heart, it is another thing. You cannot abstract yourself from this contemplation; for man, that is yourself, and men, that is the reader. Whatever you do, your tale is a conversation between you and the reader. If you show him the evil coldly, without ever showing him the good he is angry. He wonders if it is he that is bad, or if it is you. You work, however, to rouse him and to interest him; you will never succeed if you are not roused yourself, or if you hide it so well that he thinks you indifferent. He is right: supreme impartiality is an anti-human thing, and a novel ought to be human above everything. If it is not, the public is not pleased in its being well written, well composed and conscientious in every detail. The essential quality is not there: interest. The reader breaks away likewise from a book where all the characters are good without distinctions and without weaknesses; he sees clearly that that is not human either. I believe that art, this special art of narration, is only worth while through the opposition of characters; but, in their struggle, I prefer to see the right prevail. Let events overwhelm the honest men, I agree to that, but let him not be soiled or belittled by them, and let him go to the stake feeling that he is happier than his executioners.

15th January, 1876

It is three days since I wrote this letter, and every day I have been on the point of throwing it into the fire; for it is long and diffuse and probably useless. Natures opposed on certain points understand each other with difficulty, and I am afraid that you will not understand me any better today than formerly. However, I am sending you this scrawl so that you can see that I am occupied with you almost as much as with myself.

You must have success after that bad luck which has troubled you deeply. I tell you wherein lie the certain conditions for your success. Keep your cult for form; but pay more attention to the substance. Do not take true virtue for a commonplace in literature. Give it its representative, make honest and strong men pass among the fools and the imbeciles that you love to ridicule. Show what is solid at the bottom of these intellectual abortions; in short, abandon the convention of the realist and return to the time reality, which is a mingling of the beautiful and the ugly, the dull and the brilliant, but in which the desire of good finds its place and its occupation all the same.

I embrace you for all of us.

G. Sand

CCCIII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Nohant, 6th March, 1876

I am writing to you in a hurry this morning because I have just received news from M. Perrin of the first performance of the revival of the Mariage de Victorine, a play of mine, at the Theatre Francais.

I have neither the time to go there, nor the wish to leave like that at a moment's notice, but I should have liked to send some of my friends there, and he does not offer me a single seat for them. I am writing him a letter that he will receive tomorrow, and I am asking him to send you at least one orchestra seat. If you do not get it, please understand that it was not my fault. I shall have to say the same thing to five or six other people.

I embrace you therefore in a hurry, so as not to lose the post.

Give me news of your niece and embrace her for me.

G. Sand

CCCIV. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Paris

Nohant, 8th March, 1876

You scorn Sedaine, you great profane soul! That is where the doctrine of form destroys your eye! Sedaine is not a writer, that is true, although he falls but little short of it, but he is a man, with a heart and soul, with the sense of moral truth, the direct insight into human feelings. I don't mind his out-of-date reasonings and dry phraseology! The right thought is always there, and it penetrates you deeply!

My dear old Sedaine! He is one of my well-beloved papas, and I consider le Philosophe sans le savior far superior to Victorine; it is such a distressing drama and so well carried out! But you only look for the well-turned phrase, that is one thing — only one thing, it is not all of art, it is not even half of it, it is a quarter at most, and if three-quarters are beautiful, one overlooks the part that is not.

I hope that you will not go to seek for your country-side before the good weather; here, we have been pretty well spared; but for the past three days there has been a deluge, and it makes me ill. I should not have been able to go to Paris. Your niece is better, God be praised! I love you and I embrace you with all my soul.

G. Sand

Do tell M. Zola to send me his book. I shall certainly read it with great interest.

CCCV. TO GEORGE SAND

Wednesday, 9th March, 1876

COMPLETE SUCCESS, dear master. The actors were recalled after each act, and warmly applauded. The public was pleased and from time to time cries of approval were heard. All your friends who had come at your summons were sorry that you were not there.

The roles of Antoine and Victorine were especially well played.

Little Baretta is a real treasure.

How were you able to make Victorine from le Philosophe sans le savoir? That is beyond me. Your play charmed me and made me weep like an idiot, while the other bored me to death, absolutely bored me to death; I longed to get to the end. What language! the good Tourgueneff and Madame Viardot made saucer-eyes, comical to behold. In your work, what produced the greatest effect is the scene in the last act between Antoine and his daughter. Maubant is too majestic, and the actor who plays Fulgence is inadequate. But everything went very well, and this revival will have a long life.

The gigantic HARRISSE told me that he was going to write to you immediately. Therefore his letter will arrive before mine. I should have started this morning for Pont-l'Évêque and Honfleur to see a bit of the country that I have forgotten, but the floods stopped me.

Read, I beg of you, the new novel by Zola, Son Excellence Rougon: I am very anxious to know what you think of it.

No, I do not SCORN Sedaine, because I do not scorn what I do not understand. He is to me, like Pindar, and Milton, who are absolutely closed to me; however, I quite understand that the citizen Sedaine is not exactly of their calibre.

The public of last Tuesday shared my error, and Victorine, independently of its real worth, gained by contrast. Madame Viardot, who has naturally good taste, said to me yesterday, in speaking of you:

“How was she able to make one from the other?” That is exactly what I think.

You distress me a bit, dear master, by attributing esthetic opinions to me which are not mine. I believe that the rounding of the phrase is nothing. But that WRITING WELL is everything, because “writing well is at the same time perceiving well, thinking well and saying well” (Buffon). The last term is then dependent on the other two, since one has to feel strongly, so as to think, and to think, so as to express.

All the bourgeois can have a great deal of heart and delicacy, be full of the best sentiments and the greatest virtues, without becoming for all that, artists. In short, I believe that the form and the matter are two subtleties, two entities, neither of which can exist without the other.

This anxiety for external beauty which you reproach me with is for me a METHOD. When I discover a bad assonance or a repetition in one of my phrases, I am sure that I am floundering in error; by dint of searching, I find the exact expression which was the only one and is, at the same time, the harmonious one. The word is never lacking when one possesses the idea.

Note (to return to the good Sedaine) that I share all his opinions and I approve his tendencies. From the archeological point of view, he is curious and from the humanitarian point of view very praiseworthy, I agree. But what difference does it make to us today? Is it eternal art? I ask you that.

Other writers of his period have formulated useful principles also, but in an imperishable style, in a more concrete and at the same time more general manner.

In short, the persistence of the Comedie Francaise in exhibiting that to us as “a masterpiece” had so exasperated me that, having gone home in order to get rid of the taste of this milk-food, I read before going to bed the Medea of Euripides, as I had no other classic handy, and Aurora surprised Cruchard in this occupation.

I have written to Zola to send you his book. I shall tell Daudet also to send you his Jack, as I am very curious to have your opinion on these two books, which are very different in composition and temperament, but quite remarkable, both of them.

The fright which the elections caused to the bourgeois has been diverting.

CCCVI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT, at Croisset

Nohant, 15th March, 1876

I should have a good deal to say about the novels of M. Zola, and it would be better to say it in an article than in a letter, because there is a general question there which must be formulated with a refreshed brain. I should like to read M. Daudet's book first, the book you spoke of to me, the title of which I cannot recall. Have the publisher send it to me collect, if he does not want to give it to me; that is very simple. On the whole, the thing that I shall not gainsay, meanwhile making a PHILOSOPHICAL criticism of the method, is that Rougon is a STRONG book, as you say, and worthy of being placed in the first rank.

That does not change anything in my way of thinking, that art ought to be the search for the truth, and that truth is not the picture of evil. It ought to be the picture of good and evil. A painter who sees only one is as false as he who sees only the other. Life is not crammed with monsters only. Society is not formed of rascals and wretches only. The honest people are not the minority, since society exists in a certain order and without too many unpunished crimes. Imbeciles dominate, it is true, but there is a public conscience which weighs on them and obliges them to respect the right. Let people show up and chastise the rascals, that is good, it is even moral, but let them tell us and show us the opposite; otherwise the simple reader, who is the average reader, is discouraged, saddened, horrified, and contradicts you so as not to despair.

How are you? Tourgueneff wrote me that your last work was very remarkable: then you are not DONE FOR, as you pretend?

Your niece continues to improve, does she not? I too am better, after cramps in my stomach that made me blue, and continued with a horrible persistence. Physical suffering is a good lesson when it leaves one freedom of spirit. One learns to endure it and to conquer it. Of course one has some moments of discouragement when one throws oneself on the bed; but, for my part, I always think of what my old cure used to say to me, when he had the gout: THAT WILL PASS, OR I SHALL PASS. And thereupon he would laugh, content with his joke.

My Aurore is beginning history, and she is not very well pleased with these killers of men whom they call heroes and demigods. She calls them horrid fellows.

We have a confounded spring; the earth is covered with flowers and snow, one gets numb gathering violets and anemones.

I have read the manuscript of l'Etrangere. It is not as DECADENT as you say. There are diamonds that sparkle brightly in this polychrome. Moreover, the decadences are transformations. The mountains in travail roar and scream, but they sing beautiful airs, also.

I embrace you and I love you. Do have your legend published quickly, so that we may read it.

Your old troubadour,

G. Sand

CCCVII. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT 30th March, 1876

Dear Cruchard,

I am enthusiastic about Jack, and I beg you to send my thanks to M. Daudet. Ah, yes! He has talent and heart! and how well all that is done and SEEN!

I am sending you a volume of old things that have just been collected. I embrace you, and I love you.

Your old troubadour,

G. Sand

CCCVIII. TO GEORGE SAND

Monday evening, 3rd April, 1876

I have received your volume this morning, dear master. I have two or three others that have been loaned to me for a long time; I shall send them off, and I shall read yours at the end of the week, during a little two-days' trip that I am forced to take to Pont-l'Eveque and to Honfleur for my Histoire d'un coeur simple, a trifle now "on the stocks," as M. Prudhomme would say.

I am very glad that Jack has pleased you. It is a charming book, isn't it? If you knew the author you would like him even better than his book. I have told him to send you Risler and Tartarin. I am sure in advance that you would thank me for the opportunity of reading these two books.

I do not share in Tourgueneff's severity as regards Jack, nor in the immensity of his admiration for Rougon. The one has charm, the other force. But neither one is concerned ABOVE ALL else with what is for me the end of art, namely, beauty. I remember having felt my heart beat violently, having felt a fierce pleasure in contemplating a wall of the Acropolis, a perfectly bare wall (the one on the left as you go up to the Propylaea). Well! I wonder if a book independently of what it says, cannot produce the same effect! In the exactness of its assembling, the rarity of its elements, the polish of its surface, the harmony of its ensemble, is there not an intrinsic virtue, a sort of divine force, something eternal as a principle? (I speak as a Platonist.) Thus, why is a relation necessary between the exact word and the musical word? Why does it happen that one always makes a verse when one restrains his thought too much? Does the law of numbers govern then the feelings and the images, and is what seems to be the exterior quite simply inside it? If I should continue a long time in this vein, I should blind myself entirely, for on the other side art has to be a good fellow; or rather art is what one can make it, we are not free. Each one follows his path, in spite of his own desire. In short, your Cruchard no longer knows where he stands.

But how difficult it is to understand one another! There are two men whom I admire a great deal and whom I consider real artists, Tourgueneff and Zola. Yet they do not admire the prose of Chateaubriand at all, and even less that of Gautier. Phrases which ravish me seem hollow to them. Who is wrong? And how please the public when one's nearest friends are so remote? All that saddens me very much. Do not laugh.

CCCIX. TO GEORGE SAND

Sunday evening... 1876

You OUGHT to call me inwardly, dear master, “a confounded pig,” — for I have not answered your last letter, and I have said nothing to you about your two volumes, not to mention a third that I received this morning from you. But I have been, for the last two weeks, entirely taken up by my little tale which will be finished soon. I have had several errands to do, various readings to finish up with, and a thing more serious than all that, the health of my poor niece worries me extremely and, at times, disturbs my brain, so that I do not know at all what I am doing! You see that my cup is bitter! That young woman is anemic to the last degree. She is wasting away. She has been obliged to leave off painting, which is her sole distraction. All the usual tonics do no good. Three days ago, by the orders of another physician, who seems to me more learned than the others, she began hydrotherapy. Will he succeed in making her digest and sleep? in building up her strength? Your poor Cruchard takes less and less pleasure in life, and he even has too much of it, infinitely too much. Let us speak of your books, that will be better.

They have amused me, and the proof is that I have devoured with one gulp and one after another, Flamarande and the Deux Freres. What a charming woman is Madame Flamarande, and what a man is M. Salcede. The narrative of the kidnapping of the child, the trip in the carriage, and the story of Zamora are perfect passages. Everywhere the interest is sustained and at the same time progressive. In short, what strikes me the most in these two novels (as in all yours, moreover), is the natural order of the ideas, the talent, or rather the genius for narrative. But what an abominable wretch is your M. Flamarande! As for the servant who tells the story and who is evidently in love with Madame, I wonder why you did not show more plainly his personal jealousy.

Except for the count, all are virtuous persons in that story, even extraordinarily virtuous. But do you think them really true to life? Are there many like them? It is true that while reading, one accepts them because of the cleverness of the execution; but afterwards?

Well, dear master, and this is to answer your last letter, this is, I think what separates us essentially. You, on the first bound, in everything, mount to heaven, and from there you descend to the earth. You start from a priori, from the theory, from the ideal. Thence your pity for life, your serenity, and to speak truly, your greatness. — I, poor wretch, I am stuck on the earth as with soles of lead; everything disturbs me, tears me to pieces, ravages me, and I make efforts to rise. If I should take your manner of looking at the whole of life I should become laughable, that is all. For you preach to me in vain. I cannot have another temperament than my own; nor another esthetics than what is the consequence of it. You accuse me of not letting myself go, according to nature. Well, and that discipline? that virtue? what shall we do with it? I admire M. Buffon putting on cuffs when he wrote. This luxury is a symbol. In short I am trying simply to be as comprehensive as possible. What more can one exact?

As for letting my personal opinion be known about the people I put on the stage: no, no, a thousand times no! I do not recognize the right to that. If the reader does not draw from a book the moral that should be found there, the reader is an imbecile or the book is false from the point of view of accuracy. For, the moment that a thing is true, it is good. Obscene books likewise are immoral only because they lack truth. Things are not “like that” in life.

And observe that I curse what they agree to call realism, although they make me one of its high priests; reconcile all that.

As for the public, its taste disgusts me more and more. Yesterday, for instance, I was present at the first night of the Prix Martin, a piece of buffoonery that, for my part, I think full of wit. Not one of the witty things in the play produced a laugh, and the denouement, which seems out of the ordinary, passed unperceived. Then to look for what can please seems to me the most chimerical of undertakings. For I defy anyone to tell me by what means one pleases. Success is a consequence and must not be an end. I have never sought it (although I desire it) and I seek it less and less.

After my little story, I shall do another, — for I am too deeply shaken to start on a great work. I had thought first of publishing Saint-Julien in a periodical, but I have given the plan up.

CCCX. TO GEORGE SAND

Friday evening...1876

Ah! thank you from the bottom of my heart, dear master! You have made me pass an exquisite day, for I have read your last volume, la Tour de Percemont. — Marianne only to-day; as I had many things to finish, among others my tale of Saint-Julien, I had shut up the aforesaid volume in a drawer so as not to succumb to the temptation. As my little story was finished last night, I rushed upon your book when morning came and devoured it.

I find it perfect, two jewels! Marianne moved me deeply and two or three times I wept. I recognized myself in the character of Pierre. Certain pages seemed to me fragments of my own memoirs, supposing

I had the talent to write them in such a way! How charming, poetic and true to life all that is! La Tour de Percemont pleased me extremely. But Marianne literally enchanted me. The English think as I do, for in the last number of the Athenaeum there is a very fine article about you. Did you know that? So then, for this time, I admire you completely and without the least reserve.

There you are, and I am very glad of it. You have never done anything to me that was not good; I love you tenderly!

CCCXI. TO GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Sunday, Nohant, 5th April, 1876.

Victor Borie is in Italy, what must I write him? Are you the man to go to find him and explain the affair to him? He is somewhere near Civita-Vecchia, very much on the go and perhaps not easy to catch up with.

I am sure that he would receive you with open arms, for, although a financier to his finger-tips he has remained very friendly and nice to us. He does not tell us if he is on his mountain of alum for long. Lina is writing to him and will know soon, shall she tell him that you are disposed to go to meet him, or that you will wait until his return to Paris? anyway until the 20th of May he will get letters addressed to him at the Hotel Italy in Florence. We shall have to be on the watch, for he writes AT LONG INTERVALS.

I have not the time to say any more to you today. People are coming in. I have read Fromont et Risler; I charge you to thank M. Daudet, to tell him that I spent the night in reading it and that I do not know whether I prefer Jack or Risler; it is interesting, I might almost say GRIPPING.

I embrace you and I love you, when will you give me some Flaubert to read?

G. Sand

CCCXII. To GEOBGE SAND

Monday evening

Dear master, Thanks to Madame Lina's kind note, I betook myself to V. Borie's yesterday and was most pleasantly received. My nephew went to carry him the documents today. Borie has promised to look after the affair; will he do it?

I think that he is in just the position to do me indirectly the greatest service that any one could do me. If my poor nephew should get the capital which he needs in order to work, I could get back a part of what I have lost and live in peace the rest of my days.

I presented myself to Borie under your recommendation, and it is to you that I owe the cordiality of his reception. I do not thank you (of course) but you can tell him that I was touched by his kind reception (and stimulate his zeal if you think that may be useful).

I have been working a great deal lately. How I should like to see you so as to read my little medieval folly to you! I have begun another story entitled Histoire d'un coeur simple. But I have interrupted this work to make some researches on the period of Saint John the Baptist, for I want to describe the feast of Herodias.

I hope to have my readings finished in a fortnight, after which I shall return to Croisset from which spot I shall not budge till winter, — my long sessions at the library exhaust me. Cruchard is weary.

The good Tourgueneff leaves this evening for Saint Petersburg. He asks me if I have thanked you for your last book? Could I be guilty of such an oversight? You will see by my Histoire d'un coeur simple where you will recognize your immediate influence, that I am not so obstinate as you think. I believe that the moral tendency, or rather the human basis of this little work will please you!

Adieu, dear good master. Remembrances to all yours.

I embrace you very tenderly.

Your old Gustave Flaubert

CCCXIII. To MAURICE SAND

Tuesday evening, 27th

All I can say to you, in the first place, my dear friend, is, that your book has made me pass a sleepless night. I read it instantly, at one fell swoop, only stopping to fill my good pipe from time to time and then to resume my reading.

When the impression is a little less fresh I shall take up your book again to find the flaws in it. But I think that there are very few. You must be content? It ought to please? It is dramatic and as amusing as possible!

Beginning with the first page I was charmed with the sincerity of the description. And at the end I admired the composition of the whole, the logical way the events were worked out and the characters related.

Your chief character, Miss Mary, is too hateful (to my taste) to be anything but an exact picture. That is one of the choicest parts of your book, together with the homelife, the life in New York?

Your good savage makes me laugh out loud when he is at the Opera.

I was struck by the house of the missionaries (Montaret's first night). You make it seem real. Naissa scalping, and then wiping her hands on the grass, seemed to me especially well done. As well as the disgust that she inspires in Montaret,

I venture a timid observation: it seems to me that the flight of father Athanasius and of Montaret, when they escape from their prison, is not perfectly clear? Is not the material explanation of the event too short?

I do not care for, as language, two or three ready-made locutions, such as "break the ice." You can see that I have read you attentively! What a pedagogue I make, eh! I am telling you all that from memory, for I have lent your book, and it has not been returned to me yet. But my recollection of it is of a thing very well done.

Don't you agree with me that a play of very great effect could be made from it for a boulevard theatre?

By the way, how is Cadio going?

Tell your dear mamma that I adore her.

Harris, from whom I have received a letter today, charges me to remember him to her, and, for my part, I charge you to embrace her for me.

And I grasp your two hands heartily and say "bravo" to you again, and faithfully yours.

CCCXIV. To MADAM MAURICE SAND

Thursday evening, 25th May, 1876

Dear Madam,

I sent a telegram to Maurice this morning, asking for news of Madam

Sand.

I was told yesterday that she was very ill, why has not Maurice answered me?

I went to Plauchut's this morning to get details. He is in the country, at Le Mans, so that I am in a state of cruel uncertainty.

Be good enough to answer me immediately and believe me, dear madam,

Your very affectionate,

Gustave Flaubert

4 rue Murillo, Parc Monceau

CCCXV. To MADAM LINA SAND

Dear Madam,

Your note of this morning reassures me a little. But that of last night had absolutely upset me.

I beg you to give me very frequent news of your dear mother-in-law.

Embrace her for me and believe that I am

Your very devoted

Gustave Flaubert

Beginning with the middle of next week, about Wednesday or Thursday,

I shall be at Croisset.

Saturday morning, 3d June, 1876.

CCCXVI. To MAURICE SAND

Croisset, Sunday, 24 June, 1876

You had prepared me, my dear Maurice, I wanted to write to you, but I was waiting till you were a little freer, more alone. Thank you for your kind thought.

Yes, we understood each other, yonder! (And if I did not remain longer, it is because my comrades dragged me away.) It seemed to me that I was burying my mother the second time. Poor, dear, great woman! What genius and what heart! But she lacked nothing, it is not she whom we must pity.

What is to become of you? Shall you stay in Nohant? That good old house must seem horribly empty to you! But you, at least, are not alone! You have a wife...a rare one! and two exquisite children. While I was with you, I had, over and above my grief, two desires: to run off with Aurore and to kill M. Marx.[Footnote: A reporter for le Figaro.] There you have the truth, it is unnecessary to make you see the psychology of the thing. I received yesterday a very sympathetic letter from good Tourgueneff. He too loved her. But then, who did not love her? If you had seen in Paris the anguish of Martine![Footnote: George Sand's maid.] That was distressing.

Plauchut is still in Nohant, I suppose. Tell him that I love him because I saw him shed so many tears.

And let yours flow, my dear friend, do all that is necessary not to console yourself, — which would, moreover, be impossible. Never mind! In a short time you will feel a great joy in the idea alone that you were a good son and that she knew it absolutely. She used to talk of you as of a blessing.

And when you shall have rejoined her, when the great-grand-children of the grandchildren of your two little girls shall have joined her, and when for a long time there shall have been no question of the things and the people that surround us, — in several centuries, — hearts like ours will palpitate through hers! People will read her books, that is to say that they will think according to her ideas and they will love with her love. But all that does not give her back to you, does it? With what then can we sustain ourselves if pride desert us, and what man more than you should have pride in his mother!

Now dear friend, adieu! When shall we meet now? How I should feel the need of talking of her, insatiably!

Embrace Madam Maurice for me, as I did on the stairway at Nohant, and your little girls.

Yours, from the depths of my heart,

Your Gustave Flaubert

CCCXVII. To MAURICE SAND

Croisset, Tuesday, 3rd October, 1876

Thank you for your kind remembrance, my dear friend. Neither do I forget, and I dream of your poor, dear mamma in a sadness that does not disappear. Her death has left a great emptiness for me. After you, your wife and the good Plauchut, I am perhaps the one who misses her most! I need her.

I pity you the annoyances that your sister causes you. I too have gone through that! It is so easy moreover to be good! Besides that causes less evil. When shall we meet? I want so much to see you, first just to see you — and second to talk of her.

When your business is finished, why not come to Paris for some time? Solitude is bad under certain conditions. One should not become intoxicated with one's grief, however much attraction one finds in doing so.

You ask me what I am doing. This is it: this year I have written two stories, and I am going to begin another so as to make the three into one volume that I want to publish in the spring. After that I hope to resume the big novel that I laid aside a year ago after my financial disaster. Matters are improving in that direction, and I shall not be forced to change anything in my way of living. If I have been able to start at work again, I owe it partly to the good counsel of your mother. She had found the best way to bring me back to respect myself.

In order to get the quicker at work, I shall stay here till New Year's Day, — perhaps later than that. Do try to put off your visit to Paris.

Embrace your dear little girls warmly for me, my respects to Madam

Maurice, and-sincerely yours, ex imo.

CCCXVIII. To MAURICE SAND

Saint-Gratien par Sannois, 20th August, 1877

Thank you for your kind remembrance, my dear Maurice. Next winter you will be in Passy, I hope, — and from time to time we can have a good chat. I even count on seeing myself at your table by the side of your friends whose “idol” I am.

You speak to me of your dear and illustrious mamma! Next to you I do not think that any one could think of her more often than I do! How I miss her! How I need her!

I had begun un coeur simple solely on account of her, only to please her. She died while I was in the midst of this work. Thus it is with our dreams.

I still continue not to find diversion in existence. In order to forget the weight of it, I work as frantically as possible.

What sustains me is the indignation that the Imbecility of the Bourgeois affords me! Summed up at present by the large party of law and order, it reaches a dizzy height!

Has there been anything in history more inept than the 16th of May?

Where is there an idiot comparable to the Bayard of modern times?

I have been in Paris, or rather at Saint-Gratien, for three days. Day after tomorrow I leave the princess, and in a fortnight I shall make a little trip to Lower Normandy for the sake of literature. When we meet I shall talk a long time with you, if you are interested, about the terrible book that I am in the process of concocting. I shall have enough work in it to take me three or four years. Not less!

Don't leave me so long without news. Give a long look for me at the little corner of the holy ground!...My regards to your dear wife, embrace the dear little girls and sincerely yours, my good Maurice,

Your old friend

LAST LETTER

CCCXIX. To MAURICE SAND

Tuesday morning, April, 1880

My dear Maurice,

No! Erase Cruchard and Polycarp and replace those words by what you like.

The Public ought not to have all of us, — let us reserve something for ourselves. That seems to me more decent (quod decet). You do not speak of a COMPLETE EDITION? Ah! your poor dear mamma! How often I think of her! And what need I have of her! There is not a day when I do not say: “If she were there, I should ask her advice.”

I shall be at Croisset till the 8th or the 10th of May. So, my old fellow, when you wish to come there, you will be welcome. I embrace you all from the oldest to the youngest.

Cruchard for you,

Polycarp for the human race,

The Trial

“Flaubert dissects Madame Bovary” — a caricature by A. Lernet, printed in La Parodie, 1869

THE PUBLIC vs. M. GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

In 1850 Flaubert began work on Madame Bovary, his most celebrated novel, which took five years to complete. After being serialised in the Revue de Paris in 1856, the government brought an action against the novel's publisher and author on the charge of immorality. The trial was held the following year, but both Flaubert and his publisher were fully acquitted. Madame Bovary then appeared in book format for the first time, receiving a very positive reception. A full account of the trial and acquittal is provided in this section of the eBook.

SPEECH OF THE PROSECUTING ATTORNEY M. ERNEST
PINARD

PLEA FOR THE DEFENSE, BY M. SENARD

THE DECISION

SPEECH OF THE PROSECUTING ATTORNEY M. ERNEST PINARD

Gentlemen, in entering upon this debate, the Public Attorney is in the presence of a difficulty which he cannot ignore. It cannot be put even in the nature of a condemnation, since offenses to public morals and to religion are somewhat vague and elastic expressions which it would be necessary to define precisely. Nevertheless, when we speak to right-minded, practical men we are sure of being sufficiently understood to distinguish whether a certain page of a book carries an attack against religion and morals or not. The difficulty is not in arousing a prejudice, it is far more in explaining the work of which you are to judge. It deals entirely with romance. If it were a newspaper article which we were bringing before you, it could be seen at once where the fault began and where it ended; it would simply be read by the ministry and submitted to you for judgment. Here we are not concerned with a newspaper article, but entirely with a romance, which begins the first of October, finishes the fifteenth of December, and is composed of six numbers, in the Revue de Paris, 1856. What is to be done in such a case? What is the duty of the Public Ministry? To read the whole romance? That is impossible. On the other hand, to read only the incriminating texts would expose us to deep reproach. They could say to us: If you do not show the case in all its parts, if you pass over that which precedes and that which follows the incriminating passages, it is evident that you wish to suppress the debate by restricting the ground of discussion. In order to avoid this twofold difficulty, there is but one course to follow, and that is, to relate to you the whole story of the romance without reading any of it, or pointing out any incriminating passage; then to cite incriminating texts, and finally to answer the objections that may arise against the general method of indictment.

What is the title of the romance? Madame Bovary. This title in itself explains nothing. There is a second in parentheses: Provincial Morals and Customs. This is also a title which does not explain the thought of the author but which gives some intimation of it. The author does not endeavour to follow such or such a system of philosophy, true or false; he endeavours to produce certain pictures, and you shall see what kind of pictures! Without doubt, it is the husband who begins and who terminates the book; but the most serious portrait of the work, the one that illumines the other paintings, is that of Madame Bovary.

Here I relate, I do not cite. It takes the husband first at college, and it must be stated that the boy already gave evidence of the kind of husband he would make. He is excessively heavy and timid, so timid that when he arrives at the college and is asked his name, he responds: "Charbovari" He is so dull that he works continually without advancing. He is never the first, nor is he the last in his class; he is the type, if not of the cipher at least of the laughing-stock of the college. After finishing his studies here, he goes to study medicine at Rouen, in a fourth-story room overlooking the Seine, which his mother rented for him, in the house of a dyer of her acquaintance. Here he studies his medical books, and arrives little by little, not at the degree of doctor of medicine, but that of health officer. He frequented the inns, failed in his studies, but as for the rest, he had no other passion than that of playing dominoes. This is M. Bovary.

The time comes for him to marry. His mother finds him a wife in the widow of a sheriff's officer of Dieppe; she is virtuous and plain, is forty-five years old, and has six thousand a year income. Only, the lawyer who had her capital to invest set out one fine morning for America, and the younger Madame Bovary was so much affected, so struck down by this unexpected blow that she died of it. Here we have the first marriage and the first scene.

M. Bovary, now being a widower, begins to think of marrying again. He questions his memory; there is no need of going far; there immediately comes to his mind the daughter of a neighboring farmer, Mile. Emma Rouault, who had strangely aroused Madame Bovary's suspicions. Farmer Rouault had but one daughter, and she had been brought up by the Ursuline sisters at Rouen. She was little interested in matters of the farm; her father was anxious for her to marry. The health officer presented himself, there was no difficulty about the dot, and you understand that with such a disposition on both sides, these things are quickly settled. The marriage takes place. M. Bovary is at his wife's knees, is the happiest of men and the blindest of husbands.

His sole occupation is anticipating his wife's wishes.

Here the rôle of M. Bovary ends; that of Madame Bovary becomes the serious work of the book.

Gentlemen, does Madame Bovary love her husband, or try to love him? No; and from the beginning there has been what we might call the scene of initiation. From the moment of her marriage, another horizon stretched itself out before her, a new life appeared to her. The proprietor of Vaubyessard Castle gave a grand entertainment. He invited the health officer and his wife, and this was for her an initiation into all the ardour of voluptuousness! There she discovered the Duke of Laverdière who had had some success at Court; she waltzed with a viscount and experienced an unusual disturbance of mind. From this moment she lived a new life; her husband and all her surroundings became insupportable to her. One day, in looking over some furniture, she hit a piece of wire which tore her finger; it was the wire from her wedding bouquet.

To try to dispel the ennui that was consuming her, M. Bovary sacrificed his office and established himself at Yonville. Here was the scene of the first fall. We are now in the second number. Madame arrived at Yonville, and there, the first person she met upon whom she could fix her attention was — not the notary of the place, but the only clerk of that notary, Léon Dupuis. This is a young man who is making his own way and is about to set out for the capital. Any other than M. Bovary would have been disquieted by the visits of the young clerk, but M. Bovary is so ingenuous that he believes in his wife's virtue. Léon, wholly inexperienced, has the same idea. He goes away, and the occasion is lost; but occasions are easily found again.

There was in the neighborhood of Yonville one Rodolphe Boulanger (you understand that I am narrating). He was a man of thirty-four years old and of a brutal temperament; he had had much success and many easy conquests; he then had an actress for a mistress. He saw Madame Bovary; she was young and charming; he resolved to make her his mistress. The thing was easy; three meetings were sufficient to bring it about. The first time he came to an agricultural meeting, the second time he paid her a visit, the third time he accompanied her on a horseback ride which her husband judged necessary to her health; it was then, in a first visit to the forest, that the fall took place. Their meetings multiplied after this, at Rodolphe's chateau and in the health officer's garden. The lovers reached the extreme limits of voluptuousness! Madame Bovary wished to elope with Rodolphe, but while Rodolphe dared not say no, he wrote a letter in which he tried to show her that for many reasons, he could not elope. Stricken down by the reception of this letter, Madame Bovary had a brain fever, following which typhoid fever declared itself. The fever killed the love, but the malady remained. This is the second scene.

We come now to the third scene. The fall with Rodolphe was followed by a religious reaction, but it was short; Madame Bovary was about to fall anew. The husband thought the theatre useful in the convalescence of his wife and took her to Rouen. In a box opposite that occupied by M. and Madame Bovary, was Léon Dupuis, the notary's young clerk, who had made his way to Paris, and who had now become strangely experienced and knowing. He went to see Madame Bovary and proposed a rendezvous. Madame Bovary suggested the cathedral. On coming out of the cathedral, Léon proposed that they take a cab. She resisted at first, but Léon told her that this was done in Paris, and there was no further obstacle. The fall takes place in the cab! Meetings follow for Léon, as for Rodolphe, at the health officer's house, and then at a room which they rented in Rouen. Finally, she became weary of the second love, and here begins the scene of distress; it is the last of the romance.

Madame Bovary was prodigal, having lavished gifts upon Rodolphe and Léon; she had led a life of luxury and, in order to meet such expense had put her name to a number of promissory notes. She had obtained a power of attorney from her husband in the management of their common patrimony, fell in with a usurer who discounted the notes which, not being paid at the expiration of the time, were renewed under the name of a boon companion. Then came the stamped paper, the protests, judgments and executions, and, finally, the posting for sale of the furniture of Monsieur Bovary, who knew nothing of all this. Reduced to the most cruel extremities, Madame Bovary asked money from everybody, but got none. Léon had nothing, and recoiled frightened at the idea of a crime that was suggested to him for procuring funds. Having gone through every degree of humiliation, Madame Bovary turned to Rodolphe; she was not successful; Rodolphe did not have 3000 francs. There remained to her but one course: to beg her husband's pardon? No. To explain the matter to him? No, for this husband would be generous enough to pardon her, and that was a humiliation which she could not accept: she must poison herself.

We come now to grievous scenes. The husband is there beside his wife's icy body. He has her night robe brought, orders her wrapped in it and her remains placed in a triple coffin.

One day he opens a secretary and there finds Rodolphe's picture, his letters and Léon's. Do you think his love is then shattered? No, no! on the contrary, he is excited and extols this woman whom others have possessed, as proved by these souvenirs of voluptuousness which she had left to him; and from that moment he neglects his office, his family, lets go the winds the last vestige of his patrimony, and is found dead one day in the arbor in his garden, holding in his hand a long lock of black hair. This is the romance. I have related it to you, suppressing no scene in it. It is called Madame Bovary. You could with justice give it another title and call it. Story of the Adulteries of a Provincial Woman.

Gentlemen, the first part of my task is fulfilled. I have related, I shall now cite, and after the citations come the indictments which are brought upon two counts: offense against public morals and offense against religious morals. The offense against public morals lies in the lascivious pictures which I have brought before your eyes; the offense against religious morals consists in mingling voluptuous images with sacred things. I now come to the citations. I will be brief, for you will read the entire romance. I shall limit myself to citing four scenes, or rather four tableaux. The first will be that of the fall with Rodolphe; the second, the religious reaction between the two adulteries; the third, the fall with Léon, which is the second adultery, and finally the fourth, the death of Madame Bovary.

Before raising the curtain on these four pictures, permit me to inquire what colour, what stroke of the brush M. Flaubert employs — for this romance is a picture, and it is necessary to know to what school he belongs — what colour he uses and what sort of portrait he makes of his heroine.

The general colour of the author, allow me to tell you, is a lascivious colour, before, during, and after the falls! When she is a child ten or twelve years of age, she is at the Ursuline convent. At this age, when the young girl is not formed, when the woman cannot feel those emotions which reveal to her a new world, she goes to confession:

“When she went to confession, she invented little sins in order that she might stay there longer, kneeling in the shadow, her hands joined, her face against the grating beneath the whispering of the priest. The comparisons of betrothed, husband, celestial lover, and eternal marriage, that recur in sermons, stirred within her soul depths of unexpected sweetness.”

Is it natural for a little girl to invent small sins, since we know that for a child the smallest sins are confessed with the greatest difficulty? And again, at this age, when a little girl is not formed, does it not make what I have called a lascivious picture to show her inventing little sins in the shadow, under the whisperings of the priest, recalling comparisons she has heard about the affianced, the celestial lover and eternal marriage which gave her a shiver of voluptuousness?

Would you see Madame Bovary in her lesser acts, in a free state, without a lover and without sin? I pass over those words, “the next day,” and that bride who left nothing to be discovered which could be divined or found out, as the phrase in itself is more than equivocal; but we shall see how it was with the husband:

The husband of the next day, “whom one would have taken for an old maid,” the bridegroom of this bride who “left nothing to be discovered that could be divined,” arose and went out, “his heart full of the felicities of the night, with mind tranquil and flesh content,” going about “ruminating upon his happiness like one who is still enjoying after dinner the taste of the truffles he is digesting.”

It now remains, gentlemen, to determine upon the literary stamp of M. Flaubert and upon the strokes of his brush. Now, at the Castle Vaubyessard do you know what most attracted this young woman, what struck her most forcibly? It is always the same thing — the Duke of Laverdiere, as a lover — “as they say, of Marie-Antoinette, between the Messrs. de Coigny and de Lauzun.” “Emma’s eyes turned upon him of their own accord, as upon something extraordinary and august;

he had lived at Court and slept in the bed of queens!” Can it be said that this is only an historic parenthesis? Sad and useless parenthesis! History can authorise suspicions, but has not the right to establish them as fact. History has spoken of the necklace in all romances; history has spoken of a thousand things; but these are only suspicions and, I repeat, I know not by what authority these suspicions should be established as facts. And, since Marie-Antoinette died with the dignity of a sovereign and the calmness of a Christian, her life-blood should efface faults of which there are the strongest suspicions. M. Flaubert was in need of a striking example in the painting of his heroine, but Heaven knows why he has taken this one to express, all at once, the perverse instincts and the ambition of Madame Bovary!

Madame Bovary dances very well, and here she is waltzing:

“They began slowly, then went more rapidly. They turned; all around them was turning — the lamps, the furniture, the wainscoting, the floor, like a disc on a pivot. On passing near the doors the bottom of Emma’s dress caught against his trousers. Their legs commingled; he looked down at her; she raised her eyes to his. A torpor seized her; she stopped. They started again, and with a more rapid movement; the Viscount, dragging her along, disappeared with her to the end of the gallery, where, panting, she almost fell, and for a moment rested her head upon his breast. And then, still turning, but more slowly, he guided her back to her seat. She leant back against the wall and covered her eyes with her hands.”

I know well that the waltz is more or less like this, but that makes it no more moral!

Take Madame Bovary in her most simple acts, and we have always the same stroke of the brush, on every page. Even Justin, the neighbouring chemist’s boy, undergoes some astonishment when he is initiated into the secrets of this woman’s toilette. He carries his voluptuous admiration as far as the kitchen.

“With his elbows on the long board on which she was ironing, he greedily watched all these women’s clothes spread out about him, the dimity petticoats, the fichus, the collars, and the drawers with running-strings, wide at the hips and growing narrower below.

“What is that for?” asked the young fellow, passing his hand over the crinoline or the hooks and eyes.

“‘Why, haven’t you ever seen anything?’ Félicité answered laughing. ‘As if your mistress, Madame Homais, didn’t wear the same.’”

The husband also asks, in the presence of this fresh-smelling woman, whether the odour comes from the skin or from the chemise.

“Every evening he found a blazing fire, his dinner ready, easy-chairs, and a well-dressed woman, charming with an odour of freshness, though no one could say whence the perfume came, or if it were not her skin that made odourous her chemise.”

Enough of quotations in detail! You know now the physiognomy of Madame Bovary in repose, when she is inciting no one, when she does not sin, when she is still completely innocent, and when, on her return from a rendezvous, she is by the side of her husband, whom she detests; you know now the general colour of the picture, the general physiognomy of Madame Bovary. The author has taken the greatest care, employed all the prestige of his style in painting the portrait of this woman. Has he tried to show her on the side of intelligence? Never. From the side of the heart? Not at all. On the part of mind? No. From the side of physical beauty? Not even that. Oh! I know very well that the portrait of Madame Bovary after the adultery is most brilliant; but the picture is above all lascivious, the post is voluptuous, the beauty a beauty of provocation.

I come now to the four important quotations; I shall make but four; I hold to my outline: I have said that the first would be the love for Rodolphe, the second the religious reaction, the third the love for Léon, the fourth her death.

Here is the first. Madame Bovary is near her fall, nearly ready to succumb.

“Domestic mediocrity drove her to lewd fancies, marriage tendernesses to adulterous desires. She would have liked Charles to beat her, that she might have a better right to hate him, to revenge herself upon him.”

What was it that seduced Rodolphe and prepared him? The opening of Madame Bovary’s dress which had burst in places along the seams of the corsage. Rodolphe took his servant to Bovary’s house, to bleed him. The servant was very ill, and Madame Bovary held the basin.

“Madame Bovary took the basin to put it under the table. With the movement she made in bending down, her skirt (it was a summer frock with four flounces, yellow, long in the waist and wide in the skirt) spread out around her on the flags of the room; and as Emma, stooping, staggered a little as she stretched out her arms, the stuff here and there gave with the inflections of her bust.”

Here is Rodolphe’s reflection: “He again saw Emma in her room, dressed as he had seen her, and he undressed her.”

It is the first day they had spoken to each other. “They looked at one another. A supreme desire made their dry lips tremble, and softly, without an effort, their fingers intertwined.”

These are the preliminaries of the fall. It is necessary to read the fall itself.

“When the habit was ready, Charles wrote to Monsieur Boulanger that his wife was at his command, and that they counted on his good-nature.

“The next day at noon, Rodolphe appeared at Charles’s door with two saddle-horses. One had pink rosettes at his ears and a deerskin side-saddle.

“Rodolphe had put on high soft boots, saying to himself that no doubt she had never seen anything like them. In fact, Emma was charmed with his appearance as he stood on the landing in his great velvet coat and white corduroy breeches.”

“As soon as he felt the ground, Emma’s horse set off at a gallop. Rodolphe galloped by her side.”

Here they are in the forest.

“He drew her farther on to a small pool where duckweeds made a greenness on the water. Faded waterlilies lay motionless between the reeds. At the noise of their steps in the grass, frogs jumped away to hide themselves.

“‘I am wrong! I am wrong!’ she said. ‘I am mad to listen to you!’”

“‘Why? Emma! Emma!’”

“‘Oh, Rodolphe!’ said the young woman slowly, leaning on his shoulder.”

“The cloth of her habit caught against the velvet of his coat. She threw back her white neck, swelling with a sigh, and faltering, in tears, with a long shudder and hiding her face, she gave herself up to him.”

Then she arose and, after shaking off the fatigue of voluptuousness, returned to the domestic hearth, to that hearth where she would find a husband who adored her. After this first fall, after this first adultery, this first fault, is it a sentiment of remorse that she feels, in the presence of this deceived husband who adores her? No! with a bold front, she enters, glorifying adultery.

“But when she saw herself in the glass she wondered at her face. Never had her eyes been so large, so black, of so profound a depth. Something subtle about her being transfigured her. She repeated, ‘I have a lover! a lover!’ delighting at the idea as if a second puberty had come to her. So at last she was to know those joys of love, that fever of happiness of which she had despaired! She was entering upon marvels where all would be passion, ecstasy, delirium.”

Thus, from this first fault, this first fall, she glorified adultery, she sang the song of adultery, its poesy and its delights. This, gentlemen, to me is much more dangerous and immoral than the fall itself! Gentlemen, all pales before this glorification of adultery, even the rendezvous at night some time after:

“To call her, Rodolphe threw a sprinkle of sand at the shutters. She jumped up with a start; but sometimes he had to wait, for Charles had a mania for chatting by the fireside, and he would not stop. She was wild with impatience; if her eyes could have done it, she would have hurled him out at the window. At last she would begin to undress, then take up a book, and go on reading very quietly as if the book amused her. But Charles, who was in bed, called to her to come too.

“‘Come, now, Emma,’ he said, ‘it is time.’

“‘Yes, I am coming,’ she answered.

“Then, as the candles dazzled him, he turned to the wall and fell asleep. She escaped, smiling, palpitating, undressed.

“Rodolphe had a large cloak; he wrapped her in it, and putting his arm around her waist, he drew her without a word to the end of the garden.”

“It was in the arbour, on the same seat of old sticks where formerly Léon had looked at her so amorously on the summer evenings. She never thought of him now.

“The cold of the nights made them clasp closer; the sighs of their lips seemed to them deeper; their eyes, that they could hardly see, larger; and in the midst of the silence low words were spoken that fell on their souls sonorous crystalline, and reverberating in multiplied vibrations.”

Gentlemen, do you know of language anywhere in the world more expressive? Have you ever seen a more lascivious picture? Listen further:

“Never had Madame Bovary been so beautiful as at this period; she had that indefinable beauty that results from joy, from enthusiasm, from success, and that is only the harmony of temperament with circumstances. Her desires, her sorrows, the experience of pleasure and her ever-young illusions had, as soil and rain and winds and the sun make flowers grow, gradually developed her, and she at length blossomed forth in all the plentitude of her nature. Her eyelids seemed chiselled expressly for her long amorous looks in which the pupil disappeared, while a strong inspiration expanded her delicate nostrils and raised the fleshy corner of her lips, shaded in the light by a little black down. One would have thought that an artist apt in conception had arranged the curls of hair upon her neck; they fell in a thick mass, negligently and with the changing chances of their adultery that unbound them every day. Her voice now took more mellow inflections, her figure also; something subtle and penetrating escaped even from the folds of her gown and from the line of her foot. Charles, as when they were first married, thought her delicious and quite irresistible.”

Up to this time this woman’s beauty had consisted of her grace, her elegance, and her clothes; finally she is shown to you without a veil and you can say whether adultery has embellished her or not.

“‘Take me away,’ she cried, ‘carry me off! Oh, I entreat you!’

“And she threw herself upon his mouth, as if to seize there the unexpected consent it breathed forth in a kiss.”

Here is a portrait, gentlemen, which M. Flaubert knows well how to draw. How the eyes of this woman enlarge! Something ravishing expands around her, and then her fall! Her beauty has never been so brilliant as the next day after her fall and the days following. What the author shows you is the poetry of adultery, and I ask you again whether these lascivious pages do not express a profound immorality!

I come now to the second situation, which is the religious reaction.

Madame Bovary is very ill, is at death's door. She is brought back to life, and her convalescence is made remarkable by a little religious awakening.

"It was at this hour that Monsieur Bournisien came to see her. He inquired after her health, gave her news, exhorted her to religion in a coaxing little gossip that was not without its charm. The mere thought of his cassock comforted her."

Finally, she goes to communion. I do not like much to meet these holy things in a romance; but at least, when one speaks of them, he need not travesty them by his language. Is there in this adulterous woman going to communion anything of the repentant faith of a Magdalene? No, no; she is always the same passionate woman, seeking illusions and seeking them even among the most august and holy things.

"One day, when at the height of her illness, she had thought herself dying, and had asked for the communion; and, while they were making the preparations in her room for the sacrament, while they were turning the night-table covered with sirups into an altar, and while Félicité was strewing dahlia flowers on the floor, Emma felt some power passing over her that freed her from her pains, from all perception, from all feeling. Her body, relieved, no longer thought; another life was beginning; it seemed to her that her being, mounting toward God, would be annihilated in that love like a burning incense that melts into vapour."

In what tongue does one pray to God in language addressed to a lover in the outpourings of adultery? Without doubt they will tell us it is local colour, and excuse it on the ground that a vapourous, romantic woman does nothing, even in religion, like anybody else. There is no local colour which can excuse this mixture! Voluptuous one day, religious the next, there is no woman, even in other countries, under the sky of Spain or Italy, who murmurs to God the adulterous caresses which she gives her lover. You can appreciate this language, gentlemen, and you will not excuse adulterous words being introduced in any way into the sanctuary of the Divinity!

This is the second situation. I now come to the third, which is a series of adulteries.

After the religious transition, Madame Bovary is again ready to fall.

She goes to the theatre at Rouen. The play is Lucia di Lammermoor. Emma returns to her old self.

“Ah! if in the freshness of her beauty, before the pollution of marriage and the disillusion of adultery, she could have anchored her life upon some great, strong heart, then virtue, tenderness, voluptuousness, and duty blending, she would never have fallen from so high a happiness.”

Seeing Lagardy upon the stage, she had a desire to run into his arms, to take refuge in his strength, even as in the incarnation of love, and of saying to him: “Take me, take me away, let us go! thine, thine, with thee are all my ardour and all my dreams!”

Léon was with the Bovarys.

“He was standing behind her, leaning with his shoulder against the wall of the box; now and again she felt herself shuddering beneath the hot breath from his nostrils falling upon her hair.”

You were spoken to just now of the pollution of marriage; then you are shown adultery in all its poesy, in its ineffable seductions. I have said that the expression should be modified to read: the disillusion of marriage and the pollution of adultery. Very often when one is married, in the place of happiness without clouds which one promises himself, he finds but sacrifice and bitterness. The word disillusion can then be used justifiably, that of pollution, never.

Léon and Emma have a rendezvous at the cathedral. They look around or they do not, it makes no difference. They go out.

“A lad was playing about the close.

““Go and get me a cab!”

“The child bounded off like a ball by the Rue Quatre-Vents; then they were alone a few minutes, face to face, and a little embarrassed.

““Ah! Léon! Really — I don’t know — if I ought,” she whispered. Then with a more serious air, ‘Do you know, it is very improper?’

““How so?” replied the clerk. ‘It is done at Paris.’

““And that, as an irresistible argument, decided her.”

We know now, gentlemen, that the fall did not take place in the cab. Through a scruple which honors him, the editor of the Revue de Paris has suppressed the passage of the fall in the cab. But if the Revue lowered the blinds of the cab, it does allow us to penetrate into the room where they found a rendezvous.

Emma wished to leave it, because she had given her word that she would return that evening.

“Moreover, Charles expected her, and in her heart she felt already that cowardly docility that is for some women at once the chastisement and atonement of adultery.”

Once upon the sidewalk, Léon continued to walk; she followed him as far as the hotel; he mounted the stairs, opened the door and entered. What an embrace! Words followed each other quickly after the kisses. They told the disappointments of the week, their presentiments, their fears about the letters; but now all was forgotten, and they were face to face, with their laugh of voluptuousness and terms of endearment.

“The bed was large, of mahogany, in the shape of a boat. The curtains were in red levantine, that hung from the ceiling and bulged out too much towards the bell-shaped bed-side; and nothing in the world was so lovely as her brown head and white skin standing out against this purple colour, when, with a movement of shame, she crossed her bare arms, hiding her face in her hands.

“The warm room, with its discreet carpet, its gay ornaments, and its calm light, seemed made for the intimacies of passion.”

We are told what happened in that room. Here is still a passage, very important as a piece of lascivious painting:

“How they loved that dear room, so full of gaiety, despite of its rather faded splendour! They always found the furniture in the same place, and sometimes hairpins that she had forgotten the Thursday before under the pedestal of the clock. They lunched by the fireside on a little round table, inlaid with rosewood. Emma carved, put bits on his plate with all sorts of coquettish ways, and she laughed with a sonorous and libertine laugh when the froth of the champagne ran over from the glass to the rings on her fingers. They were so completely lost in the possession of each other that they thought themselves in their own house, and that they would live there till death, like two spouses eternally young. They said ‘our room,’ ‘our carpet,’ she even said ‘my slippers,’ a gift of Léon’s, a whim she had had. They were pink satin, bordered with swansdown. When she sat on his knees, her leg, then too short, hung in the air, and the dainty shoe, that had no back to it, was held on only by the toes to her bare foot.

“He for the first time enjoyed the inexpressible delicacy of feminine refinements. He had never met this grace of language, this reserve of clothing, these poses of the weary dove. He admired the exaltation of her soul and the lace on her petticoat. Besides, was she not ‘a lady’ and a married woman — a real mistress, in fine?”

This, gentlemen, is a description which leaves nothing to be desired, I hope, from the point of view of conviction. Here is another, or rather here is the continuation of the same scene:

“She used some words which inflamed him, with some kisses which drew forth his soul. Where had she learned these caresses almost immaterial, so profound and evasive were they?”

Oh! I well understand, gentlemen, the disgust inspired in her by that husband who wished to embrace her upon her return; I comprehend admirably that after a rendezvous of this kind, she felt with horror at night, “that man against her flesh stretched out asleep.”

That is not all, for according to the last tableau that I cannot omit, she came to be weary of her voluptuousness.

“She was constantly promising herself a profound felicity on her next journey. Then she confessed to herself that she felt nothing extraordinary. This disappointment quickly gave way to a new hope, and Emma returned to him more inflamed, more eager than ever. She undressed hastily, tearing off the thin laces of her corset that nestled around her hips like a gliding snake. She went on tip-toe, barefooted, to see once more that the door was closed; then, pale, serious, and without speaking, with one movement she threw herself upon his breast with a long shudder.”

I notice here two things, gentlemen, an admirable picture, the product of a talented hand, but an execrable picture from a moral point of view. Yes, M. Flaubert knows how to embellish his paintings with all the resources of art, but without the discretion of art. With him there is no gauze, no veils, it is nature in all her nudity, in all her crudity!

Still another quotation:

“They knew one another too well for any of those surprises of possession that increase its joys a hundred-fold. She was as sick of him as he was weary of her. Emma found again in adultery all the platitudes of marriage.”

The platitudes of marriage and the poetry of adultery! Sometimes it is the pollution of marriage, sometimes the platitudes, but always the poetry of adultery. These, gentlemen, are the situations which M. Flaubert loves to paint, and which, unfortunately, he paints only too well.

I have related three scenes: the scene with Rodolphe, and you have seen the fall in the forest, the glorification of adultery, and this woman whose beauty became greater with this poesy. I have spoken of the religious transition, and you saw there a prayer imprinted with adulterous language. I have spoken of the second fall, I have unrolled before you the scenes which took place with Léon. I have shown you the scene of the cab — suppressed — and I have shown you the picture of the room and the bed. Now that we believe your convictions are formed, we come to the last scene, — that of the punishment.

Numerous excisions have been made, it would appear, by the Revue de

Paris. Here are the terms in which M. Flaubert complains of it:

“Some consideration which I do not appreciate has led the Revue de Paris to suppress the number of December 1st. Its scruples being revived on the occasion of the present number, it has seen fit to cut out still more passages. In consequence, I wish to deny all responsibility in the lines which follow; the reader is informed that he sees only fragments and not the complete work.”

Let us pass, then, over these fragments and come to the death. She poisons herself. She poisons herself, why? Ah! it is a very little thing, is death, she thinks; I am going to fall asleep and all will be finished. Then, without remorse, without an avowal, without a tear of repentance over this suicide which is brought about by adulteries in the night watches, she goes to receive the sacrament for the dying. Why the sacrament, since in her last thought she is going to annihilation? Why, when there is not a tear, not a sigh of the Magdalene over her crime of infidelity, her suicide, or her adulteries?

After this scene comes that of extreme unction. These are holy and sacred words for all. It is with these words that our ancestors have fallen asleep, our fathers and our relatives, and it is with them that one day our children will see us sleep. When one wishes to make use of them, it should be done with exactness; it is not necessary, at least to accompany them with the voluptuous image of a past life.

You know how the priest makes the holy unctions upon the forehead, the ears, upon the mouth, the feet, pronouncing at the same time the liturgical phrases: quidquam per pedes, per auras, per pectus, etc., always following with the words misericordia ... sin on one side and pity on the other. These holy, sacred words should be reproduced exactly; and if they cannot be reproduced exactly, at least nothing voluptuous should be put with them.

“She turned her face slowly and seemed filled with joy on seeing suddenly the violet stole, no doubt finding again, in the midst of a temporary lull in her pain, the lost voluptuousness of her first mystical transports, with the visions of eternal beatitude that were beginning.

“The priest rose to take the crucifix; then she stretched forward her neck as one who is athirst, and gluing her lips to the body of the Man-God, she pressed upon it with all her expiring strength the fullest kiss of love that she had ever given. Then he recited the Misereatur and the Indulgentiam, dipped his right thumb in the oil and began to give extreme unction. First, upon the eyes, that had so coveted all worldly pomp; then upon the nostrils, that had been greedy of the warm breeze and amorous odours; then upon the mouth that had uttered lies, that had been curled with pride and cried out in lewdness; then upon the hands, that had delighted in sensual touches; and finally upon the soles of the feet, so swift of yore, when she was running to satisfy her desires, and that would now walk no more.”

Now, in the prayers for the dying which the priest recites, at the end or at the close of each verse occur these words: “Christian soul, go out to a higher region.” They are murmured at the moment when the last breath of the dying escapes from his lips. The priest recites, etc.

“As the death-rattle became stronger the priest prayed faster; his prayers mingled with the stifled sobs of Bovary, and sometimes all seemed lost in the muffled murmur of the Latin syllables that tolled like a passing-bell.”

After the fashion of alternating these words, the author has tried to make for them a sort of reply. He puts upon the sidewalk a blind man who intones a song of which the profane words are a kind of response to the prayers for the dying.

“Suddenly on the pavement was heard a loud noise of clogs and the clattering of a stick; and a voice rose — a raucous voice — that sang

“‘Maids in the warmth of a summer day
Dream of love and of love away.
The wind is strong this summer day,
Her petticoat has flown away.’”

This is the moment when Madame Bovary dies.

Thus we have here the picture: on one side the priest reciting the prayers for the dying; on the other the hand-organ player who excites from the dying woman

“an atrocious, frantic, despairing laugh, thinking she saw the hideous face of the poor wretch that stood out against the eternal night like a menace.... She fell back upon the mattress in a convulsion. They all drew near. She was dead.”

And then later, when the body is cold, above all should the cadaver, which the soul has just left, be respected. When the husband is there on his knees, weeping for his wife, when he extends the shroud over her, any other would have stopped, but M. Flaubert makes a final stroke with his brush:

“The sheet sank in from her breast to her knees, and then rose at the tips of her toes.”

This the scene of death. I have abridged it and have grouped it after a fashion. It is now for you to judge and determine whether there is a mixture of the sacred and the profane in it, or rather, a mixture of the sacred and the voluptuous.

I have related the romance, I have brought a charge against it and, permit me to say, against the kind of art that M. Flaubert cultivates, the kind that is realistic but not discreet. You shall see to what limits he has gone. A copy of the Artiste lately came to my hand; it is not for us to make accusations against the Artiste, but to learn to what school M. Flaubert belongs, and I ask your permission to read you some lines, which have nothing to do with M. Flaubert's prosecuted book, only to show to what a degree he excels in this kind of painting. He loves to paint temptations, especially the temptations to which Madame Bovary succumbed. Well, I find a model of its kind in the lines to follow, from the Artiste, for the month of January, signed Gustave Flaubert, upon the temptation of Saint Anthony. Heaven knows it is a subject upon which many things might be said, but I do not believe it possible to give more vivacity to the image, stronger lines to the picture.

Apollonius says to Saint Anthony: —

“What is knowledge? What is glory? Wouldst thou refresh thine eyes under the humid jasmines? Wouldst thou feel thy body sink itself, as in a wave, in the sweet flesh of swooning women?”

Ah! well! here is the same colour, the same strength of the brush, the same vivacity of expression!

To resume. I have analyzed the book, I have related the story without forgetting a page, I have then made the charge, which was the second part of my task. I have exhibited some of the portraits, I have shown Madame Bovary in repose, by the side of her husband, in contact with those whom she could not tempt, and I have pointed out to you the lascivious colour of that portrait! Then I have analyzed some of the great scenes: the fall with Rodolphe, the religious transition, the meetings with Léon, the death scene, and in all this I find the double count of offense against public morals and against religion.

I had need of but two scenes: Do you not see the moral outrage in the fall with Rodolphe? Do you not see the glorification of adultery in it? And then, the religious outrage, which I find in the drawing of the confession, in the religious transition, and finally, the scene of death.

You have before you, gentlemen, three guilty ones: M. Flaubert, the author of the book, M. Pichat who accepted it, and M. Pillet, who printed it. In this matter, there is no misdemeanor without publicity, and all those concerned in the publicity should be equally blamed. But we hasten to say that the manager of the Revue and the printer are only in the second rank. The principal offender is the author, M. Flaubert; M. Flaubert who admonished by a note from the editor, protested against the suppression which had been made in his work. After him comes M. Laurent Pichat, from whom you will demand a reason, not for the suppression which he has made, but of that which he should have made; and finally comes the printer, who is a sentinel at the door of scandal. M. Pillet, besides, is an honourable man against whom I have nothing to say. We ask but one thing of you, which is to apply the law to him. Printers should read; when they do not read or have read what they print, it is at their own risk and peril. Printers are not machines; they have a privilege, they take an oath, they are in a special situation and they are responsible. Again, they are, if you will permit the expression, like an advanced guard; if they allow a misdemeanor to pass, it is like allowing the enemy to pass. Make the penalty as mild as you will for Pillet, be as indulgent as you like with the manager of the Revue; but as for Flaubert, the principal culprit, it is for him you should reserve your severities!

My task is accomplished; we await the objections on the part of the defense. The general objection will be: But after all the romance is moral on the whole, for is not adultery punished?

To this objection there are two replies: I believe that in a hypothetically moral work, a moral conclusion cannot be reached by the presentation of the lascivious details we find here. And again I say: that the work is not moral at the foundation.

I say, gentlemen, that lascivious details cannot be covered by a moral conclusion, otherwise one could relate all the orgies imaginable, describe all the turpitude of a public woman, making her die in a charity bed of a hospital. It would be allowable to study and depict all the poses of lasciviousness. It would be going against all the rules of good sense. It would place the poison at the door of all, the remedy at the doors of few, if there were any remedy. Who are the ones to read M. Flaubert's romance? Are they men who are interested in political or social economy? No! The light pages of Madame Bovary fall into hands still lighter, into the hands of young girls, sometimes of married women. Well, when the imagination has been seduced, when this seduction has fallen upon the heart, when the heart shall have told it to the senses, do you believe that cold reason would have much power against this seduction of sense and sentiment? And then, man should not clothe himself too much in his power and his virtue; man has low instincts and high ideas, and, with all, virtue is only the consequence of an effort oftentimes laborious. Lascivious pictures have generally more influence than cold reason. This is what I respond to that theory, that is, as a first response; but I have a second.

I hold that the romance of Madame Bovary, from a philosophic point of view, is not moral. Without doubt Madame Bovary died of poison; she suffered much, it is true; but she died at her own time and in her own way, not because she had committed adultery but because she wished to; she died in all the prestige of her youth and beauty; she died after having two lovers, leaving a husband who loved her, who adored her, who found Rodolphe's portrait, his letters and Léon's, who read the letters of a woman twice an adulteress, and who, after that, loved her still more, even on the other side of the tomb. Who would condemn this woman in the book? No one. Such is the conclusion. There is not in the book a person who condemns her. If you can find one wise person, if you can find one single principal virtue by which the adulteress is condemned, I am wrong. But if in all the book there is not a person who makes her bow her head, there is not an idea, a line, by virtue of which the adulteress is scourged, it is I who am right, and the book is immoral!

Should it be in the name of conjugal honor that the book be condemned? No, for conjugal honor is represented here by a devoted husband who, after the death of his wife, meets Rodolphe and seeks to find upon the face of the lover the features of the woman he loved. I ask you whether you could stigmatize this woman in the name of conjugal honor when there is not in the book a single word where the husband does not bow before the adulteress?

Should it be in the name of public opinion? No, for public opinion is personified in a grotesque being, in the Homais apothecary surrounded by ridiculous persons whom this woman dominated.

Will you condemn it in the name of religious sentiment? No, for this sentiment you see personified in the curate Bournisien, a priest as grotesque as the apothecary, believing only in physical suffering, never in moral, and little more than a materialist.

Will you condemn it in the name of the author's conscience? I know not what the author thinks, but in chapter 10, the only philosophical one of his book, I read the following:

“There is always after the death of any one a kind of stupefaction; so difficult is it to grasp this advent of nothingness and to resign ourselves to believe in it.”

This is not a cry of unbelief, but it is at least a cry of scepticism. Without doubt it is difficult to comprehend and believe it, but why this stupefaction which manifest's itself at death? Why? Because this surprise is something that is a mystery, because it is difficult to comprehend and judge, although one must resign himself to it. And as for me, I say that if death is the beginning of annihilation, that if the devoted husband feels his love increase on learning of the adulteries of his wife, that if opinion is represented by a grotesque being, that if religious sentiment is represented by a ridiculous priest, one person alone is right, and that is Emma Bovary, — Messalina was right against Juvenal.

This is the conclusion of the book, drawn not by the author, but by a man who reflects and goes to the depths of things, by a man who has sought in this book for a person who could rule this woman. There is none there. The only person who ruled was Madame Bovary. It is necessary to seek elsewhere than in the book; we must look to Christian morals, which are the foundation of modern civilization. By this standard all explains itself, all becomes clear.

In its name the adulteress is stigmatized, condemned, not because her act is an imprudence, exposing her to disillusion and regrets, but because it is a crime against the family. You stigmatize and condemn suicide, not because it is a foolish thing (the fool is not responsible), not because it is a cowardly act (for it sometimes requires a certain physical courage), but because it is a scorn of duty in the life we are living, and the cry of unbelief in the life to come.

This code of morals stigmatizes realistic literature, not because it paints the passions: hatred, vengeance, love — the world sees but the surface and art should paint them — but not paint them without bridle, without limits. Art without rules is not art. It is like a woman who discards all clothing. To impose upon art the one rule of public decency is not to subject it, not to dishonor it. One grows great only by rule. These, gentlemen, are the principles which we profess, this the doctrine which we defend with conscience.

PLEA FOR THE DEFENSE, BY M. SENARD

Gentlemen, M. Gustave Flaubert has been accused before you of making a bad book; of having, in this book, outraged public morals and religion. M. Gustave Flaubert is beside me and affirms before you that he has made an honest book; he affirms before you that the thought in his book, from the first line to the last, is a moral thought; and that, if it were not perverted (and you have seen during the last hour how great a talent one may have for perverting a thought) it would be (and will become again presently) for you, as it has been already for the readers of the book, an eminently moral and religious thought capable of being translated into these words: the excitation of virtue through the horror of vice.

I bring M. Gustave Flaubert's affirmation here to you, and I put it fearlessly in the light of the prosecuting attorney's speech, for this affirmation is grave; and it is through the personality of its maker, through the circumstances which have led to the writing of the book, that I am going to make it understood to you.

The affirmation is grave on account of the personality that makes it: and, permit me to say to you that M. Gustave Flaubert is not to me an unknown man who has instructions to give me, and who has need of recommendations from me — I speak not only of his morality but of his position. I come here, into this precinct, fulfilling a duty of conscience after reading the book, after feeling myself exalted, by this reading, in all that is honest and profoundly religious. But, at the same time that I come fulfilling a duty of conscience, I come to fulfill a duty of friendship. I remember, and I can never forget, that his father was an old friend of mine. His father, by whose friendship I was long honoured, to the last day of his life, his father, — permit me to say his illustrious father, — was for thirty years surgeon-in-chief at the hospital at Rouen. He was in charge of the Dupuytren dissecting room, and in giving to science great instruction, he has endowed it with some great names; I will mention but one, that of Cloquet. He has not only left for himself a good name in science, he has left a grand memento in his immense service to humanity. And at the same time I am recalling my bond of friendship with him, I wish to tell you that his son, who has been dragged into Court for an outrage against morals and religion, this son is the friend of my children, as I was the friend of his father. I know his thought, I know his intentions, and the counsellor has the right here of placing himself as a personal guaranty of his client.

Gentlemen, a great name and great memories have obligations. Children were not wanting to M. Flaubert. There were three of them, two sons, and a daughter who died at twenty-one. The eldest has been judged worthy to succeed his father; and he is to-day, as he has been for many years, carrying on the mission which his father conducted for thirty years. The younger son is here; he is at your bar. In leaving them a considerable fortune and a great name, their father has left upon them the obligation of being men of intelligence and of heart; that is to say, useful men. The brother of my client has been thrown into a career where each day brings its own service. This one has devoted his life to study and to letters, the work before you being his first work. This first work, gentlemen, which provokes the passions, as the Government Attorney has said, is the result of long study and much thought. M. Gustave Flaubert is a man of serious character, turning his attention, through his very nature, to serious subjects, to sad subjects. He is not the man whom the prosecuting attorney, in fifteen or twenty lines bitten out here and there, has presented to you as a maker of lascivious pictures. No; there is in his nature, I repeat, all that is gravest, most serious, and even the saddest that one could imagine. His book, by restoring a single phrase, by putting beside the quoted lines the lines which precede and follow, will take on its veritable colour, as soon as you understand the intentions of the author. And, of the too clever words to which you have listened, there will remain to you only the memory of a sentiment of profound admiration for a talent which can thus transform things.

I have told you that M. Gustave Flaubert was a serious and grave man. His studies, conforming to his nature, have been serious and broad. They have embraced not only all branches of literature, but the right branches. M. Flaubert is not the man to be content with observations of even the best where he lived; he has sought out the best in other places; Qui mores multorum vidit et urbes.

After his father's death and the completion of his studies at college, he visited Italy, and from 1848 to 1852 traveled through the countries of the Orient, — Egypt, Palestine, Asia Minor — in which countries, doubtless, a man traveling through and bringing to his travels a fine intelligence, could acquire something exalted, something poetic, as well as the colour and prestige of style which the public minister has just pointed out, to make good the misdemeanor that he imputes. That prestige of style, those literary qualities pointed to with éclat in this debate, are there, but after no fashion can they be brought up for indictment.

Since his return, in 1852, M. Gustave Flaubert has written and sought to produce in a grand outline the result of his close and serious studies, the result of what he had gathered in his journeys.

What is the outline he has chosen, the subject he has taken, and how has he treated it? My client belongs to any of the schools, whose names I have just learned in the Attorney's speech. Heaven knows he belongs to the realistic school, in that he occupies himself with the reality of things. He belongs to the psychological school, in the sense that it is not material things which engage him, but human sentiment and the development of the passions wherever the human being is placed. He belongs to the romantic school less perhaps than to any other, because, if romanticism appears in his book, as does realism, it appears only in some ironical expressions here and there, which the public attorney has taken seriously. What M. Flaubert especially wished was to take a subject of study from real life, creating from it some true types of the middle class, arriving finally at some useful result. Yes, what has most occupied my client in the studies to which he has devoted himself, is precisely this useful aim, followed out in putting upon the scene three or four personages from actual society, living in the conditions of real life, and presenting them to the eyes of the reader in a true picture of what is met with very often in the world.

The Prosecuting Attorney, summing up his opinion of Madame Bovary, has said:

"The second title of this work might be: The Story of the Adulteries of a Provincial Woman."

I protest vigorously against this title. This alone, had I not listened to your speech from beginning to end, would prove to me the prejudice in which you are firmly bound. No! the second title of this work is not: The Story of the Adulteries of a Provincial Woman; it is, if it is absolutely necessary to have a second title: the story of the education too often met with in the provinces; the story of the perils to which such an education leads; the story of degradation, of dishonesty, of suicide, considered as a consequence of a first fault, and a fault led up to through wrong-doing, by which a young woman is often carried away. It is the story of an education, and the deplorable life of which such an education is often the preface. This is what M. Flaubert desired to paint, and not the adulteries of a woman of the provinces. You will see this at once on reading the incriminated book.

Now, the prosecuting attorney perceives in all this, and through it all, a lascivious colour. If it were possible to take the number of lines of the book which he has cut out, and put parallel to them other lines that he has left, we should have a total proportion of about one to five hundred; and you would see that this proportion of one to five hundred was in no way of a lascivious colour; it exists only under the conditions of being cut out and commented upon.

Now, what has M. Flaubert desired to paint? First, education given to a woman which is above the conditions to which she was born — something that too often happens among us, it must be confessed. Then, the mixture of discordant elements that are thus produced in the intelligence of the woman; and then when marriage comes, especially if the marriage is not in accordance with the education, but rather with the conditions under which the woman was born, the author explains all these facts which occur in the situation that he depicts.

What has he shown? He shows a woman entering upon vice because of a disappointing match; then vice in its last degree, degradation and wretchedness. Presently, when through the reading of several passages, I shall have made you acquainted with the book as a whole, I shall demand of this tribunal the privilege of their accepting the question on these terms: Would this book, put into the hands of a young woman, have the effect of leading her towards easy pleasures, towards adultery, or, on the contrary, would it show her the danger of the first step, and bring upon her a shiver of horror? The question thus put, your conscience would soon decide.

I have here stated that M. Flaubert wished to paint a woman who, instead of trying to adapt herself to the conditions in which she was placed, to her position and her birth, instead of seeking to make herself a part of the life to which she belonged, was occupied with a thousand foreign aspirations drawn from an education too far above her; instead of accommodating herself to the duties of her position, of being the tranquil wife of a country doctor with whom she should pass her days, in place of seeking her happiness in her house and in her marriage, sought it in interminable fancies; and then, meeting a young man upon the way who coquetted with her, she played the same game with him (Heaven knows they were both inexperienced enough!) urging herself on by degrees, and frightened when she turned to the religion of her early years and found it insufficient. We shall see presently why this was so. At first, the young man's ignorance and her own preserves her from danger. But she soon meets a man, of the kind of which there are too many in the world, who takes possession of her — this poor woman, already perverted and ready to stray. Here is the main point; now it is necessary to see what the book makes of it.

The Public Minister becomes incensed, and I believe wrongly so from the standard of conscience and the human heart, over that first scene, where Madame Bovary finds a sort of pleasure, of joy, in having broken her prison, and returns to her home saying: "I have a lover." Do you believe that this is not the first cry of the human heart! The proof is between you and me. But we must look a little further, and then we shall see that, if the first moment, the first instant of the fall, excites in this woman a sort of transport of joy, of delirium, in some lines farther on the deception makes itself manifest and, following the expression of the author, she seems humiliated in her own eyes.

Yes, deception, grief, and remorse come to her at the same time. The man in whom she has confided, to whom she has given herself up, has only made use of her for the moment, as he would a plaything; remorse and regret now rend her heart. It has shocked you to hear this called the disillusion of adultery; you would have preferred pollution at the hand of a writer who placed before you a woman who, not having comprehended marriage, felt herself polluted by contact with her husband, and who, having sought her ideal elsewhere, found the disillusions of adultery. This word has shocked you; in the place of disillusions, you would have wished pollution of adultery. This tribunal shall be the judge. As for me, if I had depicted the same personage I would have said to her: Poor woman! if you believe that your husband's kisses are monotonous and wearisome, if you have found only platitudes — this word has been especially brought to our notice — the platitudes of marriage — if you seem to see pollution in a union where love does not preside, take care, for your dreams are an illusion, and you will one day be cruelly deceived. But this man, gentlemen, who knows how to speak strongly, makes use of the word pollution to express what we would have called disillusion, and he has used the true word, although vague to him who can bring to it no intelligence. I would have liked better his not speaking so strongly, his not pronouncing the word pollution, but rather averting the woman from deception, from disillusion, and saying to her: Where you believe you will find love, you will find only libertinism; where you think you will find happiness, there is only bitterness. A husband who goes tranquilly about his affairs, who kisses you, puts on his house cap and eats his soup with you, is a prosaic husband revolting to you; you aspire to a man who will love you, idolize you; poor child! that man will be a libertine who will have taken you for a minute for the sake of playing with you. There will be some illusion about it the first time, perhaps the second; you may come back home joyous, singing the song of adultery. "I have a lover!" but the third time you will not wish to go to him, for the disillusion will have come. The man you have dreamed of will have lost all his prestige; you will have found again in love the platitudes of marriage, and this time with scorn, disdain, disgust and poignant remorse.

This, gentlemen, is what M. Flaubert has said, what he has painted, what is in each line of his book; and this is what distinguishes his work from all other works of the kind. Under his hand, the great irregularities of society figure on each page, and adultery walks abroad full of disgust and shame. He has brought into the common relations of life the most powerful teaching that can be given to a young woman. And Heaven knows that to those of our young women who do not find in lofty, honest principle and stern religion enough to keep them steady in the accomplishment of their duties as mothers, or who do not find it in that resignation and practical science of life which bids us accommodate ourselves to what we have, but who carry their dreams to the outside (and the most honest, the most pure of our young women, in the prosaic life of their households, are sometimes tormented by that which is going on outside), a book like this would bring but one reflection. Of that you may be sure. And this is what M. Flaubert has intended.

And notice carefully one thing: M. Flaubert is not the man who has painted a charming adultery for you, in order to arrive later with the Deus ex machina; no, you are carried too quickly on to the last page. Adultery with him is only a series of torments, remorse and regret; and then he arrives at the final, frightful expiation. It is excessive. If M. Flaubert sins, it is through excess; and I will show you presently what is meant by this. The expiation is not allowed to wait, and it is that which makes the book eminently moral and useful. It does not promise the young woman some beautiful years at the end of which she can say: after this, one is willing to die. No! from the second day there is bitterness and disillusion. The conclusion for morality is found in each line of the book.

This book is written with a power of observation to which the Government Attorney has rendered justice. And it is here that I would call your attention to it, because if the accusation is without foundation, it must fall. This book is written with a power truly remarkable for observing the smallest details. An article in the Artiste, signed Flaubert, has served as yet another text for the accusation. Let the Government Attorney note, first that this article is foreign to the indictment; then, that we will hold him innocent and moral in the eyes of this tribunal on one condition, which is, that he will have the goodness to read the entire article from the place of the cutting.

The most noticeable thing in M. Flaubert's book is what some accounts have called a fidelity wholly Daguerreian in the reproduction of the type of things, and in the intimate nature of the thought of the human heart; — and this reproduction becomes more powerful still by the magic of his style. Now notice, that if he had applied this fidelity only to the scenes of degradation, you could say with reason: the author has been pleased to paint the scenes of degradation with that power of description which is peculiarly his own. From the first to the last page of his book, he keeps close to all the facts in Emma's life, without any kind of reserve, from her infancy in her father's house, to her education in the convent, sparing nothing. And those of us who have read the book from beginning to end can say — and this is a notable point which should put him in a favorable light with you, not only bringing him acquittal, but removing from him every kind of misunderstanding — that when he comes to the difficult parts, precisely at the time of degradation, in place of doing as some classic authors have done, (as the Public Attorney knows full well, but whom he forgot when he wrote his address) a few pages of whose writings I have with me here, (not to read to you but for you to run through in Court — and I might quote a few lines here presently), in place of doing as our great classic authors, our great masters have done, who never hesitate at description when they have come to the scene of a union of the senses between man and woman, M. Flaubert contents himself with a word. All his descriptive power disappears, because his thought is chaste; because where he might write in his own manner and with the magic of his style, he feels that there are some things that should not be described or even touched upon. The Public Attorney finds that he has still said too much. When I have shown him some men who, in great philosophical works, have delighted in descriptions of these things, and when in the light of this fact I have shown that this man, who possesses the descriptive faculty to so high a degree and who, far from using it, desists and abstains from it, I shall indeed have the right to ask why this accusation has been brought?

Nevertheless, gentlemen, just as he has described to us the pleasant cradle of Emma's infancy, with its foliage, its rose-colored and white flowers which gladdened her with their blossoms and their perfume, so he has described her when she went out from there into other paths, into paths where she found mire, where her feet became soiled from its contact, when the mire rose higher than herself and — he need not have told it! But that would be to suppress the book completely, and I am going far enough to say would suppress its moral element under a pretext of defending it; for if a fault cannot be shown, if it cannot be pointed out, if in a picture of real life which aims to show, through thought, peril, fall and punishment, you would debar painting such as this, it is evident you would cut out of the book its whole purpose.

This book was not a matter of a few hours' amusement for my client. It represents two or three years of incessant study. And now I am going to tell you something more: M. Flaubert who, after so many years of labor, so many of study, so many journeys, so many notes culled from authors he had read, — and Heaven grant you may see the fountain-head from which he has drawn, for this strange fact will take upon itself his justification — M. Flaubert (and his lascivious colour) — you will find impregnated wholly with Bossuet and Massillon. It is in the study of these authors that we shall presently find him seeking, not to plagiarize, but to reproduce in his descriptions the thoughts and colours employed by them. And can you believe, after all that, having done this work with so much love for it, and with a decided purpose, that, full of confidence in himself, and after so much study and meditation, he would wish to throw himself immediately into the arena? He would have done it, no doubt, had he been an unknown man, if his name had belonged to himself in sole ownership, had he believed himself able to dispose of it and use it as it seemed good to him; but, I repeat, he is one of those upon whom rests the obligation of rank. His name is Flaubert, he is the second son of M. Flaubert, and he has desired to make a place for himself in literature, profoundly respecting the moral and religious phases of it, — not through the notoriety of a lawsuit, for such a purpose could not enter his thoughts — but through personal dignity, not wishing his name to be at the head of a publication that did not seem to some persons and to those in whom he had faith, worthy of being published. M. Flaubert read in fragments, and even in totality, to friends holding high places in the world of letters, the pages which he hoped some day to print, and I assure you that not one of them has been offended by what has just now excited such lively severity on the part of the Government Attorney. No one even thought of it. They simply examined and studied the literary value of the book. As to the moral purpose, it is so evident, so written in every line in terms so unequivocal that there was no need of raising the question.

Reassured upon the value of the book, encouraged, furthermore, by the most eminent men of the press, M. Flaubert thought only of printing it and giving it to the public. I repeat: everyone was unanimous in rendering homage to its literary merit, to its style, and at the same time to the excellent thought that pervaded it, from the first line to the last. And when this action was brought it was not he alone who was surprised and profoundly troubled, but, permit me to say, we, who cannot understand the action, and I myself most of all, who had read the book with a very lively interest as soon as it was published. But we are his intimate friends. Heaven knows that there are some shades of meaning that might escape us in our easy-going habits which never could escape women of great intelligence, of great purity and unquestioned chastity. These are not names which can be pronounced in this audience, but if I could tell you what has been said to Flaubert, what has been said to me, even, by mothers of families who have read this book, if I could tell you their astonishment, after receiving from that reading an impression so good that they believed they should thank the author for it, if I could tell you their astonishment, their grief, when they learned that this book was thought to oppose public morals and religious faith, the faith of their whole life, God knows there would be in the sum of this appreciation sufficient to fortify me, had I need of being fortified for this combat with the Public Attorney.

However, in the midst of all the appreciative voices of contemporaneous literature there is one which I wish to mention to you. There is one who is not only respected by reason of a grand and beautiful character, who, in the midst of adversity, of suffering even, has struggled courageously each day; who is not only great by virtue of many deeds useless to recall here, but great through his literary works which must be recalled because here he is an authority; great especially through the purity which exists in all his works, through the chastity of all his writings: Lamartine.

Lamartine did not know my client; he did not know that he existed. Lamartine, at his home in the country, read Madame Bovary in each number of the Revue de Paris, and Lamartine found there such power that it recurred to him again and again, as I am going to tell you.

After some days, Lamartine returned to Paris, and the next day informed himself where M. Gustave Flaubert lived. He sent to the Revue to learn where M. Gustave Flaubert lived, who had published in the magazine some articles under the title of Madame Bovary. He then directed his secretary to go and present his compliments to M. Flaubert, to express for him the satisfaction he had found in reading his book, and also his desire to see the new author who revealed himself in an essay of that order.

My client went to Lamartine's house; and he found in him not only a man who encouraged him, but who said to him:

“You have made the best book I have read in twenty years.”

In a word, his praise was such that, in his modesty, my client scarcely liked to repeat it to me. Lamartine proved to him that he had read each number, proving it most graciously by repeating entire pages from them. Lamartine only added:

“While I have read even to the last page without reserve, I did blame the last pages. You have hurt me, you have literally made me suffer! The punishment is beyond all proportion to the crime; you have created a pitifully frightful death! Assuredly the woman who defiles the marriage bed should expect punishment, but this is horrible; it is a punishment such as I have never seen. You have gone too far; you have done mischief to my nerves. That power of description which you have applied to the last moment of death has left upon me an indelible suffering!”

And when Gustave Flaubert said to him:

“But, Monsieur de Lamartine, do you know that I have been indicted and summoned to a court of correction for an offense against public morals and religion for having made a book like that?”

Lamartine answered:

“I believe that I have been all my life a man who, in literary works as well as others, comprehends fully what makes for public and religious morals; my dear child, it is not possible to find in France a tribunal that will convict you.”

This is what passed between Lamartine and Flaubert yesterday, and I have the right to say to you that this approval is among those which are worthy to be well weighed.

This well understood, let us see how my conscience could tell me that Madame Bovary was a good book, a good deed. And I ask your permission to add that I do not take to these things easily, this facility is not my habit. Some literary works I take up which, although emanating from our great writers, do not remain two minutes before my eyes. I will pass to you in the council chamber some lines that I took no delight in reading, and I will ask your permission to say to you that when I came to the end of M. Flaubert’s work, I was convinced that a cutting made by the Revue de Paris was the cause of all this. I shall ask you further to add my appreciation to this highest and most distinguished appreciation which I am about to mention.

Here, gentlemen, is a portfolio filled with the opinions of all the literary men of our time upon the work with which we are engaged, among whom are some of the most distinguished, expressing their astonishment upon reading this new work, at once so moral and so useful!

Now, how has it come about that a work like this can incur a process of law? If you will permit me, I will tell you. The Revue de Paris, whose reading committee had read the work in its entirety, for the manuscript was sent long before it was published, evidently found nothing to criticise. When it came time to print the copy of December 1st, 1856, one of the directors of the Revue became affrighted at the scene in the cab. He said: "This is not conventional, we must suppress it." Flaubert was offended by the suppression. He was not willing that it should be made unless a note to that effect were placed at the bottom of the page. It was he who exacted the note. It is he who, on account of his self-respect as an author, neither wishing to have his work mutilated nor, on the other hand wishing to make trouble for the Revue, said: "You may suppress it if it seems best to you, but you will state that you have suppressed something." And they agreed upon the following note:

"The directors have seen the necessity of suppressing a passage here which did not seem fitting to the Revue de Paris; we give notice of it to the author."

Here is the suppressed passage which I am going to read to you. We have only a proof, which we had great difficulty in procuring. The first part has not a single correction; one word is corrected in the second part.

"Where to, sir?" asked the coachman.

"Where you like," said Léon, forcing Emma into the cab.

"And the lumbering machine set out. It went down the Rue Grand-Pont, crossed the Place des Arts, the Quai Napoléon, the Pont Neuf, and stopped short before the statue of Pierre Corneille.

"Go on," cried a voice that came from within.

"The cab went on again, and as soon as it reached the Carrefour Lafayette, set off down-hill, and entered the station at a gallop.

"No, straight on!" cried the same voice.

“The cab came out by the gate, and soon having reached the Cours, trotted quietly beneath the elm-trees. The coachman wiped his brow, put his leather hat between his knees, and drove his carriage beyond the side alley by the meadow to the margin of the waters.

“It went along by the river, along the towing-path paved with sharp pebbles, and for a long while in the direction of Oyssel, beyond the isles.

“But suddenly it turned with a dash across Quatre-mares, Sotteville, La Grande-Chaussée, the Rue d’Elbeuf, and made its third halt in front of the Jardin des Plantes.

““Get on, will you?” cried the voice more furiously.

“And at once resuming its course, it passed by Saint-Sever, by the Quai des Curandiers, the Quai aux Meules, once more over the bridge, by the Place du Champ de Mars, and behind the hospital gardens, where old men in black coats were walking in the sun along the terrace all green with ivy. It went up the Boulevard Bouvreuil, along the Boulevard Cauchoise, then the whole of Mont-Riboudet to the Deville hills.

“It came back; and then, without any fixed plan or direction, wandered about at hazard. The cab was seen at Saint-Pol, at Lescure, at Mont Gargan, at La Rouge-Marc and Place du Gaillardbois; in the Rue Maladrerie, Rue Dinanderie, before Saint-Romain, Saint-Vivien, Saint-Maclou, Saint-Nicaise — in front of the Customs, at the ‘Vieille Tour,’ the ‘Trois Pipes,’ and the Monumental Cemetery. From time to time, the coachman on his box cast despairing eyes at the public-houses. He could not understand what furious desire for locomotion urged these individuals never to wish to stop. He tried to now and then, and at once exclamations of anger burst forth behind him. Then he lashed his perspiring jades afresh, but indifferent to their jolting, running up against things here and there, not caring if he did, demoralised, and almost weeping with thirst, fatigue, and depression.

“And on the harbour in the midst of the drays and casks and in the streets at the corners, the good folk opened large wonder-stricken eyes at this sight, so extraordinary in the provinces, a cab with blinds drawn, and which appeared thus constantly shut more closely than a tomb, and tossing about like a vessel.

“Once, in the middle of the day, in the open country, just as the sun beat most fiercely against the old plated lanterns, a bared hand passed beneath the small blinds of yellow canvas, and threw out some scraps of paper that scattered in the wind, and farther off alighted like white butterflies on a field of red clover all in bloom.

“At about six o’clock, the carriage stopped in a back street of the Beauvoisine Quarter, and a woman got out, who walked with her veil down, and without turning her head.

“On reaching the inn, Madame Bovary was surprised not to see the diligence. Hivert, who had waited for her fifty-three minutes, had at last started.

“Nothing, however, could prevent her setting out; she had promised to return that evening. Moreover, Charles expected her, and in her heart she felt already that cowardly docility that is for some women at once the chastisement and atonement of adultery.”

M. Flaubert calls my attention to the fact that the Public Attorney condemned this last clause.

THE GOVERNMENT ATTORNEY:

No, I have pointed it out.

M. SENARD:

It is certain that if he had made a reproach it would have fallen before these words: “at once the chastisement and atonement of adultery.” Furthermore, that could be made a matter of reproach with as much foundation as the other quotations, for in all that you have condemned there is no point that can be seriously held.

Now, gentlemen, this kind of fantastic journey having displeased the editors of the Revue, it was suppressed. This was certainly excess of reserve on the part of the Revue; and it is very certain that it is not an excess of reserve which could furnish material for a lawsuit. You shall see now what has furnished the material. What is not seen, what has been suppressed, comes thus to appear a very strange thing. People imagine many things, and often those which do not exist, as you have seen from the reading of the original passage. Heavens! Do you know what they imagined? Probably that there was in the suppressed passage something analogous to that which you will have the goodness to read in one of the most marvellous romances from the pen of an honorable member of the French Academy, M. Mérimée.

M. Mérimée, in a romance entitled The Double Mistake, describes a scene which took place in a postchaise. It is not the locality where the carriage is that is of importance, it is, as here, in the detail of what is done in the interior. I do not wish to abuse the audience, and will pass the book to the Public Attorney and to the court. If we had written a half, or a quarter part of what M. Mérimée wrote, I should find some embarrassment in the task that has been given me, or rather I should have to modify it; in place of saying what I have said, and what I affirm, that M. Flaubert has written a good book, an honest book, useful and moral, I should say: literature has its rights; M. Mérimée has made a very remarkable literary work, and it is not necessary to show ourselves too particular about details when the whole is irreproachable. I take my stand there; I should acquit, and you will acquit. Great Heavens! It is not by omission that an author can sin in a matter of this kind. And besides, you will have the detail of that which took place in the cab. But as my client himself was content to make a journey, revealing what passed in the interior of the carriage only by a bare hand which appeared under the yellow silk curtains and threw out bits of torn paper which were scattered by the wind and settled down afar off like white butterflies upon a field of red clover all in flower, as my client was content with that, no one knew anything about it and everyone supposed — from the suppression itself — that he had at least said as much as the member of the French Academy. You have seen that there was nothing in it.

Ah, well! this unfortunate suppression has caused the lawsuit! That is to say, when, in the offices where they have charge, and with infinite reason, of inspecting all writings which could offend public morals, they saw this cut, they took warning. I am obliged to declare, and, gentlemen of the Revue, allow me to state that they started the work of their scissors two words too far off; they should have begun before they got into the cab. To cut after that was more difficult. This cutting was indeed most unfortunate; but if you have committed the error, gentlemen of the Revue, assuredly you will atone for it to-day.

They said in the inspecting office: Take heed of what is to follow, and when the following number appeared, they made war on it to the syllable. The people in the office are not obliged to read all; and when they saw that some one had written about a woman removing all her clothing, they were startled enough without going further. It is true that, differing from our great masters, Flaubert has not taken the trouble to describe the alabaster of her bare arms, throat, etc. He has not said, as did a poet whom we love:

I see her alabaster limbs ardent and pure,
Smooth as ebony, like the lily, coral, roses, veins of azure,
Such indeed, as in former times thou showedst to me
Of nudity embellished and adorned;
When nights slipped by, and pillows soft
Saw thee from my kisses waking and sleeping oft.

He has said nothing like this of André Chénier's. But he finally said:

"She abandoned herself.... Her clothing fell from her."

She abandoned herself! Why not? Is all description to be prohibited? But when one makes an incriminating charge, he should read the whole, and the Government Attorney has not read the whole. The passage he makes the charge against does not stop where he stopped; it has a corrective, and here it is:

"Nevertheless, there was upon this brow covered with cold drops, upon these stammering lips, in these bewildered eyes, in the clasp of these arms something extreme, something vague and lugubrious which seemed to Léon to glide between them in some subtle fashion, as if to separate them."

In the office they did not read that. The Government Attorney just now did not notice it. He only saw this:

"Then, with a single gesture, she allowed all her clothes to fall from her."

And then he cries out: An outrage to public morals! Surely, it is too easy to accuse with a system like this. God forbid that the authors of dictionaries fall under the Government Attorney's hand! Who could escape condemnation if, by means of cutting, not of phrases, but of words, one is to be informed of a list he has made that might offend morals or religion?

My client's first thought, which unfortunately met with resistance, was this: "There is only one thing to do: print the book immediately, not with parts cut out, but the work entire as it left my hands, restoring to it the scene in the cab." I was of his opinion, believing that the best defense of my client would be a complete imprint of the work with special indication of some points to which we would beg to draw the Court's attention. I myself gave the title to this publication: Memoir of Gustave Flaubert for the prevention of outrage to religious morals brought against him. I had written on it with my hand: Civil Court, Sixth Chamber, with the signature of the President and the Public Minister. There was a preface in which was written:

"They have indicted me with phrases taken here and there from my book; I can only defend myself with the whole book."

To ask the judges to read an entire romance would be asking much; but we are before judges who love truth, who desire the truth, and who to learn it would not shrink from any fatigue. We are before judges who desire justice and desire it energetically, and who will read, without any kind of hesitation, what we beg them to read. I said to M. Flaubert: "Send this immediately to the printers, and put my name at the bottom beside yours: SENARD, Counsel." They had begun the printing; arrangements were made for a hundred copies for our own use; the work went on with extreme rapidity, they were working day and night on it, when the order came to us to discontinue the printing, not of a book, but of a pamphlet in which was the incriminated work together with explanatory notes. We appealed to the office of the Attorney-General — who informed us that the prohibition was absolute and could not be removed.

Well, so be it! We should have published the book with our notes and observation's; but now I ask you, gentlemen, if your first reading has left you in doubt, to give it a second reading. You will willingly do this, as you desire the truth; and you could not be among those who, when two lines of a man's writing is brought to them, are sure to make it fit any condition that may be. You do not wish a man to be judged upon a few cuttings more or less skilfully made. You would not allow that; you would not deprive him of the ordinary means of defense. Well, you have the book, and although it may be less easy than you might wish, you will make your own divisions, observations, and meanings, because you desire the truth, because truth is necessary for the basis of your judgment, and truth will come from a serious examination of the book.

However, I cannot stop here. The Public Minister has attacked the book, and it is necessary for me to defend it, to complete the quotations he has made, and show the nothingness of the accusation against each incriminated passage; that will be all my defense.

I shall not attempt, assuredly, to place myself in opposition to the exalted, animated, pathetic appreciation with which the Public Attorney has surrounded all that he said, by striving for appreciation of the same kind; the defense would have no right to make use of such a manner of procedure; it must content itself with citing the text, such as it is.

And in the first place, I declare that nothing is more false than what has just been said about lascivious colour. Lascivious colour! Where can you find it? My client has depicted in Madame Bovary what sort of woman? My God! it is sad to say, and yet it is true, a young girl, born, as they nearly all are, honest; at least the greater number are honest, but very fragile, when education, instead of fortifying them, softens them and turns them into bad paths. He has depicted a young girl. Is she of perverse nature? No, but of an impressionable nature, susceptible of exaltation.

The Government Attorney has said: "This young girl has constantly been presented in a lascivious light." No! she is represented as born in the country, born on a farm, where she is occupied with all her father's labor, and where no kind of lasciviousness can find a way to her mind or heart. Then she is represented, in the place of following the destiny which would be hers naturally, instead of being brought up for the farm or in some analogous place in which she ought to live, she is represented as under the short-sighted authority of a father who thinks he must have his daughter educated in a convent, this girl born on a farm, who should marry a farmer, or a man of the country. She is then taken to a convent, outside her sphere. As there is nothing that does not have weight in the Public Attorney's speech, we must leave nothing without a response. Ah! you spoke of her little sins, and in quoting from the first number, you said:

"When she went to confession, she invented little sins, in order that she might stay there longer, kneeling in the shadow ... beneath the whisperings of the priest." You have gravely deceived yourself in regard to my client's meaning. He has not committed the fault with which you reproach him; the error is wholly on your side, in the first place upon the age of the girl. As she entered the convent at thirteen, it is evident that she must have been fourteen when she went to confession. She was not then a child of ten years, as it has pleased you to say, and you were materially deceived on that point. But I am not so sure of the unlikelihood of a child of ten years liking to remain at the confessional “under the whisperings of the priest.”

All that I desire is that you read the lines which precede, and that is not easy, I agree. And here appears the inconvenience of not having a pamphlet memoir at hand; with such an aid, we should not have to search through six volumes!

I have called your attention to this passage in order to recall it to Madame Bovary and her true character. Will you permit me to say, what seems to me very important, that M. Flaubert has fully comprehended this point and put it in bold relief. There is a kind of religion which is generally spoken of to young girls, which is the worst of all religion. There may be in this regard a difference of opinion. As for me, I declare clearly that I know nothing more beautiful, or useful, or necessary to sustain, not only women in the ways of life but men themselves, who sometimes have the most difficult trials to overcome, I know nothing so useful, so necessary, as the religious sentiment, but a serious religious sentiment, and permit me to add, severe.

I wish my children to believe in one God, not a God in the abstractness of pantheism, but in a Supreme Being with whom they have relationship, to whom they are accustomed to pray, and who at once awes and fortifies them. This thought, you see, it is your belief as well as mine, is our strength in evil days, is our strength against what we call the world; the refuge; or better still, the strength of the weak. It is this thought which gives women that stability which makes them resigned to a thousand little things in life, which makes them carry all their suffering to God, and ask of Him grace to fulfill their duty. That religion, gentlemen, is the Christian religion, and it is that which establishes a relationship between God and man. Christianity, in placing a sort of intermediary power between God and ourselves, renders God more accessible, and communication with Him easier. That the Mother of Him who has made Himself the Saviour should receive the prayers of women, cannot affect, so far as I can see, purity, religious sanctity, or religious sentiment itself. But here is where the change begins. In order to accommodate a religion to all natures, all sorts of petty, miserable, paltry things are introduced. The pomp of the ceremonies, instead of being a true pomp which lays hold on the soul, often degenerates into a commerce in relics, medals, of little saints and Virgins. To what, gentlemen, do the minds of children, curious, ardent, and tender, lend themselves, especially the minds of young girls? To all these enfeebled, attenuated, miserable images of the religious spirit. They then take upon themselves little religious duties to put in practice, little devotions of tenderness, of love, and in the place of having in their soul the sentiment of God, the sentiment of duty, they abandon themselves to reveries, to little devices, to little devotions. And then comes the poesy, and then comes, it is very necessary to say it, a thousand thoughts of charity, of tenderness, of mystic love, a thousand forms which deceive young girls and sensualize religion. These poor children, naturally credulous and weak, take to all this poesy and reverie instead of attaching themselves to something more reasonable and severe. Whence it happens that you have very many strong devotees among women who are not religious at all. And when the wind blows them from the path where they ought to walk, in place of finding strength to combat it, they find only a kind of sensuality which bewilders them.

Ah! you have accused me of having confounded the religious element with sensualism, in the picture of modern society! Accuse rather the society in the midst of which we live, but do not accuse the man who cries with Bossuet: "Awake and be on thy guard against peril!" And say to the fathers of families: Take care! These are not good customs for your daughters; there is in all these mixtures of mysticism something which sensualises religion; say that, and you will speak the truth. It is for this that you accuse Flaubert; it is for this that I exalt his conduct. Yes, he has given very good warning of the whole family of dangers arising from exaltation among young persons, who take upon themselves petty devotions instead of attaching themselves to a strong and severe religion which would sustain them in a day of weakness. And now you shall see whence comes the invention of the little sins "under the whisperings of the priest." Read page 30:

"She had read 'Paul and Virginia,' and she had dreamed of the little bamboo-house, the nigger Domingo, the dog Fidèle, but above all the sweet friendship of some dear little brother, who seeks red fruit for you on trees taller than steeples, or who runs barefoot over the sand, bringing you a bird's nest."

Is this lascivious, gentlemen? Let us continue.

THE GOVERNMENT ATTORNEY:

I did not say that passage was lascivious.

M. SENARD:

I ask your pardon, but it is precisely in this passage that you found a lascivious phrase, and it was only by isolating it from what preceded and what followed that you could make it seem lascivious.

"Instead of attending to mass, she looked at the pious vignettes with their azure borders in her book, and she loved the sick lamb, the sacred heart pierced with sharp arrows, or the poor Jesus sinking beneath the cross he carries. She tried, by way of mortification, to eat nothing a whole day. She puzzled her head to find some vow to fulfill."

Do not forget this; when one invents little sins to confess and seeks some vow to fulfill, as you will find in the preceding line, evidently one has got ideas that are a little false from somewhere. And now I ask you if I have to discuss your passage! I continue:

"In the evening, before prayers, there was some religious reading in the study. On week-nights it was some abstract of sacred history or the Lectures of the Abbé Frayssinous, and on Sundays passages from the 'Génie du Christianism,' as a recreation. How she listened at first to the sonorous lamentations of its romantic melancholies re-echoing through the world and eternity! If her childhood had been spent in the shop-parlor of some business quarter, she might perhaps have opened her heart to those lyrical invasions of Nature, which usually come to us only through translation in books. But she knew the country too well; she knew the lowing of cattle, the milking, the plow. Accustomed to calm aspects of life, she turned, on the contrary, to those of excitement. She loved the sea only for the sake of its storms, and the green fields only when broken up by ruins. She wished to get some personal profit out of things, and she rejected as useless all that did not contribute to the immediate desire of her heart, being of a temperament, more sentimental than artistic, looking for emotions not landscapes."

You shall see with what delicate precaution the author has introduced a saintly old maid, and how, with a purport of teaching religion, there is allowed to slip into the convent a new element, through the introduction of romance brought in by a stranger. Do not forget this when the subject of religious morals is under consideration.

“At the convent there was an old maid who came for a week each month to mend the linen. Patronized by the clergy, because she belonged to an ancient family of noblemen ruined by the Revolution, she dined in the refectory at the table of the good sisters, and after the meal had a bit of chat with them before going back to her work. The girls often slipped out from the study to go and see her. She knew by heart the love-songs of the last century, and sang them in a low voice as she stitched away. She told stories, gave them news, went errands in the town, and on the sly lent the big girls some novel, that she always carried in the pockets of her apron, and of which the good lady herself swallowed long chapters in the intervals of her work.”

This is nothing but marvellous, speaking from a literary point of view, and absolution can but be granted a man who has written these admirable passages as a warning against all perils of education of this kind, as an indication to young women of the stumbling-blocks in the life in which they will be placed. Let us continue:

“They were all love, lovers, sweet-hearts, persecuted ladies fainting in lonely pavilions, postilions killed at every stage, horses ridden to death on every page, sombre forests, heartaches, vows, sobs, tears and kisses, little skiffs by moonlight, nightingales in shady groves, ‘gentlemen’ brave as lions, gentle as lambs, virtuous as no one ever was, always well dressed, and weeping like fountains. For six months, then, Emma, at fifteen years of age, made her hands dirty with books from old lending libraries. With Walter Scott, later, she fell in love with historical events, dreamed of old chests, guardrooms and minstrels. She would have liked to live in some old manor-house, like those long-waisted châtelaines who, in the shade of pointed arches, spent their days leaning on the stone, chin in hand, watching a cavalier with white plume galloping on his black horse from the distant fields. At this time, she had a cult for Mary Stuart and enthusiastic veneration for illustrious or unhappy women. Joan of Arc, Héloïse, Agnès Sorel, the beautiful Ferronnière, and Clémence Isaure stood out to her like comets in the dark immensity of heaven, where also were seen, lost in shadow, and all unconnected, St. Louis with his oak, the dying Bayard, some cruelties of Louis XI., a little of St. Bartholomew's, the plume of the Béarnais, and always the remembrance of the plates painted in honor of Louis XIV.

"In the music-class, in the ballads she sang, there was nothing but little angels with golden wings, madonnas, lagunes, gondoliers; — mild compositions that allowed her to catch a glimpse athwart the obscurity of style and the weakness of the music of the attractive phantasmagoria of sentimental realities."

Now, you have not remembered this, when that poor country girl, having returned to the farm and married a village physician, is invited to an evening party at the Castle, to which you have sought to call the attention of the judges to show that there was something lascivious in a waltz she took part in. You have not called to mind this education when this poor woman is charmed that an invitation comes to take her from her husband's common fireside and lead her to the Castle, where she sees fine gentlemen, beautiful ladies, and the old duke, who, they said, had had great fortune at Court! The Government Attorney has shown some fine emotions à propos of Queen Marie-Antoinette! Assuredly there is not one of us who would not share his thought; like him, we have trembled at the name of this victim of the Revolution, but it is not with Marie-Antoinette that we are concerned here, it is with the Castle Vaubyessard.

There was an old duke there who had had, they said, relations with the queen, and towards whom all eyes were turned. And when this young woman found herself thus transported into the midst of the world, thus realizing all the fantastic dreams of her youth, can you wonder at the intoxication of it? And you accuse her of being lascivious! Better accuse the waltz itself; that dance of our great modern balls where, said a late author writing about it, the woman "leans her head upon the shoulder of her partner whose limbs embrace her." You find Madame Bovary lascivious in Flaubert's description, but there is not a man, and I will not except you, who, having taken part in a ball like that and seen that sort of waltz, has not had in mind the wish that his wife or his daughter refrain from this pleasure which has in it so much of the untamed. If, counting upon the chastity which enveloped this young woman, we allow her sometimes to give herself up to this pleasure which the world sanctions, it is necessary to count very much upon that envelope of chastity and, however much one may count upon it, it is not unheard of to express the impressions which M. Flaubert has expressed in the name of morals and chastity.

Here she is at the Castle Vaubyessard, observed by the old duke, noticed favorably by all, and you cry out: What details! What does it mean? Details are everywhere, although we cite but a single passage.

“Madame Bovary noticed that many ladies had not put their gloves in their glasses.

“But at the upper end of the table, alone among all those women, bent over his full plate, with his napkin tied round his neck like a child, an old man sat eating, letting drops of gravy drip from his mouth. His eyes were bloodshot, and he wore a little queue tied with a black ribbon. He was the Marquis’s father-in-law, the old Duke de Laverdière, once on a time favorite of the Count d’Artois, in the days of the Vaudreuil hunting-parties at the Marquis de Conflans’, and had been, it was said, the lover of Queen Mari-Antoinette between Monsieur de Coigny and Monsieur de Lauzun.”

Defend the queen, defend her especially before the scaffold, say that because of her title she had the right of respect, but suppress your accusations when one contents himself with saying that he had been, it was said, the lover of the queen. Can that be so serious that you reproach us with having insulted the memory of that unfortunate woman?

“He had lived a life of noisy debauch, full of duels, bets, elopements; he had squandered his fortune and frightened all his family. A servant behind his chair named aloud to him in his ear the dishes that he pointed to, stammering, and constantly Emma’s eyes turned involuntarily to this old man with hanging lips, as to something extraordinary. He had lived at court and slept in the bed of queens!

“Iced champagne was poured out. Emma shivered all over as she felt it cold in her mouth. She had never seen pomegranates nor tasted pine-apples.”

You see that these descriptions are charming, incontestably, and that it is not difficult to take a line here and there for the purpose of creating a kind of colour, against which my conscience protests. It is not a lascivious colour, it is only lifelike; it is the literary element and at the same time the moral element.

Here we have a young girl, whose education you are acquainted with, become a woman. The Government Attorney has asked: Did she even try to love her husband? He has not read the book; if he had read it, he would not have made the objection.

We have, gentlemen, this poor woman dreaming at first. On page 34 you will find her dreams. And there is something more here, something of which the Government Attorney did not speak, and which I must tell you, and these are her impressions when her mother died; you will see if they are lascivious soon enough! Have the goodness to turn to page 33 and follow me:

“When her mother died she cried much the first few days. She had a funeral picture made with the hair of the deceased, and, in a letter sent to the Bertaux full of sad reflections on life, she asked to be buried some day in the same grave. The good man thought she must be ill, and came to see her. Emma was secretly pleased that she had reached at a first attempt the rare ideal of pale lives, never attained by mediocre hearts. She let herself glide along with Lamartine meanderings, listened to harps on lakes, to all the songs of dying swans, to the falling of the leaves, the pure virgins ascending to heaven, and the voice of the Eternal discoursing down the valleys. She wearied of it, would not confess it, continued from habit, and at last was surprised to feel herself soothed, and with no more sadness at heart than wrinkles on her brow.”

I wish to make answer to the Government Attorney’s reproach that she made no effort to love her husband.

THE GOVERNMENT ATTORNEY:

I did not reproach her for that, I said that she did not succeed in loving him.

M. SENARD:

If I have been mistaken, if you made no reproach, that is the best response that could be given. I believed that I understood you to make one; let us see how I may be deceived. Moreover, here is what I read at the end of page 36:

“And yet, in accord with theories she believed right, she desired to make herself in love with him. By moonlight in the garden she recited all the passionate rhymes she knew by heart, and, sighing, sang to him many melancholy adagios; but she found herself as calm after this as before, and Charles seemed no more amorous and no more moved.

“When she had thus for a while struck the flint on her heart without getting a spark, incapable, moreover, of understanding what she did not experience as of believing anything that did not present itself in conventional forms, she persuaded herself without difficulty that Charles’s passion was nothing very exorbitant. His outbursts became regular; he embraced her at certain fixed times. It was one habit among other habits, and, like a dessert, looked forward to after the monotony of dinner.”

On page 37 we find a group of similar things. Now, here is where the peril begins. You know how she has been brought up; and I beg you not to forget this for an instant.

There is not a man who, having read this, would not say that M. Flaubert is not only a great artist but a man of heart, for having in the last six pages turned all the horror and scorn upon the woman and all the interest towards the husband. He is a great artist, as has been said, because he has left the husband as he was, he has not transformed him, and to the end he is the same good man, commonplace, mediocre, full of the duties of his profession, loving his wife well, but destitute of education or elevation of thought. He is the same at the death-bed of his wife. And nevertheless, there is not an individual to whom the memory returns with more interest.

Why? Because he has kept to the end his simplicity and uprightness of heart; because to the end he has fulfilled his duty while his wife was led astray. His death is as beautiful and as touching as the death of his wife is hideous. On the dead body of the woman the author has shown the spots made by the vomiting of poison; they soil the white shroud in which she goes to her burial, and he has made her, as he desired, an object of disgust; but there is a man there who is sublime — the husband standing beside the grave. There is a man who is grand, sublime, whose death is admirable — the husband, who, finding himself broken-hearted by the death of his wife, sees afterwards all the illusions of the heart that remained to him embraced in the thought of his wife in the tomb. Keep that, I beg you, in your remembrance. The author has gone beyond what was necessary — as Lamartine has said — in rendering the death of the woman hideous and her punishment most terrible. The author has concentrated all the interest upon the man who did not deviate from the line of duty, who preserved his mediocre character, to be sure (for the author could not change his character) but who preserved also all his generosity of heart, while upon the wife who deceived him, ruined him, gave him into the hands of usurers, put into circulation forged notes and finally arrived at suicide, was heaped all the accumulated horrors. We shall see that it is natural — the death of this woman who, if she had not come to her end by poison, would have been broken by the excess of misfortune with which she was surrounded. The author has seen this. His book would not be read if he had done otherwise, if, in order to show where an education as perilous as that of Madame Bovary can lead, he had not been prodigal with the fascinating images and the powerful tableaux for which he is reproached.

M. Flaubert constantly sets forth the superiority of the husband over the wife, and what superiority, if you please? that of simple duty fulfilled, while the wife was straying from hers. Here she is, fixed by the bent of this bad education; here she is, gone out after the scene of the ball, with the young boy, Léon, as inexperienced as herself. She coquets with him but does not dare to go further; nothing happens. Then comes Rodolphe who takes the woman to himself. After looking at her for a moment, he said: This woman is all right. She will be easy prey, because she is light-minded and inexperienced. As to the fall, will you re-read pages 42, 43 and 44. I have only a word to say about this scene and that is: there are no details, no descriptions, no image that can trouble the senses; a single word indicates the fall: “She abandoned herself.” I pray you to have the goodness to read again the details of the fall of Clarissa Harlowe, which I have not heard decried as a bad book. M. Flaubert has substituted Rodolphe for Lovelace, and Emma for Clarissa. If you will compare the two authors and the two books you will appreciate the situation.

But I will return here to the indignation of the Government Attorney. He is shocked that remorse does not immediately follow the fall, and that in the place of expressing bitterness, she said with satisfaction: “I have a lover!” But the author would not be true, if he made the enchanting draught seem bitter while it still touched the lips. He who wrote as the Attorney understands might be moral, but he would be saying what is not in nature. No, it is not at the first moment of a fault that the sentiment of fault is awakened; otherwise, it would not be committed. No, it is not at the moment when she is under a delusion that intoxicates her that a woman can be averted from this intoxication even by the immensity of the fault she has committed. She feels only the intoxication; she goes back to her home happy, sparkling, and singing in her heart: "I have a lover!" But can this last long? You have read pages 424 and 425. On both pages, and if you please, to page 428, the sentiment of disgust with her lover is not yet manifest; but she is already under the impression of fear and uneasiness. She thinks, weighs the question, and believes that she does not wish to abandon Rodolphe:

"Something stronger than herself forced her to him; so much so, that one day, seeing her come unexpectedly he frowned as one put out.

"What is the matter with you?" she said, 'Are you ill? Tell me!'

"At last he declared with a serious air that her visits were becoming imprudent — that she was compromising herself.

"Gradually Rodolphe's fears took possession of her. At first, love had intoxicated her, and she had thought of nothing beyond. But now that he was indispensable to her life, she feared to lose anything of this, or even that it should be disturbed. When she came back from his house, she looked all about her, anxiously watching every form that passed in the horizon, and every village window from which she could be seen. She listened for steps, cries, the noise of the ploughs, and she stopped short, white, and trembling more than the aspen leaves swaying overhead."

You see unmistakably that she was not deceived; she felt clearly that there was something about it of which she had not dreamed. Let us take pages 433 and 434 and you will be still further convinced:

"When the night was rainy, they took refuge in the consulting-room, between the cart-shed and the stable. She lighted one of the kitchen candles that she had hidden behind the books. Rodolphe settled down there as if at home. The sight of the library, of the bureau, of the whole apartment, in fine, excited his merriment, and he could not refrain from making jokes about Charles which rather embarrassed Emma. She would have liked to see him more serious and even on occasions more dramatic; as, for example, when she thought she heard a noise of approaching steps in the alley.

“‘Some one is coming!’ she said

“He blew out the light.

“‘Have you your pistols?’

“‘Why?’

“‘Why, to defend yourself,’ replied Emma.

“‘From your husband? Oh, poor devil!’”

And Rodolphe finished his phrase with a gesture which signified: I could crush him with a fillip.

She was amazed at his bravery, although she felt that there was a sort of indelicacy and naïve grossness about it that was scandalizing.

“Rodolphe reflected a good deal on the affair of the pistols. If she had spoken seriously, it was very ridiculous, he thought, even odious; for he had no reason to hate the good Charles, not being what is called devoured by jealousy; and on this subject Emma had treated him to a lecture, which he did not think in the best taste.

“Besides, she was growing very sentimental. She had insisted on exchanging miniatures; they had cut handfuls of hair, and now she was asking for a ring — a real wedding-ring, in sign of an eternal union. She often spoke to him of the evening chimes, of the voices of nature. Then she talked to him of her mother — hers! and of his mother — his!

“Finally she wearied him.”

Then, on page 453:

“He had no longer, as formerly, words so gentle that they made her cry, nor passionate caresses that made her mad; so that their great love, which engrossed her life, seemed to lessen beneath her like the water of a stream absorbed into its channel, and she could see the bed of it. She would not believe it; she redoubled in tenderness, and Rodolphe concealed his indifference less and less.

“She did not know whether she regretted yielding to him, or whether, she did not wish, on the contrary, to enjoy him the more. The humiliation of feeling herself weak was turning to rancour, tempered by their voluptuous pleasures. It was not affection; it was like a continual seduction. He subjugated her; she almost feared him.”

And you are afraid, Mr. Government Attorney, that young women might read this! I am less frightened, less timid than you. On my own personal account, I can admirably understand a father of a family saying to his daughter: Young lady, if your heart, your conscience, if religious sentiment and the voice of duty are not sufficient to make you walk in the right path, look, my child, look well at the weariness, the suffering, the grief and desolation attending the woman who seeks happiness outside her home! This language would not wound you in the mouth of a father, would it? M. Flaubert has said nothing but this; he has made a painting most true, and most powerful, of what the woman who dreams of finding happiness outside her house immediately discovers.

But let us go on and we shall come to all the adventures of the disillusion. You show me the caresses of Léon on page 60. Alas! she will soon pay the ransom of adultery, and that ransom you will find terrible, in some pages farther on in the book you condemn. She sought happiness in adultery, poor unfortunate one! And she found, besides the disgust and fatigue that the monotony of marriage can bring to the woman who does not walk in the path of duty, the disillusion and the scorn of the man to whom she has given herself. Was any of this scorn lacking in the book? Oh, no! and you cannot deny it, for the book is under your eyes. Rodolphe, who has shown himself so vile, gives to her a last proof of egoism and cowardice. She has said to him: "Take me! Carry me away! I am stifling; I can no longer breathe in my husband's house, to which I have brought shame and misfortune." He hesitates; she insists. Finally, he promises, and the next day she receives a terrible letter under which she falls crushed and annihilated. She is taken ill and is dying. The number you are consulting shows you all the convulsions of a soul at war with itself, which perhaps could be led back to duty by an excess of suffering, but unfortunately she meets a boy with whom she had played when she was inexperienced. This is the movement of the romance, and then comes the expiation.

But the Government Attorney stops me and asks: Although it may be true that the purpose of the book is good from one end to the other, could you allow such obscene details as those that have been brought forward?

Very certainly I could not allow such details, but where have I allowed them? Where are they? I now arrive at the passages most condemned. I will say no more of the adventure in the cab. This Court has heard enough with regard to that; I come to the passages that you have pointed out as contrary to public morals and which form a certain number of pages in the December number. And, in order to pull away all the scaffolding of your accusation, there is only one thing to be done: to restore what precedes and what follows your quotations, in a word, to substitute the text complete as opposed to your cutting.

At the bottom of page 72, Léon, after making an agreement with Homais, the chemist, goes to the Hôtel de Boulogne; the chemist goes there to find him.

“Emma was no longer there. She had just gone in a fit of anger. She detested him now. This failing to keep their rendezvous seemed to her an insult.

“Then, growing calmer, she at length discovered that she had no doubt calumniated him. But the disparaging of those we love always alienates us from them to some extent. We must not touch our idols; the guilt sticks to our fingers.”

Great heavens! And it is for such lines as I have been reading to you that we are dragged before you. Listen now:

“They gradually came to talking more frequently of matters outside their love, and in the letters that Emma wrote him she spoke of flowers, verses, the moon and the stars, naïve resources of a waning passion striving to keep itself alive by all external aids. She was constantly promising herself a profound felicity on her next journey. Then she confessed to herself that she felt nothing extraordinary. This disappointment quickly gave way to a new hope, and Emma returned to him more inflamed, more eager than ever. She undressed brutally, tearing off the thin laces of her corset that nestled around her hips like a gliding snake. She went on tip-toe, barefooted, to see once more that the door was closed; then, pale, serious, and without speaking, with one movement she threw herself upon his breast with a long shudder.” You have stopped here, Mr. Attorney; permit me to continue:

“Yet there was upon that brow covered with cold drops, on those quivering lips, in those wild eyes, in the strain of those arms, something vague and dreary that seemed to Léon to glide between them subtly as if to separate them.”

You call this lascivious colour, you say that this gives a taste for adultery, you say that these pages excite and arouse the senses, — that they are lascivious pages! But death is in these pages! You did not think of that, Mr. Attorney, and were simply frightened to find such words as corset, clothing which falls off, etc.; and you attach yourself to these three or four words, such as corset and falling clothing. Do you wish me to show you that corsets can appear in a classic book, a very classic book? I shall give myself the pleasure of so doing, presently.

“She undressed herself ...” [ah! Mr. Government Attorney, how badly you have understood this passage!] “she undressed hastily [poor thing], tearing off the thin laces of her corset that nestled around her hips like a gliding snake; then pale, serious, and without speaking, with one movement she threw herself upon his breast with a long shudder.... There was upon that brow covered with cold drops ... in the strain of those arms something vague and dreary....”

We must ask here where the lascivious colour is? and where is the severe colour? and ask if the senses of the young girl into whose hands this book might fall, could be aroused, excited — as she might by reading a classic of classics, which I shall cite presently, and which has been reprinted a thousand times without any prosecution, public or royal, following it. Is there anything analogous in what I am going to read you? Is there not, on the contrary, a horror of vice that this “something dreary glides in between them to separate them?” Let us continue, I pray:

“He did not dare to question her; but, seeing her so skilled, she must have passed, he thought, through every experience of suffering and of pleasure. What had once charmed now frightened him a little. Besides, he rebelled against his absorption, daily more marked by her personality. He begrudged Emma this constant victory. He even strove not to love her; then, when he heard the creaking of her boots, he turned coward, like drunkards at the sight of strong drinks.”

What is lascivious there?

And then, take the last paragraph:

“One day, when they had parted early and she was returning alone along the boulevard, she saw the walls of her convent; then she sat down on a form in the shade of the elm-trees. How calm that time had been! How she longed for the ineffable sentiments of love that she had tried to figure to herself out of books! The first month of her marriage, her rides in the wood, the viscount that waltzed, and Lagardy singing, all repassed before her eyes. And Léon suddenly appeared to her as far off as the others.

“‘Yet I love him,’ she said to herself.”

Do not forget this, Mr. Attorney, when you judge the thought of the author, when you wish to find absolutely lascivious colour where I can only find an excellent book.

“She was not happy — she never had been. Whence came this insufficiency of life — this instantaneous turning to decay of everything on which she leant?”

Is that lascivious?

“But if there were somewhere a being strong and beautiful, a valiant nature, full at once of exaltation and refinement, a poet’s heart in angel’s form, a lyre with sounding chords ringing out elegiac epithalamia to heaven, why, perchance, should she not find him? Ah! how impossible! Besides, nothing was worth the trouble of seeking it; everything was a lie. Every smile hid a yawn of boredom, every joy a curse, all pleasure satiety, and the sweetest kisses left upon your lips only the unattainable desire for a greater delight.

“A metallic clang droned through the air, and four strokes were heard from the convent-clock. Four o’clock! And it seemed to her that she had been there on that form an eternity. But an infinity of passions may be contained in a minute, like a crowd in a small space.”

It is not necessary to look at the end of the book to find what is in it from one end to the other. I have read the incriminated passage without adding a word, to defend a work which defends itself through itself. Let us continue leading from this same incriminated passage, looking at it from a moral point of view:

“Madame was in her room, which no one entered. She stayed there all day long, torpid, half dressed, and from time to time burning Turkish pastilles which she had bought at Rouen in an Algerian’s shop. In order not to have at night this sleeping man stretched at her side, by dint of manoeuvring, she at least succeeded in banishing him to the second floor, while she read till morning extravagant books, full of pictures of orgies and thrilling situations. Often, seized with fear, she cried out, and Charles hurried to her.

“‘Oh, go away!’ she would say.

“Or at other times, consumed more ardently than ever by that inner flame to which adultery added fuel, panting, tremulous, all desire, she threw open her window, breathed in the cold air, shook loose in the wind her masses of hair, too heavy, and gazing upon the stars, longed for some princely love. She thought of him, of Léon. She would then have given anything for a single one of those meetings that surfeited her.

“Those were her gala days. She wished them to be sumptuous, and when he alone could not pay the expenses, she made up the deficit liberally, which happened almost every time. He tried to make her understand that they would be quite as comfortable somewhere else, in a smaller hotel, but she always found some objection.”

You see all this is very simple when one reads the whole; but in cuttings like those of the Government Attorney, the smallest word becomes a mountain.

THE GOVERNMENT ATTORNEY:

I did not quote any of those phrases last mentioned; but since you wish to quote what I have not incriminated, it would be well not to pass over the foot of the page adjoining page 50.

M. SENARD:

I pass over nothing, but I insist upon citing the incriminated passages in the quotations. We are quoting from pages 77 and 78.

THE GOVERNMENT ATTORNEY:

I refer to the quotations made to the audience, and thought you imputed me with having cited the lines you are about to read.

M. SENARD:

Mr. Attorney, I have quoted all the passages by whose aid you have attempted to constitute a misdemeanor — which accusation is now shattered. You developed before the audience what seemed to you convincing, and have had a fair opportunity. Happily we had the book and the defense knew the book; if he had not known it, his position, allow me to tell you, would have been very awkward. I am called upon to explain such and such passages to myself and to add others for the benefit of the audience. If I had not possessed the book, as I do, the defense had been difficult. Now, I can show you, through a faithful analysis of the romance, that far from being considered a lascivious work, it should be considered, on the contrary, eminently moral. After doing this, I took the passages that have been the motive for police correction, and after I followed the cuttings with what preceded and what succeeded, the accusation became so weak that you are in revolt the moment I have finished reading them! These same passages that you stamped as recriminating, I have used an equal right to quote myself, for the purpose of showing you the folly of the accusation.

I continue my quotation where I stopped at the bottom of page 78.

“He was bored now when Emma suddenly began to sob on his breast, and his heart, like the people who can only stand a certain amount of music, dozed to the sound of a love whose delicacies he no longer noted.

“They knew one another too well for any of those surprises of possession, that increase its joys a hundredfold. She was as sick of him as he was weary of her. Emma found again in adultery all the platitudes of marriage.”

Platitudes of marriage! He who did the cutting here has said: Now, here is a man who says that in marriage there are only platitudes! It is an attack on marriage, it is an outrage to morals! You will agree, Mr. Attorney, that with cuttings artistically made, one can go far in the way of incriminating. What is it that the author called the platitudes of marriage? That monotony which Emma had dreaded, which she had wished to escape from but had found continually in adultery, which was precisely the disillusion. You now see clearly that when, in the place of cutting off the members of certain phrases and cutting out some words, we read what precedes and what follows, nothing remains for incrimination; and you can well comprehend that my client, who knew what he wished to say, must be a little in revolt at seeing it thus travestied. Let us continue:

“She was as sick of him as he was weary of her. Emma found again in adultery all the platitudes of marriage.

“But how to get rid of him? Then, though she might feel humiliated at the baseness of such enjoyment, she clung to it from habit or from corruption, and each day she hungered after them the more, exhausting all felicity in wishing for too much of it. She accused Léon of her baffled hopes, as if he had betrayed her; and she even longed for some catastrophe that would bring about their separation, since she had not the courage to make up her mind to it herself.

“She none the less went on writing him love letters, in virtue of the notion that a woman must write to her lover.

“But whilst she wrote it was another man she saw, a phantom fashioned out of her most ardent memories. [This is certainly not incriminating.]

“Then she fell back exhausted, for these transports of vague love wearied her more than great debauchery.

“She now felt constant ache all over her. Often she even received a summons, stamped paper that she barely looked at. She would have liked not to be alive, or to be always asleep.”

I call that an excitation of virtue through a horror of vice, as the author himself calls it, and which the reader, no longer perplexed, cannot fail to see, unless influenced by ill-will.

And now, something more to make you perceive what kind of man you are about to judge. And in order to show you, not what kind of justification I may expect, but whether M. Flaubert has made use of lascivious colour, and whence he got his inspiration, let me put upon your desk this book used by him, in whose passages he found himself inspired to paint this concupiscence, the entanglements of this woman who sought happiness in illicit pleasures, but could not find it there, who sought again and again and never found it. Whence has Flaubert derived his inspiration, gentlemen? It was from this book; listen:

ILLUSION OF THE SENSES.

“Whoever, then, attaches himself to the senses, must necessarily wander from object to object and deceive himself, so to speak, by a change of place, as concupiscence, — that is to say, love of pleasure, — is always changing, because its ardour languishes and dies in continuity, and it is only change that makes it revive. Again, what is that other characteristic of a life of the senses, that alternate movement of appetite and disgust, of disgust and appetite, the soul floating ever uncertain between ardour which abates and ardour which is renewed? Inconstantia concupiscentia. That is what a life of the senses is. However, in this perpetual movement, one must not allow himself to be deceived by the image of wandering liberty.”

This is what a life of the senses is. Who has said that? Who has written these words which you are about to hear upon these excitements and excessive ardor? What is the book which M. Flaubert perused day and night, and which has inspired the passages that the Government Attorney condemns? It is by Bossuet! What I shall read to you is a fragment of Bossuet's discourse upon Illicit Pleasures. I shall bring you to see that all these incriminated passages are — not plagiarized; the man who appropriates an idea is not a plagiarist — but imitations of Bossuet. Do you wish for another example? Here it is:

UPON SIN.

“And do not ask me, Christians, in what way this great change of pleasure into punishment will come about. The thing is proved by the Scriptures. It is Truth who has said it, it is the All-Powerful who has made it so. And sometimes, if you will look at the nature of the passions to which you abandon your heart, you will easily comprehend that they may become an intolerable punishment. They all have in themselves cruel pain, disgust and bitterness. They all have an infinity which is angered by not being able to be satisfied. There are transports of rage mingled in all of them which degenerates into a kind of fury not less painful than unreasonable. Love, if I may be permitted so to name it in this guise, has its uncertainties, its violent agitations, its irresolute resolutions and an abyss of jealousies.”

And further:

“Ah! What, then, is easier than making of our passions an insupportable pain or sin, when, if we cut out, as is very just, the little sweetness through which they lead us, there is left of them only the cruel disquiet and bitterness with which they abound? Our sins are against us, our sins are upon us, our sins are in the midst of us; like an arrow piercing our body, an insupportable weight upon our head, a poison devouring our entrails.”

Is not all that you have just listened to designed to show you the bitterness of passion? I leave you this book, lined and thumb-marked by the studious man who has found his thought there. And that man, who has been inspired from a source of this kind, who has written of adultery in the terms you have listened to, is prosecuted for outrage of public and religious morals!

A few lines still upon the woman sinner, and you will see how M. Flaubert, having decided to paint this ardour, understood taking inspiration from this model:

“But, punished for our error, without being deceived by it, we seek in change the remedy for our scorn; we wander from object to object, and if, finally there is some one who holds us, it is not because we are content with our choice, but because we are bound by our inconstancy.”

* * * * *

“All appeared to her empty, false, disgusting in these creatures: far from finding there those first charms which her heart had had so much difficulty in defending, she saw in them now only frivolity, danger and vanity.”

* * * * *

“I will not speak of an entanglement of passion; what fears there are that the mystery of it cannot dispel! what measures to keep on the side of well-being and pride! what eyes to shun! what watchers to deceive! what returns to fear from those whom one chooses for their aids and confidants in their passion! what indignities to suffer from him, perhaps, for whom one has sacrificed honour and liberty, and of whom one dare not complain! To all this, add those cruel moments when passion, less lively, leaves us to choose between falling back upon ourselves and feeling all the humility of our position, and those moments where the heart, born for more solid pleasures, leaves us with our own idols and finds its punishment in its own disgust and inconstancy. Profane world! if there is in you that felicity that is so much vaunted, favor your adorers with it nor punish them for the faith they have added so lightly to your promises.”

Let me say to you here: when a man in the silence of the night, meditates upon the causes of enticement for woman, when he finds them in her education and, putting aside personal observation, for the sake of expressing his thoughts, matures them at the sources I have indicated, not allowing himself to use his pen except from inspiration of Bossuet and Massillon, permit me to ask you if there is a word to express my surprise, my grief, on seeing this man dragged into Court — on account of some passages in his book, and precisely for the truest and most elevated ideas that he was able to bring together! And I pray you not to forget this in relation to the charge of outrage against religious morals! And then, if you will permit me, I will put in opposition to all this, under your very eyes, what I myself call attacking the moral, that is to say, satisfaction of the senses without bitterness, without those large drops of cold sweat which fall from the brow of those who give themselves over to it; and I will not quote to you from licentious books in which the authors have sought to arouse the senses; I will quote from only one book — which is given as a prize in colleges, but whose author's name I ask leave to withhold until after I have read you a passage from it. Here is the passage: I will ask you to pass the volume. It is a copy that was given to a college student as a prize. I prefer you to take this copy rather than M. Flaubert's:

“The next day I was received into her apartment. There I felt all that voluptuousness carries with it. The room was filled with the most agreeable perfumes. She lay upon a bed which was enclosed in garlands of flowers. She appeared to be lying there languishingly. She extended her hand to me and made me sit beside her. In all, even in the veil which covered her face, there was a charm. I could see the form of her beautiful body. A simple cloth which moved as she moved allowed me at one time to see, and at another to lose sight of, her ravishing beauty.”

A simple cloth when it was extended over a dead body appeared to you a lascivious image; here it is extended over a living woman:

“She noticed that my eyes were occupied, and when she saw them inflamed, the cloth seemed to open itself away from her; I saw all the treasures of a divine beauty. At this moment she took my hand; my eyes were wandering. There is only my dear Ardasire, I cry out, who can be as beautiful; but I swear to the gods that my fidelity.... She threw herself on my neck and drew me into her arms. Suddenly the room became darkened; her veil opened and she gave me a kiss. I was beside myself; a flame started suddenly through my veins and aroused all my senses. The idea of Ardasire was far from me. She remained to me only as a memory ... there appeared to me but one thought.... I was going.... I was going to prefer this one even to her. Already my hands had wandered to her breasts; they ran rapidly everywhere; love showed itself only in its fury; it hurried on to victory; a moment more and Ardasire could not defend herself.”

Who, now, has written that? It is not the author of The New Héloïse, it is the President, Montesquieu! Here is no bitterness, no disgust, but all is sacrificed to literary beauty, and they give it as a prize to pupils in rhetoric, without doubt to serve as a model in the amplifications and descriptions that they are required to write. Montesquieu described in his Persian Letters a scene which could not even be read. It concerns a woman placed between two men who dispute over her. This woman, placed between two men, has dreams — which appear to the author very agreeable.

Shall we sum up, Mr. Attorney? Or is it necessary for me to quote you Jean-Jacques Rousseau in his Confessions, and some others? No, I will only say to the judges that if, on account of his description of the carriage in The Double Misunderstanding, M. Mérimée had been prosecuted, he would have been acquitted immediately. One sees in his book only a work of art of great literary beauty. One would no more condemn it than he would condemn paintings or statuary, which is not content with representing all the beauties of the body, but wishes to add ardour and passion. I will follow it no farther; I ask you to recognise the fact that M. Flaubert has not weighted his images and has done only one thing: he has touched with a firm hand the scene of degradation. At each line of his book he has brought out the disillusion, and instead of ending it with something charming, he has undertaken to show us that this woman, after meeting scorn, abandonment, and ruin of her house, comes to a frightful death. In a word, I can only repeat what I said at the beginning of this plea, that M. Flaubert is the author of a good book, a book which aims at the excitation of virtue by arousing a horror of vice.

I will now look into his outrage against religion. An outrage against religion committed by M. Flaubert! And in what respect, if you please? The Government Attorney has thought he found in him a sceptic. I can assure the Government Attorney that he is deceived. I am not here to make a profession of faith, I am here only to defend a book, and for that reason I shall limit myself to a simple word. Now as to the book, I defy the Government Attorney to find in it anything that resembles an outrage against religion. You have seen how religion was introduced in Emma’s education, and how this religion, false in a thousand ways, could not hold Emma from the bent that carried her astray. Would you know in what kind of language M. Flaubert speaks of religion? Listen to some lines that I take from the first number, pages 231, 232 and 233:

“One evening when the window was open, and she, sitting by it, had been watching Lestiboudois, the beadle, trimming the box, she suddenly heard the Angelus ringing.

“It was the beginning of April, when the primroses are in bloom, and a warm wind blows over the flower-beds newly turned, and the gardens, like women, seem to be getting ready for the summer fêtes. Through the bars of the arbour and away beyond, the river could be seen in the fields, meandering through the grass in wandering curves. The evening vapors rose between the leafless poplars, touching their outlines with a violet tint, paler and more transparent than a subtle gauze caught athwart their branches. In the distance cattle moved about; neither their steps nor their lowing could be heard; and the bell, still ringing through the air, kept up its peaceful lamentation.

“With this repeated tinkling the thoughts of the young woman lost themselves in old memories of her youth and school-days. She remembered the great candlesticks that rose above the vases full of flowers on the altar, and the tabernacle with its small columns. She would have liked to be once more lost in the long line of white veils, marked off here and there by the stiff black hoods of the good sisters bending over their prie-Dieu.”

This is the language in which his religious sentiment is expressed. And yet we have understood from the Government Attorney that scepticism reigned in M. Flaubert’s book from one end to the other. Where, I pray you, have you found this scepticism?

THE GOVERNMENT ATTORNEY:

I have not said that there was any of it in its inner meaning.

M. SENARD:

If not in its inner meaning, where then, is it? In your cuttings, evidently. But here is the work entire, as the Court will judge it, and it can see that the religious sentiment is so forcefully imprinted there that the accusation of scepticism is pure slander. And now, the Government Attorney will permit me to say to him that it was not for the purpose of accusing the author of scepticism that all this trouble has been made.

Let us proceed:

“At mass on Sundays, when she looked up, she saw the gentle face of the Virgin amid the blue smoke of the rising incense. Then she was moved; she felt herself weak and quite deserted, like the down of a bird whirled by the tempest, and it was unconsciously that she went towards the church, inclined to no matter what devotions, so that her soul was absorbed and all existence lost in it.”

This, gentlemen, is the first appeal of religion to hold Emma from the trend of her passions. She has fallen, poor woman, and then been repelled by the foot of the man to whom she abandoned herself. She is nearly dead, but raises herself and becomes reanimated; and you shall see now what is written in the 15th of November number, 1856, page 548:

“One day, when at the height of her illness, she had thought herself dying, and had asked for the communion; and while they were making the preparations in her room for the sacrament, while they were turning the night-table, covered with sirups, into an altar, and while Félicité was strewing dahlia flowers on the floor, Emma felt some power passing over her that freed her from her pains, from all perception, from all feeling. Her body, relieved, no longer thought; another life was beginning; it seemed to her that her being, mounting toward God, would be annihilated in that love like a burning insense that melts into vapour. [You see that this is the language in which M. Flaubert speaks of religious things]. The bed-clothes were sprinkled with holy water, the priest drew from the holy pyx the white wafer; and it was fainting with a celestial joy that she put out her lips to accept the body of the Saviour presented to her.”

I ask the pardon of the Government Attorney, I ask the Court's pardon for interrupting this passage; but I must needs say that it is the author who is speaking, and bring to your notice in what terms he expresses the mystery of the communion. Before going on with the reading, I must needs impress the literary value of this picture upon the Court and insist that they seize upon these expressions which are the author's own:

“The curtains of the alcove floated gently round her like clouds, and the rays of the two tapers burning on the night-table seemed to shine like dazzling halos. Then she let her head fall back, fancying she heard in space the music of seraphic harps, and perceived in an azure sky, on a golden throne in the midst of saints holding green palms, God the Father, resplendent with majesty, who with a sign sent to earth angels with wings of fire to carry her away in their arms.”

* * * * *

“This splendid vision dwelt in her memory as the most beautiful thing that it was possible to dream, so that now she strove to recall her sensation, that still lasted, however, but in a less exclusive fashion and with a deeper sweetness. Her soul, tortured by pride, at length found rest in Christian humility, and, tasting the joy of weakness, she saw within herself the destruction of her will, that must have left a wide entrance for the inroads of heavenly grace. There existed, then, in the place of happiness, still greater joys, — another love beyond all loves, without pause and without end, one that would grow eternally! She saw amid the illusions of her hope a state of purity floating above the earth mingling with heaven, to which she aspired. She wanted to become a saint. She bought chaplets and wore amulets; she wished to have in her room, by the side of her bed, a reliquary set in emeralds that she might kiss it every evening.”

Here are some of his religious sentiments! And if you wish to pause a moment to consider the author’s thought, I will ask you to turn the page and read the first three lines of the second paragraph:

“She grew provoked at the doctrines of religion; the arrogance of the polemic writings displeased her by their inveteracy in attacking people she did not know; and the secular stories, relieved with religion, seemed to her written in such ignorance of the world, that they insensibly estranged her from the truths for whose proof she was looking.”

This is the language of M. Flaubert. Now, if you please, we come to another scene, that of the extreme unction. Oh! Mr. Government Attorney, how you have deceived yourself when, stopping at the first words, you accuse my client of mingling the sacred with the profane; when he has been content to translate the beautiful formulas of extreme unction, at the moment when the priest touches the organs of sense, at the moment where, according to the ritual, he says: Per istam unctionem, et suam piissimam misericordiam, indulgeat tibi Dominus quid-quid deliquisti!

You said it was not necessary to touch upon holy things. With what right do you misinterpret these holy words:

“May God, in His holy pity, pardon you for all the sins that you have committed through sight, taste, hearing, etc.?”

Wait, I am going to read the condemned passage, and that will be all my vengeance. I dare say vengeance, because the author has need of being avenged! Yes, it is necessary for M. Flaubert to go out of here not only acquitted, but avenged! You will see from what kind of reading he has been nourished. The condemned passage is on page 271 of the December 15th number, and runs thus:

“Pale as a statue, and with eyes red as fire, Charles, not weeping, stood opposite her at the foot of the bed, while the priest bending one knee, was muttering words in a low voice.”

This whole picture is magnificent, and the wording of it irresistible. But be quiet, and I will not prolong it beyond measure. Now here is the condemnation!

“She turned her face slowly, and seemed filled with joy on seeing suddenly the violet stole, no doubt finding again, in the midst of a temporary lull in her pain, the lost voluptuousness of her first mystical transports, with the visions of eternal beatitude that were beginning.

“The priest rose to take the crucifix: then she stretched forward her neck as one who is athirst, and gluing her lips to the body of the Man-God, she pressed upon it with all her expiring strength the fullest kiss of love that she had ever given.”

The extreme unction has not yet begun; but we are reproached for this kiss. I am not going to search in the history of Saint Theresa whom you perhaps know, but the memory of whom is too far away, I am not going to seek in Fénelon for the mysticism of Madame Guyon, nor in more modern mysticisms, in which I find much reason. I only wish to ask of those schools which you designate as belonging to sensual Christianity, the explanation of this kiss; it is Bossuet, Bossuet himself, of whom I would ask it:

“Obey, and strive finally to enter into the disposition of Jesus in communing, which is the disposition of harmony, joy and love; the whole gospel proclaims it. Jesus wishes that we may be with Him; He wishes to rejoice and He wishes us to rejoice with Him: He has given Himself....” etc.

I continue the reading of the condemned passage:

“Then he recited the Misereatur and the Indulgentiam, dipped his right thumb in the oil and began to give extreme unction. First upon the eyes, that had so coveted all worldly pomp; then upon the nostrils, greedy for warm breezes and amorous perfumes; then upon the mouth, that had uttered lies, that curled with pride and cried out in lewdness; then upon the hands, that had delighted in sensual touches, and finally upon the soles of feet, so swift of yore when she was running to satisfy her desires, and that now would walk no more.

“The curé wiped his fingers, threw the bit of cotton dipped in oil into the fire, and came and sat down by the dying woman, to tell her that she must now blend her sufferings with those of Jesus Christ, and abandon herself to the Divine mercy.

“Finishing his exhortations, he tried to place in her hand a blessed candle, symbol of the celestial glory with which she was soon to be surrounded. Emma, too weak, could not close her fingers, and the taper, but for Monsieur Bournisien, would have fallen to the ground.

“However, she was not quite so pale, and her face had an expression of serenity as if the sacrament had cured her.

“The priest did not fail to point this out; he even explained to Bovary that the Lord sometimes prolonged the life of persons when he thought it meet for their salvation; and Charles remembered the day when, so near death, she had received the communion. Perhaps there was no need to despair, he thought.”

Now, when a woman dies and the priest goes to give her extreme unction, if one portrays that mystic scene and translates for us the sacramental words with scrupulous fidelity, they say that he has touched upon holy things; that he has put a rash hand on sacred matters; because to the deliquisti per oculos, per os, per aurem, per manus et per pedes he has added the sin which each of the organs has committed. But we are not the first to walk in this path. M. Sainte-Beuve, in a book which you know, has also a scene of extreme unction, and here is how he expresses it:

“Oh! yes, upon the eyes first, as the most noble and most alive of the senses; upon those eyes for what they have seen and regarded too tenderly, or that which was too perfidious in others' eyes, or too mortal; for what they have read and re-read of endearment that was too dear; for what they have poured out in vain tears over fragile goods and faithless creatures; for the sleep which they have too often forgotten, thinking only of the evening!

“Upon the ears also for what they have heard and allowed themselves to hear that was too sweet, too flattering and intoxicating; for that sound which the ear steals from deceptive words; for what it drinks in from stolen honey!

“Then the smell, for the too subtle and voluptuous perfumes of evening and the springtime in the depth of the woods, for flowers received in the morning and all through the day, and breathed in with so much pleasure!

“Upon the lips, for what they have pronounced that was too confused or too open; for what they did not reply at certain moments or what they have not revealed to certain persons; for what they have sung in solitude that was too melodious and too full of tears; for their inarticulate murmur and for their silence!

“Upon the neck, in the place of on the breast, for the ardor of desire according to the consecrated expression (propter ardorem libidinis); yes, for the grief in affection and the rivalry, for too much anguish in human tenderness, for the tears which are suffocated in a voiceless throat, for all that goes to wound the heart and break it!

“Upon the hands also, for having seized a hand which was not bound to holiness; for having received too burning tears; perhaps for having begun to write and for finishing a response not lawful!

“Upon the feet, for not having fled, for not having been satisfied with long, solitary walks, for not having been weary soon enough in the midst of temptations which were ever beginning anew!”

You did not prosecute that. Here are two men who, each in his own sphere, has taken the same thing and who have, according to his own idea, added the sin, the fault. Can it be that you make an indictment for simply translating the formula of the ritual: Quidquid deliquisti per oculos, per aurem, etc.?

M. Flaubert has done just what M. Sainte-Beuve did, without plagiarizing. He has made use of a right which belongs to any writer, to add to what another has said and complete the subject. The last scene of the romance of Madame Bovary has been made a complete study of this kind from religious documents. M. Flaubert has taken the scene of the extreme unction from a book which a venerable ecclesiastic, one of his friends, lent to him; this same friend has read the scene and been moved to tears, not imagining that the majesty of religion was in any way offended. The book is entitled: An historic, dogmatic, moral, liturgical and canonical explanation of the catechism, with an answer to the objections drawn from science against religion, by the Abbé Ambroise Guillois, curate of Notre-Dame-du-Pré, 6th edition, etc., a work approved by His Eminence the Cardinal Gousset, N.N.S.S. the Bishops and Archbishops of Mans, of Tours, of Bordeaux, of Cologne, etc., vol. III., printed at Mans, by Charles Monnoyer, 1851. Now, you shall see in this book, as you saw just now in Bossuet's, the principles, and, in a certain way, the text of the passages which the Government has condemned. It is no longer M. Sainte-Beuve, an artist, a literary rhapsodist, whom I am quoting; we now listen to the Church itself:

"Extreme unction can give back health to the body if it be useful to the glory of God" ... and the priest says that this often happens. Now, here is the extreme unction:

"The priest addresses the sick with a short exhortation, if he is in a state to hear it, in order to dispose him worthily to receive the sacrament which is to be administered to him.

"The priest then passes the unction upon the sick person with the stiletto or the extremity of his right thumb, which he dips each time in the oil. This unction should be made especially upon the five parts of the body which nature has given to man as the organs of sensation, namely: the eyes, the ears, the nostrils, the mouth and the hands."

"As the priest makes the unctions [we have followed from point to point the ritual which we have copied], he pronounces the words which correspond to them.

"To the eyes, upon the closed eyeball: Through this holy unction and His divine pity, may God pardon all the sins that you have committed through sight. The sick person should at this moment have a new hatred of all the sins committed through sight: such as indiscreet looks, criminal curiosity, and reading what has caused to be born in him a host of thoughts contrary to faith or morals."

What has M. Flaubert done? He has put in the mouth of the priest, by uniting the two parts, what should be in his thoughts and also those of the sick person. He has copied purely and simply.

“To the ears: Through this holy unction and through His divine pity, may God pardon all the sins that you have committed through the sense of hearing. The sick person should, at this moment, detest anew all the errors of which he is guilty from listening with pleasure to slander, calumny, proposed dishonesty and obscene songs.

“To the nostrils: Through this holy unction and His divine pity, may the Lord pardon all the sins that you have committed through the sense of smell. At this moment the sick person should detest anew all the sins that he has committed through the sense of smell, his refined and voluptuous search for perfumes, all his sensibilities, all that he has breathed in of iniquitous odors.

“To the mouth, upon the lips: Through this holy unction and through His great pity, may the Lord pardon you all the sins that you have committed by the sense of taste and words. The sick man at this moment should detest anew all the sins that he has committed in oaths and blaspheming ... in eating and drinking to excess....

“Upon the hands: Through this holy unction and through His great pity, may the Lord pardon all the sins that you have committed through the sense of touch. The sick man ought to detest at this moment all the larcenies, the injustice of which he has been guilty, all the liberties, more or less criminal, which he has allowed himself. The priest receives the unction on his hands from without because he has already received it from within at the time of his ordination, and the sick person receives it within.

“Upon the feet: Through this holy unction and His great pity, may God pardon all the sins that you have committed in your walks. The sick man ought, at this moment, to detest anew all the steps that he has taken in the path of iniquity, such as scandalous walks, and criminal interviews.... The unction of the feet is made upon the top or on the sole, according to the convenience of the sick person, and according to the custom of the diocese where it takes place. The most common practice seems to be to make it on the soles of the feet.

“And finally upon the breast. [M. Sainte-Beuve has copied this; we have not, because it was concerned with the breast of a woman.]

Propter ardorem libidinis, etc.

“On the breast: Through this holy unction and His great pity, may the Lord pardon all the sins which have been committed from the ardour of the passions. The sick man ought, at this moment, to detest anew all the bad thoughts to which he has abandoned himself, all sentiments of hatred, or vengeance that he has nourished in his heart.”

And following the ritual, we could have spoken of something more than the breast, but God knows what holy anger would have been aroused in the Public Attorney’s office, if we had spoken of the loins!

“To the loins: Through this holy unction and His great pity, may the Lord pardon all the sins that you have committed by irregular impulses of the flesh.”

If we had said that, what a thunderbolt you would have had with which to attempt to crush us, Mr. Attorney! and nevertheless, the ritual adds: “The sick man ought, at this moment, to detest anew all illicit pleasures, carnal delights, etc....”

This is the ritual; and you have seen the condemned article. It has nothing of raillery in it, but is serious and earnest. And I repeat to you that he who lent my client this book, and saw my client make the use of it that he has, has taken him by the hand with tears in his eyes. You see, then, Mr. Government Attorney, how rash — not to use an expression which in order to be exact is not too severe — is your accusation of our touching upon holy things. You see now that we have not mingled the profane with the sacred when, at each sense we indicated the sin committed by that sense, since it is the language of the Church itself.

I insist now upon mentioning the other details of the charge of outrage against religion. The Public Minister said to me: “It is no longer religion but the morals of all time that you have outraged; you have insulted death!” How have we insulted death? Because at the moment when this woman dies, there passes in the street a man whom she had met more than once, to whom she had given alms from her carriage as she was going to her adulterous meetings; a blind man whom she was accustomed to see, who sang his song walking along slowly by the side of her carriage, to whom she threw a piece of money, but whose countenance made her shiver? This man was passing in the street; and at the moment when Divine pity pardoned, or promised pardon, to the unfortunate woman who was expiating the faults of her life by a frightful death, human raillery appeared to her in the form of the song under her window. Great Heavens! you find an outrage in this! But M. Flaubert has only done what Shakespeare and Goethe have done, who, at the supreme moment of death, have not failed to make heard some chant, or perhaps plaint, or it might be raillery, which recalls to him who is passing to eternity some pleasure which he will never more enjoy, or some fault to be atoned. Let us read:

“In fact, she looked around her slowly, as one awakening from a dream; then in a distinct voice she asked for her looking-glass, and remained some time bending over it, until the big tears fell from her eyes. Then she turned away her head with a sigh and fell back upon the pillows.”

I could not read it, I am like Lamartine: “The punishment seems to me to go beyond truth....” I should not consider that I was doing a bad deed, Mr. Attorney, in reading these pages to my married daughters, honest girls who have had a good example and good teaching, and who would never, never go away from the straight path for indiscretion, or away from things that could and ought to be understood.... It is impossible for me to continue this reading and I shall hold myself rigorously to the condemned passages:

“As the death-rattle became stronger [Charles was by her side, the man whom you did not see but who is admirable] the priest prayed faster; his prayers mingled with Bovary’s stifled sobs, and sometimes all seemed lost in the muffled murmur of the Latin syllables that tolled like a passing bell.

“Suddenly on the pavement was heard a loud noise of clogs, and the clattering of a stick; and a voice, a raucous voice, sang:

“Maids in the warmth of a summer day,
Dream of love and of love away;
The wind is strong this summer day,
Her petticoat is blown away.”“

Emma raised herself like a galvanized corpse, her hair undone, her eyes fixed, staring.

“Where the sickle blades have been,
Nannette, gathering ears of corn,

Passes bending down, my queen,
To the earth where they were born.”

““The blind man!” she cries.

“And Emma began to laugh, an atrocious, frantic, despairing laugh, thinking she saw the hideous face of the poor wretch that stood out against the eternal night like a menace.

“She fell back upon the mattress in a convulsion. They all drew near. She was dead.”

You see, gentlemen, in this supreme moment, a recalling of her sin, and with it remorse and all that goes with it of poignancy and fear. It is not alone the whim of an artist wishing only to make a contrast without a purpose or a moral; she hears the blind man in the street singing the frightful song he had sung when she was returning all in a perspiration and hideous from an adulterous meeting; it is the same blind man whom she saw at each of those meetings; the blind man who pursued her with his song and his importunity; it is he who comes now to personify human rage at the instant when Divine pity comes to her and follows her to the supreme moment of death! And this is called an outrage against public morals! But I say, on the contrary, that it is an homage to public morals, that there is nothing more moral than this; I say that in this book the vice of education is awake, that it is taken from the true, from the living flesh of our society, and that at each stroke the author places before us this question: “Have you done what you ought for the education of your daughters? Is the religion you have given them such as will sustain them in the tempests of life, or is it only a mass of carnal superstitions which leaves them without support when the storm rages? Have you taught them that life is not the realization of chimerical dreams, that it is something prosaic to which it is necessary to accommodate oneself? Have you taught them that? Have you done what you ought for their happiness? Have you said to them: Poor children, outside the route I have pointed out to you, in the pleasures you may pursue, only disgust awaits you, trouble, disorder, dilapidation, convulsions, and execution....” And you will see that if anything were lacking in the picture, the sheriff’s officer is there; there, too, is the Jew who has seized and sold her furniture to satisfy the caprices of this woman; and the husband is still ignorant of this. Nothing remains for the unfortunate woman, except death!

But, said the Public Minister, her death is voluntary; this woman died in her own time.

But how could she live? Was she not condemned? Had she not drunk to the last dregs her shame and baseness?

Yes, upon our stage we show women who have strayed (and I cannot say what they have done) as happy, charming and smiling. Questam corpore facerant. I limit myself to this remark: When they show them to us happy, charming, enveloped in muslin, presenting a gracious hand to counts, marquises and dukes, often responding themselves to the name of countess or duchess, you call that respecting public morals. But the man who depicts the adulterous woman dying a shameful death, commits an outrage against public morals!

Now, I do not wish to say it is not your opinion that you have expressed, since you have expressed it, but you have yielded to a prejudice. No, it cannot be you, the husband, the father of a family, the man who is there, it is not you, that is not possible; without the prejudice of the speech of the prosecution and a preconceived idea, you would never say that M. Flaubert was the author of a bad book! Surely, left to your inspirations, your appreciation would be the same as mine. I do not speak from a literary point of view; but from a moral and religious standard, as you understand it and I understand it, you and I could not differ.

They have said, furthermore, that we have brought upon the scene a materialistic curate. We took the curate as we took the husband. He is not an eminent ecclesiastic, but an ordinary priest, a country curate. And as we have insulted no one, expressed no thought or sentiment that could be injurious to a husband, so we have insulted no ecclesiastic. I have only a word to say beyond this. Do you wish to read books in which ecclesiastics play a deplorable rôle? Take Gil Blas, The Canon (of Balzac), Nôtre-Dame de Paris of Victor Hugo. If you wish to read of priests who are the shame of the clergy, seek them elsewhere, for you will not find them in Madame Bovary. What have we shown? A country curate, who in his function of country curate is, like M. Bovary, an ordinary man. Have I represented him as a gourmand, a libertine, or a drunkard? I have not said a word of that kind. I have represented him fulfilling his ministry, not with elevated intelligence, but as his nature allowed him to fulfill it. I have put in contact with him, and in an almost continual state of discussion, a type which lives — as the creatures of M. Prudhomme live — as all other creations of our time will live who are taken from truth and which it is not possible for one to forget, and that is the country pharmacist, the Voltairean, the sceptic, the incredulous man, who is in a perpetual quarrel with the curate. But in these quarrels, who is it that is beaten, buffeted, and ridiculed? It is Homais; to him is the most comic rôle given, because he is the most true, because he best paints our sceptical epoch, a fury whom we call a priest-hater. Permit me still to read to you page 206. It is the good woman of the inn who offers something to her curate:

“‘What can I do for you, Monsieur le Curé?’ asked the landlady, as she reached down from the chimney one of the copper candlesticks placed with their candles in a row. ‘Will you take something? A thimbleful of cassis? A glass of wine?’

“The priest declined very politely. He had come for his umbrella, that he had forgotten the other day at the Ernemont convent, and after asking Madame Lefrançois to have it sent to him at the presbytery in the evening, he left for the church, from which the Angelus was ringing.

“When the chemist no longer heard the noise of his boots along the square, he thought the priest’s behavior just now very unbecoming. This refusal to take any refreshment seemed to him the most odious hypocrisy; all priests tumbled on the sly, and were trying to bring back the days of the tithe.

“The landlady took up the defense of her curé.

“‘Besides, he could double up four men like you over his knee. Last year he helped our people to bring in the straw; he carried as many as six trusses at once, he is so strong.’

“‘Bravo!’ said the chemist. ‘Now just send your daughters to confess to fellows with such a temperament! I, if I were the Government, I’d have the priests bled once a month. Yes, Madame Lefrançois, every month — a good phlebotomy, in the interests of the police and morals.’

“‘Be quiet, Monsieur Homais. You are an infidel; you’ve no religion.’

“The chemist answered: ‘I have a religion, my religion, and I even have more than all these others with their mummeries and their juggling. I adore God, on the contrary. I believe in the Supreme Being, in a Creator, whatever he may be. I care little who has placed us here below to fulfill our duties as citizens and fathers of families; but I don't need to go to church to kiss silver plates, and fatten, out of my pocket, a lot of good-for-nothings who live better than we do. For one can know him as well in a wood, in a field, or even contemplating the eternal vault like the ancients. My God! mine is the God of Socrates, of Franklin, of Voltaire, and Béranger! I am for the profession of faith of the 'Savoyard Vicar,' and the immortal principles of '89! And I can't admit of an old boy of a God who takes walks in his garden with a cane in his hand, who lodges his friends in the belly of whales, dies uttering a cry, and rises again at the end of three days; things absurd in themselves, and completely opposed, moreover, to all physical laws, Which proves to us, by the way, that priests have always wallowed in torpid ignorance, in which they would fain engulf the people with them.'

"He ceased looking round for an audience, for in his bubbling over the chemist had for a moment fancied himself in the midst of the town council. But the landlady no longer heeded him; she was listening to a distant rolling."

What is this? A dialogue, a scene such as occurred each time that Homais had occasion to speak of priests.

There is something better in the last passage of page 271:

"Public attention was distracted by the appearance of Monsieur Bournisien, who was going across the market with the holy oil.

"Homais, as we due to his principles, compared priests to ravens attracted by the odour of death. The sight of an ecclesiastic was personally disagreeable to him, for the cassock made him think of the shroud, and he detested the one from some fear of the other."

Our old friend, he who lent us the catechism, was very happy over this phrase; he said to us: "It is a true hit; it is indeed the portrait of a priestophobe whom the cassock makes think of a shroud, and who holds one in execration from a little fear of the other." He was impious, and he profaned the cassock a little through impiety, perhaps, but much more because he was made to think of a shroud.

Permit me to make a résumé of all this. I am defending a man who, if he had met a literary criticism upon the form of his book, or upon certain expressions, or on too much detail, upon one point or another, would have accepted that literary criticism with the best heart in the world. But to find himself accused of an outrage against morals and religion! M. Flaubert has not recovered from it; and he protests here before you with all the astonishment and all the energy of which he is capable against such an accusation.

You are not of the sort to condemn books upon certain lines, you are of the sort to judge after reflection, to judge of the way of putting a work, and you will put this question with which I began my plea and with which I shall end it: Does the reading of such a book give a love of vice, or inspire a horror of it? Does not a punishment so terrible drive one to virtue and encourage it? The reading of this book cannot produce upon you an impression other than it has produced upon us, namely: that the work is excellent as a whole, and that the details in it are irreproachable. All classic literature authorizes the painting of scenes like these we are passing upon.

With this understanding, we might have taken one for a model, which we have not done; we have imposed upon ourselves a sobriety which we ask you to take into account. If, as is possible, M. Flaubert has overstepped the bound he placed for himself, in one word or another, I have only to remind you that this is a first work, but I should then have to tell you that his error was simply one of self-deception, and was without damage to public morals. And in making him come into Court — him, whom you know a little now by his book, him whom you already love a little and will love more, I am sure, when you know him better — is enough of a punishment, a punishment already too cruel. And now it is for you to decide. You have already judged the book as a whole and in its details; it is not possible for you to hesitate!

THE DECISION

The Court has given audience for a part of the last week to the debate of the suit brought against MM. Léon Laurent-Pichat and Auguste-Alexis Pillet, the first the director, the second the printer of a periodical publication called the Revue de Paris, and M. Gustave Flaubert, a man of letters, all three implicated: 1st, Laurent-Pichat, for having, in 1856, published in the numbers of the 1st and the 15th of December of the Revue de Paris, some fragments of a romance entitled, Madame Bovary and, notably, divers fragments contained in pages 73, 77, 78, 272, 273, has committed the misdemeanor of outraging public and religious morals and established customs; 2nd, Pillet and Flaubert are similarly guilty; Pillet in printing them, for they were published, and Flaubert for writing and sending to Laurent-Pichat for publication, the fragments of the romance entitled, Madame Bovary as above designated, for aiding and abetting, with knowledge, Laurent-Pichat in the facts which have been prepared, in facilitating and consummating the above-mentioned misdemeanor, and of thus rendering themselves accomplices in the misdemeanor provided for by articles 1 and 8 of the law of May 17, 1819, and 59 and 60 of the Penal Code.

M. PINARD, substitute, has sustained the prosecution.

The COURT, after hearing the defense, presented by M. SENARD for M. FLAUBERT, M. DEMAREST for PICHAT, and M. FAVÉRIE for the PRINTER, has set for audience this day (Feb. 7) for pronouncing judgment, which is rendered in the following terms:

“Be it known, that Laurent-Pichat, Gustave Flaubert and Pillet are charged with having committed the misdemeanor of an outrage against public and religious morals and established customs; the first as author, in publishing in the periodical publication entitled the Revue de Paris of which he is the manager-proprietor, and in the numbers of the 1st and 15th of October, the 1st and 15th of November and the 1st and 15th of December, 1856, a romance entitled Madame Bovary, Gustave Flaubert and Pillet as accomplices, the one for furnishing the manuscript, and the other for printing the said romance;

“Be it known, that the particularly marked passages of the romance with which we have to do, which include nearly 300 pages, are contained, according to the terms of the ordinance of dismissal before the Court of Correction, in pages 73, 77 and 78 (of the number of the 1st of December), and 271, 272, 273 (of the 15th of December number, 1856);

“Be it known, that the incriminated passages, viewed abstractively and isolatedly, present effectively either expressions, or images, or pictures which good taste reproves and which are of a nature to make an attack upon legitimate and honorable susceptibilities;

“Be it known, that the same observations can justly be applied to other passages not defined by the ordinance of dismissal, and which, in the first place seem to present an exposition of theories which would at least be contrary to the good customs and institutions which are the basis of our society, as well as to a respect for the most august ceremonies of divine worship;

“Be it known, that, from these diverse titles, the work brought before the Court merits severe blame, since the mission of literature should be to ornament and recreate the mind by raising the intelligence and purifying manners, rather than by showing the disgust of vice in offering a picture of disorder which may exist in our society;

“Be it known, that the defendants, and particularly Gustave Flaubert, energetically denied the charge brought against them, setting forth that the romance submitted to the judgment of the Court had an eminently moral aim; that the author had principally in view the exposing of dangers which result from an education not appropriate to the sphere in which one lives, and that, pursuant to this idea, he has shown the woman, the principal personage in the romance, aspiring towards the world and a society for which she was not made, unhappy in her modest condition where she was placed by fate, forgetting first her duties as a mother, afterward lacking in her duties as a wife, introducing successively into her house adultery and ruin, and ending miserably by suicide, after passing through all degrees of the most complete degradation, having even descended to theft;

“Be it known, that this data, moral without doubt in principle, must be completed in its development by a certain severity of language and by a reserve directed especially towards that which touches the exposition of the pictures and situations which the author has employed in placing it before the eyes of the public;

“Be it known, that it is not allowed, under pretext of painting character or local colour, to reproduce the facts, words, and gestures of the digressions of the personages which a writer gives himself the mission to paint; that a like system, applied to works of the mind as well as to productions of the fine arts, would lead to a realism which would be the reverse of the beautiful and the good, and which, bringing forth works equally offensive to the eye and to the mind, would commit a continual outrage against public morals and good manners;

“Be it known, that there are limits which literature, even the lightest, should not pass, and of which Gustave Flaubert and the co-indicted have not taken sufficient account;

“Be it known, that the work of which Flaubert is the author, is a work which appears to be long and seriously elaborated, from a literary point of view and as a study of character; that the passages coming under the ordinance for dismissal, as reprehensible as they may be, are few in number as compared with the extent of the work; that these passages, either in the ideas they expose, or in the situations they represent, bring out as a whole the characters which the author wished to paint, although exaggerated and impregnated with a vulgar realism often shocking;

“Be it known, that Gustave Flaubert affirms his respect for good manners, and all that attaches itself to religious morals; that it does not appear that his book has been written like certain other books, with the sole aim of giving satisfaction to the sensual passions, to a spirit of license and debauch, or of ridiculing things which should be held in the respect of all;

“That he has done wrong only in losing sight of the rules which every writer who respects himself ought never to lose sight of, or forget: that literature, like art, in order to accomplish the good which it is expected to produce ought only to be chaste and pure in its form and expression;

“In the circumstances, be it known, that it is not sufficiently proven that Pichat, Gustave Flaubert and Pillet are guilty of the misdemeanor with which they are charged;

“The Court acquits them of the indictment brought against them, and decrees a dismissal without costs.”

The Criticism

GUSTAVE FLAUBERT: A STUDY by Guy de Maupassant

Translated by M Walter Dinne

The great short story writer Guy de Maupassant (1850 – 1893) was a protégé of Flaubert, and Maupassant's stories contain an economy of style that are said to have been inspired by his mentor. Following Flaubert's death, Maupassant wrote this critical analysis of his work, using notes and diary accounts.

Guy de Maupassant — Flaubert's famous protégé

GUSTAVE FLAUBERT: A STUDY

GUSTAVE FLAUBERT was born in Rouen on the 12th of December, 1821. His mother was the daughter of a physician of Pont-l'Évêque, M. Fleuriot. She belonged to a Low-Normandy family, the Cambremers of Croix-Mare, and was allied to Thouret, of the Constituent Assembly.

Flaubert's grandmother, Charlotte Cambremer, was, in childhood, a companion of Charlotte Corday. His father, born at Nogent on the Seine, was of a family originally from Champagne. He was a surgeon of great skill and renown, a director of the hospital at Rouen. A straightforward, simple, brusque man, he was astonished, though not indignant, at his son's choice of a vocation. He considered the profession of writing an occupation of idleness and uselessness.

Gustave Flaubert was the opposite of a phenomenal child. He succeeded in learning to read only with extreme difficulty. It is doubtful whether he knew how when he entered the Lyceum, at nine years of age.

His great passion in childhood was to have stories told to him. He would listen motionless, fixing his great blue eyes upon the narrator. Then, he would remain quiet for some hours thinking, one finger in his mouth, entirely absorbed, as if asleep.

His mind was at work, however, for he composed dramatic pieces before he was able to write, which he acted all alone, representing the different personages, and improvising the long dialogues.

From his early infancy, the two distinctive traits of his nature were great ingenuousness and a dislike of physical action. All his life he remained ingenuous and sedentary. He could not see any one walking or moving about near him without becoming exasperated; and he would declare in his sharp voice, sonorous and always a little theatrical, that motion was not philosophical. "One can think and write only when seated," he would say.

His ingenuousness continued until his last days. This observer, so penetrating and so subtle, seemed to see life clearly only from afar. When it touched him, when it was busy in his immediate neighborhood, one would have said that a veil covered his eyes. His extreme native frankness, his immovable honesty, the generosity of all his emotions, of all the impulses of his soul are indubitably the causes of this unchanging ingenuousness.

He lived beside the world, but not in it. Better placed for observation, he did not have the impression of downright contact.

To him especially could one apply what he wrote in his preface to the Last Songs, of his friend Louis Bouilhet:

“Finally, if the accidents of the world, when they are observed, appear to you transposed for the sake of an illusion in description, so that all things comprise a part of your existence, nor seem to have any other use; if you can be unmoved by any injury, ready for any sacrifice, breastplated against any trial, rush in and publish!”

As a young man, he was of surprising beauty. An old friend of the family, an illustrious physician, said to his mother: “Your son is the God of Love grown up.”

Disdaining women, he lived in the exaltation of the artist, in a kind of poetic ecstasy which he preserved by daily association with him who was his dearest friend, the brother heart which one never finds twice. This was Alfred Le Poittevin, who died young of a disease of the heart, brought on by overwork.

Then Flaubert was struck with a terrible malady which his other friend, M. Maxime Ducamp, had the evil inspiration to reveal to the public, in trying to establish a relation between the artistic nature of Flaubert and epilepsy, explaining one by the other.

Assuredly, this frightful disease could not strike down the body without overshadowing the mind. But is that to be regretted? Are happy, strong and self-reliant people fitted, as it is generally understood, to penetrate and express our life, so tormented and so short? Are these exuberant persons made for discovering all the misery, all the suffering which surrounds us, to perceive that death strikes without ceasing, everywhere, each day, ferocious, blind, and fatal?

So it is possible, it is probable, that the first attack of epilepsy left an imprint of melancholy and of fear upon the ardent mind of this robust man. It is probable that, as a consequence of it, a sort of apprehension of life rested upon him, a little more sombre manner of looking at things, a suspicion before the event, a doubt before apparent happiness. But to those who knew that enthusiastic, vigorous man who was called Flaubert, to those who saw him live, laugh, rejoice, feel and vibrate each day, there is no doubt that the fear of a crisis, which disappeared in ripe age and re-appeared only in the last years, could not have modified, except in an imperceptible degree, his manner of being and feeling and the habits of his life.

After some literary essays which were not published, Gustave Flaubert made his début in 1857 by a masterpiece called Madame Bovary.

Everyone knows the history of this book, the lawsuit brought by the Public Attorney, the violent speech of M. Pinard, whose name will be remembered by this case, the eloquent defense of M. Senard, the difficult, haggling acquittal, the reproach of the President in severe words, and then, success, the avenger, resounding, immense!

But Madame Bovary has also a secret history which may be a lesson to beginners in this difficult trade of letters.

When Flaubert, after five years of wearisome labor, had finished this unusual work, he intrusted it to his friend M. Maxime Ducamp, who put it into the hands of M. Laurent Pichat, editor-proprietor of the Revue de Paris. Then it was that he found how difficult it is to make oneself understood at the first blow, how one is misunderstood by those in whom he has confidence, and by those who pass for the most intelligent. From this epoch dates that scorn which he had for men's judgment, and his irony for absolute assertions or denials.

Some time after taking the manuscript of Madame Bovary to M. Laurent Pichat, M. Maxime Ducamp wrote the following singular letter to Gustave Flaubert, which may perhaps modify the opinion one has formed from the revelations of this writer of his friend, and in particular of Madame Bovary in his Literary Souvenirs:

JULY 14, 1856.

“DEAR OLD FRIEND: Laurent Pichat has read your romance and has sent me his approval of it, which I am to address to you. You will see on reading it how much I should share it, since it reproduces nearly all the observations that I made before your departure. I sent your book to Laurent without doing more than to recommend it to him warmly; we had no understanding that we were to see you with the same eye. The counsel he gives you is good, and I would even say that it is the only counsel you can follow. Leave us masters of your romance that we may publish it in the Revue; we will make such cuttings as we judge indispensable; you can then publish it later in book form as you think best; that concerns you alone. My most friendly opinion is that, if you do not do this, you will compromise yourself absolutely and will make your appearance with a perplexing work whose style is not sufficient to give it interest. Be courageous, close your eyes during the operation and pride yourself, if not upon your talent, at least on the experience acquired in these things, and upon our affection for you. You have buried your romance under a heap of things, well done but useless; one cannot see it plainly enough; but try to uncover it and it is an easy task. We shall have this done under our eyes by an experienced and skilful person; we shall not add a word to your copy; we shall only prune it; this will cost you a hundred francs, which will be reserved for you on your rights, and you will have published a thing truly good in the place of an incomplete work too much bolstered. You may curse me with all your might, but remember meanwhile, that in all this I have looked only to your interest.

Adieu, dear old chap; answer, and believe me Yours always,
MAXIME DUCAMP.”

The mutilation of this typical and henceforth immortal book, performed by an “experienced and skilful person,” would have cost the author only one hundred francs! Truly, that is nothing!

Gustave Flaubert was stirred with a profound and natural emotion on reading this strange counsel. And he wrote in his boldest hand, upon the back of that carefully preserved letter, only this word: “Gigantic!”

The two collaborators, Messrs. Pichat and Maxime Ducamp, now put themselves to work to extricate their friend’s book from that heap of things “well done, but useless,” which damaged it; for one reads in a sample copy of the first edition of the book, preserved by the author, the following lines:

“This copy represents my manuscript as it comes from the hand of Sir Laurent Pichat, poet and editor-proprietor of the Revue de Paris.”
GUSTAVE FLAUBERT.

20th April, 1857.

On opening the volume, one finds from page to page, lines, paragraphs, and entire scenes cut out. The greater part of the new or original things are cancelled with care.

And one reads further, on the last page, from the hand of Gustave Flaubert, this:

“It was necessary, according to Maxime Ducamp, to retrench all the nuptials, and, according to Pichat, to suppress, or at least abridge considerably, and to make over the meetings from one end to the other! According to the general opinion of the Revue, the clubfoot is considerably too long, ‘useless.’“

This was also the origin of the coolness which arose in the ardent friendship between Flaubert and M. Ducamp. If it were necessary to produce a more definite proof of this, it could be found in this fragment of a letter from Louis Bouilhet to Flaubert:

“As for Maxime Ducamp, I have gone fifteen days without seeing him and should have passed another week in the same fashion if he had not appeared at my house on Thursday of last week. I must say that he was very amiable both as regards my welfare and your own. This may have been policy, but I state the fact simply as a historian. He offered me his services in finding an editor, and later in finding a library. He is well informed about you and your work. What I told him about Bovary interested him very much. He said to me, in incidental phrases, that he was very glad the wrong was on your side for never having pardoned him the matter of the Revue, that he saw with happiness your works in his magazine, etc., etc. He seemed to speak with conviction and frankness. . . .”

These small details are important only from the point of view of M. Ducamp’s judgment of his friend. A reconciliation took place between them later.

The appearance of Madame Bovary was a revolution in letters. The great Balzac, forgotten, had shown his genius in some powerful books, stuffed, taken from life, observations, or rather revelations of humanity. He divined, invented, created an entire world, born of his mind. Little of the artist, in the delicate sense of the word, he wrote strong language, full of imagery, a little confused and laborious.

Carried away by his inspiration, he seemed to be ignorant of that difficult art, the giving to ideas their true value through words, sonorousness and context of phrase.

He put into his work the weight of a colossus; and there are few pages from this great man which can be cited as masterpieces of language, as one cites Rabelais, La Bruyère, Bossuet, Montesquieu, Chateaubriand, Michelet, Gautier, etc.

Gustave Flaubert, on the contrary, proceeding more by penetration than intuition, makes use of an admirable new language, precise, sober, sonorous, for a study of human life, profound, surprising, complete.

This is no longer the romance such as the greatest have made, the romance where one always feels a little imagination, a little of the author; a romance that can be classed among the tragic kind, the sentimental kind, the passionate kind; the romance where the purpose, the opinions of the author and his manner of thought show themselves. It is life itself made evident. One would say that the personages arose under his eyes as he turned the pages; that the landscapes unrolled themselves, with their sorrows, their gaieties, their odours, their charm; that objects surged before the reader, as he called them forth with an invisible power, concealed one knows not where.

Gustave Flaubert, in fact, was the most ardent apostle of impersonality in art. He would not admit, that the author ever should be surmised, that he should let fall in a page, in a line, in a word, a single particle of his opinion, nor any appearance of purpose. He should be the mirror of facts, but a mirror which should reproduce them by giving to them that inexpressible reflection, that, I know not what of something almost divine which is called art.

It is not "impersonal" that one should call it, in speaking of this impeccable artist, but impassible. If he attached considerable importance to observation and analysis, he laid still greater stress on composition and style. For with him these two qualities were the essentials of an imperishable book. By composition — he meant that vexatious labour which consists in expressing only the essence of actions that follow each other in an existence, in choosing uniquely the characteristic traits and grouping them, combining them in such a way that they concur in a manner most perfect for producing the effect one wishes to obtain, but not with any purpose of instruction whatever.

Nothing so irritated him as the doctrines of the pawns of criticism upon moral art or honest art. "Since humanity has existed," he would say, "all the great writers have protested through their works against such impotent counsel."

Morality, honesty, and such principles are indispensable things in the maintenance of established social order; but there is nothing in common between social order and letters. Romance writers have as their chief object the observation and description of human passions, good and bad. Their mission is not to moralise, nor to scourge, nor to teach. A book with these tendencies ceases to be an artistic book.

The writer looks at and tries to penetrate the soul and the heart, to sound their depths, the propensities, shameful or magnanimous, together with all the complicated mechanism of movable mortals. He observes according to his temperament as a man, and his artistic conscience. He ceases to be conscientious and artistic if he systematically forces himself to glorify humanity, to gloss things over, to attenuate the passions that he judges dishonestly to the profit of the passions he judges honestly.

Any act, good or bad, has importance for the writer only as a subject for writing, without any idea of good or bad to be attached to it. It is worth more or less as a literary document, that is all.

Beyond the truth, observed in good faith and expressed with talent, there is nothing except the powerless efforts of the pawns.

The great writers are not preoccupied with either morals or chastity. For example: Aristophanes, Apuleius, Ovid, Virgil, Rabelais, Shakespeare and many others.

If a book carries a lesson, it should be in spite of the author, through the very force of the facts it relates. Flaubert considered these principles as articles of faith.

When Madame Bovary appeared, the public, accustomed to the unctuous syrup of the elegant romances, likewise to the unlikely adventures of the chance romances, classed the new writer among the realists. This is a gross error and stupid folly. Gustave Flaubert was no more a realist because he observed life with care than M. Cherbuliez is not an idealist because he observed badly. The realist is he who occupies himself only with the brutal fact without comprehending its relative importance or noting its reverberations. To Gustave Flaubert, a fact in itself signified nothing. He explains himself thus in one of his letters:

“You complain that the events are not varied, — that is the plaint of a realist, and besides, how do you know this? It may be necessary to look at them more closely. Have you ever believed in the existence of things? Is not everything an illusion? There is no truth except in its relation, that is to say, the fashion in which we perceive the objects.”

No observer, however, was ever more conscientious; and no one strove more to comprehend the causes which led to the effects. His process of work, his artistic process held much more to penetration than to observation. Instead of displaying the psychology of his personages in explanatory dissertations, he simply made it appear by their acts. The inward was thus unveiled by the outward, and without any psychological argument.

In the first place, he imagined his types; then, proceeding by deduction, he gave to these beings the characteristic actions which they would naturally accomplish, following their temperaments with an absolute logic. Life, then, that he studied so minutely, could serve him only as a title of instructions.

Never does he announce the events; one would say on reading them that the facts spoke for themselves, so much importance did he attach to a visible appearance of men and things.

It is this rare quality of scene-setter and impassible portrayer which baptized him a realist by the superficial minds who know how to comprehend the deep meaning of a work only when it is spread out in philosophic phrases.

He was much irritated over this epithet of realist, which they pasted on his back, and pretended to have written his Bovary only out of hatred to the school of M. Champflèury.

In spite of a great friendship for Émile Zola, and a great admiration for his powerful talent, which he qualified as genial, he could never pardon him his naturalism. It is sufficient to read Madame Bovary with intelligence to understand how far removed he was from realism. The plan of the realistic writer consists in simply relating the facts that have happened among personages whom they have known or observed. In Madame Bovary, each personage is a type, that is to say, a résumé of a series of beings belonging to the same intellectual order.

The country doctor, the provincial dreamer, the chemist, — a sort of Prudhomme, — the curate, the lovers, and even all the accessory figures, are types, endowed with a relievo much more energetic than are they in whom are concentrated great powers of observation, and much more lifelike than those represented by a pattern, or model, of their class.

But Gustave Flaubert continued to grow great up to the hour of the blossoming of romanticism; he was nourished by echoing phrases of Chateaubriand and Victor Hugo, and felt in his soul a lyric need which could not completely expand in such clearly-defined books as Madame Bovary.

And this is one of the most singular sides of this great man: this innovator, this revealer, this man-who-dared was, up to the time of his death, under the dominating influence of romanticism. Almost in spite of himself, almost unconsciously, driven by the irresistible force of his genius, by the creative force shut up within him, has he written these romances in a style so novel, and a note so personal. From his own taste, he would have preferred epic subjects, which unrolled themselves in a kind of song, like tableaux in an opera.

In Madame Bovary, besides, as in the Sentimental Education, his style, constrained to the rendition of common things, has often some flights, some sonorousness of tone, above the subjects it expresses. It makes departures, as if tired of being held back, of being forced to such platitude and, in speaking of Homais' stupidity or Emma's silliness, it becomes pompous or confusing, as if he were translating the movement of a poem.

Not being able to resist this need of grandeur, he composed, after the fashion of a Homeric recital, his second romance, Salammbô.

And is that a romance? Or is it rather an opera in prose? The tableaux are developed with prodigious magnificence, with a surprising pomp, colour and rhythm. The phrase sings, cries, has the fury and sonorousness of the trumpet, the murmur of the hautboy, the undulations of the violoncello, the artifice of the violin and the finesse of the flute. And the personages, built for heroes, seem always on the stage, speaking after a superb mode, with an elegance strong and charming, with the air of moving about in antique and imposing garb and decorations.

This giant's book, the most plastically beautiful that he has written, gives also the impression of a magnificent dream. Is it thus that events passed such as Gustave Flaubert relates? No, undoubtedly no. If the facts are exact, the pomp of poesy which he throws over them show them to us in a kind of apotheosis, the lyric art of which envelops whatever it touches.

But scarcely had he ended that sonorous recitation of a mercenary revolt, when he felt himself called on anew by subjects less superb, and he composed with slowness that great romance of patience, that long, sober, and perfect study which is called the Sentimental Education.

This time he took for his personages, no longer types, as in the Bovary, but any sort of men, mediocre men, the kind we meet every day. Although this work demanded a superhuman amount of labour in its composition, so much does it resemble life itself that it has the air of being executed without plan or purpose. It is the perfect image of what takes place each day; it is an exact journal of existence. And yet, the philosophy in it remains so completely latent, so completely concealed behind the facts; the psychology is so perfectly enclosed in the action, attitudes and words of the personages, that the great public, accustomed to underscored effects, to manifest teaching, did not comprehend the value of this incomparable romance.

Only very keen minds and observers have seized the purport of this unique book, so artless, so sad, so simple in appearance, but so profound, so veiled, and so bitter. The Sentimental Education, scorned for the most part by the critics, accustomed as they are to the known forms and the immutable in art, has, nevertheless, numerous and enthusiastic admirers who give it the highest place among Flaubert's works.

But it became necessary for him, in consequence of one of those inevitable reactions of the mind, to undertake a new subject, something large and poetic; and he finished a work, sketched some time before, entitled The Temptation of Saint Antony.

This is certainly the most powerful effort of the mind he ever made. But the very nature of the subject, its extent, its inaccessible height, rendered such a work almost beyond human strength. Taking up the old legend, he no longer has him assailed by visions of nude women and succulent nourishment alone, but by all the doctrines, all the beliefs and superstitions by which the disturbed mind of man is bewildered. It is a colossal defile of religious escort, of -all the strange conceptions, simple and complicated, enclosed in the brain of dreamer, priest, or philosopher who is tortured by a desire to penetrate the unknown.

As soon as this enormous task was finished (a work somewhat painful and confused, a chaos of tottering beliefs), he began again upon nearly the same subject, taking the sciences in place of religion and two narrow-minded citizens instead of the ecstatic saint.

Here are some of the ideas and the development of this encyclopaedic book, Bouvard and Pécuchet, which might have as a sub-title: "Concerning false methods in the study of human knowledge."

Two copyists employed in Paris met by chance and became bound together in the closest friendship. One of them had a small inheritance, the other his savings. With the combined sum they bought a farm in Normandy, the dream of their existence, and left the capital. Then they began a series of studies and experiences embracing all human knowledge, and thus are developed the philosophic data of the work.

At first, they took to gardening, then to agriculture, to chemistry, astronomy, medicine, archaeology, history, literature, politics, hygiene, to magnetism and sorcery; they finally came to philosophy, losing themselves in its abstractions; they fell into religion, which soon disgusted them; they took up the education of two orphans, but finding themselves frustrated again and in despair, they go back to copying as in days gone by.

The book is thus a review of all the sciences, as they appear to two lucid enough minds of the mediocre, simple order. It is at the same time a formidable collection of knowledge, and above all a prodigious criticism on all scientific systems, opposing the one to the other, tearing down both sides by bringing fact to bear upon them, contradicting them by the aid of accepted and undisputed laws. It is a history of the feebleness of human intelligence, a promenade through the labyrinth of erudition with a thread in one's hand. This thread is the grand irony of a thinker who proves, in all things and without ceasing, eternal and universal stupidity.

Beliefs, established for some centuries, are exposed, developed, and dismembered in ten lines by placing in opposition other beliefs so deftly and briskly as to undo and demolish them. From page to page, from line to line, a notion comes up, and immediately another rises in its turn, when the first withdraws or falls, struck down by its neighbor.

What Flaubert did for religions and antique philosophy in The Temptation of Saint Antony, he has here accomplished anew for all modern knowledge. It is the Tower-of-Babel of science, where all doctrines, diverse, contrary, and absolute (above all), speaking each its own language, demonstrate the impotence of effort, the vanity of affirmation and always "the eternal misery of all."

The truth of to-day becomes the error of to-morrow; all is uncertain, variable, containing in unknown proportions, some quantity of the true and of the false. At least, what is there is neither true nor false. The moral of the book seems contained in this phrase of Bouvard's: "Knowledge is gained by following the data furnished by an angle in space. Perhaps it will not bring all that we are ignorant of, which would require so much greater space that one can never hope to discover it."

This book touches upon that which is greatest, most curious, most subtle and most interesting in man: it is the history of an idea under all its forms, in all its manifestations, with all its transformations, in its weakness and in its power.

It is curious to notice here in Gustave Flaubert a tendency towards an ideal more and more abstract and elevated. By ideal must not be understood that sentimental kind which seduces the common citizen's imagination. For the ideal, with most men, is nothing other than the unlikely. For the rest, it is simply the domain of the idea.

Flaubert's early romances have been first of all a study of customs, very true and very human; then, a dazzling poem, a procession of images and visions. In Bouvard and Pécuchet, the personages themselves belong to systems and not to mankind. The actors serve uniquely for expressing ideas which, as if they were beings, move, unite, combat and destroy each other. And some particularly comic part, or wicked idea, takes its place in the procession of beliefs in the brains of these two poor gentlemen who personify humanity. They are always of good faith, always zealous; and invariably experience contradicts the best established theory, and the most subtle reasoning is demolished by the most simple fact.

This surprising edifice of knowledge, built for demonstrating human impotence, should have a crowning conclusion, a shining justification. After this formidable array, the author has heaped up an irresistible amount of proof, the wrong side of foolishness culled from among great men.

When Bouvard and Pécuchet, disgusted with everything, returned to their copying, they naturally opened the books that they had read, taking them in the natural order of their studies, and transcribed minutely some choice passages from them into the works from which they were drawing. Then begins a series of frightful absurdities, ignorance, flagrant contradictions, monstrous errors, shameful statements, and mistakes inconceivable to high minds and those of more intelligence. Whoever has written upon a subject has sometime said a foolish thing. This foolish statement Flaubert has unfailingly found and set down; and, putting with it another, then another, then another, he has made a formidable array which disconcerts all belief and all statement.

This inner view of human stupidity resulted in a mountain of notes too mixed ever to be published unabridged. He has classed them, however; but this classification should be revised, and half, at least, of this mass of documents suppressed. Nevertheless, here is the order in which he left these notes:

inasmuch as it appeared at once the best and the lowest in price, etc. By reason of which, they prayed humbly, but firmly, that his Majesty, the natural protector of their work, would be willing to protect them from all attack upon their rights by absolutely interdicting this perturbing product.”

SCIENTIFIC IDEAS.

NATURAL HISTORY.

“The women in Egypt prostituted themselves publicly to the crocodiles!” — PROUDHON: {On the celebration of Sunday, 1850.}

“Dogs are ordinarily of two opposite tints, the one light and the other dark, so that in whatever part of the house they may be, they can be seen upon the furniture, with the colour of which they might be confounded.”

— BERNARDIN DE SAINT-PIERRE: Harmonies of Nature.

“Fleas throw themselves, wherever they are, upon a white colour. This instinct was given to them that we might catch them more easily.”

— BERNARDIN DE SAINT-PIERRE: Harmonies of Nature.

“The melon is divided by nature into sections so as to be eaten in the family; the pumpkin, being much larger, can be eaten with the neighbours.”

— BERNARDIN DE SAINT-PIERRE: Études de la Nature.

CARE FOR THE TRUTH.

“AU authority, especially that of the church, ought to oppose new things, without letting themselves be frightened at the danger of retarding the discovery of some new truths, which may be inconvenient, fleeting, and wholly useless as compared with the shocking of institutions and accepted opinions.”

— P. 283, vol. 2, DE MAISTRE, Exam. Phil. Bacon.

“A disease of potatoes was caused by the disaster at Monville. The meteor was most active in the valleys, where it drew off the heat. It had the effect of a sudden coldness.”

— RASPAIL: Hist. Health and Sickness, p. 246, 247.

FISHES.

“I notice in fishes that it is a marvel they are born and live in the waters of the ocean, which are salt, and that their race was not annihilated long ago.”

— GAUME: Catechism of Perseverance, 57.

CONCERNING CHEMISTRY.

“Is it necessary to observe that this vast science (Chemistry) is absolutely out of place in general teaching? Of what use is it to the minister, the magistrate, the sailor, or the merchant?”

— DE MAISTRE: Letters and unedited pamphlets.

SCORN OF SCIENCE.

“Many persons have thought that science in the hands of man dries up the heart, disenchant nature, leads the minds of the weak to atheism, and from atheism to crime.”

— CHATEAUBRIAND: Genius of Christianity, p. 335.

ZOOLOGY.

“It is, as it seems to us, a great pity to find man to-day ranked among the mammiferous (after Linnæus’s system) with the monkeys, the bats and the sloths. Is he not worthy to be left at the head of creation where Moses, Aristotle, Buffon, and Nature placed him?”

— CHATEAUBRIAND: Genius of Christianity, p. 551.

“His movements [of the serpent] differ from those of all animals. One does not know where to say the principle of his locomotion lies, for he has neither fins, nor feet, nor wings; nevertheless he flees like a shadow and vanishes magically.”

— CHATEAUBRIAND: Genius of Christianity, p. 138.

LINGUISTIC.

“If one had a dictionary of savage tongues, he might find there the remaining evidence of a language spoken before their day by an enlightened people, and, if we did not find it, the only conclusion would be that degradation had arrived at such a point that the last remnants had been effaced.”

— DE MAISTRE: Evenings at St. Petersburg.

THE NATURAL SCIENCES ARE SECONDARY.

“They belong to prelates, to the nobles, to the great officers of State, to be the depositories and the guardians of conserved truth, to teach nations what is good and what is bad, what is true and what is false, in moral and spiritual order. Others have no right to reason upon this kind of matter. They have the natural sciences to amuse them; of what can they complain?”

— 8th Conversation, p. 131. DE MAISTRE.

Evenings at St. Petersburg.

SCIENCE SHOULD BE PUT IN SECOND PLACE.

“If we do not look well to ancient maxims, if education be not given up to the priests, and if science is not put in the second place, the evils which await us are incalculable; we shall be brutalized by science, and that is the last degree of brutality.”

— DE MAISTRE: Essay on generating principles.

HISTORIC REVIEW.

Opinion on the study of history.

“The teaching of history may have, in my opinion, some inconvenient peril for the professor. It has some also for pupils.” — DUPANLOUP.

CRITICAL HISTORY.

“If we consider Napoleon in respect to his moral qualities, it is difficult to estimate him, because it is difficult to discover goodness in a soldier who is ever occupied with strewing the earth with the dead; friendship in a man who never has his equals about him; probity in a potentate who is master of the riches of the universe. At the same time, however outside the ordinary rules this mortal may be, it is not impossible to seize here and there certain traits of his moral physiognomy.”

— A. THIERS:

History of the Consulate and the Empire, vol. 22, p. 713.

“Many times have I heard deplored the blindness of the judgment of Francis I., who thrust away Christopher Columbus when he proposed the Indies.”

“His morals [Chlmène] are at least scandalous, if, in fact, not depraved. This pernicious example renders the work notably defective and destroys the aim of the poetry which would otherwise be useful.”

— Academy (On The Cid).

“Let one quote me an excerpt from the great Corneille that I would not have undertaken to do better myself than he has done it! Who is to be the judge? I should only do what any man is capable of doing, provided he believed as firmly in Aristotle as in me.”

— LESSING: Dramatists of Hamburg, p. 462, 463.

“In spite of the reputation which this writer [La Bruyère] enjoyed, there is much negligence in his style.”

— CONDILLAC: Treatise on the Art of Writing.

“A famous dreamer [Descartes], subject to flights of the imagination, whose name is made for a chimerical country.”

— MARAT: Concerning the Panthéon.

“Rabelais, filth of humanity.” — LAMARTINE, LULLI.

“His songs, so often repeated in the world, serve only to suggest passions the most irregular.”

— BOSSUET: Maxims on Comedy.

MOLIERE

“It is a pity that Molière did not know how to write.” — FENELON.

“Molière is an infamous actor.” — BOSSUET.

BYRON.

“Byron’s genius seems to me to be at bottom a little stupid.” — L. VEUILLLOT: Free Thoughts, p. 11.

“In my opinion, Byron, after he had been very justly rejected by his family and his country, — that is to say, — put in a convict-prison for being a faithless husband and a scandalous citizen, — if he had been a man of sense, and truly great in mind and heart, he would have made the simplest reparation for the sake of recovering the right to bring up his daughter and serve his country.” — L. VEUILLOT: Free Thoughts, p. 11.

ABUSE OF GREAT MEN.

“He [Bonaparte] is in fact a great winner of battles; but aside from that the least General is more skilful than he.”

— CHATEAUBRIAND: Napoleon and the Bourbons.

BONAPARTE.

“It has been believed that he had perfected the art of war, while it is certain that he has retrograded toward the infancy of the art.”

— CHATEAUBRIAND: Bonaparte and the Bourbons.

BACON.

“Bacon is absolutely devoid of the spirit of analysis; not only does he not know how to resolve questions, but he does not know how to place them.”

— DE MAISTRE: Examination of Bacon's Philosophy, vol. i, p. 37.

“Bacon was a man ignorant of all the sciences, and all his ideas were fundamentally false.”

DE MAISTRE:

Examination of Bacon's Philosophy, vol. 1, p. 82.

“Bacon had an eminently false mind, of a kind of falseness which never has belonged to any one but him. His absolute incapacity, essential, radical, was seen in all branches of natural science.”

— DE MAISTRE: Examination of Bacon's Philosophy, vol. 1, p. 285.

VOLTAIRE.

“Voltaire is nothing as a philosopher, without authority as a critic and an historian, and antiquated as a scholar; daylight has been let in upon his private life, but through pride, the wickedness and little meannesses of his soul and character are discredited.”

— DUPANLOUP: High Intellectual Education.

GOETHE.

“Posterity, to whom Goethe has left his work to be judged, will do what it has to do. It will write on tablets of bronze:

‘Goethe, born at Frankfort in 1749, died at Weimar in 1852; a great writer, a great poet and a great artist.’ And then the fanatics, who are for form for the sake of form, and art for the sake of art, for love and materialism, will come and ask to have added: ‘Great man!’ and Posterity will answer: ‘No!’“

— A. DUMAS, fls.

July 23, 1873.

IDEAS OF ART.

IMBECILE.

“There is no doubt that extraordinary men, in whatever way it may be, owe a part of their success to the superior qualities with which they are endowed by organization.” — DAMIRON: Course of Philosophy, vol. 11, p. 35.

“The grocery shop is respectable. It is a branch of commerce. The army is more respectable still, because it is an institution whose aim is order. The grocery is useful, the army is necessary.”

— The News: JULES NORIAC.

Oct. 26, 1865.

JOCRISSES.

“As soon as a Frenchman has passed the frontier, he enters upon foreign territory.”

— L. HAVIN: Sunday Courier, Dec. 15.

“When the limit is overleaped, there are limits no longer.” — PONSARD.

There are in existence almost enough of these notes to fill three volumes. The aptitude of Gustave Flaubert for discovering this kind of stupidity was surprising. The following example is characteristic.

On reading the discourse of Scribe's reception at the French Academy, he stopped short before this phrase, which he noticed immediately:

“Does Molière's comedy instruct us in the great events of the Louis XIV. century? Does it tell us a word of the weaknesses or faults of the great king? Does it speak of the revoking of the Edict of Nantes?”

He wrote under this quotation:

“Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, 1685.”

“Death of Molière, 1673.”

How was it that no one of the Academicians, meeting to listen to this discourse before it was delivered, happened upon this very simple comparison of dates?

Gustave Flaubert counted upon forming a volume of these justifying documents. In order to render the collection of stupidity less heavy and fastidious, there were to be at intervals two or three stories, of poetic idealism, also copied in Bouvard and Pechuchet.

Among his papers was found the plan of one of these stories, which would have been entitled: A Night with Don Juan. This plan, indicated by short phrases, often by single words alone, reveals better than any dissertation his manner of conceiving and preparing his work. From this point of view it is interesting. Here it is:

A NIGHT WITH DON JUAN.

I.

“Make him without accomplishments, of a single trait.

“Begin with tumult of action, — tableau of two cavaliers arriving upon horses out of breath. Glimpse of the landscape, but not too marked, only as seen through the trees, — let the horses graze in the brushwood, — they become entangled in the lines, etc. — In the midst of the dialogue, from time to time, break in with little details of action.

“Don Juan unbuttons and throws down his sword which comes out of the scabbard a little upon the turf. — He comes to kill the brother of Donna Elvira. — He has fled. — The conversation begins in sharp, brusque speeches.

“Landscape. — The convent behind them. — They are seated on a grassplot, on a declivity under some orange trees. — Circle of woods about them. — Slightly rising land before them. — Horizon of mountains, bare at the summit. — Setting sun.

“Don Juan is weary and betakes himself to Le porello. — But is it my fault, the life you lead and make me lead? Ah, well, the life that I lead — is that my fault also? What! It is not your fault. — Leporello believed him, for he had often seen in him the good intention of leading a more regular life, — yes, and the chance of making it otherwise. Examples. — Leporello mentions the examples: desire that he has for knowing all the women he sees, universal jealousy of the human race. — You would wish all to belong to you. — You would seek occasions. — Yes, a disquiet urges me. I should wish . . . aspiration. . . . — Less than ever he knows what he would wish, what he wishes. — Leporello for a long time has comprehended little that his master said. — Don Juan wishes to be pure, to be a virgin youth. — He has never been so because he is so bold, impudent and positive. — He has often wished for the emotions of innocence. — In all and above all, it is the woman he seeks. — But why do you leave them? — Ah! why? — Don Juan says it is from weariness of a woman possessed. — Annoyance which takes his eye, temptation to strike those who weep. — How you repel them, the poor little hinds! How you forget! — Don Juan astonishes himself even in forgetting and sounds this idea, finding it a sad thing. — I have found some tokens of love, but know not whence they have come to me. — You complain of life, master; it is unjust. — Leporello wickedly enjoys the idea of goodness in Don Juan. — The young people look at him, Leporello, with envy, thinking that he participates somewhat in the poesy of his master.

“Reverie of Don Juan on the idea submitted to him by Leporello, that he may have a son somewhere. . . .

“And I have seen you in having seen your ancestors. — Desire that Don Juan has to define in his thoughts the countenances now nearly effaced. — What would he not give to have once more a clear idea of these images!

“It is not all the change itself. It is that you change often for the worse. — Love of plain women. Have you not been mad during the past year over that old Neapolitan marchioness?

“Don Juan relates how he lost his virginity (an old duenna, in a shadow, in a castle). — But you did not know then that this was only a desire; poor man (Seized him in her arms), and what it is born of? — Excitation of physical desire — Corruption. — Abyss which separates subject and object, and the appetite of the one for entering the other. — This is what I am always in quest of. — Silence.

“There was in my father’s garden the figure of a woman which had been on the prow of a ship. — Desire showed in it. — He clammers up one day and takes hold of her breasts. — Dead spiders in the wood. — First sentiment of woman, a feeling of peril. — And I have always found the heart of wood. And especially so when they are at play! I see you are happy. Atonement for joy (calm before, calm after), this has always given me the suspicion that there was something concealed. — But no. — Impossibility of a perfect communion, however adherent the kiss may be. — Something constrains and in itself makes a wall. Silence of the pupils of the eye while they devour themselves, The look goes for more than words. From there comes the desire, for a most intimate attachment, always being renewed and deceived. (Note it from different standpoints):

Jealousy in desire: to know, to have.

Jealousy in possession: to look at in sleep, to understand at heart

Jealousy in remembrance: to see again and remember well.

“It is always the same thing, said Leporello. — Ah, no! it is never the same thing! So many women, so many desires, and the different joys and bitternesses.

“Let the vulgarity of Leporello bring out the superiority of Don Juan and place it objectively in showing the difference, especially that the difference is only in intensity I “Desire of other men. Willing to be all that the women expect. — How does it affect me? What is this great number of mistresses compared to the rest? How many there are who do not know me and to whom I have never been anything!

“Two kinds of love. That which attracts to itself, which imbibes, where individualism and the senses predominate (not all of the voluptuous kind, however). To this belongs jealousy. The second is the love which draws you outside of itself. It is larger, more rending, more sweet. It has some magnetic influence where the other has recurring sharpnesses. Don Juan has proved the two, sometimes in the case of the same woman. There are some women who bring the first, there are others who provoke the second, some both at the same time. This also depends upon the moment, chance and the disposition.

“Don Juan is weary and finishes with a feeling that his head would split, as one does when he has thought too long, without a solution. — They hear the bell toll for the dead. And this is one for whom all is done! What is it for?

“They raise their heads.

II.

“Don Juan scales the wall and sees Anna Maria asleep. — Tableau. — Long contemplation, — desire, — remembrance. — She awakes. At first, some words cut short, as if following her thought. She has no fear of him (the least clash possible without their being able to distinguish the fantastic from the real).

“It is long that I have awaited you. You did not come. — Relate her illness and death. — As the dialogue proceeds, she awakes more and more. — Sweat upon her head-bands; raises herself slowly, slowly, at first on her elbows, then sits. — Great astonished eyes. Return to the exact. How?

“Then it is you whose steps I was listening for in the wood. — Stifling heat of the nights. — The promenade in the cloister, shade of the columns, which did not move as the trees had. I plunged my hands into the fountain. — Symbolic comparison of the changed stag. — A summer afternoon.

“They prohibit our telling our thoughts — à propos of the crucifix which stands over Anna Maria’s bed, the Christ who watches over our dreams. — The crucifix is alway immovable while the heart of the young girl is agitated and often grieved.

“This crucifix is a comfort to Anna Maria, but it does not respond to her in her love. — Oh! I have prayed to Him so often! Why will He not, why has He not listened to me? Aspirations of the flesh and love that is true (perfecting the mystic love), in parallel with the shameless aspirations of Don Juan who has had, in his other loves, especially in moments of lassitude, some mystic needs. (Indicate this, as to Don Juan, in his conversation with Leporello.)

“Movement of Anna Maria encircling Don Juan with her arms. — The flesh of the fore-arm borne upon the arteries and the wrists at the end of the stiff hands, too small to reach to him; a lock of Don Juan’s hair catches in a button of her chemise, as he lowers his head towards her.

“The night becomes animated, — a few shepherds are heard upon the mountains. There also they speak of love. — It is love which occupies them. — You do not know the simple joy. — The day dawns.

“Aspirations of Anna Maria’s life at harvest times. Sunday afternoons the feast days of the church. — The overseers torment her. — I loved the confessional much. She approached it with a sentiment of voluptuous fear, because her heart was open. — Mystery, shade. — But she had no sins to tell, although she could have wished she had. There are, they say, some women of the ardent life, — happy.

“One day she swooned all alone in the church, where she went to place some flowers (the organist was playing all alone), while contemplating a large window penejrated by the sunlight.

“Frequent desires which she has at communion. To have Jesus in the body. God in self! — At each new sacrament it seems to her that the thirst may be appeased. — She multiplies her works, fasts, prayers, etc. — Sensuality of the young. — Feels the stomach pulling, weakness of the head. — She is afraid, and studies how to overcome these fears, etc. — Mortifications. — Is fond of pleasant odours. She smells some disgusting things. — Voluptuousness of bad odours. — She is ashamed before Don Juan, because of her enthusiasm. — Anna Maria is astonished at his desire. — What is it? How is it that I desire and she desires that which she does not know? Voluptuousness creeps into her, as disgust into Don Juan. I heard you speaking of the world. Speak to me! Speak to me!

“The lamp goes out for want of oil. — The stars shine into the room (not the moon). Then the day dawns. — Anna Maria falls dead.

“The horses are heard browsing and shaking the saddles on their backs. Don Juan escapes.

“Tone of character of Anna Maria: sweet.

“Never lose sight of Don Juan! The principal object (at least of the second part) is the union, the equality, the duality, each of which terms has been incomplete up to the present time, melting them together, and each showing gradually that it is coming to complete itself by uniting with the neighboring term.”

Gustave Flaubert did not write Bouvard and Pécuchet at a single stroke. It might be said that half of his life was passed in meditation upon this book, and that he consecrated his last six years to the execution of this tour de force. An insatiable reader, indefatigable in research, he heaped up documents without ceasing. Finally, one day, he put himself to work, somewhat terrified before the enormity of the task. “One must be mad,” he often said, “to undertake a work like that.” And it was indeed necessary to have superhuman patience and an ineradicable will.

Down there at Croisset, in his great study with five windows, he moaned day and night over his work. Without relaxation, without recreation, pleasures or distractions, with mind fearfully intent, he advanced with a desperate slowness, discovering each day some new study to be made, some new research to undertake. And his phrases also tormented him, his phrase, so concise, so precise, so coloured as to enclose in two lines a whole volume, and in a paragraph all the thoughts of a savant. He would take a number of ideas of the same nature, and, as a chemist prepares an elixir, dissolve them and mix them, rejecting the accessories and simplifying the principles, until out of his crucible would come absolute formulas containing in fifty words an entire system of philosophy.

Once it became necessary for him to stop, exhausted and almost discouraged; then, as a recreation, he wrote his delicious volume entitled: Three Stories.

It might be said here that he wished to make this a complete and perfect résumé of his work. The three novels: A Simple Soul, The Legend of Saint Julien the Hospitaller and Herodias, show in a short and admirable fashion the three aspects of his talent.

If it were necessary to class these three jewels, perhaps we should put Saint Julien the Hospitaller in the, first rank. It is an absolute masterpiece in colour and style, a masterpiece in art.

A Simple Soul relates the story of a poor country servant, honest and shallow, whose life goes on until death without a glimmer of true happiness ever shining upon it.

The Legend of Saint Julien the Hospitaller shows us the miraculous adventures of a saint as made by an old, stained-glass church window, with a wise and highly-coloured simplicity.

Herodias tells us of the tragedy of the decapitation of Saint John the Baptist.

Gustave Flaubert still had many subjects for novels and romances. He counted on writing, from the first, the Battle of Thermopylae, and for this purpose made a voyage to Greece in the beginning of the year 1872 to see the actual country of this superhuman struggle. He wished to make of it a kind of patriotic recitation, simple and terrible, which might be read to the children of the people, to teach them to make them love their country.

He wished to show the valiant souls, the magnanimous hearts and the vigorous bodies of these symbolic heroes and, without employing a technical word, or an ancient term, to tell the story of this immortal battle, which belonged not to the history of a single nation but of the world. He rejoiced at the idea of writing the adieux of these warriors to their wives in sonorous terms, where they recommend them, in case they fall in the encounter, to marry again some robust men soon, in order to give new sons to their country. The very thought of this heroic story gave Flaubert a powerful enthusiasm.

He had planned, too, a kind of modern Matron of Ephesus, having been carried away by a subject which Turgenev related to him.

Finally, he meditated a great romance upon the second Empire, where could be seen the mixture and contact of Oriental and Occidental civilisations, — the amalgamation of the Greeks from Constantinople, so many of whom came to Paris during Napoleon's reign, playing an important rôle in Parisian society and the factitious, refined world of Imperial France.

Two personages chiefly attracted him, a man and a woman, a Parisian household, showing craftiness with ingenuousness, ambition and corruption. The man, a superior officer, dreams of a great fortune which he is slowly amassing, and with a natural, egotistic profligacy he makes his wife, who is very pretty and full of intrigue, serve his projects.

In spite of all the efforts, of every nature, of his companion, his desires are not satisfied to his liking. Then, after long years of attempts, both realise the vanity of their hopes and finish their life as honest, deceived people, resigned and tranquil.

He saw still, in project, another great romance upon the administration, with this title: The Head of the Department, and he affirmed that no one has ever yet comprehended what a comic personage, and how important and useless, a Head of the Department is.

Gustave Flaubert was before all, and above all, an artist. The public to-day scarcely distinguishes the signification of this word as applied to a man of letters. The sense of art, that scent so delicate, so subtle, so difficult, so unseizable, so inexpressible, is essentially a gift of the aristocracy of intelligence; it can scarcely belong to the democracy.

Some very great writers have not been artists. The public and even the greater part of the critics make no difference between the one and the other.

In the last century, on the contrary, the public, adjudged difficult and refined, carried to an extreme this artistic sense which has now disappeared. It worked itself into a passion for a phrase, for a verse, for an ingenious or a bold epithet. Twenty lines, a page, a portrait, an episode, sufficed it for judging and classing an author. It sought the underneath, the inner meaning of the words, penetrated the secret reasoning of the author, read slowly without passing over anything, seeking, after digesting the phrase, to find out whether there still remained anything more to penetrate. And minds, slowly prepared for literary sensations, receive readily the secret influence of this mysterious power which puts some soul into a work.

When a man, however richly endowed he may be, concerns himself only with relating something, when he takes no account of the fact that veritable literary power is not in the anecdote but in the manner of preparing, presenting, and expressing it, he has no sense of art.

The profound and delicious joy which leaps to your heart before certain pages, before certain phrases, comes only through those who have said them; they come from an accord of expression and idea which is absolute, from a sensation of secret beauty and harmony which escapes for the most part the observation of the multitude.

Musset, that great poet, was not an artist. The charming things he said, in an easy, seductive language, left quite indifferent those who are occupied in the pursuit, the research, and the emotions of a higher beauty, more unreachable, more intellectual.

The multitude, on the contrary, found in Musset satisfaction for all their poetic appetites, which are a little gross, and unable to comprehend the trembling, almost the ecstasy, which certain pieces of Baudelaire, Victor Hugo, and Leconte de Lisle can give. Those words have a soul. Most readers, and even writers, ask only a meaning. They find that this soul, which appears in contact with other words, which shines upon and illumines certain books with an unknown light, is very difficult to call forth.

There are, in the joining and combinations of the language written by certain men, the evocation of a whole poetic world, that the people of the mundane world know neither how to perceive nor to surmise. When one speaks to them of it, they are offended, begin to reason, argue, deny, and cry out that they wish you would show it to them. It would be useless to try. Feeling it not, they could never comprehend.

Some educated, intelligent men, writers even, are astonished when one speaks to them of this mystery of which they are ignorant; and they laugh and shrug their shoulders. What matters it? They do not know. As well talk music to a people who have no ear.

Ten words exchanged are sufficient for two minds endowed with this mysterious sense of art to comprehend each other's meaning, as if they were speaking a language of which others were ignorant.

Flaubert was tortured all his life in the pursuit of this unseizable perfection. He had a conception of style which bestows upon him, in this one word, all the qualities of the thinker and the writer. So, when he declared: "There is nothing but style," one must understand him to mean: There is nothing but sonorousness or harmony of words.

One usually means by "style," the fashion in which each individual writer presents his thought. Style would then be different according as the man, brilliant or sombre, abundant or concise, followed his own temperament. Gustave Flaubert thought that the personality of the author should disappear in the originality of the book, and that the originality of the book should not come from the singularity of style.

For he did not consider “styles” as a series of moulds each of which carries the particular mark of a writer and in which he runs all of his ideas; but he believed in style, that is to say, in a unique, absolute manner for expressing a thing in all its colour and all its intensity.

For him it was the work itself. Just as among beings, the blood nourishes the flesh and even determines the contour and external appearance, following its race and family, so, for him, the foundation in a work imposed the expression with a fatality, unique and true; also the measure, rhythm, and all the lines of the form.

He did not understand that foundation could exist without form, nor form without foundation. The style, then, became the being, the impersonal being, so to speak; and imprinted only its qualities upon the quality of the thought and the power of vision.

Possessed by the absolute belief that there existed only one way of expressing a thing, one word to use, one adjective to qualify it and one verb to give it life, he gave himself superhuman labor to discover, in each phrase, that word, that epithet and that verb. Thus, he believed in a mysterious harmony of expression, and, when a correct term did not seem to him euphonious, he would seek another with an invincible patience, certain that he had not found the true, the unique.

Writing, then, was for him a formidable thing, full of torment, peril and fatigue. He would seat himself at his table with a fear of and a desire for this loved but torturing work. He would remain there for hours, immovable, vexed by his frightful labour, fearful of this colossus, patient and careful as one who would build a pyramid of a child’s marbles.

Sunk in his oak armchair with its high back, his head drawn down between his shoulders, he would look steadily at his paper with his blue eye, whose small pupil seemed like a black dot always in motion. A light cap of silk, such as ecclesiastics wear, covering the top of his head, allowed long locks of hair to escape, which fell down and spread out upon his back. A large dressing-gown, of brown cloth, enveloped him entirely; and his red face, cut by a heavy moustache, white at the drooping ends, appeared swollen under a furious rush of blood. His eyes, shaded by great, sombre brows, ran along the lines, digging out words, overturning phrases, consulting the physiognomy of the assembled letters, spying the effect as a hunter eyes his game.

Then he would begin to write, slowly, stopping often, beginning again, erasing, writing across words, filling the margins, and intervening spaces, blackening twenty pages to finish one, and, under the heavy effort of his thought, whining meantime like a sawyer.

Sometimes, throwing the quill which he held in his hand into a large Oriental tin plate filled with goose-quills carefully sharpened, he would take up the sheet of paper, raise it to a level with his eyes and, leaning upon his elbow, would declaim in a sharp, high voice. He would listen to the rhythm of his prose, stop as if seizing a passing cadence, place the commas with exact knowledge, like the halting-places in a long journey.

“A phrase is likely to live,” he would say, “when it corresponds to all the necessities of respiration. I know that a phrase is good when it can be read very loud.”

“Phrases badly written,” he writes in a preface to the Last Songs of Louis Bouilhet, “will not submit to this test; they oppress the chest, strain the cords of the heart, and are thus found outside the conditions of life.”

A thousand occupations besieged him at the same time, taking possession of him; but that certain attitude of desperation always remained fixed in his mind: “Among all expressions, all turns, all forms, there is but one expression, one turn, one form for expressing what I have to say.”

And with cheek inflated, neck congested, brow reddened, and muscles stretched like those of an athlete in a struggle, he would fight desperately for an idea, for a word, seizing them and coupling them in spite of themselves, holding them together in an indissoluble fashion by the power of his will, grasping the thought and subjugating it little by little, with fatigue and almost superhuman effort, encaging it like a captive beast, in solid and precise form.

From this formidable labour was born for him an extreme respect for literature and for the phrase. The moment that he had constructed a phrase, with so much difficulty and torture, he would not admit that a word of it could be changed. When he read to his friends the story entitled A Simple Soul, they made some remarks and criticisms upon a passage of ten lines, in which the old maid ends by confounding her parrot with the Holy Spirit. The idea would appear too subtle for a peasant's mind. Flaubert listened, reflected, and recognised that the observation was just. But a sudden anguish seized him: "You are right," said he, "only — in that case I must change my phrase."

That same evening, however, he put himself to the task; he passed the night in changing ten words, scratching and erasing twenty sheets of paper and in the end changed nothing, not having been able to construct another phrase whose harmony appeared to satisfy him.

At the beginning of the same story, the last word of a new paragraph, serving for the subject of the next following, could but make place for an ambiguity. This defect was pointed out to him; he recognized it, forced himself to modify the sense, and, not succeeding in producing the cadence that he wished, he cried out discouraged: "So much the worse for the sense; rhythm before everything!"

That question of rhythm in prose sent him forth into passionate dissertations, at times: "In verse," he would say, "the poet has fixed rules. He has measure, caesura, rhyme, and a quantity of practical indications making a science of the trade. In prose, a profound sentiment of rhythm is necessary, of fugitive rhythm, without rules, without certainty, an inborn quality, and with that a power of reasoning, the artistic sense infinitely more subtle and more keen, in order to change at any instant the movement, the color, the style, to follow the things one wishes to say. When one knows how to handle this fluid thing which is called French prose, when one knows the exact value of words, and when one knows how to modify that value according to the place he gives it, when one knows how to put all the interest of a page to one line, put one idea in relief among a hundred others, and this uniquely by the choice and position of the terms which express it; when one knows how to strike with a word, with a single word placed in a certain fashion, as one strikes with an arm; when one knows how to overturn a soul, to fill it suddenly with joy or fear, enthusiasm, chagrin, or anger, by simply putting an adjective under the eye of the reader, one is truly an artist, the most superior of artists, a true prose-writer."

He had for the great French writers a frantic admiration. Entire chapters of the masters he knew by heart, and would declaim them in a resounding voice, intoxicated by the prose, giving special sounds to the words, scanning, modulating, singing the phrases. Some clauses fascinated him; he would repeat them a hundred times, always astonished at their exactness, and declaring: "One must be a man of genius to find adjectives like that."

No one had a greater respect and love for his art, or sentiment for the literary dignity, than Gustave Flaubert. A single passion, love for literature, filled his life, even to his last day. He loved it furiously, in a unique, absolute fashion.

Nearly always, an artist conceals some secret ambition foreign to his art. It is often glory that he pursues, that radiant glory which places us, while we are yet living, in an apotheosis, which turns heads, brings down applause and captivates the hearts of women.

To please the ladies! This is also the desire of nearly all. To be all-powerful through talent, in Paris, in the world, an exceptional being, admired, praised, loved, who can cull at will, almost, these fruits of the living flesh of which we are ahungered! To enter, especially where one is preceded by renown, respect and adoration, and see all eyes fixed upon him, and all smiles turned towards himself. It is this that they seek who give themselves up to this strange and difficult trade, this trade of reproducing and interpreting nature by artificial means.

Others have sought money, perhaps for itself, perhaps for the satisfaction it gives: the luxury of existence and the delicacies of the table.

Gustave Flaubert loved letters in an absolute fashion, so absolute that in his soul filled with this love, there was no place for any other ambition.

Never had he any other interest, any other desire; it was almost impossible for him to talk of anything else. His mind, possessed by literary occupations, always returned to them, and he declared useless all those things which interest the people of the world.

He lived alone nearly all the year, worked without respite, without interruption. An indefatigable reader, his repose was in his books, and he possessed an entire library of notes taken from the volumes in which he had dug. Besides, his memory was marvellous; he could recall a chapter, page, or paragraph where he had found a little detail in an unknown work, five or ten years before. He also knew an incalculable number of facts.

The greater part of his life he passed on his estate at Croisset, near Rouen. It was a pretty white house, of ancient style, on the bank of the Seine, in the midst of a magnificent garden which extended back and scaled, by steep roads, the great side of Canteleu. From some of the windows of his large study, could be seen the great ships coming up to Rouen, or going down to the sea, passing so near that they almost seemed to touch the walls with their yards. He loved to watch this mute movement of the vessels gliding along on the great river, going out to all the countries of which one dreams.

Often, leaving his table, he would go and frame his giant chest and his head, which was like one of an ancient Gaul, in one of the windows. On the left, the thousand steeples of Rouen outlined upon space their silhouettes and their carved profiles of stone; a little more to the right, the thousand chimneys of the Saint-Sever manufactories, vomited into the sky their festoons of smoke. The water-tower, as high as the highest of the pyramids of Egypt, looks from the other side of the water at the spire of the cathedral, the highest clock-tower in the world.

Opposite extended green fields where red and white cows were lying down or feeding and, still more to the right, a great forest upon the coast shuts off the horizon where flows the large, calm river, full of tree-covered islands, on its way to the sea, disappearing in the distance in the curve of an immense valley.

He loved this superb, tranquil landscape, which his eyes had looked upon since his infancy. He almost never descended to the garden, having a distaste for moving about. Sometimes, however, when a friend came to see him, he would walk with him along the great avenue of willows planted on the terrace, which seemed made for serious or tender conferences.

He pretended that Pascal had already been in that house, and that he had walked and talked and dreamed with him under those trees.

Three windows of his study opened on the garden and two on the river. The room was large, having no ornaments except books, a few portraits of friends and some souvenirs of his travels. There were the bodies of some little alligators, dried, the foot of a mummy (which a simple-minded domestic had blackened and polished like a boot), some amber beads from the Orient, a gilt Buddha dominating his great work-table and looking both divine and secular out of his motionless, long, yellow eyes; an admirable bust of Caroline Flaubert, Gustave's sister, who died as a young woman, and on the floor beside a Turkish divan covered with cushions, a magnificent white bear skin.

He would set himself to work at nine or ten o'clock in the morning, stop long enough for breakfast, and immediately take up his labour again. He often slept an hour or two in the afternoon; but he was awake until three or four o'clock in the morning, accomplishing the best part of his task in the calm silence of the night, in the tranquillity of that great apartment, scarcely lighted by the two lamps with green shades. Mariners upon the river made use of "Monsieur Gustave's" windows for a lighthouse.

There was in the country-side a sort of legend about him. They looked upon him as a brave man, a little queer, whose singular costumes astonished their eyes and their minds.

He was always clothed for work in large trousers, held by a silk cord, à la girdle, and an immense dressing-gown which reached the floor. This garment, which he adopted not for pose, but because of its ample comfort, was made of brown cloth in winter, and in summer of some light stuff having a white ground with bright-colored design. The citizens of Rouen, going to breakfast at the Bouille, on Sunday, returned cheated in their hopes when they could not see from the bridge of the steamboat the original of M. Flaubert's portrait standing in his high window.

He took pleasure also in looking at the boats full of people. He would put up to his eyes an opera-glass that always lay on the edge of his table or the corner of the chimney-piece, and watch curiously all the faces turned towards him. Their ugliness amused him, their astonishment made him expand; he read the character, temperament, and stupidity of each one from his face.

Much has been said of his hatred of the common citizen, the bourgeois. He made this word bourgeois a synonym for stupidity and defined it thus: "I call anybody who thinks sordidly a bourgeois." He had, then, nothing against the bourgeois class, but against a particular kind of stupidity that he met most often in that class. He had also perfect scorn for "good people." But, finding himself less often in contact with the workman than with the people of the world, he suffered less from popular foolishness than from the worldly sort. That ignorance whence comes absolute beliefs, so-called immortal principles, all the conventions, all prejudice, the whole arsenal of commonplace, elegant opinions exasperated him. Instead of smiling, as very many do, at the universal silliness, at the intellectual inferiority of the greater number, he suffered horribly from it. When he went away from a drawing-room where mediocrity of talk had continued for an evening, he was cast down, weakened, as if he had been beaten unmercifully — was half-idiot himself, he affirmed — so much did he possess the faculty of penetrating another's thoughts. Always vibrating and very impressionable, he likened himself to one flayed, who leaped from pain at the least contact; and human stupidity assuredly wounded him during his whole life, as great misfortunes of the intimate, secret kind, wound.

He considered stupidity a little in the light of a personal enemy, tormenting him to the point of martyrdom; and he pursued it with fury, as a hunter follows his prey, attacking it from the lowest to the greatest brains. He had the subtle sense of a bloodhound for discovering it, and his rapid eye would fall upon it as it was concealing itself in the columns of a journal or even in the lines of a beautiful book. He would sometimes arrive at such a degree of exasperation from it that he wished to destroy the whole human race.

The misanthropy of his works comes from no other thing. The bitter savour found in them is only that continual discovery of mediocrity, of commonplaceness, of foolishness in all its forms. He makes a note of it on every page, in every paragraph, by a word, a simple design, by accenting a scene or a dialogue. He fills the intelligent reader with melancholy and makes him desolate by proving the folly of human life. The unexplained uneasiness that many people have had on opening the Sentimental Education, was only the unreasoned sensation of that eternal stupidity of thought shown openly in skulls.

He said sometimes that he ought to have called that book Dried Fruits, in order to make its meaning better comprehended. Each man reading it asked himself with uneasiness whether he were not one of those sad personages of that gloomy romance, so much that was intimate and rending did one find in each of the personal statements.

After an enumeration of his grim studies, he wrote one day: "And all this in the unique aim of sputtering upon my contemporaries the disgust they inspire in me! I shall finally tell my manner of thought, exhale my resentment, vomit my hatred, expectorate my gall, purge my indignation.”

This scorn of the exalted idealist for the current stupidity and the customary commonplaceness was accompanied by a vehement admiration for superior people, whatever was their talent or their erudition. Never having loved anything but Thought, he respected it in all its manifestations; and his reading extended into books that would ordinarily seem most foreign to literary art. He became angry with a friendly journal when some one criticised M. Renan adversely in it: the name of Victor Hugo filled him with enthusiasm; his friends were such men as MM. Georges Pouchet and Berthelot; his salon in Paris was very curious.

He received there Sundays, from one o'clock until seven, in a very simple bachelor's apartment on the fifth story. The walls were bare and the furniture modest, for he had a horror of the playthings of art.

As soon as a touch of the bell announced the first visitor, he would throw over his work-table (which was covered with scattered leaves of paper black with writing) a light cover of red silk that enveloped and concealed all the implements of his work, which were as sacred to him as the objects of divine service are to a priest. Then, as his domestic nearly always went out on Sunday, he would open the door himself.

The first comer was often Ivan Turgenieff, whom he embraced as he would a brother. Larger still than Flaubert, the Russian romance writer loved the French romancer with an affection profound and rare. Affinity in talent, philosophy, and mind, similarity in tastes, in life and in dreams, a conformity in literary tendencies, in exalted idealism, in admiration and erudition, put so many points of contact between these two that on seeing each other they experienced perhaps a still greater joy of heart than joy of intelligence.

Turgenieff would sink into an armchair and speak slowly, in a sweet voice, a little feeble and hesitating, which gave to anything he said a charm and an extreme interest. Flaubert would listen religiously, fixing upon the great white face of his friend his large blue eyes with their moving pupils, and respond in his sonorous voice, which came out like the sound of a clarion from under the moustache of an old Gallic warrior. Their conversation rarely touched upon current affairs and scarcely ever got far from literary history. Often Turgenev was laden with foreign books, and would make running translations of Goethe's, Pushkin's, or Swinburne's poems.

Others would arrive, from time to time; M. Taine, his eyes concealed behind his spectacles, of timid gait, carrying historical documents containing unknown facts, all with the odor and savor of stirred-up archives, a vision of ancient life perceived by the piercing eye of philosophy.

Here were MM. Frederic Baudry, a member of the institute and director of the Mazarine Library; Georges Pouchet, professor of comparative anatomy in the Museum of Natural History; Claudius Popelin, the master enameler; Philippe Burty, writer, collector, art critic, of subtle and charming mind.

Then there was Alphonse Daudet, who brought the air of Paris, the living Paris, a lover of pleasure, brisk and gay. He would trace in a few words some infinitely droll silhouettes, walk over each and all with his charming irony, Southern and personal, accentuating the fine points of his lively mind with his attractiveness of face and gesture, as well as with the skill of his recitals, always composed like his written stories. His head, shapely and very fine, was covered with a mass of black hair falling to his shoulders, mingling with his curly beard, the pointed ends of which he often rolled between his fingers. His eye, long in cut but little open, sent forth a look as black as ink, vague sometimes, by reason of excessive short-sightedness. His voice sang a little; his gesture was lively, manner active; in short, he had all the signs of a son of the South.

Émile Zola enters in his turn, breathless from climbing the five stories, and always followed by his faithful son, Paul Alexis. He throws himself into an armchair and seeks, with a glance of his eye over the faces, the state of mind, the tone and nature of the talk. Seated a little at one side, one leg under him, holding his ankle in his hand, and speaking little, he listens attentively. Sometimes when literary enthusiasm, an artists' muddle, carries them away, throwing them into excessive theories and paradoxes so dear to men of lively Imagination, he becomes restless, removes the leg, utters, from time to time, a "But — " suppressed in the great uproar; then, when Flaubert's lyric is over, he takes up the discussion tranquilly, in a calm voice and peaceable words. He is of medium height, a little stout, of gentlemanly and obstinate aspect. His head, much like those seen in old Italian paintings, without being beautiful shows a great character of power and intelligence. His short hair springs from a very well developed brow, and the straight nose stops as if cut short by a blow of the shears, too abruptly, above the lip shaded by a rather heavy black moustache. The lower part of the face is full but energetic, and is covered with a trimmer beard almost beautiful. His black, short-sighted, penetrating eye smiles often ironically, while a peculiar fold draws back the upper lip in a droll and mocking fashion.

Some others still arrive; here is the editor, Charpentier. Except for some white hairs among the long black locks, one might take him for a youth. He is a slender and handsome bachelor, with a thin pointed chin shaded blue from the closely shaved beard. He wears only a moustache. He laughs easily with a young and sceptical laugh, listens, and promises all that each writer asks of him, as they seize him and push him into a corner, recommending to him a thousand things. Here is the charming poet, Catulle Mendès, with the face of a sensual, seductive saint, whose silken beard and light hair surround, in a blonde cloud, a fine, pale face. An incomparable talker, a refined artist, subtle, seizing upon all the most fugitive literary sensations, he especially pleases Flaubert by the charm of his words and the delicacy of his mind. Here is Émile Bergerat, his brother-in-law, who married the second daughter of Théophile Gautier. Here is José-Maria Hérédia, that marvellous maker of sonnets, who will live as one of the most perfect poets of his time. Here are Huysmans, Hennique, Céard, and others still, Léon Cladel, the difficult and refined stylist, and Gustave Toudouze.

Then enters, almost always the last, a man of tall, thin figure, whose serious face, although often laughing, shows a great character of a high and noble order. He has long, grayish hair that has a faded appearance, a moustache a little lighter, still, and singular eyes whose pupils are strangely dilated. He has the aspect of a gentleman, that fine, nervous air of people of blood. He is (one can feel it) of the world, and of the best of it. It is Edmond de Goncourt. He advances holding in his hand a package of tobacco which he carefully guards while he extends to his friends his free hand.

The little drawing-room is overflowing. Some groups pass into the dining-room. It is then that one sees Gustave Flaubert.

With large gestures, by which he appears to fly, going about from one to another, crossing the apartment with a single step, his long robe swelling out behind him in his brusque movements like the brown sail of a fishing barque, full of exaltations, indignations, of vehement flames, of resounding eloquence, he amuses with his rage, his good nature, stupefies with his prodigious erudition, to which his surprising memory is an aid, terminates a discussion by a clear, profound word, runs through the centuries at a bound of thought to bring together two facts of the same order, two men of the same race, two lessons of the same nature, whence light would leap out as if flint struck flint.

Then the friends depart, one after another. He accompanies them into the anteroom where they chat a moment, each alone with him, shaking hands vigorously, tapping each other on the shoulder with a good, affectionate laugh. And when Zola, who was the last to leave, was gone, always followed by Paul Alexis, Flaubert slept an hour under a large canopy before changing his coat to call upon his friend, the Princess Mathilde, who received every Sunday.

He loved the world, although he grew indignant over some of the conversation in it; and he had for women a tender and paternal friendship, although he judged them severely at a distance and often repeated that phrase of Proudhon's: "Woman is the desolation of the just"; he loved great luxury and sumptuous elegance; it was apparent, although he lived in the most simple manner possible.

Among his intimates he was gay and good. His powerful gayety seemed to have descended directly from the joviality of Rabelais. He loved farces and amusements throughout the whole year. He laughed often, with a contented, frank, deep laugh; and this laugh seemed even more natural to him, and more normal than his exasperation against humanity. He loved to receive his friends and to dine with them. When one went to see him at Croisset it was a great happiness for him, and he prepared the reception beforehand with a cordial and visible pleasure. He was a great eater and loved fine, delicate things for the table.

This sad misanthropy which has been so much spoken of was not innate with him, but came little by little from a permanent realization of human stupidity. His soul was naturally joyous and his heart full of generous impulses. In short, he loved to live and he lived fully, sincerely, as one can live with the French temperament, with which melancholy never takes the same desolating way that it does among certain Germans and certain Englishmen.

And now, is it not sufficient to have loved life with a long and powerful passion? He had it, this passion, until his death. He had given, from his youth up, all his life to letters, and he never took it away. He used his existence in this immoderate, exalted tenderness, passing feverish nights, like a lover, trembling with ardour, falling from fatigue after hours of taxing and violent love, and beginning again each morning from the time of his waking to give his thought to the well-beloved.

Finally, one day he fell, stricken, against the foot of his work-table, killed by HER, by LITERATURE; killed as are all great passionate souls by the passion that fires them.

GUY DE MAUPASSANT.

PREFACE

IN 1849 Flaubert, accompanied by his close friend and ardent admirer, Maxime Ducamp, set out for a lengthened tour in the East. That they might enjoy every facility for their expedition, Ducamp succeeded in obtaining governmental missions of a nominal nature for himself and his companion, Flaubert's charge being the collection of any information that might be thought suitable for communication to the Chambers of Commerce. The two friends journeyed through Egypt, Nubia, Palestine, Syria, and Rhodes, and so home through Asia Minor, Turkey in Europe, and Greece. During all the earlier portions of their travels, and in spite of the eagerness with which he had anticipated them, Flaubert displayed only listlessness and lack of curiosity, though, strange to say, the scenes which at that time impressed him so slightly came back to him afterwards with great vividness, and were of infinite service to him when writing Salammô. On arriving in Greece, however, and finding himself surrounded by those historic scenes with which books had made him so familiar, a change came. His enthusiasm was kindled; he began to make notes; he resolved to write the tale of Thermopylae; (Ixiii) he laughed at difficulty and hardship, and flung himself, with all the ardour of which his nature was capable, into the enjoyment of the hour. It was a time which dwelt long in his memory; a gleam of light falling across his darkened life, to which in after days he was wont to look back with lingering regret.

On his return to France in 1851 Flaubert resumed his former life at Croisset, a house which had belonged to his father, near Rouen. Here for the most part he lived, working, feeling, remembering, distrusting, until 1857, when his first published work, Otiadame Bovary, made its appearance in the columns of the Revue de Paris, a journal established a few years before by some of his own friends. The story of the publication of this pitiless book, the hubbub it created, and the prosecution to which it gave rise, can only be alluded to in passing. A fact, however, to be noted, is that it struck loudly the keynote of a new literary school. Flaubert may be called the creator of realism in modern French literature. For its subsequent development away from and down from himself he is, of course, in no way responsible. Indeed, seeing, as he did, much writing that he despised characterized as “realistic,” he shrank from the application of the epithet to his own books. Yet he was wrong. Realism in art is simply minute and impersonal presentation. Part of Flaubert’s work was anticipated by his predecessors. Scrupulosity of description is to be found in Balzac. Flaubert, taking up the work where Balzac laid it down, added impersonality and perfected the new literary creed.

It was a cardinal principle with him that to the reader the author should be altogether non-existent, that of his private views and feeling there should be absolutely no trace. Not a phrase, not an epithet must betray him. What he preached was the pure objectivity of literature. He conceived it to be the duty of an author to hold the mirror up to nature, but to be no less his duty sedulously to refrain from adding any comment on the reflections that he obtained. It was no part of art, as art, to teach. Any didactic face that it possessed, whether for good or evil, could inhere only in the facts themselves. And these facts must be scrupulously and faithfully portrayed. Flaubert, then, was undoubtedly a realist, and if we find him at times impatiently repudiating the title, it is because it had come to be frequently applied to men who were clever copyists — unimaginative though faithful presenters of fact — and little if anything more. But Flaubert himself was much more. He was a realist, it is true, but he was a great artist as well, — how great only those possessed of the literary sense and of some poetical feeling can fully know.

There is the same distinction between Flaubert's work and that of many imitators of his method as there is between a waxen figure at Madame Tussaud's and a masterpiece of portraiture by Millais. Both are truthful, both are real, but the one possesses what the other lacks — that power, namely, of stimulating the imagination which differences a picture from a design, or a description from a catalogue. Flaubert was no mere depicter of crude facts. A fact in itself was nothing to him. He held it valuable only in so far as it was capable, in combination with other facts, of assisting to set forth a picture that should be artistic as well as true. His works are constructions, not compilations.

Flaubert's literary ideals were therefore two — Truth and Art — and his devotion to them guided and leavened his whole career. To attain to the first he shrank from no toil, and the subjects of most of his works were such as to render the most arduous toil necessary. His appetite for knowledge was Gargantuan. His researches were extraordinary and were sometimes so recondite as to be superfluous. He would ransack volumes to furnish forth the detail of a phrase, and his books bear testimony to his extraordinary capacity for assimilating and utilising the information that he acquired. Yet his writings are not the products of a pedant. Truth stood high in his estimation, but Art held a higher place still. Indeed he frequently dwelt upon its claims with an almost extravagantly enthusiastic insistence. "What is said is nothing; the manner in which it is said is everything. A work of art which seeks to prove anything fails from that very reason. A fine verse with no meaning is superior to one which is less fine and which has a meaning." And in phrases such as these he frequently and passionately emphasised the necessity of perfection in form.

It is not surprising to find that to Flaubert, with his lofty ideas concerning art, writing was literally an anguish. His distress was no doubt partly the sad effect of nervous disease, and partly the outcome of that natural anxiety felt by many great writers respecting their work, and of the existence of which George Eliot's experience affords a recent proof. To a very large extent, however, it proceeded from a peculiarly eager restlessness after an ideal perfection of form and phrase. "Style" was to him something lofty and, almost sacred. As commonly employed the term denotes a manner of writing characteristic of an individual. Flaubert understood it differently. Art, he believed, was impersonal. "Style," accordingly, denoted not one method, but the only method, of expressing a given idea, and it was to the discovery of this intimate relationship between thought and speech that his mighty energies were directed. "Amid all these expressions," he says, "all these forms and all these terms, there is but one expression, one turn, and one form to describe what I wish to say."

The labour bestowed by Flaubert upon the execution of his work, was, therefore, as prodigious as that devoted to the accumulation of material for them. His letters to George Sand are studded with allusions to the "terrors of style," and to his "literary agonies." He considers the writing of twenty pages within a month as an extraordinary feat. He describes his work as being both a pleasure and a torture. He was harassed by an intense longing after an ideal perfection of style. His language must be at once the exact and the harmonious expression of his thought.

Immediately after the publication of (Madame 'Bovary, Flaubert set about the writing of Salammbô, which appeared in 1862. It is interesting to learn that he had intended his second book to be a reply to those critics who accused him of merely copying what he had seen and of being altogether incapable of invention. "No one," he said, speaking of what he would put into his projected work, "shall accuse me of realism." His purpose, however, was not fulfilled. Salammbô is to the full as realistic as (Madame 'Bovary, the difference between the two consisting simply in the fact that whereas the author had actually seen the life depicted in the latter, that in the former had to be framed by his imagination out of the materials afforded him by long and painful study.

Salammbô must be regarded as Flaubert's masterpiece. It is the book in which his powers found the freest scope, and in which he is at his best. It was, further, the book for which he himself entertained most affection, and so much was this the case that he would grow angry when people spoke of him as “the author of IMadame Hovary.”

In 1838 he had visited Tunis and the ruins of Carthage in order to prosecute his researches amid the very scenes in which the action of his story was to proceed, while the studies which he undertook to enable him to conjure up so vividly before us the events of a most obscure historical period were, to use a favourite expression of his own, “enormous.” His replies to Sainte-Beuve and Frcehner, contained in the appendix in Volurçe II. of this edition of Salammbô, will give some idea of the conscientious care with which he executed his work, and which on this occasion was all the more honourable to him, seeing that the obscurity of his subject and the absence of general information about it, almost invited to a lax exercise of the imagination. He was true to his principles, nevertheless, and was in a position to adduce authorities for every detail in his book, from the name of a god to the epithet given to a precious stone, and from the costume of Salammbô to the ingredients of a medicament. His critics certainly experienced le quart d’heure de Rabelais when he took up his pen to reply to them. Had some of them known th® man with whom they had to deal, their strictures would have been less sweeping, and they would have regarded him with a feeling of awe similar to that with which the accomplishments of our own Ben Jonson inspired the critics of his day.

It is no small merit in Salammbô that all its wealth of detail is rarely oppressive, and that the human interest distinctly dominates throughout.

Of the characters in the book the highest praise has generally been given to Hamilcar. He is certainly a grand creation. There is infinite art displayed in the manner in which his various qualities are contrasted with one another, and at the same time harmonised into a single living whole. His tender affection for his little son, his brutal treatment of his slaves, his generosity to the poor, his commercial dishonesty, his lofty scorn of the Ancients, and his faithless cruelty towards his vanquished foes, are all combined to form a portrait that is both congruous and real. Nevertheless I should, for my own part, be inclined to award the palm to Matho. Nothing could be more excellent than the delineation of this African Hercules. The savage simplicity of his nature is wrought out with marvellous skill. His utter lack of self-consciousness or self-restraint, his passionate tears and groans, his stupefaction at the sight of Salammbô, the fitful play of his moods in the tent scene, his dogged submission to his fate when he realizes that he can never again see the woman that he loves, — all his actions and feelings, from his first appearance in Hamilcar's gardens down to the climax of his great agony in the presence of assembled Carthage, are depicted with a vividness so startling that the man seems to be living before our eyes. Such a character as this finds an excellent foil in the wily Greek, Spendius. Subtle, keen-witted, audacious, cowardly, he contrasts in every way with the simple, one-ideal, brutally-brave Libyan, who, save on the one occasion when the ardour of his passion bears down all attempts at opposition, is as wax in his hands. Some of Flaubert's most artistic touches are to be found in the contrasts suggested between these two widely different natures.

Salammbô herself is the only unsatisfactory character in the book. She is an enigma. Flaubert himself recognised this, but the plea which he urged in excuse can scarcely be admitted. It may be true that we can have no intimate knowledge of the Eastern woman, but nevertheless if the actions of one are to be described at all, there should surely be some attempt to indicate their motives. Respecting Salammbô's motives, however, we are left altogether in the dark. Her earlier conduct, indeed, is not wholly unintelligible. Her secluded life and burning religious enthusiasm might perhaps have induced that semi-ecstatic state which apparently is hers, a condition which almost defies analysis, and in which actions seem to be the creatures of wholly unaccountable impulses. But the description of her behaviour subsequent to her disillusion is disappointing. — There are incidents that seem to denote the dull, purposeless atony of despair, and others that point to a loss of religious faith. The gradual growth of a tender feeling towards Matho is also hinted at, but all is left in provoking uncertainty, and if her conduct is not inexplicable it is certainly not explained. Yet, in spite of all its defects, the portrait of Salammbô is a striking one. In the gardens among the soldiers, on the terrace invoking Tanith, with Matho in the tent, or bending down in the last scene towards the tortured man whose life she would now gladly save, she is very real to us. She may perplex us but she certainly lives. She is at once as vivid and as incomprehensible as a dream.

The world in which these characters move is brought before us with a realism that is a triumph of art. We feel indeed as if we had been transported bodily into a new region. We are given no vague description of what once has been. We are placed in the centre of what, for the time being, actually is. The surroundings are by no means pleasant ones, it is true, and it is very possible to sympathise with the feeling which prompted Sainte-Beuve to declare that the atmosphere irritated him, and to deplore the absence of some character who might have bridged over the gulf lying between the ideas of Modern Europe and those of Ancient Carthage. Yet the existence of this very feeling is a testimony to Flaubert's artistic skill. The people whom we are called upon to contemplate revolt us at every turn, but there is that in them, nevertheless, which compels us to recognise that they are our own flesh and blood. The inhuman humanity of the book tries us often as we read, but the pain that it causes us is in itself a proof of the author's realistic power.

Nothing can in fact exceed the vividness of the scenes described. Flaubert excels himself in this work as a metteur en scène. The bustling, selfish, immoral, superstitious town seems to live before us. The brutal, unsophisticated, credulous Mercenaries stare us in the face. We reel with the Barbarians at their feast; we hold our breath in agony as Matho makes his wondrous escape; we can see every incident in the siege; we shudder at the horrors of the Pass, and we are harrowed almost beyond endurance by the spectacle of Matho's terrible end.

It would be a graceless task to dwell upon the faults in such a book as this. Faults, of course, there are, for the greatest artist cannot command complete success. There are some improbabilities in the story, the most notable of which is, perhaps, Hanno's escape from the camp at Sicca. Occasionally, too, insufficient regard is paid to the necessity of perspective, and the elaboration of detail for the purpose of producing a realistic effect is carried to an extreme which defeats its own object. Instances are the disaster to the woman and child in Chapter XIII., and the contest for the rat in Chapter IX. But, after all, the scratches at the base of a cathedral do not detract from the grandeur of the pile, and in spite of such relatively microscopic blemishes, Salammbô is a work which will always be noted for its grand simplicity and purity of diction, its artistic construction, its dramatic force, and its truth to humanity.

Extract from 'FIGURES OF SEVERAL CENTURIES' by Arthur Symons

GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Salammbô is an attempt, as Flaubert, himself his best critic, has told us, to 'perpetuate a mirage by applying to antiquity the methods of the modern novel.' By the modern novel he means the novel as he had reconstructed it; he means Madame Bovary. That perfect book is perfect because Flaubert had, for once, found exactly the subject suited to his method, had made his method and his subject one. On his scientific side Flaubert is a realist, but there is another, perhaps a more intimately personal side, on which he is lyrical, lyrical in a large, sweeping way. The lyric poet in him made La Tentation de Saint-Antoine, the analyst made L'Education Sentimentale; but in Madame Bovary we find the analyst and the lyric poet in equilibrium. It is the history of a woman, as carefully observed as any story that has ever been written, and observed in surroundings of the most ordinary kind. But Flaubert finds the romantic material which he loved, the materials of beauty, in precisely that temperament which he studies so patiently and so cruelly. Madame Bovary is a little woman, half vulgar and half hysterical, incapable of a fine passion; but her trivial desires, her futile aspirations after second-rate pleasures and second-hand ideals, give to Flaubert all that he wants: the opportunity to create beauty out of reality. What is common in the imagination of Madame Bovary becomes exquisite in Flaubert's rendering of it, and by that counterpoise of a commonness in the subject he is saved from any vague ascents of rhetoric in his rendering of it.

In writing Salammbô Flaubert set himself to renew the historical novel, as he had renewed the novel of manners. He would have admitted, doubtless, that perfect success in the historical novel is impossible, by the nature of the case. We are at best only half conscious of the reality of the things about us, only able to translate them approximately into any form of art. How much is left over, in the closest transcription of a mere line of houses in a street, of a passing steamer, of one's next-door neighbour, of the point of view of a foreigner looking along Piccadilly, of one's own state of mind, moment by moment, as one walks from Oxford Circus to the Marble Arch? Think, then, of the attempt to reconstruct no matter what period of the past, to distinguish the difference in the aspect of a world perhaps bossed with castles and ridged with ramparts, to two individualities encased within chain-armour! Flaubert chose his antiquity wisely: a period of which we know too little to confuse us, a city of which no stone is left on another, the minds of Barbarians who have left us no psychological documents. 'Be sure I have made no fantastic Carthage,' he says proudly, pointing to his documents; Ammianus Marcellinus, who has furnished him with 'the exact form of a door'; the Bible and Theophrastus, from which he obtains his perfumes and his precious stones; Gresenius, from whom he gets his Punic names; the Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions. 'As for the temple of Tanit, I am sure of having reconstructed it as it was, with the treatise of the Syrian Goddess, with the medals of the Duc de Luynes, with what is known of the temple at Jerusalem, with a passage of St. Jerome, quoted by Seldon (De Diis Syriis), with the plan of the temple of Gozzo, which is quite Carthaginian, and best of all, with the ruins of the temple of Thugga, which I have seen myself, with my own eyes, and of which no traveller or antiquarian, so far as I know, has ever spoken.' But that, after all, as he admits (when, that is, he has proved point by point his minute accuracy to all that is known of ancient Carthage, his faithfulness to every indication which can serve for his guidance, his patience in grouping rather than his daring in the invention of action and details), that is not the question. 'I care little enough for archæology! If the colour is not uniform, if the details are out of keeping, if the manners do not spring from the religion and the actions from the passions, if the characters are not consistent, if the costumes are not appropriate to the habits and the architecture to the climate, if, in a word, there is not harmony, I am in error. If not, no.'

And there, precisely, is the definition of the one merit which can give a historical novel the right to exist, and at the same time a definition of the merit which sets Salammbô above all other historical novels. Everything in the book is strange, some of it might easily be bewildering, some revolting; but all is in harmony. The harmony is like that of Eastern music, not immediately conveying its charm, or even the secret of its measure, to Western ears; but a monotony coiling perpetually upon itself, after a severe law of its own. Or rather, it is like a fresco, painted gravely in hard, definite colours, firmly detached from a background of burning sky; a procession of Barbarians, each in the costume of his country, passes across the wall; there are battles, in which elephants fight with men; an army besieges a great city, or rots to death in a defile between mountains; the ground is paved with dead men; crosses, each bearing its living burden, stand against the sky; a few figures of men and women appear again and again, expressing by their gestures the soul of the story.

Flaubert himself has pointed, with his unerring self-criticism, to the main defect of his book: 'The pedestal is too large for the statue.' There should have been, as he says, a hundred pages more about Salammbô. He declares: 'There is not in my book an isolated or gratuitous description; all are useful to my characters, and have an influence, near or remote, on the action.' This is true, and yet, all the same, the pedestal is too large for the statue. Salammbô, 'always surrounded with grave and exquisite things,' has something of the somnambulism which enters into the heroism of Judith; she has a hieratic beauty, and a consciousness as pale and vague as the moon whom she worships. She passes before us, 'her body saturated with perfumes,' encrusted with jewels like an idol, her head turreted with violet hair, the gold chain tinkling between her ankles; and is hardly more than an attitude, a fixed gesture, like the Eastern women whom one sees passing, with oblique eyes and mouths painted into smiles, their faces curiously traced into a work of art, in the languid movements of a pantomimic dance. The soul behind those eyes? the temperament under that at times almost terrifying mask? Salammbô is as inarticulate for us as the serpent, to whose drowsy beauty, capable of such sudden awakenings, hers seems half akin; they move before us in a kind of hieratic pantomime, a coloured, expressive thing, signifying nothing. Mâtho, maddened with love, 'in an invincible stupor, like those who have drunk some draught of which they are to die,' has the same somnambulist life; the prey of Venus, he has an almost literal insanity, which, as Flaubert reminds us, is true to the ancient view of that passion. He is the only quite vivid person in the book, and he lives with the intensity of a wild beast, a life 'blinded alike' from every inner and outer interruption to one or two fixed ideas. The others have their places in the picture, fall into their attitudes naturally, remain so many coloured outlines for us. The illusion is perfect; these people may not be the real people of history, but at least they have no self-consciousness, no Christian tinge in their minds.

'The metaphors are few, the epithets definite,' Flaubert tells us, of his style in this book, where, as he says, he has sacrificed less 'to the amplitude of the phrase and to the period,' than in Madame Bovary. The movement here is in briefer steps, with a more earnest gravity, without any of the engaging weakness of adjectives. The style is never archaic, it is absolutely simple, the precise word being put always for the precise thing; but it obtains a dignity, a historical remoteness, by the large seriousness of its manner, the absence of modern ways of thought, which, in Madame Bovary, bring with them an instinctively modern cadence.

Salammbô is written with the severity of history, but Flaubert notes every detail visually, as a painter notes the details of natural things. A slave is being flogged under a tree: Flaubert notes the movement of the thong as it flies, and tells us: 'The thongs, as they whistled through the air, sent the bark of the plane trees flying.' Before the battle of the Macar, the Barbarians are awaiting the approach of the Carthaginian army. First 'the Barbarians were surprised to see the ground undulate in the distance.' Clouds of dust rise and whirl over the desert, through which are seen glimpses of horns, and, as it seems, wings. Are they bulls or birds, or a mirage of the desert? The Barbarians watch intently. 'At last they made out several transverse bars, bristling with uniform points. The bars became denser, larger; dark mounds swayed from side to side; suddenly square bushes came into view; they were elephants and lances. A single shout, "The Carthaginians!" arose.' Observe how all that is seen, as if the eyes, unaided by the intelligence, had found out everything for themselves, taking in one indication after another, instinctively. Flaubert puts himself in the place of his characters, not so much to think for them as to see for them.

Compare the style of Flaubert in each of his books, and you will find that each book has its own rhythm, perfectly appropriate to its subject-matter. That style, which has almost every merit and hardly a fault, becomes what it is by a process very different from that of most writers careful of form. Read Chateaubriand, Gautier, even Baudelaire, and you will find that the aim of these writers has been to construct a style which shall be adaptable to every occasion, but without structural change; the cadence is always the same. The most exquisite word-painting of Gautier can be translated rhythm for rhythm into English, without difficulty; once you have mastered the tune, you have merely to go on; every verse will be the same. But Flaubert is so difficult to translate because he has no fixed rhythm; his prose keeps step with no regular march-music. He invents the rhythm of every sentence, he changes his cadence with every mood or for the convenience of every fact. He has no theory of beauty in form apart from what it expresses. For him form is a living thing, the physical body of thought, which it clothes and interprets. 'If I call stones blue, it is because blue is the precise word, believe me,' he replies to Sainte-Beuve's criticism. Beauty comes into his words from the precision with which they express definite things, definite ideas, definite sensations. And in his book, where the material is so hard, apparently so unmalleable, it is a beauty of sheer exactitude which fills it from end to end, a beauty of measure and order, seen equally in the departure of the doves of Carthage, at the time of their flight into Sicily, and in the lions feasting on the corpses of the Barbarians, in the defile between the mountains.

GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

In the year 1877 Gustave Flaubert wrote to a friend : “ You speak of Balzac’s letters. I read them when they appeared, but with very little enthusiasm. The man gains from them, but not the artist. He was too much taken up with business. You never meet a general idea, a sign of his caring for anything beyond his material interests. . . . What a lamentable life!” At the time the volumes appeared (the year before), he had written to Edmond de Goncourt: “ What a preoccupation with money and how little love of art! Have you noticed that he never once speaks of it? He strove for glory, but not for beauty.”

The reader of Flaubert’s own correspondence,<sup>1</sup> lately given to the world by his niece Madame Commanville and which in the fourth volume is brought to the eve of his death — the student of so much vivid and violent testimony to an intensely exclusive passion is moved to quote these words for the sake of contrast. It will not be said of the 1 Correspondance de Gustave Flaubert. Quatrieme Serie. Paris, 1893.

writer that he himself never once speaks of art; it will be said of him with a near approach to truth that he almost never once speaks of anything else. The effect of contrast is indeed strong everywhere in this singular publication, from which Flaubert’s memory receives an assault likely to deepen the air of felicity missed that seemed destined henceforth to hang over his personal life. “ May I be skinned alive,” he writes in 1854, “before I ever turn my private feelings to. literary account.” His constant refrain in his letters is the impersonality, as he calls it, of the artist, whose work should consist exclusively of his subject and his style, without an emotion, an idiosyncrasy that is not utterly transmuted. Quotation does but scanty justice to his rage for this idea; almost all his feelings were such a rage that we wonder what form they would have borrowed from a prevision of such posthumous betrayal. “ It’s one of my principles that one must never write down one's self. The artist must be present in his work like God in Creation, invisible and almighty, everywhere felt but nowhere seen." Such was the part he allotted to form, to that rounded detachment which enables the perfect work to live by its own life, that he regarded as indecent and dishonourable the production of any impression that was not intensely calculated. "Feelings" were necessarily crude, because they were inevitably unselected, and selection (for the picture's sake) was Flaubert's highest morality.

This principle has been absent from the counsels of the editor of his letters, which have been given to the world, so far as they were procurable, without attenuation and without scruple. There are many of course that circumstances have rendered inaccessible, but in spite of visible gaps the revelation is full enough and remarkable enough. These communications would of course not have been matter for Flaubert's highest literary conscience; but the fact remains that in our merciless age ineluctable fate has overtaken the man in the world whom we most imagine gnashing his teeth under it. His ideal of dignity, of honour and renown, was that nothing should be known of him but that he had been an impeccable writer. "I feel all the same," he wrote in 1852, "that I shall not die before I've set a - roaring somewhere (sans avoir fait rugir quclque part) such a style as hums in my head and which may very well overpower the sound of the parrots and grasshoppers." This is a grievous accident for one who could write that "The worship of art contributes to pride, and of pride one has never too much." Sedentary, cloistered, passionate, cynical, tormented, in his love of magnificent expression, of subjects remote and arduous, with an unattainable ideal, he kept clear all his life of vulgarity and publicity and newspaperism only to be dragged after death into the middle of the market-place, where the electric light beats fiercest. Madame Commanville's publication hands him over to the Philistines with every weakness exposed, every mystery dispelled, every secret betrayed. Almost the whole of her second volume, to say nothing of a large part of her first, consists of his love-letters to the only woman he appears to have addressed in the accents of passion. His private style moreover was as unchastened as his final form was faultless. The result happens to be deeply interesting to the student of the famous "artistic temperament"; it can scarcely be so for a reader less predisposed, I think, for Flaubert was a writers' writer as much as Shelley was a "poets' poet"; but we may ask ourselves if the time has not come when it may well cease to be a leading feature of our homage to a distinguished man that we shall sacrifice him with sanguinary rites on the altar of our curiosity. Flaubert's letters indeed bring up with singular intensity the whole question of the rights and duties, the decencies and discretions of the insurmountable desire to know. To lay down a general code is perhaps as yet impossible, for there is no doubt that to know is good, or to want to know, at any rate, supremely natural. Some day or other surely we shall all agree that everything is relative, that facts themselves are often falsifying and that we pay more for some kinds of knowledge than those particular kinds are worth. Then we shall perhaps be sorry to have had it drummed into us that the author of calm, firm masterpieces, of Madame Bovary, of Salammbô, of Saint-JuHcn VHospitalier, was narrow and noisy and had not personally and morally, as it were, the great dignity of his literary ideal.

When such revelations are made, however, they are made, and the generous attitude is doubtless at that stage to catch them in sensitive hands. Poor Flaubert has been turned inside out for the lesson, but it has been given to him to constitute practically — on the demonstrator's table with an attentive circle round — an extraordinary, a magnificent "case." Never certainly in literature was the distinctively literary idea, the fury of execution, more passionately and visibly manifested. This rare visibility is probably the excuse that the responsible hand will point to. The letters enable us to note it, to follow it from phase to phase, from one wild attitude to another, through all the contortions and objurgations, all the exaltations and despairs, tensions and collapses, the mingled pieties and profanities of Flaubert's simplified yet intemperate life. Their great interest is that they exhibit an extraordinary singleness of aim, show us the artist not only disinterested but absolutely dishumanised. They help us to perceive what Flaubert missed almost more than what he gained, and if there are many questions in regard to such a point of view that they certainly fail to settle, they at least cause us to turn them over as we have seldom turned them before. It was the lifelong discomfort of this particular fanatic, but it is our own extreme ad vantage, that he was almost insanely excessive. "In literature," he wrote in 1861, "the best chance one has is by following out one's temperament and exaggerating it." His own he could scarcely exaggerate; but it carried him so far that we seem to see on distant heights his agitations outlined against the sky. "Impersonal" as he wished his work to be, it was his strange fortune to be the most expressive, the most vociferous, the most spontaneous of men. The record of his temperament is therefore complete, and if his ambiguities make the illuminating word difficult to utter, it is not because the picture is colourless.

Why was such a passion, in proportion to its strength, after all so sterile? There is life, there is blood in a considerable measure in Madame Bovary, but the last word about its successors can only be, it seems to me, that they are splendidly and infinitely curious. Why may, why must indeed in certain cases, the effort of expression spend itself, and spend itself in success, without completing the circle, without coming round again to the joy of evocation? How can art be so genuine and yet so unconsolated, so unhumorous, so unsociable? When it is a religion, and therefore an authority, why should it not be, like other authorities, a guarantee? How can it be such a curse without being also a blessing? What germ of treachery lurks in it to make it, not necessarily but so easily that there is but a hair-line to cross, delusive for personal happi ness? Why in short when the struggle is success should the success not be at last serenity? These mysteries and many others pass before us as we listen to Flaubert's loud plaint, which is precisely the profit we derive from his not having, with his correspondents, struck, like Balzac, only the commercial note. Nothing in his agitated and limited life, which began at Rouen in 1821, is more striking than the prompt, straightforward way his destiny picked him out and his conscience handed him over. As most young men have to contend with some domestic disapproval of the muse, so this one had rather to hang back on the easy incline and to turn away his face from the formidable omens. It was only too evident that he would be free to break his heart, to gueuler, as he fondly calls it, to spout, to mouth and thresh about, to that heart's content. No career was ever more taken for granted in its intensity, nor any series of tribulations more confidently invited. It was recognised from the first that the tall and splendid youth, green-eyed and sonorous (his stature and aspect were distinguished), was born to gueuler, and especially his own large cadences.

His father, a distinguished surgeon, who died early, had purchased near Rouen, on the Seine, the small but picturesque property of Croisset; and it was in a large five-windowed corner room of this quiet old house, his study for forty years, that his life was virtually spent. It was marked by two great events; his journey to the East and return through the south of Europe with Maxime Du Camp in 1849, and the publication of Madame Bovary (followed by a train of consequences) in 1857. He made a second long journey (to Algeria, Tunis and the site of Carthage) while engaged in writing Salamambo; he had before his father's death taken part in a scanty family pilgrimage to the north of Italy, and he appears once to have spent a few weeks on the Righi and at another time a few days in London, an episode, oddly enough, of which there is but the faintest, scarcely a recognisable, echo in his correspondence. For the rest, and save for an occasional interlarding of Paris, his years were spent at his patient table in the room by the rural Seine. If success in life (and it is the definition open perhaps to fewest objections), consists of achieving in maturity the dreams of one's prime, Flaubert's measure may be said to have been full. M. Maxime Du Camp, in those two curious volumes of Impressions Littéraires which in 1882 treated a surprised world and a scandalised circle to the physiological explanation of his old friend's idiosyncrasies, declares that exactly as that friend was with intensity at the beginning, so was he with intensity in the middle and at the end, and that no life was ever simpler or straighter in the sense of being a case of growth without change. Doubtful indeed were the urgency of M. Du Camp's revelation and the apparent validity of his evidence; but whether or no Flaubert was an epileptic subject, and whether or no there was danger in our unconsciousness of the question (danger to any one but M. Maxime Du Camp), the impression of the reader of the letters is in complete conformity with the pronouncement to which I allude. The Flaubert of fifty differs from the Flaubert of twenty only in size. The difference between Bouvard et Pecuchet and Madame Bovary is not a difference of spirit; and it is a proof of the author's essential continuity that his first published work, appearing when he had touched middle life and on which his reputation mainly rests, had been planned as long in advance as if it had been a new religion.

Madame Bovary was five years in the writing, and the Tentation de Saint-Antoine, which saw the light in 1874, but the consummation of an idea entertained in his boyhood. Bouvard et Pécuchet, the intended epos of the blatancy, the comprehensive betise of mankind, was in like manner the working out at the end of his days of his earliest generalisation. It had literally been his life-long dream to crown his career with a panorama of human ineptitude. Everything in his literary life had been planned and plotted and prepared. One moves in it through an atmosphere of the darkest, though the most innocent, conspiracy. He was perpetually laying a train, a train of which the inflammable substance was “ style.” His great originality was that the long siege of his youth was successful. I can recall no second case in which poetic justice has interfered so gracefully. He began Madame Bovary from afar off, not as an amusement or a profit or a clever novel or even a work of art or a morceau de vie, as his successors say to-day, not even, either, as the best thing he could make it; but as a premeditated classic, a masterpiece pure and simple, a thing of conscious perfection and a contribution of the first magnitude to the literature of his country. There would have been every congruity in his encountering proportionate failure and the full face of that irony in things of which he was so inveterate a student. A writer of tales who should have taken the extravagance of his design for the subject of a sad “ novelette “ could never have permitted himself any termination of such a story but an effective anticlimax. The masterpiece at the end of years would inevitably fall very flat and the overweening spirit be left somehow to its illusions. The solution in fact was very different, and as Flaubert had deliberately sown so exactly and magnificently did he reap. The perfection of Madame Bovary is one of the commonplaces of criticism, the position of it one of the highest a man of letters dare dream of, the possession of it one of the glories of France. No calculation was ever better fulfilled, nor any train more successfully laid. It is a sign of the indefeasible bitterness to which Flaubert’s temperament condemned him and the expression of which, so oddly, is yet as obstreperous and boyish as that of the happiness arising from animal spirits — it is a mark of his amusing pessimism that so honourable a first step should not have done more to reconcile him to life. But he was a creature of transcendent dreams and unfathomable perversities of taste, and it was in his nature to be more conscious of one broken spring in the couch of fame, more wounded by a pin-prick, more worried by an assonance, than he could ever be warmed or pacified from within. Literature and life were a single business to him, and the “torment of style” that might occasionally intermit in one place was sufficiently sure to break out in another. We may polish our periods till they shine again, but over the style of life our control is necessarily more limited.

To such limitations Flaubert resigned himself with the worst possible grace. He polished ferociously, but there was a side of the matter that his process could never touch. Some other process might have been of use; some patience more organised, some formula more elastic, or simply perhaps some happier trick of good-humour; at the same time it must be admitted that in his deepening vision of the imbecility of the world any remedy would have deprived him of his prime, or rather of his sole, amusement. The bŕtise of mankind was a colossal comedy, calling aloud to heaven for an Aristophanes to match, and Flaubert’s nearest approach to joy was in noting the opportunities of such an observer and feeling within himself the stirrings of such a genius. Toward the end he found himself vibrating at every turn to this ideal, and if he knew to the full the tribulation of proper speech no one ever suffered less from that of proper silence. He broke it in his letters, on a thousand queer occasions, with all the luxury of relief. He was blessed with a series of correspondents with whom he was free to leave nothing unsaid; many of them ladies too, so that he had in their company all the inspiration of gallantry without its incidental sacrifices. The most interesting of his letters are those addressed between 1866 and 1876 to Madame George Sand, which, originally collected in 1884, have been re-embodied in Madame Commanville’s publication. They are more interesting than ever when read, as we are now able to tread them, in connection with Madame Sand’s equally personal and much more luminous answers, accessible in the fifth and sixth volumes of her own copious and strikingly honourable Correspondance. No opposition could have been more of a nature to keep the ba’l rolling than that of the parties to this candid commerce, who were as united by affection and by common interests as they were divided by temper and their way of feeling about those interests. Living, each of them, for literature (though Madame Sand, in spite of her immense production, very much less exclusively for it than her independent and fastidious friend), their comparison of most of the impressions connected with it could yet only be a lively contrast of temperaments. Flaubert, whose hark indeed (it is the rule) was much worse than his bite, spent his life, especially the later part of it, in a state of acute exasperation; but her inalterable serenity was one of the few irritants that were tolerable to him.

Their letters are a striking lesson in the difference between good-humour and bad, and seem to point the moral that either form has only to be cultivated to become our particular kind of intelligence. They compared conditions at any rate, her expansion with his hard contraction, and he had the advantage of finding in a person who had sought wisdom in ways so many and so devious one of the few objects within his ken that really represented virtue and that he could respect. It gives us the pattern of his experience that Madame Sand should have stood to him for so much of the ideal, and we may say this even under the impression produced by a reperusal of her total correspondence, a monument to her generosity and variety. Poor Flaubert appears to us to-day almost exactly by so much less frustrated as he was beguiled by this happy relation, the largest he ever knew. His interlocutress, who in the evening of an arduous life accepted refreshment wherever she found it and who could still give as freely as she took, for immemorial habit had only added to each faculty, his correspondent, for all her love of well-earned peace, offered her breast to his aggressive pessimism, had motherly, reasoning, coaxing hands for it, made in short such sacrifices that she often came to Paris to go to brawling Magny dinners to meet him and wear, to please him, as I have heard one of the diners say, unaccustomed peach-blossom dresses. It contributes to our sense of what there was loveable at the core of his effort to select and his need to execrate that he should have been able to read and enjoy so freely a writer so fluid; and it also reminds us that imagination is after all, for the heart, the safest quality. Flaubert had excellent honest inconsistencies, crude lapses from purity in which he could like the books of his friends. He was susceptible of painless amusement (a rare emotion with him) when his imagination was touched, as it was infallibly and powerfully, by affection. To make a hard rule never to be corrupted, and then to make a special exception for fondness, is of course the right attitude.

He had several admirations, and it might always be said of him that he would have admired it he could, for he could like a thing if he could be proud of it, and the act adapted itself to his love of magnificence. He could like indeed almost any one he could say great coloured things about: the ancients, almost promiscuously, for they never wrote in newspapers, and Shakespeare (of whom he could not say fine things enough), and Rabelais, and Montaigne, and Goethe, and Victor Hugo (his biggest modern enthusiasm), and Leconte de Lisle, and Renan, and Thdophile Gautier. He did scant justice to Balzac and even less to Alfred de Musset. On the other hand he had an odd and interesting indulgence for Boileau. Balzac and Musset were not, by his measure, “writers,” and he maintains that be it in verse, be it in prose, it is only so far as they “write” that authors live; between the two categories he makes a fundamental distinction. The latter indeed, the mere authors, simply did not exist for him, and with Mr, Bcsant’s Incorporated Society he would have had nothing whatever to do. He declares somewhere that it is only the writer who survives in the poet. In spite of his patience with the “muse” to whom the majority of the letters in the earlier of the volumes before us were addressed, and of the great invidious coup de chapeau with which he could here and there render homage to versification, his relish for poetry as poetry was moderate. Far higher was his estimate of prose as prose, which he held to be much the more difficult art of the two, with more maddening problems and subtler rhythms, and on whose behalf he found it difficult to forgive the “proud sister” attitude of verse. No man at any rate, to make up for scanty preferences, can have had a larger list of literary aversions. His eye swept the field in vain for specimens untainted with the “modern infection,” the plague which had killed Thdophile Gautier and to which he considered that he himself had already succumbed. If he glanced at a feuillcton he saw that Madame Sarah Bernhardt was “a social expression,” and his resentment of this easy wisdom resounded disproportionately through all the air he lived in. One has always a kindness for people who detest the contemporary tone if they have done something fine; but the baffling thing in Flaubert was the extent of his suffering and the inelasticity of his humour. The jargon of the newspapers, the slovenliness of the novelists, the fatuity of Octave Feuillet, to whom he was exceedingly unjust, for that writer's love of magnificence was not inferior to his critic's, all work upon him with an intensity only to be explained by the primary defect of his mind, his want of a general sense of proportion. That sense stopped apparently when he had settled the relation of the parts of a phrase, as to which it was exquisite.

Fortunately he had confidants to whom he could cry out when he was hurt and whose position, as he took life for the most part as men take a violent toothache, was assuredly no sinecure. To more than one intense friendship were his younger and middle years devoted; so close was his union with Louis Bouilhet, the poet and dramatist, that he could say in 1870 : " I feel no longer the need to write, because I wrote especially for a being who is no more. There's no taste in it now — the impulse has gone." As he wrote for Bouilhet, so Bouilhet wrote for him. " There are so few people who like what I like or^ have an idea of what I care for." That was the indispensable thing for him in a social, a personal relation, the existence in another mind of a love of literature sufficiently demonstrated to relieve the individual from the great and damning charge, the charge perpetually on Flaubert's lips in regard to his contemporaries, the accusation of malignantly hating it. This universal conspiracy he perceived, in his own country, in every feature of manners, and to a degree which may well make us wonder how high he would have piled the indictment if he had extended the inquiry to the manners of ours. We draw a breath of relief when we think to what speedier suffocation he would have yielded had he been materially acquainted with the great English-speaking peoples. When he declared, naturally enough, that liking what he liked was a condition of intercourse, his vision of this community was almost destined, in the nature of things, to remain unachievable; for it may really be said that no one in the world ever liked anything so much as Flaubert liked beauty of style. The mortal indifference to it of empires and republics was the essence of that " modern infection" from which the only escape would have been to ne faire que de Vart. Mankind, for him, was made up of the three or four persons, Ivan Turgenieff in the number, who perceived what he was trying for, and of the innumerable millions who didn't. Poor M. Maxime Du Camp, in spite of many of the leading characteristics of a friend, was one of this multitude, and he pays terribly in the pages before us for his position. He pays, to my sense, excessively, for surely he had paid enough and exactly in the just and appropriate measure, when, in the introduction contributed to the "definitive" edition of Madame Bovary, M. Guy de Maupassant, avenging his master by an exquisite stroke, made public the letter of advice and remonstrance addressed to Flaubert by M. Du Camp, then editor of the Revue de Paris, on the eve of the serial appearance of the former's first novel in that periodical. This incomparable effusion, with its amazing reference to excisions and its suggestion that the work be placed in the hands of an expert and inexpensive corrector who will prepare it for publication, this priceless gem will twinkle for ever in the setting M. de Maupassant has given it, or we may perhaps still more figuratively say in the forehead of the masterpiece it discusses. But there was surely a needlessness, there was surely a nervous and individual ferocity in such a vindictive giving to the world of every passage of every letter in which the author of that masterpiece has occasion to allude to his friend's want of tact. It naturally made their friendship unsuccessful that Flaubert disliked M. Du Camp, but it is a monstrous imputation on his character to assume that he was small enough never to have forgiven and forgotten the other's mistake. Great people never should be avenged; it diminishes their privilege. What M. Du Camp, so far as an outsider may judge, had to be punished for was the tone of his reminiscences. But the tone is unmistakably the tone of affection. He may have felt but dimly what his old comrade was trying for, and even the latent L richness of L'Education Sentimentale, but he renders full justice to Flaubert's noble independence. The tone of Flaubert's own allusions is a different thing altogether. It is not unfair to say that all this disproportionate tit-for-tat renders the episode one of the ugliest little dramas of recent literary history. The irony of a friend's learning after long years and through the agency of the press how unsuspectingly another friend was in the habit of talking of him, is an irony too cruel for impartial minds. The disaster is absolute, and our compassion goes straight to the survivor. There are other survivors who will have but little more reason to think that the decencies have presided over such a publication.

It is only a reader here and there in all the wide world who understands to-day, or who ever understood, what Gustave Flaubert tried for; and it is only when such a reader is also a writer, and a tolerably tormented one, that he particularly cares. Poor Flaubert's great revenge, however, far beyond that of any editorial treachery, is that when this occasional witness does care he cares very peculiarly and very tenderly and much more than he may be able successfully to say. Then the great irritated style-seeker becomes, in the embracing mind, an object of interest and honour; not so much for what he altogether achieved as for the way he strove and for the inspiring image that he presents. There is no reasoning about him; the more we take him as he is the more he has a special authority. Salammbô, in which we breathe the air of pure aesthetics, is as hard as stone; L'Education, for the same reason, is as cold as death; Saint-Antoine is a medley of wonderful bristling metals and polished agates, and the drollery of Bouvard et Pécuchet (a work as sad as something perverse and puerile done for a wager), about as contagious as the smile of a keeper showing you through the ward of a madhouse. In Madame Bovary alone emotion is just sufficiently present to take off the chill. This truly is a qualified report, yet it leaves Flaubert untouched at the points where he is most himself, leaves him master of a province in which, for many of us, it will never be an idle errand to visit him. The way to care for him is to test the virtue of his particular exaggeration, to accept for the sake of his aesthetic influence the idiosyncrasies now revealed to us, his wild gesticulation, his plaintive, childish side, the side as to which one asks one's self what has become of ultimate good-humour, of human patience, of the enduring man. He pays and pays heavily for his development in a single direction, for it is probable that no literary effort so great, accompanied with an equal literary talent, ever failed on so large a scale to be convincing. It convinces only those who are converted, and the number of such is very small. It is an appeal so technical that we may say of him still, but with more resignation, what he personally wailed over, that nobody takes his great question seriously. This is indeed why there may be for each of the loyal minority a certain fine scruple against insistence. If he had had in his nature a contradiction the less, if his indifference had been more forgiving, this is surely the way in which he would have desired most to be preserved.

To no one at any rate need it be denied to say that the best way to appreciate him is, abstaining from the clumsy process of an appeal and the vulgar process of an advertisement, exclusively to use him, to feel him, to be privately glad of his message. In proportion as we swallow him whole and cherish him as a perfect example, his weaknesses fall into their place as the conditions about which, in estimating a man who has been original, there is a want of tact in crying out. There is of course always the answer that the critic is to be suborned only by originalities that fertilise; the rejoinder to which, of equal necessity, must ever be that even to the critics of unborn generations poor Flaubert will doubtless yield a fund of amusement. To the end of time there will be something flippant, something perhaps even "clever" to be said of his immense ado about nothing. Those for some of whose moments, on the contrary, this ado will be as stirring as music, will belong to the group that has dabbled in the same material and striven with the same striving. The interest he presents, in truth, can only be a real interest for fellowship, for initiation of the practical kind; and in that case it becomes a sentiment, a sort of mystical absorption or fruitful secret. The sweet est things in the world of art or the life of letters are the irresponsible sympathies that seem to rest on divination. Flaubert's hardness was only the act of holding his breath in the reverence of his search for beauty; his universal renunciation, the long spasm of his too-fixed attention, was only one of the absurdest sincerities of art. To the participating eye these things are but details in the little square picture made at this distance of time by his forty years at the battered table at Croisset. Everything lives in this inward vision of the wide room on the liver, almost the cell of a monomaniac, but consecrated ground to the faithful, which, as he tried and tried again, must so often have resounded with the pomp of a syntax addressed, in his code, peremptorily to the ear. If there is something tragi-comic in the scene, as of a tenacity in the void or a life laid down for grammar, the impression passes when we turn from the painful process to the sharp and splendid result. Then, since if we like people very much we end by liking their circumstances, the eternal chamber and the dry Benedictine years have a sufficiently palpable offset in the repoussé bronze of the books.

An incorruptible celibate and dédaigneux des femmes (as, in spite of the hundred and forty letters addressed to Madame Louise Colet, M. de Maupassant styles him and, in writing to Madame Sand, he confesses himself), it was his own view of his career that, as art was the only thing worth living for, he had made immense sacrifices to application — sacrificed passions, joys, affections, curiosities and opportunities. He says that he shut his passions up in cages and only at long intervals, for amusement, had a look at them. The orgie Je littératurc, in short, had been his sole form of excess. He knew best of course, but his imaginations about himself (as about other matters) were, however justly, rich, and to the observer at this distance he appears truly to have been made of the very stuff of a Benedictine. He compared himself to the camel, who can neither be stopped when he is going nor moved when he is resting. He was so sedentary, so averse to physical exercise, which he speaks of somewhere as an occupation funeste, that his main alternative to the chair was, even by day, the bed, and so omnivorous in research that the act of composition, with him, was still more impeded by knowledge than by taste. “I have in me,” he writes to the imperturbable Madame Sand, “a fond d’ecclésiastique that people don’t know “ — the clerical basis of the Catholic clergy. “We shall talk of it,” he adds, “much better viva voce than by letter”; and we can easily imagine the thoroughness with which between the unfettered pair, when opportunity favoured, the interesting subject was treated. At another time indeed, to the same correspondent, who had given him a glimpse of the happiness of being a grandmother, he refers with touching sincerity to the poignancy of solitude to which the “radical absence of the feminine element” in his life had condemned him. “Yet I was born with every capacity for tenderness. One doesn’t shape one’s destiny, one undergoes it. I was pusillanimous in my youth — I was afraid of life. We pay for everything.” Besides, it was his theory that a “man of style” should never stoop to action. If he had been afraid of life in fact, I must add, he was preserved from the fear of it in imagination by that great “historic start,” the sensibility to the frisson historique, which dictates the curious and beautiful outburst, addressed to Madame Colct, when he asks why it had not been his lot to live in the age of Nero. “ How I would have talked with the Greek rhetors, travelled in the great chariots on the Roman roads, and, in the evening, in the hostelryes, turned in with the vagabond priests of Cybele! . . . I have lived, all over, in those directions; doubtless in some prior state of being. I’m sure I’ve been, under the Roman empire, manager of some troop of strolling players, one of the rascals who used to go to Sicily to buy women to make actresses, and who were at once professors, panders and artists. These scoundrels have wonderful ‘ mugs’ in the comedies of Plautus, in reading which I seem to myself to remember things.”

He was an extreme admirer of Apuleius, and his florid inexperience helps doubtless somewhat to explain those extreme sophistications of taste of which La Tentation de Saint-Antoine is so elaborate an example. Far and strange are the refuges in which such an imagination seeks oblivion of the immediate and the ugly. His life was that of a pearl-diver, breathless in the thick element while he groped for the priceless word, and condemned to plunge again and again. He passed it in reconstructing sentences, exterminating repetitions, calculating and comparing cadences, harmonious chutes de phrase, and beating about the bush to deal death to the abominable assonance. Putting aside the particular ideal of style which made a pitfall of the familiar, few men surely have ever found it so difficult to deal with the members of a phrase. He loathed the smug face of facility as much as he suffered from the nightmare of toil; but if he had been marked in the cradle for literature it may be said without paradox that this was not on account of any native disposition to write, to write at least as he aspired and as he understood the term. He took long years to finish his books, and terrible months and weeks to deliver himself of his chapters and his pages. Nothing could exceed his endeavour to make them all rich and round, just as nothing could exceed the unetherised anguish in which his successive children were born. His letters, in which, inconsequently for one who had so little faith in any rigour of taste or purity of perception save his own, he takes everybody into his most intimate literary confidence, the pages of the publication before us are the record of everything that retarded him. The abyss of reading answered to the abyss of writing; with the partial exception of Madame Bovary every subject that he treated required a rising flood of information. There are libraries of books behind his most innocent sentences. The question of “art” for him was so furiously the question of form, and the question of form was so intensely the question of rhythm, that from the beginning to the end of his correspondence we scarcely ever encounter a mention of any beauty but verbal beauty. He quotes Goethe fondly as to the supreme importance of the “conception,” but the conception remains for him essentially the plastic one.

There are moments when his restless passion for form strikes us as leaving the subject out of account altogether, as if he has taken it up arbitrarily, blindly, preparing himself the years of misery in which he is to denounce the grotesqueness, the insanity of his choice. Four times, with his orgueil, his love of magnificence, he condemned himself incongruously to the modern and familiar, groaning at every step over the horrible difficulty of reconciling “style” in such cases with truth and dialogue with surface. He wanted to do the battle of Thermopylae, and he found himself doing Bouvard et Pécuchet. One of the sides by which he interests us, one of the sides that will always endear him to the student, is his extraordinary ingenuity in lifting without falsifying, finding a middle way into grandeur and edging off from the literal without forsaking truth. This way was open to him from the moment he could look down upon his theme from the position of une blague suprieur, as he calls it, the amused freedom of an observer as irreverent as a creator. But if subjects were made for style (as to which Flaubert had a rigid theory : the idea was good enough if the expression was), so style was made for the ear, the last court of appeal, the supreme touchstone of perfection. He was perpetually demolishing his periods in the light of his merciless gueulades. He tried them on every one; his gueulades could make him sociable. The horror, in particular, that haunted all his years was the horror of the cliché, the stereotyped, the thing usually said and the way it was usually said, the current phrase that passed muster. Nothing, in his view, passed muster but freshness, that which came into the world, with all the honours, for the occasion. To use the ready-made was as disgraceful as for a self-respecting cook to buy a tinned soup or a sauce in a bottle. Flaubert considered that the dispenser of such wares was indeed the grocer, and, producing his ingredients exclusively at home, he would have stabbed himself for shame like Vatel. This touches on the strange weakness of his mind, his puerile dread of the grocer, the bourgeois, the sentiment that in his generation and the preceding misplaced, as it were, the spirit of adventure and the sense of honour, and sterilised a whole province of French literature. That worthy citizen ought never to have kept a poet from dreaming.

He had for his delectation and for satiric purposes a large collection of those second-hand and approximate expressions which begged the whole literary question. To light upon a perfect example was his nearest approach to natural bliss. Bnuvard et Ptcuchct is a museum of such examples, the cream of that Dictionnaire des Idtfes Regies for which all his life he had taken notes and which eventually resolved itself into the encyclopaedic exactitude and the lugubrious humour of the novel. Just as subjects were meant for style, so style was meant for images; therefore as his own were numerous and admirable he would have contended, coming back to the source that he was one of the writers to whom the significance of a work had ever been most present. This significance was measured by the amount of style and the quantity of metaphor thrown up. Poor subjects threw up a little, fine subjects threw up much, and the finish of his prose was the proof of his profundity. If you pushed far enough into language you found yourself in the embrace of thought. There are doubtless many persons whom this account of the matter will fail to satisfy, and there will indeed be no particular zeal to put it forward even on the part of those for whom, as a writer, Flaubert most vividly exists. He is a strong taste, like any other that is strong, and he exists only for those who have a constitutional need to feel in some direction the particular aesthetic confidence that he inspires. That confidence rests on the simple fact that he carried execution so far and nailed it so fast. No one will care for him at all who does not care for his metaphors, and those moreover who care most for those will be discreet enough to admit that even a style rich in similes is limited when it renders only the visible. The invisible Flaubert scarcely touches; his vocabulary and all his methods were unadjusted and alien to it. He could not read his French Wordsworth, M. Sully Prudhomme; he had no faith in the power of the moral to offer a surface. He himself offers such a flawless one that this hard concretion is success. If he is impossible as a companion he is deeply refreshing as a reference; and all that his reputation asks of you is an occasional tap of the knuckle at those firm thin plates of gold which constitute the leaves of his books. This passing tribute will yield the best results when you have been prompted to it by some other prose.

In other words, with all his want of port, i.e., as the psychological critics of his own country would say of him, poor Flaubert is one of the artists to whom an artist will always go back. And if such a pilgrim, in the very act of acknowledgment, drops for an instant into the tenderness of compassion, it is a compassion singularly untainted with patronage or with contempt; full moreover of mystifications and wonderments, questions unanswered and speculations vain. Why was he so unhappy if he was so active; why was he so intolerant if he was so strong? Why should he not have accepted the circumstance that M. de Lamartine also wrote as his nature impelled, and that M. Louis Enault embraced a convenient opportunity to go to the East? The East, if we listen to him, should have been closed to one of these gentlemen and literature forbidden to the other. Why does the inevitable perpetually infuriate him, and why does he inveterately resent the ephemeral? Why does he, above all, in his private, in other words his continuous epistolary, despair, assault his correspondents with malodorous comparisons? The bad smell of the age was the main thing he knew it by. Naturally therefore he found life a chose hideuse. If it was his great merit and the thing we hold on to him for that the artist and the man were welded together, what becomes, in the proof, of a merit that is so little illuminating for life? What becomes of the virtue of the beauty that pretends to be worth living for? Why feel, and feel genuinely, so much about "art," in order to feel so little about its privilege? Why proclaim it on the one hand the holy of holies, only to let your behaviour confess it on the other a temple open to the winds? Why be angry that so few people care for the real thing, since this aversion of the many leaves a luxury of space? The answer to these too numerous questions is the final perception that the subject of our observations failed of happiness, failed of temperance, not through his excesses, but absolutely through his barriers. He passed his life in strange oblivion of the circumstance that, however incumbent it may be on most of us to do our duty, there is, in spite of a thousand narrow dogmatisms, nothing in the world that any one is under the least obligation to like — not even (one braces one's self to risk the declaration), a particular kind of writing. Particular kinds of writing may sometimes, for their producers, have the good fortune to please; but these things are windfalls, pure luxuries, not resident even in the cleverest of us as natural rights. Let Flaubert always be cited as one of the devotees and even, when people are fond of the word, as one of the martyrs of the plastic idea; but let him be still more considerably preserved and more fully presented as one of the most conspicuous of the faithless. For it was not that he went too far, it was on the contrary that he stopped too short. He hovered for ever at the public door, in the outer court, the splendour of which very properly beguiled him, and in which he seems still to stand as upright as a sentinel and as shapely as a statue. But that immobility and even that erectness were paid too dear. The shining arms were meant to carry further, the other doors were meant to open. He should at least have listened at the chamber of the soul. This would have floated him on a deeper tide; above all it would have calmed his nerves.

Extracts from ‘PHOENIX: THE POSTHUMOUS PAPERS’ by D.H. Lawrence

This short extract was taken from D.H. Lawrence’s review of Mastro-don Gesualdo, by Giovanni Verga.

The trouble with realism — and Verga was a realist — is that the writer, when he is a truly exceptional man like Flaubert or like Verga, tries to read his own sense of tragedy into people much smaller than himself. I think it is a final criticism against Madame Bovary that people such as Emma Bovary and her husband Charles simply are too insignificant to carry the full weight of Gustave Flaubert’s sense of tragedy. Emma and Charles Bovary are a couple of little people. Gustave Flaubert is not a little person. But, because he is a realist and does not believe in “heroes,” Flaubert insists on pouring his own deep and bitter tragic consciousness into the little skins of the country doctor and his uneasy wife. The result is a discrepancy. Madame Bovary is a great book and a very wonderful picture of life. But we cannot help resenting the fact that the great tragic soul of Gustave Flaubert is, so to speak, given only the rather commonplace bodies of Emma and Charles Bovary. There’s a misfit. And to get over the misfit, you have to let in all sorts of seams of pity. Seams of pity, which won’t be hidden.

The great tragic soul of Shakespeare borrows the bodies of kings and princes — not out of snobbism, but out of natural affinity. You can’t put a great soul into a commonplace person. Commonplace persons have commonplace souls. Not all the noble sympathy of Flaubert or Verga for Bovarys and Malavoglias can prevent the said Bovarys and Malavoglias from being commonplace persons. They were deliberately chosen because they were commonplace, and not heroic. The authors insisted on the treasure of the humble. But they had to lend the humble by far the best part of their own treasure, before the said humble could show any treasure at all.

So, if I Malavoglia dates, so does Madame Bovary. They belong to the emotional-democratic, treasure-of-the-humble period of the nineteenth century. The period is just rather out of fashion. We still feel the impact of the treasure-of-the-humble too much. When the emotion will have quite gone out of us, we can accept Madame Bovary and I Malavoglia in the same free spirit with the same detachment as that in which we accept Dickens or Richardson.

Mastro-don Gesualdo, however, is not nearly so much treasure-of-the-humble as I Malavoglia. Here, Verga is not dealing with the disaster of poverty, and calling it tragedy. On the contrary, he is a little bored by poverty. He must have a hero who wins out, and makes his pile, and then succumbs under the pile.

German Books: Thomas Mann

Thomas Mann is perhaps the most famous of German novelists now writing. He, and his elder brother, Heinrich Mann, with Jakob Wassermann, are acclaimed the three artists in fiction of present-day Germany.

But Germany is now undergoing that craving for form in fiction, that passionate desire for the mastery of the medium of narrative, that will of the writer to be greater than and undisputed lord over the stuff he writes, which is figured to the world in Gustave Flaubert.

Thomas Mann is over middle age, and has written three or four books: Buddenbrooks, a novel of the patrician life of Lubeck; Tristan, a collection of six Novellen; Königliche Hoheit, an unreal Court romance; various stories, and lastly, Der Tod in Venedig. The author himself is the son of a Lubeck Patrizier.

It is as an artist rather than as a story-teller that Germany worships Thomas Mann. And yet it seems to me, this craving for form is the outcome, not of artistic conscience, but of a certain attitude to life. For form is not a personal thing like style. It is impersonal like logic. And just as the school of Alexander Pope was logical in its expressions, so it seems the school of Flaubert is, as it were, logical in its aesthetic form. "Nothing outside the definite line of the book," is a maxim. But can the human mind fix absolutely the definite line of a book, any more than it can fix absolutely any definite line of action for a living being?

Thomas Mann, however, is personal, almost painfully so, in his subject-matter. In "Tonio Kroger," the long Novelle at the end of the Tristan volume, he paints a detailed portrait of himself as a youth and younger man, a careful analysis. And he expresses at some length the misery of being an artist. "Literature is not a calling, it is a curse." Then he says to the Russian painter girl: "There is no artist anywhere but longs again, my love, for the common life." But any young artist might say that. It is because the stress of life in a young man, but particularly in an artist, is very strong, and has as yet found no outlet, so that it rages inside him in Sturm und Drang. But the condition is the same, only more tragic, in the Thomas Mann of fifty-three. He has never found any outlet for himself, save his art. He has never given himself to anything but his art. This is all well and good, if his art absorbs and satisfies him, as it has done some great men, like Corot. But then there are the other artists, the more human, like Shakespeare and Goethe, who must give themselves to life as well as to art. And if these were afraid, or despaired of life, then with their surplus they would ferment and become rotten. Which is what ails Thomas Mann. He is physically ailing, no doubt. But his complaint is deeper: it is of the soul.

And out of this soul-ailment, this unbelief, he makes his particular art, which he describes, in "Tonio Kroger," as "Wahlerisch, er-lesen, kostbar, fein, reizbar gegen das Banale, und aufs höchste empfindlich in Fragen des Taktes und Geschmacks." He is a disciple, in method, of the Flaubert who wrote: "I worked sixteen hours yesterday, today the whole day, and have at last finished one page." In writing of the Leitmotiv and its influence, he says: "Now this method alone is sufficient to explain my slowness. It is the result neither of anxiety nor indigence, but of an overpowering sense of responsibility for the choice of every word, the coining of every phrase ... a responsibility that longs for perfect freshness, and which, after two hours' work, prefers not to undertake an important sentence. For which sentence is important, and which not? Can one know before hand whether a sentence, or part of a sentence may not be called upon to appear again as Motiv, peg, symbol, citation or connexion? And a sentence which must be heard twice must be fashioned accordingly. It must — I do not speak of beauty — possess a certain high level, and symbolic suggestion, which will make it worthy to sound again in any epic future. So every point becomes a standing ground, every adjective a decision, and it is clear that such work is not to be produced off-hand."

This, then, is the method. The man himself was always delicate in constitution. "The doctors said he was too weak to go to school, and must work at home." I quote from Aschenbach, in Der Tod in Venedig. "When he fell, at the age of fifty-three, one of his closest observers said of him: 'Aschenbach has always lived like this' — and he gripped his fist hard clenched; 'never like this' — and he let his open hand lie easily on the arm of the chair."

He forced himself to write, and kept himself to the work. Speaking of one of his works, he says: "It was pardonable, yea, it showed plainly the victory of his morality, that the uninitiated reader supposed the book to have come of a solid strength and one long breath; whereas it was the result of small daily efforts and hundreds of single inspirations."

And he gives the sum of his experience in the belief: "dass beinahe alles Grosse, was dastehe, als ein Trotzdem dastehe, trotz Kummer und Qual, Armut, Verlassenheit, Körperschwache, Luster, Leidenschaft und tausend hemmnischen Zustände gekommen sei." And then comes the final revelation, difficult to translate. He is speaking of life as it is written into his books:

"For endurance of one's fate, grace in suffering, does not only mean passivity, but is an active work, a positive triumph, and the Sebastian figure is the most beautiful symbol, if not of all art, yet of the art in question. If one looked into this portrayed world and saw the elegant self-control that hides from the eyes of the world to the last moment the inner undermining, the biological decay; saw the yellow ugliness which, sensuously at a disadvantage, could blow its choking heat of desire to a pure flame, and even rise to sovereignty in the kingdom of beauty; saw the pale impotence which draws out of the glowing depths of its intellect sufficient strength to subdue a whole vigorous people, bring them to the foot of the Cross, to the feet of impotence; saw the amiable bearing in the empty and severe service of Form; saw the quickly enervating longing and art of the born swindler: if one saw such a fate as this, and all the rest it implied, then one would be forced to doubt whether there were in reality any other heroism than that of weakness. Which heroism, in any case, is more of our time than this?"

Perhaps it is better to give the story of Der Tod in Venedig, from which the above is taken, and to whose hero it applies.

Gustav von Aschenbach, a fine, famous author, over fifty years of age, coming to the end of a long walk one afternoon, sees as he is approaching a burying place, near Munich, a man standing between the chimeric figures of the gateway. This man in the gate of the cemetery is almost the Motiv of the story. By him, Aschenbach is infected with a desire to travel. He examines himself minutely, in a way almost painful in its frankness, and one sees the whole soul of this author of fifty-three. And it seems, the artist has absorbed the man, and yet the man is there, like an exhausted organism on which a parasite has fed itself strong. Then begins a kind of Holbein Totentanz. The story is quite natural in appearance, and yet there is the gruesome sense of symbolism throughout. The man near the burying ground has suggested travel — but whither? Aschenbach sets off to a watering place on the Austrian coast of the Adriatic, seeking some auventure, some passionate adventure, to which his sick soul and unhealthy body have been kindled. But finding himself on the Adriatic, he knows it is not thither that his desire draws him, and he takes ship for Venice. It is all real, and yet with a curious sinister unreality, like decay, the “biological decay.” On board there is a man who reminds one of the man in the gateway, though there is no connexion. And then, among a crowd of young Poles who are crossing, is a ghastly fellow, whom Aschenbach sees is an old man dressed up as young, who capers unsuspected among the youths, drinks hilariously with them, and falls hideously drunk at last on the deck, reaching to the author, and slobbering about “dern allerliebsten, dem schdnsten Liebchen.” Suddenly the upper plate of his false teeth falls on his underlip.

Aschenbach takes a gondola to the Lido, and again the gondolier reminds one of the man in the cemetery gateway. He is, moreover, one who will make no concession, and, in spite of Aschenbach’s demand to be taken back to St. Mark’s, rows him in his black craft to the Lido, talking to himself softly all the while. Then he goes without payment.

The author stays in a fashionable hotel on the Lido. The adventure is coming, there by the pallid sea. As Aschenbach comes down into the hall of the hotel, he sees a beautiful Polish boy of about fourteen, with honey-coloured curls clustering round his pale face, standing with his sisters and their governess.

Aschenbach loves the boy — but almost as a symbol. In him he loves life and youth and beauty, as Hyacinth in the Greek myth. This, I suppose, is blowing the choking heat to pure flame, and raising it to the kingdom of beauty. He follows the boy, watches him all day long on the beach, fascinated by beauty concrete before him. It is still the Kiinstler and his abstraction: but there is also the “yellow ugliness, sensually at a disadvantage,” of the elderly man below it all. But the picture of the writer watching the folk on the beach gleams and lives with a curious, gold-phosphorescent light, touched with the brightness of Greek myth, and yet a modern seashore with folks on the sands, and a half-threatening, diseased sky.

Aschenbach, watching the boy in the hotel lift, finds him delicate, almost ill, and the thought that he may not live long fills the elderly writer with a sense of peace. It eases him to think the boy should die.

Then the writer suffers from the effect of the sirocco, and intends to depart immediately from Venice. But at the station he finds with joy that his luggage has gone wrong, and he goes straight back to the hotel. There, when he sees Tadzin again, he knows why he could not leave Venice.

There is a month of hot weather, when Aschenbach follows Tadzin about, and begins to receive a look, loving, from over the lad’s shoulder. It is wonderful, the heat, the unwholesomeness, the passion in Venice. One evening comes a street singer, smelling of carbolic acid, and sings beneath the veranda of the hotel. And this time, in gruesome symbolism, it is the man from the burying ground distinctly.

The rumour is, that the black cholera is in Venice. An atmosphere of secret plague hangs over the city of canals and palaces. Aschenbach verifies the report at the English bureau, but cannot bring himself to go away from Tadzin, nor yet to warn the Polish family. The secretly pest-smitten days go by. Aschenbach follows the boy through the stinking streets of the town and loses him. And on the day of the departure of the Polish family, the famous author dies of the plague.

It is absolutely, almost intentionally, unwholesome. The man is sick, body and soul. He portrays himself as he is, with wonderful skill and art, portrays his sickness. And since any genuine portrait is valuable, this book has its place. It portrays one man, one atmosphere, one sick vision. It claims to do no more. And we have to allow it. But we know it is unwholesome — it does not strike me as being morbid for all that, it is too well done — and we give it its place as such.

Thomas Mann seems to me the last sick sufferer from the complaint of Flaubert. The latter stood away from life as from a leprosy. And Thomas Mann, like Flaubert, feels vaguely that he has in him something finer than ever physical life revealed. Physical life is a disordered corruption, against which he can fight with only one weapon, his fine aesthetic sense, his feeling for beauty, for perfection, for a certain fitness which soothes him, and gives him an inner pleasure, however corrupt the stuff of life may be. There he is, after all these years, full of disgusts and loathing of himself as Flaubert was, and Germany is being voiced, or partly so, by him. And so, with real suicidal intention, like Flaubert's, he sits, a last too-sick disciple, reducing himself grain by grain to the statement of his own disgust, patiently, self-destructively, so that his statement at least may be perfect in a world of corruption. But he is so late.

Already I find Thomas Mann, who, as he says, fights so hard against the banal in his work, somewhat banal. His expression may be very fine. But by now what he expresses is stale. I think we have learned our lesson, to be sufficiently aware of the fulsomeness of life. And even while he has a rhythm in style, yet his work has none of the rhythm of a living thing, the rise of a poppy, then the after uplift of the bud, the shedding of the calyx and the spreading wide of the petals, the falling of the flower and the pride of the seed-head. There is an unexpectedness in this such as does not come from their carefully plotted and arranged developments. Even Madame Bovary seems to me dead in respect to the living rhythm of the whole work. While it is there in Macbeth like life itself.

But Thomas Mann is old — and we are young. Germany does not feel very young to me.

Extracts from Virginia Woolf's diary

1936

Sunday, June 21st.

After a week of intense suffering - indeed mornings of torture - and I'm not exaggerating - pain in my head - a feeling of complete despair and failure - a head inside like the nostrils after hay fever - here is a cool quiet morning again, a feeling of relief, respite, hope. Just done the Robson: think it good. I am living so constrainedly: so repressedly: I can't make notes of life. Everything is planned, battened down. I do half an hour down here: go up, often in despair: lie down: walk round the Square: come back and do another ten lines. Then to Lords yesterday. Always with a feeling of having to repress control. I see people lying on sofa between tea and dinner. Rose M., Elizabeth Bowen, Nessa. Sat in the Square last night. Saw the dripping green leaves. Thunder and lightning. Purple sky. N. and A. discussing 4/8 time. Cats stealing round. L. dining with Tom and Bella. A very strange, most remarkable summer. New emotions: humility: impersonal joy: literary despair. I am learning my craft in the most fierce conditions. Really reading Flaubert's letters I hear my own voice cry out Oh art! Patience: find him consoling, admonishing. I must get this book quietly, strongly, daringly into shape. But it won't be out till next year. Yet I think it has possibilities, could I seize them. I am trying to cut the characters deep in a phrase: to pare off and compact scenes: to envelop the whole in a medium.

Tuesday, June 23rd.

A good day - a bad day - so it goes on. Few people can be so tortured by writing as I am. Only Flaubert I think. Yet I see it now, as a whole. I think I can bring it off, if I only have courage and patience: take each scene quietly: compose: I think it may be a good book. And then - oh when it's finished!

Not so clear today, because I went to dentist and then shopped. My brain is like a scale: one grain pulls it down. Yesterday it balanced: today dips.

Friday, October 6th.

Well I have succeeded in despite of distractions to belong to other nations in copying out again the whole of Roger. Needless to say, it's still to be revised, compacted, vitalized. And can I ever do it? The distractions are so incessant. I compose articles on Lewis Carroll and read a great variety of books - Flaubert's life, R.'s lectures, out at last, a life of Erasmus and Jacques Blanche. We are asked to lunch with Mrs Webb, who so often talks of us. And my hand seems as tremulous as an aspen. I have composed myself by tidying my room. Can't quite see my way now as to the next step in composition. Tom this weekend. I meant to record a Third Class Railway Carriage conversation. The talk of business men. Their male detached lives. All politics. Deliberate, well set up, contemptuous and indifferent of the feminine. For example: one man hands the Evening Standard, points to a woman's photograph. 'Women? Let her go home and bowl her hoop,' said the man in blue serge with one smashed eye. 'She's a drag on him,' another fragment. The son is going to lectures every night. Odd to look into this cool man's world: so weather tight: insurance clerks all on top of their work; sealed up; self-sufficient; admirable; caustic; laconic; objective; and completely provided for. Yet thin, sensitive: yet schoolboys; yet men who earn their livings. In the early train they said, 'Can't think how people have time to go to war. It must be that the blokes haven't got jobs.' 'I prefer a fool's paradise to a real hell.' 'War's lunacy. Mr Hitler and his set are gangsters. Like Al Capone.' Not a chink through which one can see art, or books. They play crosswords when insurance shop fails.

Balzac in one of his novels gives utterance to the following thought: "Genius is a terrible disease. Every writer of genius cherishes in his heart a monster which devours all his emotions as soon as he gives birth to them. Which is to be the conqueror? Will the disease vanquish the man, or the man the disease? He must be a great man who can establish a perfect equilibrium between his genius and his character. Unless the poet be a giant, unless he be possessed of the shoulders of a Hercules, he must inevitably remain bereft of heart, or else bereft of talent."

Here, unfortunately, Balzac breaks off his dissertation, and does not state what in his opinion is the cause of this disease of genius, why the development and power of the artistic personality stand in many respects in inverse ratio to the development and power of the moral type, or on what fundamental ground depends that primary antagonism between these two elements which is so often to be observed in the daily experience of life. Every one knows, for instance, that writers of talent, artists or musicians, are in the majority of cases men of the most unpractical nature, that their eccentricities and irresponsibility verge not uncommonly on complete moral disintegration, that they are bad fathers of families and bad husbands, and that while expressing great sensitiveness in the forcible language of their works, they very often show themselves in real life to be at heart hard and unfeeling egotists. An enquiry into the origin of the causes responsible for the deep contrast which exists between the æsthetic and ethical points of view, between the artist and the man, between genius and character, would undoubtedly open up one of the most interesting chapters in the history of creative psychology.

Let us take, as an illustration of our thesis, the tragic scene of the destruction of Laocoon, as described in the Æneid. Picture the horror and anguish with which the citizens of Troy witness the seizure and suffocation of Laocoon and his children by the gigantic serpents. The onlookers are filled with terror, grief, and a desire to save the unfortunate victims. In bringing out the psychic differences of constitution among the crowd, the crucial moment of action plays a most important rôle, developing the instinct of self-preservation among the more timid ones, or the efforts of the more manly to lend their aid. Then imagine a sculptor moving about in this wavering and undecided crowd, and studying the terrible tragedy which is being enacted before his eyes as a fit theme for a future work of art. He alone remains an unmoved spectator amid the general confusion, lamentation, cries, and prayers. His moral instincts are all absorbed in an intense æsthetic curiosity. Tears would hinder his vision, and he keeps them sternly back, because it is imperatively necessary for him to see every form, every outline of the muscles distorted under the crushing force of the snakes' huge coils. Every detail of the picture which in the others awakens loathing and terror, evokes in him a joy that is outside the ken of other men. While they weep and waver, the artist rejoices in the expression of agony on the countenance of Laocoon, rejoices that the father is unable to bring aid to his children, that the serpents are compressing their bodies with irresistible force. The next moment, perchance, the man will have conquered the artist. But the deed is done, the fact remains, the moment of cruel contemplation has had the power to brand upon his heart its ineradicable impression.

A series of similar episodes must sooner or later create in the mind of the artist the habit of withdrawing himself from life, of regarding it from one side, from without, from the point of view no longer of a living human being, but from that of an unmoved observer, who seeks in all that comes to pass before his eyes only some material for his own artistic reproduction. And in proportion as his powers of imagination and observation increase, so in equal measure must his sensitiveness and the exercise of that power of will which is indispensable for all moral activity diminish. If nature has neither endowed the mind of the artist with an adamantine stoicism, nor filled his heart with an inexhaustible spring of love, his æsthetic qualities will little by little devour his ethical instincts; genius may, in the words of Balzac, "consume" the heart. In such a case as this, the categories of good and evil which people have most to do with in real life, i.e., the will and the passions, are confused in the artist's mind with the categories of the beautiful and the ugly, the characterless and the characteristic, the artistically interesting and the inane. Wickedness and vice attract the imagination of the poet, if only they be concealed under forms that are externally beautiful and attractive; while virtue looks dull and insignificant unless she can afford some material for a poetical apotheosis.

But the artist excels not only in the quality of being able to contemplate objectively and dispassionately the emotions of others, he is unique also in this, that he can, as an impartial observer, subject his own heart to the same hard, æsthetic scrutiny that he applies to the actions of others. Ordinary people can, or at least believe that they can, entirely recover from the emotions which may have seized upon them, be they transports of love or hatred, of joy or sorrow. An honourable man, when he makes his vow of love to a woman, honestly believes in the truth of that vow — it never enters his head to inquire whether he really is as much in love as he says he is. One would on the face of things expect a poet more than other men to be inclined to give way to emotion, to be credulous, and to let himself be carried away; but in reality there always remains in his soul, however deeply it may be swayed by passion, the power to look into its own depths as into those of a character in a dream or novel; to follow with attention, even in moments of complete intoxication, the infinite intangible changes of his emotions, and to focus upon them the force of his merciless analysis.

Human emotions are hardly ever simple or unalloyed: in the majority of cases they are composed of a mixture of parts differing immensely in the values of their components. And a psychological artist involuntarily discovers so many contradictions in himself and in others, even in moments of genuine exaltation, that by degrees he comes to lose all faith in his own rectitude, as well as in the rectitude of others.

II

The letters of Flaubert, published in two volumes, offer rich material for the study, from a living example, of the question of the antagonism which exists between the artistic and moral personality.

“Art is higher than life”; such is the formula which stands as the corner-stone of the whole, not only of Flaubert’s æsthetic view, but also of his philosophical view of life. As a young man of thirty he writes to one of his school friends: “If I did not introduce into the plot of my poems a French queen of the fifteenth century, I should feel an utter disgust of life, and long ere this a bullet would have freed me from this humiliating folly.” Within a year’s time he is, with half serious rhetoric and youthful enthusiasm, encouraging the same young friend to proceed with his own work. “Let us ever devote ourselves to our art, which, being more powerful than all nations, crowns, or rulers, holds, in virtue of its glorious diadem, eternal sway over the whole universe.” When over forty years of age, and on the verge of the tomb, Flaubert repeats with even greater emphasis and audacity the same device: “L’homme n’est rien; l’œuvre est tout.” — “Man is nothing; work is everything.”

In the flower of his early manhood, though possessed of beauty, wit, and talent, he forsook the world for the sake of his art, like an ascetic in the desert: he immersed himself in his solitude, as the Christian hermits immured themselves in their caverns. “To bury oneself in one’s art, and spurn all else, is the only way to evade unhappiness,” he writes to his friend. “Pride makes up for all things, if there be only a broad enough foundation for it.... I certainly lack little; I should no doubt like to be as generous as the richest, as happy as a lover, as sensuous as those who give up their lives to pleasure; ... But in the meanwhile I covet neither riches, nor love, nor pleasures; ... Now, as for a long time past, I ask only for five or six hours of repose in my own chamber; in winter a big fire in my fireplace, and at night two candles on my table.” A year later he is advising the same friend: “Do as I do, break from the outside world, and live like a bear, like a white bear; send all else to the devil, and yourself as well, everything except only your thoughts. There is at the present moment such a great gulf fixed between myself and the rest of the world, that I oft-times experience a feeling of astonishment when I hear even the most ordinary and natural things; ... there are certain gestures, certain intonations of the voice, which fill me with surprise, and there are certain silly things which nearly make me giddy.”

Even in moments of overwhelming passion, Flaubert places his literary vocation immeasurably above his personal happiness; and love of woman strikes him as insignificant by the side of his love of poetry. “No,” he writes to his fiancée, “you had far better love my art and not myself; for this attachment will never leave you, nor can illness or death deprive you of it. Worship thought, for in thought alone is truth, because it is one and imperishable. Can art, the only thing in life that is true and valuable, be compared with earthly love? Can the adoration of relative beauty be preferred to an eternal worship? Veneration for art — that is the best thing that I possess; it is the one thing for which I respect myself.”

He refuses to see anything relative in poetry, but regards it as absolutely independent of and entirely cut off from life, and as being more real than action; he perceives in art “the most self-satisfying principle imaginable which requires as little external support as a star.” “Like a star,” he says, “fixed and glittering in its own heaven, does art observe the globe of the world revolve; that which is beautiful will never be utterly destroyed.” In the unity of the various portions of a work, in the every detail, in the harmony of the whole, Flaubert feels that “there is some inner essence, something in the nature of a divine force, something like an eternal principle.” “For how otherwise would there exist any relation between the most exact and the most musical expression of thought?”

The sceptic who is not bound by any creed, but has spent his whole life in doubt and hesitation in face of the ideas of God, religion, progress, and scientific humanity, becomes pious and reverential when face to face with the question of art. The true poet is, in his opinion, distinguished from all other people by the divine inspiration of his ideas, “by the contemplation of the immutable (la contemplation de l’immuable), that is to say, religion in the highest sense of the word.” He regrets that he was not born in that age when people worshipped art, when there still existed genuine artists in the world, “whose life and thoughts were the blind instruments of the instinct of beauty. They were the organs of God, by means of which He Himself revealed His true essence to them; for these artists there was no happiness; no one knew how much they suffered; each night as they lay down sadly to rest they gazed wearily at the life of men with an astonished eye, just as we might gaze at an ant-hill.”

To most artists beauty is a more or less abstract quality; to Flaubert it was as concrete an object of passion as is gold to the miser, power to the ambitious, or his lady to the lover. His work was like a deliberate suicide; he gave himself entirely up to it, with the fanaticism of a man possessed by a mania, with the mystic submission and enthusiasm of a martyr, with the awe of a priest as he enters the sacred sanctuary. Thus does he describe his own work: “Sick and irritable at heart, enduring a thousand times in the day moments of anguish and despondency, and having neither wife nor any of the joys of life to distract me, I continue to toil at my weary task, like a good workman who, with sleeves rolled up and brow streaming with sweat, strikes on his anvil without fear of rain or hail, of storm or thunder.” Here is an extract from a biography of Flaubert written by Maupassant, one of his favourite pupils and disciples, which gives an accurate picture of the gifted writer’s energy for work: “His head bowed, his face and brow and neck bathed in moisture, all his muscles tense, like an athlete at the height of the contest, he set himself to face the desperate strife with his ideas and words, rejecting, uniting, or forging them as in an iron grip by the power of his will, condensing them and gradually with superhuman strength working out his thought, and confining it, like a wild beast in a cage, in a definite, indestructible form.”

III

Flaubert, more than any other man, has experienced in his own life, the destructive power of his over-sharpened, analytical disposition. With the malevolence, which was so strangely mingled in him with the then fashionable Byronism, and with a confused presentiment of an impending and inevitable catastrophe, he embarks at the early age of seventeen upon his work of destruction and internal iconoclasm: "I analyse myself and others," he writes to a friend; "I am always anatomizing, and whenever I at last succeed in finding something, which all men consider pure and beautiful, but which is in reality a putrid spot, a gangrene, I shake my head and smile. I have come to the firm conclusion that vanity is the fundamental basis of all things, and that even that which we call conscience is in fact only a concealed and incipient vanity. You give in charity, partly, may be, out of compassion, out of pity, or from horror of suffering and sordidness, but also out of egotism; for the chief motive of your action is the desire to acquire the right to say to yourself: I have done good; there are very few people like me; I respect myself more than other men." Eight years later he writes to his devoted wife: "I love to analyze; it is an occupation that distracts me. Although I am not very much inclined to see the humorous side of things, yet I cannot regard my own personality altogether seriously, because I see myself how ridiculous I am, ridiculous not in the sense of being externally comic, but in the inner sense of that inherent irony which, being present in the life of men, shows itself sometimes even in the most obviously natural actions, in the most ordinary gestures.... All this one feels in oneself, but it is hard to explain. You do not understand it, because in you it is as simple and genuine as in a beautiful hymn of love and poetry. For I regard myself as a sort of arabesque or marquerie work; there are within me pieces of ivory and of gold and of iron, some of painted paper, others of brilliants, and others again of lead."

This life is so rich in visions and imaginings, that they finally obscure the real world altogether, and receive in passing through this medium a reflected colouring in addition to their own. "I always see the antithesis of things; the sight of a child inevitably suggests to my mind the thought of old age; the sight of a cradle, the idea of the grave. When I look at my wife, I think of myself as her skeleton. That is why scenes of happiness sadden me, while sad things leave me indifferent. I weep so much internally in my own soul, that my tears cannot flow outwardly as well; things that I read of in a book agitate me much more than any actually existing sorrows.” Here we encounter a distinguishing trait of the majority of natures that are gifted with strong artistic temperaments. “The more oppressed I feel, the more melancholy and highly strung and prone to tears and to give myself over to a sense of imaginary suffering, so much the more do my real feelings remain dry and hard and dead within my heart; they are crystallized within it.” This is the mental attitude described by Pushkin:

“In vain did I appeal to the emotions within me, With unmoved ears I heard the breath of Death, And all unmoved I gazed on her. So that is what I loved with flaming soul, With such intensity of passion, With so great anguish and agony of love, With such torment and unreason! Where is now pain and where is love? Alas, for the poor credulous shade in my soul! For the sweet memory of days for ever passed I can now find neither tears nor reproaches.”

This condition of incomprehensible indifference towards the beloved one, this despair arising not out of grief, but as a result of his own coldness, of his lack of commiseration and pity was all too familiar to Flaubert; and according to his custom, he boldly proceeds to analyse this trait, which it is the one endeavour of most other artists to conceal, not only from others, but even from themselves, regarding it mistakenly as a form of egoism that is entirely in conflict with Nature. He describes his feelings at the grave of his dearly loved sister: “I was as cold as the grave-stone, and only terribly bored.” What does he do at the moment when an ordinary man, forgetful of all else, would give himself up entirely to his grief? With pitiless curiosity, “himself catching nothing of their emotions,” he analyzes them “like an artist.” “This melancholy occupation alleviated my grief remarkably,” he writes to a friend, “perhaps you will regard me as utterly heartless if I confess to you that my present sorrow” (that is to say the grief experienced at the death of his sister) “does not strike me as the heaviest lot that I have ever had to endure. At times when there was apparently nothing to be sad about, it has been my fate to be much sadder.” A little further on comes a long discourse upon the Infinite, upon Nirvana, — a discourse in which the author gives utterance to much inspired poetry, but to very little simple human sorrow.

In the letter in which Flaubert describes the funeral of a friend of his childhood, his æsthetic cult of sadness reaches a still higher plane of meditateness. “On the body of the departed there appeared the signs of a terrible transformation; we hid the corpse in a double shroud. So covered, he looked like an Egyptian mummy enveloped in the bandages of the tomb, and I cannot describe the feelings of joy and freedom which I experienced at sight of him at that moment. There was a white mist over everything, the forest trees stood out against the sky, and the funeral lights were still shining in the pallor of the dawning day; the birds were twittering, and I recalled a verse of his poem: ‘He flies away like a winged bird to meet the rising sun in the pine wood,’ or, to put it better, I heard his voice uttering these words and the whole day long they haunted me with their enchantment. They placed him in the ante-chamber, the doors were left ajar, and the cool morning air penetrated into the room, mingled with a refreshing rain, which had just then begun to fall.... My soul was filled with emotions, till then unknown, and upon it there flamed forth like summer lightning such thoughts as I can never repeat again: a thousand recollections of the dead were wafted to me on the fumes of the incense, in the chords of the music.” ... And here the artist, in the midst of his æsthetic abstraction, converts his genuine grief into a thing of beauty, so that in his enlightened view the death of his beloved friend not only causes him no pang, or suffering, but, on the contrary, gives him a mystic resignation, incomprehensible to ordinary men, an ecstasy that is foreign to and removed from life, a joy that is entirely impersonal.

During his sojourn in Jerusalem, Flaubert paid a visit to the lepers. Here is the account of his impressions: “This place (that is the plot of land set aside for those who are afflicted with leprosy) is situated outside the town, near a marsh, whence a host of crows and vultures arose and took their flight at our approach. The poor sufferers, both women and men (in all about a dozen persons) lie all huddled together in a heap. They have no covering on their heads, and there is no distinction of sex. Their bodies are covered with putrefying scars, and they have sombre cavities in place of noses. I was forced to put on my eye-glasses in order to discover what was hanging to the ends of their arms. Were they hands, or were they some greenish-looking rags? They were hands! (There is a prize for colourists!) A sick man was dragging himself to the water's edge to drink some water. Through his mouth, which yawned black and empty of the gums, that seemingly had been burned away, the palate was clearly visible. A rattle sounded in his throat as he dragged the limbs of his dead-white body towards us. And all around us reigned tranquil Nature, the ripples of the stream, the green of the trees, all bubbling over with the abundance of sap and youth, and the coolness of the shadows beneath the scorching sun." This extract is taken from no novel, in which a poet might force himself to be objective, but from a traveller's notes, from a letter to a friend, wherein the author has no kind of motive for concealing the subjective character of his emotions. And yet in spite of this, except for the two rather common-place epithets of "poor wretches" (pauvres misérables), there is not a single touch of pity, not even a suggestion of compassion.

IV

“I am not a Christian” (je ne suis pas Chrétien), says Flaubert in a letter to Georges Sand. The French Revolution was, in his opinion, unsuccessful, because it was too intimately bound up with the idea of religious pity. The idea of equality, on which is based the essence of the democracy of to-day, is a contradiction of all the principles of equity. See what a preponderating influence is given at this day to grace. Emotion is everything, justice nothing. “We are degenerating owing to our superfluity of indulgence and of compassion, and to our moral drought.” “I am convinced,” he remarks, “that the poor envy the rich, and that the rich fear the poor; it will be so for ever — and vain it is to preach the Gospel of Love.”

Flaubert tries to justify his instinctive antipathy to the idea of brotherhood by the assertion that this idea is always found to be in irreconcilable contradiction to the principle of equity. “I hate democracy (in the sense at least in which the word is accepted in France), that is to say the magnifying of grace to the detriment of justice, the negation of right — in a word, the anti-social principle (l’anti-sociabilité).” “The gift of grace (within the province of theology) is the negation of justice; what right has a man to demand any change in the execution of the law?” Yet he hardly believes in this principle himself, and only enunciates it in order to have an argument with which to refute the idea of brotherhood. At least this is what he says, in a moment of complete frankness, in a letter to an old friend: “Human justice seems to me the most unstable thing in the whole world. The sight of a man daring to judge his neighbour would send me into convulsions of laughter if it did not arouse my disgust and pity, and if I were not at the present moment” (he was at that time engaged in studying for the law) “obliged to study a system of absurdities, by virtue of which men consider that they acquire the right to judge. I know of nothing so absurd as law, except, perhaps, the study of it.” In another letter he confesses that he never could understand the abstract and dry conception of duty, and that “it did not seem to him to be inherent in the nature of mankind (il ne me paraît pas inhérent aux entrailles humaines).” Evidently, then he believes as little in the idea of justice as he does in that of fraternity. As a matter of fact, he has no moral ideal.

“There is only one thing in the world that I really value, and that is beautiful verse; an elegant, harmonious, melodious style; the warmth of the sun; a picturesque landscape; moonlight nights; antique statues, and the character in a profile.... I am a fatalist, in fact, like a Mahometan, and I believe that all that we do for the progress of humanity is of no use. As to this idea of progress, I am mentally incapable of grasping such nebulous and dreary conceptions. All the nonsense talked on this subject simply bores me beyond endurance.... I cherish a deep respect for the ancient form of tyranny, for to me it is the finest expression of humanity that has ever been made manifest.” “I have few convictions,” he writes to Georges Sand, “but one of those I have I cherish firmly — it is the conviction that the masses are always composed of idiots. And yet one may not consider the masses as stupid, because within them is concealed the seed of an incalculable fecundity (d’une fécondité incalculable).”

Flaubert makes a half-jesting attempt to contrast the doctrines of the socialists with his own ideas of the political order of the future. “The only logical conclusion is an administration consisting of mandarins, if only these mandarins be possessed of some knowledge, and if possible, even considerable knowledge. The mass of the people will thus always remain as minors, and will always hold the lowest place in the hierarchy of the social orders, seeing that it is composed of unlimited numbers.... In this lawful aristocracy of the present time is our whole salvation.” ... “Humanity represents nothing new. Its irremediable worthlessness filled my soul even in my early youth with bitterness. And that is why I now experience no disappointment. I am convinced that the crowd, the common herd will always be odious.... Until the time comes when men shall submit to set up mandarins, and shall have substituted for the Roman Pope an Academy of Sciences, until that time comes, all politics, and all society even to its deepest roots, must be merely a collection of revolting lies (de blagues écœurantes.)” Nevertheless in his novel “Bouvard et Pécuchet” Flaubert makes every effort to destroy faith even in the strength of the principles of science, and to prove that modern science is as impermanent a structure, as contradictory and superstitious a system as was the theology of the Middle Ages. To his disbelief in science Flaubert, moreover, is constantly giving utterance: thus, for instance, when he comes upon the Positivism of Comte, he finds this system “unbearably stupid” (c’est assommant de bêtise).

V

We have thus seen that Flaubert's attempt to reach a compromise with regard to the preponderating tendency of the age did not succeed; of his views respecting the structure of society, the only true one is his insight into the lower classes of the people. "However well you may feed the animal man, however thickly you gild his stable, even though you give him the softest and most luxurious litter, still he will ever remain a beast. The only progress upon which one can count is the effort to make the beast less of a cannibal. But as to raising the level of his ideas, or inspiring the masses with a broader conception of God, I seriously doubt whether this can ever be achieved."

In another letter he frankly admits that he has no faith, no principles of morality, no political ideals, and in this admission, wrung from the depths of his heart, the note of despair is already struck: "In the present day there seems to be as little possibility of establishing any new belief as of obtaining respect for the old faith. And so I seek and fail to find that one idea upon which all the rest should depend." These few words throw a clearer light on the attitude of Flaubert during the latter years of his life than anything else. Formerly he had found this idea in his art, while now he assumes that there is another and higher basis, upon which art itself must rest; but to find this principle is beyond his power. He seeks forgetfulness in work, but work only brings exhaustion, and he is still more dissatisfied. He realises his singularity, and it draws him out of his objective attitude into that incomprehensible existence, the very conception of which he himself denies.

The real tragedy of his position lies in the fact that he is alone in the midst of a strange and unknown world. And little by little his despair reaches its utmost limits: "Whenever I am without a book in my hand, or whenever I am not writing, such anguish seizes on me that I simply find myself on the verge of tears." So he writes in a letter to Georges Sand. "It seems to me that I have literally turned into a fossil, and that I am deprived of all connection with the universe around me." "A feeling of universal destruction and agony possesses me, and I am deathly sad." "When I am tired out from my work, I grow anxious about myself. No one remembers me, I belong to another sphere. My professional friends are so little friendly to me.” “I pass whole weeks without exchanging a word with a single human creature, and at the end of the week I find it hard to recall any special day or any particular event during the course of that time. On Sundays I see my mother and niece, and that is all. A gathering of rats in the attic, that is my whole society. They make an infernal noise over my head, when the rain is not roaring, and the wind is not howling. The nights are blacker than coal, and a silence is all around me, infinite as in the desert. One’s senses are terribly sharpened in such surroundings, and my heart starts beating at the slightest sound.” “I am losing myself in the reminiscences of my youth, like an old man. Of life I ask nothing more, save a few sheets of paper that I may scratch ink upon. I feel as though I were wandering through an endless desert, wandering, not knowing whither; and that at one and the same time, I am the wanderer, and the camel, and the desert.” “One hope alone sustains me, that soon I shall be parted from life, and that I shall surely find no other existence that might be still more painful.... No, no! Enough of misery!”

All his letters to Georges Sand are one weary restless martyr’s confession of the “disease of genius.” Sometimes a simple plaint bursts from him, and in it, through the impenetrable pride of the fighter, can be detected something soft and broken, as in the voice of a man who is over-tired. The fury of his enemies, the calumnies of his friends, the lack of understanding of his critics, no longer wounded his self-pride; he merely hated them. “All this avalanche of folly neither disturbs nor grieves me. Only one would prefer to inspire one’s fellow men with pleasant feelings.”

Then finally, even his last consolation — his art — deserts him. “In vain I gather my strength; the work will not come, will not come. Everything disturbs and upsets me. In the presence of others I can still control myself, but when I am alone I often burst into such senseless, spasmodic tears that I think I am going to die from them.” In his declining years, when he can no longer turn to the past, and no longer correct his life, he asks himself the question: what if even that beauty, in the name of which he has destroyed his faith in God, in life, and in humanity, is as visionary and delusive as all else? What if his art, for the sake of which he had given up his life, his youth, and happiness, and love, should have abandoned him on the very edge of the grave?

“The Shadow is enveloping me,” he says, as he realises that the end is at hand. This exclamation is as the cry of eternal anguish uttered before his death by another artist, Michael Angelo, the brother of Flaubert in his ideals and aims and genius:

“Io parto a mano a mano, Crescemi ognor piu l’ombra, e il sol vien manco, E son presso a cadere, infermo e stanco.” “Inch by inch I sink, The shadows lengthen, the sun sinks down, And I am ready to depart, Broken and weary.”

Death struck him down at his work-table, quite suddenly, like a thunder-bolt. Dropping his pen from his hand, he sank down lifeless, killed by his one great, single passion, the love of his art.

Plato in one of his myths relates how the souls of men travel in chariots on winged steeds along the heavenly way; to some of whom it is given after a short time to approach that spot whence is visible the domain of Ideas; with yearning do they gaze aloft, and a few stray rays of light fall deep down among them. Then, when these souls are re-incarnated, to return and suffer on earth, all that is best in the human heart appeals to them and touches them, as a reflection of some eternal light, as a confused remembrance of another world, into which it was granted them to peep for the space of a single moment.

Surely there must have fallen upon the soul of Flaubert in the glorious sphere of the imagination a ray of beauty that was perhaps too bright.
